43329

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43020

VOLUME CXXI

JULY 1, 1925, TO DECEMBER 30, 1925

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

http://archive.org/details/nation121julnewy

43020

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXI

July 1, 1925, to December 30, 1925

(Nos. 3130-3156)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Articles
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

A., W.
Birthday greetings; C..... 234
Abd-el-Krim
Krim faces Europe. M. M. Knight; S.... 252
Academic freedom
Dayton—and after; E..... 155
Accidents. See also Automobile accidents
Accused. E. Brieux; D..... 446
Adam Solitaire; D..... 604
Advertising
Farmer goes into business. F. F. Peters; S..... 67
Miami the mighty; E..... 183
Aeronautics, Commercial
Civilian aircraft problem; E..... 695
Subsidized Egypt-India Co.; EP..... 3
Aeronautics, Military
Americans in Morocco; EP.....292, 344, 560
Seven years after. D. Horton; S..... 375
Africa, Southwest
Rehoboth question. A. E. Johnson; S.... 186
After the recital. L. Ridge; P..... 403
Agriculture—Economic aspects
Deflated farmer. J. W. Quigley; S..... 140
Mr. Coolidge beguiles the farmer; E..... 721
Agriculture—Great Britain
Lloyd George's land campaign. J. A. Hobson; S..... 542
Agriculture—Russia
Russian agricultural progress. H. M. Ware; C..... 598
Aidline-Trommer, Elbert
A sail; C..... 210
Air mail. See Postal service, Aerial
Alcaeus to the tenth muse. M. T. Ritter; P.. 278
Alien property. See Enemy property
Aliens
Eight days on Ellis Island. R. Hunter; S 483
Alimony
Justice Strong on alimony; EP..... 345
All dressed up. A. Richman; D..... 364
All that by any feat of light. R. Holden; P.. 424
Allen, J. Egert
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Allen, Robert S.
La Follette trail in Wisconsin; C..... 330
Allinson, Brent Dow
Life or death for the League; S..... 511
Aluminum trust; EP.....502, 637
Amalgamated clothing workers; EP.....265, 612
American civil liberties union
Sweet land of liberty..... 402
American federation of labor
Atlantic City convention; EP..... 476
Labor combats waste; E..... 565
Strictly nonpartisan; EP..... 181
American literature
Indian and Hottentot; Dt..... 514
Last days of the charming lady. A. Tate; S..... 485
"Native" literature; E..... 348
Transatlantic criticism; E..... 267
American woolen company; EP..... 537
Americana collector; EP..... 719
Amundsen, Roald E. G; EP..... 3
Anderson, Mary
Women's capacity for work; C..... 760
Anderson, Maxwell
Outside looking in. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 338
Anderson, Maxwell, and Stallings, L.
First flight. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 390
Anderson, William H; Dt..... 384
Andrews, H. G.
War among the railroads; S..... 184
Androcles and the lion. G. B. Shaw; D..... 688
Annunzio, Garbriele d'; EP..... 132
Antioch College
Denies admission to Negro; EP..... 612
Antonia; D..... 551
Arkansas
Arkansawyers, attention! B. Fulks; C... 735
Arlen, Michael
Green hat. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 363
Armaments
Arms for the Riff. M. M. Knight; S..... 327
Competitive race continues; EP..... 151
Publicity for armaments; IP..... 149
Armaments. See also Disarmament
Armistice day
Boston insults its heroes. R. L. Lurie; S 596
Arms and the man. G. B. Shaw; D..... 364
Armstrong, Hamilton Fish
Serbo-Croat dispute; IS..... 101
Arnold, Marguerite
Box; P..... 235
Artists
Artists, take notice. A. E. Spingarn; C.. 95
Ascher, Charles S.
Bach festival; M..... 50
Ash, David Fuller
Poe and his contemporaries; C..... 282
Athletics
At Chicago university; EP..... 693
College athletics—play or work?; E..... 615
Atlantic City. Drifter's visit; Dt..... 167
Austen, Jane
Rare Jane Austen; E..... 750
Australia
Election results; EP..... 717
Authors
Writing for money. R. V. Hardon; S... 208
Authors, American
American background. E. L. Masters; S 226
Can an artist live in America? L. Lewisohn; S..... 423
Can an artist live in America S. Lewis; S..... 662
United States and the artist. Z. Gale; S.. 22
Authorship
Literary delusions; E..... 248
Automobile accidents
Massacre of the innocents. B. Shadwell; C..... 386
Speed-murder. B. Shadwell; C..... 734
Autumn nocturne. D. Morton; P..... 619

B

B., J. W.
Lead us to it; C..... 37
Bach festival. C. S. Ascher; M..... 50
Baker, R. J.
Benjamin R. Tucker's publications; C.... 654
Bakeries
Bread and water; E..... 504
Baldwin, Celia
Binding the Filipinos; C..... 572
Banks and banking
Discount rates; EP..... 587
Gotham national bank suit; EP..... 266
More power to the bankers. W. Z. Ripley; S..... 618
Tariff happy family; E..... 614
Barber, Ruth Janet
The cheat; P..... 300
Barnes, Harry Elmer
Poincaré's guilt in the war; S..... 380
Bartlett, Ruth
He knew the newspapers; C..... 488
Bartlett, Ruth Fitch
Portrait in the horizontal; P..... 211
Baruch, Bernard
Seven years after; E..... 134
Baseball
By radio; Dt..... 487
Bass, Altha Leah
Oil; S..... 188
Bass, Basil N.
Flaming coffins; S..... 507
Batchelder, Samuel F.
Washington Elm; EP..... 83
Bates, Ernest Sutherland
Logic; S..... 595
Vegetarian and the tiger; S..... 595
Bates, Katharine Lee
Mr. Bok's national song. C. E. Vose; C.. 143
Bausman, Frederick
Capital punishment; C..... 624
Bayreuth today. P. Sanborn; M..... 520
Bazinet, John L. Miracles; C..... 516
Beck, Sir Adam
Sir Adam Beck and his job; E..... 249
Bejarano, J. M., translator
Sign. A. Nervo; P..... 170
Belgium
Budgets, taxes, and waste; E..... 748
New government; EP..... 84
Owned by Wall st; EP..... 638
Women's suffrage in Belgium. A. Somerhausen; IS..... 574
Bell, Stephen
How free is Britain's free trade?; C..... 304
Bent, Silas
Are profits the cause of war?; C..... 281
Deep water runs still; S..... 62
Berrying; Dt..... 209
Beware of widows. O. Davis; D..... 740
Biography
Biography and brilliance; E..... 223
Lives and times; E..... 399
Bird music. J. Rorty; P..... 403
Birds. R. Jeffers; P..... 333
Birth control
Birth-control laws in Europe. M. W. Dennett; C..... 36
Gandhi on birth control; I..... 243
Society of Friends pamphlet; EP..... 85
Bishop, G. H.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Black, MacKnight
Christ dead; P..... 144
Black, Ruby A.
Jobs for women; S..... 648
Blackwell, Alice Stone
"Old feminists"; C..... 332
Blanshard, Paul
Bolshevism in China; S..... 323
Inquiring reporter in Shanghai; S..... 299
Boats in a fog. R. Jeffers; P..... 333
Bogan, Louise
If we take all gold; P..... 464
Bohn, William E.
Anthracite country—another view; C..... 760
Bok, Edward W.
Mr. Bok's national song. C. E. Vose; C.. 143
Bond, Drew
Dayton; C..... 168
Book reviews. See also Literary criticism
Books and reading
Books. M. Gorki; S..... 541
First editions; EP..... 613
Hearst newspapers' advice; EP..... 85
Retribution. Mueller, W. C.; C..... 190
What they read in Soviet Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 538
Borah, William E.
On League's China resolution; EP..... 317
Ten senators on the world court..... 751
War claims and national honor; E..... 720
Boston insults its heroes. R. L. Lurie; S.... 596
Bourdin, H. L., and Williams, S. T., editors
Crèvecoeur the loyalist; S..... 328
Bourgeois, Léon. Obituary; EP..... 397
Bouton, S. Miles
Class justice in Germany; C..... 256
Bowen, Betsy, and Stephen Jumel. W. H. Shelton; C..... 257
Box. M. Arnold; P..... 235
Boyd, Ernest
Literary executioner; E..... 695
Braman, Oklahoma
Oil. A. L. Bass; S..... 188
Braverman, Barnet
Barnet Braverman; C..... 282
Breakfasts; Dt..... 189
Brieux, Eugene
Accused. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D... 446
Bristol, Mark L.
Returns to Turkey; EP..... 612
Brown, David A.
Jewish relief abroad; C..... 514
Brown, W. Norman
India's new intransigence; IS..... 766
Brown, W. T.
Dayton; C..... 168
Brown, William Montgomery
Bishop Brown's beliefs. S. P. Delany; C 331
Deposed; EP..... 449
"Provably," not "probably." R. F. Nye; C 734
William Montgomery Brown. R. F. Nye; C..... 653
Brussard, Edgar Bernard; EP..... 103
Bryan, William Jennings
Darrow vs. Bryan. J. W. Krutch; S..... 136
William Jennings Bryan; E..... 154
Bryant, Louise
A Turkish divorce; S..... 231
Buffalo. Free from the U. S.; EP..... 319
Bulbs
Worms and Dutch bulbs. N. Van Aken; S..... 701
Bulgaria
Bulgarian execution; I..... 524
Bulgarian protest; I..... 312
Censorship in Bulgaria; I..... 524
Press comment in Bulgaria; IP..... 523
Trouble with Greece; EP..... 501
Busick, Charles O.
California justice; E..... 182
Business conditions
Herbert Hoover—super-business man; G. T. Odell; S..... 325
Mr. Gary prophesies prosperity; E..... 530
Butler
Why omit Smedley Butler? T. R. Keniston; C..... 210
Butter and egg man. G. Kaufman; D..... 446

Byington, Steven T.
Clothes; S ... 89
Have the French read Flaubert?; C ... 143
"Hobo" and "gay-cat"; C ... 573
Bynner, Witter
Night in Mexico; P ... 280
Byrd, Howard; EP ... 103
Byrnes, Lillian Tramp; P ... 305

C

Caillaux, Joseph
Debt problem; EP ... 395, 450
Political history; EP ... 369
California
California injustice. C. K. McClatchy; C 544
California justice; E ... 182
Educating gifted children; EP ... 747
Guilt by association; E ... 505
San Quentin and The Nation; EP ... 395
Water-power fight in California. H. W. Laidler; S ... 508
California. See also Los Angeles
Call of life. A. Schnitzler; D ... 494
Calles, Plutarco Elias
Mexico today; S ... 18
Cambridge, Mass. Washington elm; EP ... 83
Cameron, Ralph H.
Canyons and Camerons. A. Warner; S ... 481
Canada
Canadian progressives divide and fall. D. MacKay; S ... 727
Liberal defeat; EP ... 528
Meighan on war; EP ... 747
Canary Dutch; D ... 338
Cancer; E ... 133
Capital punishment
Capital punishment. F. Bausman; C ... 624
Is it a deterrent?; EP ... 451
League for abolition; EP ... 132
Capper, Arthur
Ten senators on the world court ... 751
Carmichael. K. Fearing; P ... 359
Carolinian; D ... 584
Cartoons ... 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 19, 22, 225, 252, 271, 272, 274, 275, 277, 299, 300, 323, 381, 382, 533, 535, 540, 541, 591, 592
Casamajor, Mary
Why they stop their subscriptions; C ... 282
Catholic church. See Roman Catholic church
Censorship
In England; EP ... 200
Justice Ford again; Dt ... 94
"Replenishing Jessica"; EP ... 85
Chamberlain, Austen; EP ... 559
Charles, Fred
McIntosh chair of banking; C ... 118
Charlot revue; D ... 604
Charteris, James E.
Faked war atrocity; EP ... 475, 502
General Charteris falsifies again; E ... 563
Chase, Stuart
Soup, soap, and shoes; S ... 728
Chauffeurs. See also Taxicab drivers
Cheat. R. J. Barber; P ... 300
Chemical foundation; EP ... 746
Chen, Ping-Tsang
Chinese customs; IS ... 631
Chenkin, Rose Y.
Diet; C ... 410
Chicago Daily news. Trusteeship; EP ... 345
Chicherin, George
Chicherin and the Russian debt. P. Hibben; S ... 732
Chichester, James Meeting; P ... 761
Child labor
Child labor in China; IP ... 80
Child study association; EP ... 476
Children, Gifted
California's education plan; EP ... 747
Chile
White terror in liberal Chile. A. Roller; IS ... 415
Chile. See also Tacna-Arica question
China
Bolshevism in China. P. Blanshard; S ... 323
Chamberlain's speech; EP ... 559
Child labor in China; IP ... 80
China and the Washington conference; I ... 124
China conference and after; E ... 347
China's servitudes. C. Hodges; IS ... 176
Chinese customs. P.-T. Chen; IS ... 631
Chinese demands; I ... 339
Chinese student revolt; I ... 127
Conferences; EP ... 83, 245, 317, 476, 611
Fair play to China; E ... 320
Foreign powers; EP ... 55, 131, 199, 219
Foreign protests; I ... 128
Inquiring reporter in Shanghai. P. Blanshard; S ... 299
International Ph. D.'s. P. Hutchinson; S 253
Meaning of Shanghai. H. F. Ward; S ... 108
Speaking of Shanghai. A. Rarig; C ... 234
Strike; EP ... 1, 179, 245
Two missionary statements; I ... 340
W. L. Clause article; EP ... 293
What are we doing in China?; E ... 106
What China asks; E ... 293
Chinese in the U. S.
Hip Sing Tong convention; EP ... 691
In Chinatown and in China; E ... 398
New York strike meeting; EP ... 345
Philadelphia Chinatown raids; EP ... 317
Police run wild in Cleveland. R. T. Herrick; S ... 401
Sauce for the gander. J. A. Towle; C ... 573
Chisolm, William Wallace
Dayton; C ... 168
Christ dead. M. Black; P ... 144
Christianity
Purging of Christianity. New York Lawyer; C ... 94
Christmas
Fur mammy's honey boy. R. M. Jonas; C 703
Christy, Bayard H.
Birthday greetings; C ... 233
City chap; D ... 604
City managers
Making the cities' business businesslike. X. Y. Z.; C ... 703
Clapper, Raymond
Uncle Sam's sweatshop; S ... 91
Clark, Victor S.
Birthday greetings; C ... 234
Cleghorn, S. N.
Birthday greetings; C ... 233
Cleveland, Ohio
Police run wild in Cleveland. R. T. Herrick; S ... 401
Proportional representation; EP ... 220
Cline, Leonard
Behind this prohibition; S ... 250
Clinton papers appear; E ... 5
Does prohibition prohibit?; C ... 410
Clothing and dress
Clothes. S. T. Byington; S ... 89
Men's clothing; Dt ... 571
Morality and clothes. C. E. Payne, E. D. Tittmann, M. A. De Ford; C ... 234
Women, bless 'em!; E ... 135
Coal industry—Great Britain
British constitutionalism and the coal settlement. J. R. MacDonald; S ... 225
England's socialist tories; E ... 181
Strike threat; EP ... 152
Coal industry—United States
Atlantic City conferences; EP ... 103
Coal; business as usual; E ... 86
Coal digger on coal. E. Hauer; C ... 358
Coal strike from inside. J. R. Robinson; C ... 734
Coolidge and coal; E ... 564
Letter to the miners' chief; E ... 268
Pinchot plan; EP ... 691
Settling the coal strike; E ... 641
Standing in the need of prayer; E ... 269
Wage negotiations; EP ... 180
Coal miners
Anthracite country. A. Hard; S ... 592, 621
Anthracite country—another view. W. E. Bohn; C ... 760
Cohen, Morris R.
Jewish relief abroad; C ... 515
Colbert, Carl
Birthday greetings; C ... 233
Colbron, Grace Isabel
Lives of great men; C ... 734
College of the city of New York
Revolt against military training; E ... 616
EP ... 639, 718
College students
College undergraduates; E ... 564
Princeton conference; EP ... 718
Colleges and universities—United States
College athletics—play or work?; E ... 615
College publications; EP ... 693
Militarizing America's youth; E ...
Private money for state universities. J. Jastrow; C ...
Problem of admission; EP ...
Revolt against military training; E ...
Shall state universities take "tainted money"? Z. Gale; S ...
Colleges and universities—U. S. See also Coll of the city of New York; Duke universi
George Peabody college; Ohio universi
Princeton university; Trinity college; V derbilt university; Western Reserve uni sity; Wisconsin university
Color prejudice. See Race prejudice Commerce
Capitalizing calamity; E ...
What does the world want?; EP ...
Communism
Communist art. L. Fischer; S ...
Communist party (Great Britain); EP ...
Communists sentenced in London; EP ...
Completion. J. Daly; P ...
Composed while under arrest. M. Y. Lhermontov; P ...
Conference on the limitation of armaments, W ington, D. C., 1921
China and the Washington conference; I ...
Connors, Tom
California justice; E ...
Contemporaries. L. Ridge; P ...
Contempt of court
"Constructive contempt"; EP ...
Cook, A. J.
British miner's prophet. W. Midgley; S ...
Cookery
Can brides cook? E ...
Pies that mother made. R. H. Lewis; C ...
Coolidge, Calvin
And the coal strike; EP ...
And the press; EP ...
Boring from within. G. W. Norris; S ...
Coolidge and coal; E ...
Exuberance of Senator Pepper. F. R. Kent; S ...
French debt and the press; EP ... 343
King Calvin; E ... 296
Leadership and politics; EP ... 745
Little Bob wins. F. R. Kent; S ... 758
Mr. Coolidge beguiles the farmer; E ... 721
Mr. Coolidge faces a test; E ... 346
Mr. Coolidge's new-old message. F. R. Kent; S ... 570
Mr. Coolidge's wonderful speech; E ... 452
Speeches; EP ... 83, 611
Coolidge, Elizabeth Sprague
Royal gift; E ... 454
Cooperation
Control through cooperation. F. R. Rosseel; C ... 304 Corporations
More power to the bankers. W. Z. Ripley; S ... 618
Cost of living
Coolidge's figures; EP ... 639
Quality and prices. R. Reimann; C ... 71
Coughlan, M. Fay
Anita Whitney's conviction; C ... 759
Coward, Noel
Easy virtue. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 739
Hay fever. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 469
Vortex. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 391
Craig's wife. G. Kelly; D ... 521
Cramer, R. Melville
Modern slavery in Africa; I ... 195
Crane, John O.
Czecho-Slovak elections; IS ... 714
Crane, Nathalia. Infant muse; E ... 589
Cravath, Paul D.
Oil, judges, and the law; C ... 190
Crèvecœur the loyalist. The grotto; an unpublished letter from the American farmer; edited by H. L. Bourdin and S. T. Williams; S ... 328
Crime and criminals
Dean Pound on crime wave; EP ... 267
Experiment in freedom. W. Reswick; S ... 535
In Britain and U. S.; EP ... 370
Making criminals out of soldiers. F. L. Holmes; S ... 114
Criswell, Jimmie
What little Mary learned about history ... 166
Croatia
Serbo-Croat dispute. H. F. Armstrong; IS ... 101
Cromwell, Seymour L. Obituary; EP ... 345
Crothers, Rachel
Lady's virtue. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 713
Cullen, Countee
Loss of love; P ... 32
Cullen, Lewis J.
Nordics find a defender; C ... 488
Czechoslovak Republic
Czecho-Slovak elections. J. O. Crane; IS. 714

D

Dailey, Hudson S.
Birthday greetings; C ... 233
Daly, James
Completion; P ... 406
Damon, S. Foster
Dusk; P ... 12
Dana, John Cotton; EP ... 105
Danziger, Samuel
"More power to his jaw"; C ... 734
D'Arcy, Hugh; Dt ... 597
Darrow, Clarence
Darrow vs. Bryan. J. W. Krutch; S ... 136
new intransigence. W. N. Brown; ... 766 the east; E ... 5
ht F.; EP ... 475
W.; EP ... 746
of widows. Criticism. J. W. h; D ... 740 ome easy go. Criticism. J. W. h; D ... 584 nnessee. H. K. Hollister; S ... 61
... 713
ndependent; EP ... 221 ttle boys. A. Tate; P ... 663
lty. See Capital punishment eneral
o and his accusers; I ... 366
lic
French agreement; EP ... 265
debt agreement; EP ... 246 in and the Russian debt. P. Hib- S ... 732 and deception; E ... 223
, Italy and the U. S.; EP ... 559 colonies and debts. P. J. Wester; C 386 debts and Liberian rubber; E ... 479 nd U. S. agree; EP ... 585
tte, we want our money. A. S. ted, 2nd; S ... 723 for a girl's room. H. Gregory; P ... 283 he army of art. V. Mayakovsky; P. 537 y; EP ... 83
Miriam Allen
y and clothes; C ... 234
gainst evolution; C ... 143
Jacob relief abroad; C ... 515
H. Mullins; P ... 625
lden P.
Brown's beliefs; C ... 331 rt
, bankrupt; S ... 138

France's dangerous adventure; S..... 277
Only hope in France; S..... 651
Protocols, pacts, alliances; S..... 408
See-saw in France; S..... 591
Democracy
Facing our world; E..... 248
Denmark
Disarmament and credit. P. Jones; C.... 331
Disarmament in Denmark. J. Moritzen; IS 655
Dennett, Mary Ware
Birth-control laws in Europe; C..... 36
Depew, Chauncey; EP..... 345
Déri, Emery
Horthy or Bethlen? IS..... 262
Detroit
Negro segregation comes north. W. White; S..... 458
Street railways; EP..... 246
Devil to pay. H. Heijermans; D..... 740
Dictionary of American biography; EP..... 85
Diesel-engines
Motor ship passenger service; EP..... 639
Diet. R. Y. Chenkin; C..... 410
Dilemma. V. Moore; P..... 191
Disarmament
Conference plans; EP..... 344
Disarmament and credit. P. Jones; C.... 331
Disarmament in Denmark. J. Moritzen; IS 655
Proposed conference; EP..... 717
Disarmament. See also Armaments
Diving
'Twixt wood and water; E..... 373
Dobrée, Bonamy
Timotheus; E..... 641
Doheny, Edward L.; EP..... 84
Dole, Charles
Dayton; C..... 167
Drama
American paradox; E..... 531
Dreier, Dorothea
Dorothea Dreier. L. Merrick; A..... 629
Druzhelovsky; EP..... 105
DuBois, B. F.
Why they stop their subscriptions; C..... 282
Duke university. Endowment; Dt..... 544
Du Pont de Nemours, E. I., company
Deep Water runs still. S. Bent; S..... 62
Du Ponts and the press. W. J. Robertson; C..... 210
Dusk. S. F. Damon; P..... 12

E

E., C. L.
Einstein's relativity; C..... 118
E., T.
Peddling discredited stuff; C..... 71
East, Edward M.; EP..... 181
Eastman, Crystal
Britain's labor women; S..... 92
Eastman, J. B.; EP..... 200
Eastman, Max
Lonely bather; P..... 355
Modern Messiah; P..... 355
Eastman, Max, translator
Composed while under arrest. M. Y. Lhermontov; P..... 546
Sail. M. Y. Lhermontov; P.....32, 210
Easy come easy go. O. Davis; D..... 584
Easy virtue. N. Coward; D..... 739 Edge, Walter E.
Ten senators on the world court..... 751
Edgerton, Charles E.
What Solomon said; C..... 760
Education
Menace of education; E..... 722
Education—U. S.
Washington governor's proposal; EP..... 613
Eiges, S. W.
He wants facts; C..... 332
Einstein theory
Einstein's relativity. S. A. Reeve and C. L. E.; C..... 116
Elections—Australia
Defeat of labor; EP..... 717
Elections—Czecho-Slovak Republic
Czecho-Slovak elections. J. O. Crane; IS 714
Elections—Great Britain
Labor party gains; EP..... 560
Elections—United States
Governor Smith's victory; E..... 562
Westchester county; EP..... 560
Eliot, Thomas Stearns
T. S. Eliot. E. Muir; S..... 162
Elkus, Abram I.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Elliott, Harry V.
Federal trade commission; C..... 34
Ellis, William F.
In praise of Marat; C..... 303
Ellis Island
Eight days on Ellis Island. R. Hunter; S 483
Elsinore, Denmark
Evidence of things seen; E..... 294
Enemy. C. Pollock; D.....551; E 636
Enemy property
Chemical foundation case; EP..... 746
Indictment of Miller, etc.; EP..... 527
War claims and national honor; E..... 720
English channel. Hints for swimmers; E..... 224
English language
Grammar vs. idiom; E..... 506
English literature
British books: autumn. E. Muir; S..... 577
Englishmen; EP..... 85
Eton college
Drifter's visit; Dt..... 34
Europe
Americanization of Europe; N. Klein; C.. 489
France's treaties in eastern Europe; I... 80
Giving Europe another chance. J. R. MacDonald; S..... 617
Great advance toward peace; E..... 478
Hope of peace; EP.....1, 55, 219
Irreconcilables. W. Hard; C..... 571
Only road to peace. J. R. MacDonald; S.. 15
Protocols, pacts, alliances. R. Dell; S.... 408
Russia—guest or ghost.. E..... 399
Europe. See also Locarno Conference, 1925
European war, 1914-1918
Armed merchant ships; EP..... 56
Fragment of war-time history. E. T. Nagler; S..... 568
Heroic age. H. R. Mussey; S..... 9
European war, 1914-18—Causes
Marx on Poincaré; EP..... 746
Poincaré in his own defense; E..... 322
Poincaré's guilt in the war. H. E. Barnes; S..... 380
Evolution
Wanted: a bootlegger. C. A. Mullen; C.. 71
War against evolution. M. A. De Ford; C 143
Evolution. See also Tennessee evolution controversy
Exhibitions
Dorothea Dreier. L. Merrick; A..... 629

F

Face on the floor. H. D'Arcy; Dt..... 597
Fall of Eve; D..... 338
Farm labor
Hired man. R. G. Tugwell; S..... 164
Farm produce—Marketing
Farmer goes into business. F. F. Peters; S 67
Farmers
Deflated farmers. J. W. Quigley; S..... 140
Farrington, Wallace R.
Crude sugar; refined politics. F. Kunz; S 279
Fascism
Fight against Fascismo. G. Giglio; IS.... 365
Fascism. See also Italy
Fearing, Kenneth
Carmichael; P..... 359
Federal and state relations
Out where bureaucracy begins. H. Fergusson; S..... 112
Federal council of the churches of Christ in America
Failure of prohibition; E..... 372
Federal trade commission. See U. S.—Federal trade commission
Feminism
"Old feminists." A. S. Blackwell; C..... 332
Woman-made world; E..... 201
Fergusson, Harvey
Out where bureaucracy begins; S..... 112
Fiction
Writing for money. R. V. Hardon; S.... 208
Fin de siècle. E. L. Walton; P..... 490
Final. G. Taggard; P..... 32
Finance—Belgium
Owned by Wall st.; EP..... 638
Finance—France
Debt problem; EP.....450, 559, 638
France, bankrupt. R. Dell; S..... 138
France's danger; E..... 749
French budget for 1926; I..... 496
French debts and Liberian rubber; E..... 479
Only hope in France. R. Dell; S..... 651
Trouble in France; E..... 531
Finance—Germany
Stock exchange strike; EP..... 104
Finance—Great Britain
Britain's budget. F. W. Garrison; C..... 69
Finance—Italy
Debt to U. S.; EP..... 559
Finance—United States
Economy claims attacked; EP..... 84
Taxation by misrepresentation. L. W. McKernan; S..... 566
Finland
Finnish politics; I..... 743
Firearms
Inter-state traffic committee; EP..... 503
Firestone, Harvey S.
French debts and Liberian rubber; E..... 479
First flight. M. Anderson and L. Stallings; D. 390
Fischer, Louis
America and Mosul; S..... 756
Communist art; S..... 158
That alleged Italo-Russian treaty; C..... 760
What they read in Soviet Russia; S..... 538
Fish protection
Preserved fish; E..... 106
Fite, Warner
Miguel de Unamuno; C..... 572
Flag exercises
Can any one help her? H. F. M.; C..... 624
Florida
Cabaret boat; Dt..... 652
Lives of great men. G. I. Colbron; C... 734
Florists
Outdoor-grown blossoms; EP..... 371
Fog. R. Jeffers; P..... 333
Food. New York's favorite; EP..... 2
Football; Dt..... 733
Forbes, James
Young blood. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 713
Ford motor company
And the Dearborn independent; EP..... 221
Foreign affairs; EP..... 746
Forests and forestry. See also National forests
Fountain. E. O'Neill; D..... 765 Frame, Ray A.
Down with editors!; C..... 463
France
Adventurers' war in Morocco. M. M. Knight; S..... 376
America, the League, and Syria. M. O. Hudson; C..... 623
Ca marche. M. Kelsey; C..... 487
Campaign in Syria; EP.....292, 528
Concerning France. E. H. Whelan; C... 573
Financial crisis; EP.....450, 559, 585, 612, 638
France, bankrupt. R. Dell; S..... 138
France's color line; E..... 134
France's danger; E..... 749
France's dangerous adventure. R. Dell; S. 277
France's treaties in eastern Europe; I... 80
French colonies and debts. P. J. Wester; C 386
French war in Morocco; I..... 78
Have the French read Flaubert? S. T. Byington; C..... 143
History moves slowly; EP..... 369
Intellectuals and war; EP..... 199
Lafayette, we want our money. A. S. Olmsted, 2nd; S..... 723
Only hope in France. R. Dell; S..... 651
Policy of France. E. Herriot; S..... 17
Political developments; EP..... 292
See-saw in France. R. Dell; S..... 591
Seven years after. D. Horton; S..... 375
Trouble in France; E..... 531
War in Morocco; EP.....84, 131, 199, 265
France—Finance. See Finance—France
France and Germany
Germany's peace offensive; E..... 155
Painlevé's speech; EP..... 318
Peace negotiations; EP..... 1
Francis, Robert C.
Stockholm, 1925; S..... 594
Frankfurter, Felix
Anita Whitney and the courts; C..... 652
Fraser, Hugh Russell
Virginia's freedom; C..... 71
Frazier, E. Franklin
Trial by fury; C..... 303
Free speech. See also Academic freedom
Free trade
Economic urge toward free trade. J. A. Hobson; S..... 24
How free is Britain's free trade? S. Bell; C..... 304
French, Martin E.
Governor of Virgin Islands; EP..... 266
French literature
Fall books in France. R. Lalou; S..... 576
Frenchmen; EP..... 85
Friedman, Louis
America's debt to Hyam Solomon; C..... 95
Friend. F. E. Hill; P..... 664
From the continent's end. R. Jeffers; P..... 333
Fuhr, W. C.
Birthday greetings; C..... 234
Fulks, Bryan
Arkansawyers, attention.. C..... 735
Fuller, Ben H.
On Haiti; EP..... 56

G

Gale, Zona
Shall state universities take "tainted money"? S..... 349
United States and the artist; S..... 22
Galileo
Dayton; C..... 168
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
Gandhi on birth control; I..... 243
Gannett, M. T. L.
Falstaff's "green fields"; C..... 143
Garrick gaieties; D..... 77
Garrison, Frank W.
Britain's budget; C..... 69
Gary, Elbert H.
Mr. Gary prophesies prosperity; E..... 530
Gases in warfare
U. S. instruction book; EP..... 503
Genius
Babe Ruth and others; Dt..... 303
George Peabody college; EP.....319, 397
Georgia
Acquittal of Negro; EP..... 719
Germany
American views the Huns. S. Lewis; S. 19
Believe it or not. L. Wendell; C..... 331
Class justice in Germany. A. Hitler, S. M. Bouton; C..... 256
Difficulties with Poland; EP..... 179
Germans in China; EP..... 199
Germany's peace offensive; E..... 155
Hindenburg as president. A. Wolfers; C.. 70
Locarno treaties; EP..... 638
Political lines melting; EP..... 292
Power of the bankers; EP..... 104
Trustification of Germany; E..... 400
Germany. See also France and Germany
Germany—Occupation by allies
Evacuation plans; EP.....131, 586
Gutenberg society statement; EP..... 220
Gettysburg, Battle of Gettysburg. I. R. Pennypacker; C..... 281
Giglio, Giovanni
Fight against Fascismo; IS..... 365
Glacier. L. T. Nicholl; P..... 593
Glasgow, Ellen
Birthday greetings; C..... 232
Glass slipper. F. Molnar; D..... 550

Glassberg, Benjamin
Palestine or Russia? C.... 385
Gloucester, Mass.
Gloucester fats a calf; E.... 87
Godkin, Edwin L.; EP.... 57
Gold, Michael
Theater and revolution; S.... 536
Gorki, Maxim
Books; S.... 541
Gotham national bank; EP.... 266
Gottschalk, Laura Riding
Many gentlemen; P.... 578
Government. See Political science
Government employees
Uncle Sam's sweatshop. R. Clapper; S.... 91
Grahame, O. F.
From "kiver to kiver"; C.... 624
Grand Canyon national park
Canyons and Camerons. A. Warner; S.... 481
Grand street follies; D.... 77
Grattan, C. Hartley
Walter Hines Page—patriot or traitor? S. 512
Gray, George. Obituary; EP.... 201
Great Britain
British labor and the empire. L. H. Guest; IS.... 392
Censorship; EP.... 200
England's socialist tories; E.... 181
Influence on the League; EP.... 369
Menace of British Empire. S. Saklatvala; S.... 378
Trotzky's prediction; EP.... 318
Greece
Trouble with Bulgaria; EP.... 501
Green, William; EP.... 692
Green hat. M. Arlen; D.... 363
Gregory, Horace
Decoration for a girl's room; P.... 283
Grey, Edward Grey, 1st viscount
Walter Hines Page—patriot or traitor? C. H. Grattan; S.... 512
Gruening, Ernest
Emerging Mexico; S.... 28
Guam
Thou shalt not whistle—in Guam. A. Warner; S.... 206
When we acquired Guam; I.... 216
Guest, L. Haden
British labor and the empire; IS.... 392
Gye, William Ewart
Cancer; E.... 133

H

Haggin, B. H.
Pedant looks at jazz; M.... 685
Haiti
Elections and the U. S.; EP.... 692
General Fuller on U. S. marines; EP.... 56
Interparliamentary union; EP.... 396
Service of Georges Sylvain; EP.... 179
Hamlet in modern dress; D.... 629
Haney, Bert E.
King Calvin; E.... 296
Hard, Anne
Anthracite country; S.... 592, 621
Hard, William
Irreconcilables; C.... 571
Hardon, R. V.
Writing for money; S.... 208
Hardy, Thomas, poet; E.... 319
Harpsichord
Landowska's contribution. P. Sanborn; M 175
Hartt, Rollin Lynde
What lies beyond Dayton; S.... 111
Hats
"More hair and less straw." A. Vogel; C.. 37
Hauer, Ein
Coal digger on coal; C.... 358
Haunted country. R. Jeffers; P.... 333
Hawaii
Crude sugar; refined politics. F. Kunz; S 279
Menace of education; E.... 722
Hay fever. N. Coward; D.... 468
Hayes, Sir Bertram
Arming of the Olympic; EP.... 56
Hays, Arthur Garfield
Strategy of the Scopes defense; S.... 157
Walter Hines Page; C.... 597
Heartman, Charles F.; EP.... 719
Heijermans, Herman
Devil to pay. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 740
Herald, Leon Serabian
I mourn the dead; P.... 517
Your portrait; P.... 96
Herrick, Russell T.
Police run wild in Cleveland; S.... 401
Herriot, Edouard
Policy of France; S.... 17
Herter, Christian A.
Birthday greetings; C.... 234
Hibben, Paxton
Chicherin and the Russian debt; S.... 732
Movies in Russia; S.... 539
Hill, Frank Ernest
Friend; P.... 664
Hind, John
Menace of education; E.... 722
Hindus, Maurice G.
At a peasant Soviet; S.... 533
Hired men. See Farm labor
History
What little Mary learned about history. J. Criswell.... 166
Hitchhiking; Dt.... 141
Hobo, tramp, bum. International brotherhood welfare association; C.... 489
Hobson, John A.
Economic urge toward free trade; S.... 24
Lloyd George's land campaign; S.... 542
Hodges, Charles
China's servitudes; IS.... 176
Holden, Raymond
All that by any feat of light; P.... 424
Holka polka; D.... 521
Hollister, Howard K.
In Dayton, Tennessee; S.... 61
Holmes, Emil E.
Discovered!; C.... 358
Holmes, Fred L.
Making criminals out of soldiers; S.... 114
Holmes, John Haynes
Does prohibition prohibit?; C.... 410
Holt, Hamilton
Lives of great men. G. I. Colbron; C.... 734
Holy bonds. C. Rakosi; P.... 729
Holy Rollers
Holy Rollers on Shin Bone Ridge. A. M. Sumner; S.... 137
Holy terror; D.... 446
Holzapfel, Rudolf Maria
Appeal for Holzapfel. A. Schnitzler and others; C.... 654
Honduras
Loan to Honduras? J. C. Valle; C.... 142
Hoorgin, Isaiah J. Obituary; EP.... 266
Hoover, Herbert Clark
Cosmetics and research; EP.... 747
Herbert Hoover—super-business man. G. T. Odell; S.... 325
Preserved fish; E.... 106
Hopwood, Avery
Naughty Cinderella. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 604
Horton, Dabney
Rum, radicalism, and rebellion; E.... 721
Seven years after. A letter and its answer; S.... 375
Housing
Cooperative housing; EP.... 153
Houses without profiteering; E.... 107
Howard, Sidney
Lucky Sam McCarver. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 551
Hudson, Manley O.
America, the League, and Syria; C.... 623
World court—a reply; S.... 726
Hudson, Stephen
Stephen Hudson. E. Muir; S.... 661
Huebsch, B. W., Inc.; EP.... 247
Humphries, Rolfe
Words to be flung up a stairway; P.... 16
Hungary
Beniczky-Horthy feud; EP.... 132
Horthy or Bethlen? E. Déri; IS.... 262
Hunter, Rex
Eight days on Ellis Island; S.... 483
Hutchinson, Paul
International Ph. D.'s; S.... 253
Hydroelectric power
Water-power fight in California. H. W. Laidler; S.... 508
Hyman, Louis
Garment workers' dispute; C.... 118

I

I mourn the dead. L. S. Herald; P.... 517
If we take all gold. L. Bogan; P.... 464
Immigration and emigration—U. S.
Decline in immigration; EP.... 370
Eight days on Ellis Island. R. Hunter; S.... 483
Indignities to citizens. T. O'Brien; C.... 358
Visas and immigrants. J. M. Shaw; C.... 598
In a garden; D.... 630
Income tax
Publicity for tax returns; EP.... 318
India
India and opium. G. M. Williams; S.... 229
India on opium; I.... 242
India's new intransigence. W. N. Brown; IS.... 756
Out of the east; E.... 5
Indian statues
Hail to the chief; E.... 136
Industrial workers of the world
California injustice. C. K. McClatchy; C.. 514
California justice; E.... 132
Infantile paralysis
Los Angeles's campaign of silence. W. B. Knox; S.... 67
Inheritance tax
Those grave-robbing taxes; E.... 58
Injunctions; EP.... 267
Institute of Pacific relations, Honolulu
International Ph. D.'s. P. Hutchinson; S 29
Interest for 1,000 years; Dt.... 702
International brotherhood welfare association
Hobo, tramp, bum; C.... 489
International ladies' garment workers' union
Answer to the left wing. M. Sigman; C 142
Dissension; EP.... 240
Garment workers' dispute. L. Hyman; C 118
Interparliamentary union
Haiti and Saklatvala; EP.... 396
Washington meeting; EP.... 370
Interstate commerce commission
On reorganization of the "Katy"; EP.... 200
Ironies. W. S. Smith; P.... 387
Island house. C. Norman; P.... 736
Issue; EP.... 698
Italy
Amnesty; EP.... 220
Attack on Amendola; EP.... 152
Censoring manuscripts; EP.... 613
Correspondent expelled; EP.... 152
De Bono and his accusers; I.... 366
Debt agreement; EP.... 585
Excess population controversy; EP.... 181
Fascism at work. T. Sellin; S.... 513
Fight against Fascismo. G. Giglio; IS... 365
Italy's despotism. J. Murphy; IS.... 605
Mussolini's fascist state; I.... 149
Mussolini's rule; EP.... 450, 528, 586
Secret treaty with Russia; EP.... 560
That alleged Italo-Russian treaty. L. Fischer; C.... 760

J

Jakubowitz, Alexander; EP.... 153
Japan
Law and order in Japan. H. F. Ward; IS.... 289
Jastrow, Joseph
Private money for state universities; C... 463
Jazz music
Pedant looks at jazz. B. H. Haggin; M.. 685
Jazz singer; D.... 364
Jeffers, Robinson
Birds; P.... 333
Boats in a fog; P.... 333
Fog; P.... 333
From the continent's end; P.... 333
Haunted country; P.... 333
Jefferson, Thomas
Virginia's freedom. H. R. Fraser; C.... 71
Jensen, Johannes
Evidence of things seen; E.... 294
Jews in Europe
Jewish relief abroad. D. A. Brown; M. R. Cohen, H. M. Kallen, J. De Haas; C.... 514
Palestine or Russia? L. Lewisohn, B. Glassberg; C.... 385
Jews in Palestine
Workers in Palestine. L. Lewisohn; S... 301
Johnson, Albin E.
Rehoboth question; S.... 186
Johnson, Allen; EP.... 85
Johnson, R. L.
Why they stop their subscriptions; C.... 282
Jonas, Rosalie M.
Fur mammy's honey boy; C.... 703
Jones, Paul
Disarmament and credit; C.... 331
Jordan, Max
Birthday greetings; C.... 233
Journalism
Slush; E.... 202; Dt 623
Training for fiction writing; EP.... 477
Joyce, James. E. Muir; S.... 421
Judges
Majesty of the law; EP.... 2
Psychological tests for judges. L. L. Thurstone; C.... 516
Jumel, Stephen, and Betsy Bowen. W. H. Shelton; C.... 257
Jury. Exemption from service; EP.... 104
Justice, Administration of California justice; E.... 182

K

K., C. L.
Discriminating praise; C.... 37
K., G.
Esther Lea Yarnell; C.... 143
Kahn, Otto H; EP.... 561
Kallen, H. M.
Jewish relief abroad; C.... 515
Kane, Richard
[illegible] moving-picture chair; EP.... 267
[illegible]eon
[illegible]m in China. P. Blanshard; S... 323
[illegible]atherine, countess
[illegible] from U. S.; EP.... 503, 586, 745
[illegible] EP.... 503
[illegible] Missouri, Kansas and Texas railroad
[illegible]George
[illegible]nd egg man. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 446
[illegible]rick
[illegible]an. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 521
[illegible] M.
[illegible]inking; C.... 358
[illegible]nnette
[illegible]ood and water; E.... 373
[illegible]
[illegible]wife. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 521
[illegible]
[illegible]; C.... 487
[illegible] (Mustapha Kemal Pasha)
[illegible]h divorce. L. Bryant; S.... 231
[illegible]eodore R.
[illegible]mit Smedley Butler?; C.... 210
[illegible] R.
[illegible]s desert; S.... 620
[illegible]ce of Senator Pepper; S.... 700
[illegible]b wins; S.... 758
[illegible]dge's new-old message; S.... 570
[illegible]shington correspondence. T. M.; C.... 654
[illegible]
Slavery in English Kenya; I.... 196
Kessler, Harry, count
Word from across the Rhine.... 17
[illegible]Mackenzie; EP.... 528

Kinnaird, Clark
Land of the free!; C..... 571
Klein, Nicholas
Americanization of Europe; C..... 489
Knight, M. M.
Adventurers' war in Morocco; S..... 376
Arms for the Riff; S..... 327
Krim faces Europe; S..... 252
Knox, William Boardman
Los Angeles's campaign of silence; S..... 646
Kosher Kitty Kelly; D..... 77
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Bohemia's west end; D..... 468
Darrow vs. Bryan; S..... 136
Glass of fashion; D..... 629
Liberty's glorious feast; D..... 338
Made in Czecho-Slovakia; D..... 550
Mr. Coward again; D..... 739
Religious farce; D..... 688
Russians triumph; D..... 765
Second flight; D..... 390
Should lawyers lie?; D..... 446
Siegfried; D..... 311
Symbols; D..... 603
Tennessee; where cowards rule; S..... 88
Tennessee's dilemma; S..... 110
These charming people; D..... 363
Tirocinium; D..... 582
Two revues; D..... 77
Unco guid; D..... 713
Unspacious days; D..... 521
Vita brevis; D..... 494
Ku Klux klan
Discovered! E. E. Holmes; C..... 358
Not dead yet; EP..... 199
Kunz, Fritz
Crude sugar; refined politics; S..... 279

L

Labor and laboring classes—Africa
Modern slavery in Africa; I..... 195
Slavery in English Kenya; I..... 196
Labor party (Great Britain)
Britain's labor women. C. Eastman; S... 92
British labor and the empire. L. H. Guest; IS..... 392
British labor turns to the left. S. Nearing; S..... 405
British trade unionism at Scarborough. J. R. MacDonald; S..... 404
Ladd, Edwin F. Obituary; EP..... 3
Lady's virtue. R. Crothers; D..... 713
La Follette, Robert Marion; E..... 4
La Follette, Robert Marion, jr.
Election; EP..... 343
La Follette trail in Wisconsin. R. S. Allen; C..... 330
Little Bob wins. F. R. Kent; S..... 758
Shall he be ousted?; EP..... 396
"Young Bob"; E..... 59
"Young Bob." G. E. Roe; C..... 210
Laidler, Harry W.
L. I. D. anniversary; EP..... 693
Water-power fight in California; S..... 508
Lalou, René
Fall books in France; S..... 576
La Motte, Ellen N.
Kathleen Mavourneen treaties; C..... 169
Land tenure
Lloyd George's land campaign. J. A. Hobson; S..... 542
Landlords
"Acceptable references"; EP..... 529
Landowska, Wanda
Landowska's contribution. P. Sanborn; M..... 175
Langan, Frank
Plumber's view; C..... 304
Large black pig society; EP..... 221
Laski, Harold J.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Last night of Don Juan. E. Rostand; D..... 603
Lawson, Victor F. Obituary; EP..... 247
League for industrial democracy
Twentieth birthday; EP..... 693
League of nations
America, the League, and Syria. M. O. Hudson; C..... 623
Arms conference; EP..... 2
Greece, Bulgaria and the League; EP..... 501
Life or death for the League. B. D. Allinson; S..... 741
League of nations Assembly
Protocols, pacts, alliances. R. Dell; S..... 408
Sixth session; EP..... 369
League of nations. Permanent court of international justice
Article 13. J. N. Rosenberg; S..... 677
Mass opinion at work; E..... 749
Outlawing war by the world court; E..... 183
Power to decide, none to enforce. J. N. Rosenberg; S..... 150
Reservations. J. N. Rosenberg; S..... 679
Shall the U. S. enter?; EP..... 67
Ten senators on the world court..... 7
World court—a reply. M. O. Hudson; S.. 720
Ledoux, Urbain J.
Defines hobo, tramp, bum; EP..... 371
Léger, Fernand. L. Lozowick; A..... 712
Lenin, Nikolai
Tale of Lenin and the Czar. L. Saifulina; S..... 160
Lenroot, I. L.
Ten senators on the world court..... 741
Leonard, William Ellery
We couldn't fool him; C..... 281
Lewis, Ada. Obituary; EP..... 371
Lewis, Robert H.
Pies that mother made; C..... 410
Lewis, Sinclair
American views the Huns; S..... 19
Can an artist live in America?; S..... 662
Lewisohn, Ludwig
Can an artist live in America?; S..... 423
Palestine or Russia?; C..... 385
Workers in Palestine; S..... 301
Lhermontov, M. Y.
Composed while under arrest; P..... 546
A sail; P..... 32, 210
Liberator, The
May days. G. Taggard; S..... 353
Liberia
French debts and Liberian rubber; E..... 479
Liberty
Sweet land of liberty..... 102
Libraries
Mr. Dana on modern libraries; EP..... 105
Library of congress
Royal gift; M..... 454
Lilienthal, David E.
Has the negro the right of self-defense?; S..... 721
Lippman, Jacob
Oil, judges, and the law; C..... 190
Literary criticism
Books and The Nation. C. Van Doren; S 11
Our literature and ourselves; E..... 480
Reviewing in 1865..... 38
Transatlantic criticism; E..... 267
Literary delusions; E..... 248
Literature
Books. M. Gorki; S..... 541
Books and The Nation. C. Van Doren; S 11
Timotheus; E..... 641
Literature. See also Satire
Little, Clarence Cook
College undergraduates; E..... 564
Lloyd George, David
Lloyd George's land campaign. J. A. Hobson; S..... 542
Locarno conference, 1925
Giving Europe another chance. J. R. MacDonald; S..... 617
Russia—guest or ghost?; E..... 399
Treaties approved by Germany; EP..... 638
Lodge, Henry Cabot
Wilson and Lodge. V. S. Yarros; C..... 653
Logic. E. S. Bates; S..... 595
London Daily News
On Coolidge's speech; EP..... 611
Lonely father. M. Eastman; P..... 355
Loony; a modern movie. R. L. Wolf..... 270
Los Angeles
Los Angeles's campaign of silence. W. B. Knox; S..... 646
Other side of Los Angeles. I. L. Mayers; C..... 95
Sinclair's Examiner letter; EP..... 57
Loss of love. C. Cullen; P..... 32
Loucheur, Louis
Capitalizing calamity; E..... 479
Loveman, Amy
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Lovers of happiness. E. Sapir; P..... 72
Lowell, A. Lawrence
College undergraduates; E..... 564
Lowell, Amy; EP..... 221
Lozowick, Louis
Fernand Léger; A..... 712
Lucky Sam McCarver. S. Howard; D..... 551
Lurie, R. L.
Boston insults its heroes; S..... 596
Lynching
In Russia and the U. S. EP..... 628
New Albany, Miss. EP..... 449
Lysistrata; D..... 766

M

M., H. F.
Can any one help?; C..... 671
M., T.
Birthday greetings; C..... 234
Our Washington correspondence; C..... 623
McClatchy, Charles K.
California farmers; C..... 349
McCoy, I. J.
Birthday greetings; C..... 790
MacDonald, J. Ramsay
British coal legislation and the coal situation; S..... 540
British trade unionism at Scarborough; S 404
Inquiry into coal; S..... 548
Glorious European wedding chance; S..... 617
Only ways to peace; S..... 17
McIntosh, Henry P.
Chair of banking; EP..... 67
Chair of banking. J. Charles; C..... 158
McKay, Henry F.
He can't read; EP..... 606
MacKay, Douglas
Canadian government drive and pulp; S 7
MacKaye, Benton
Canadian government; E..... 17
McKernan, Louis W.
Taxation by misrepresentation; S..... 566
McLean, George P.
The senators on the world court..... 741
MacMillan, Donald B.
Under Greenland skies; EP..... 2, 127
MacNider, Hanford. EP..... 179
Maine
Tide power project. EP..... 244
Mannix, Daniel J. M.
Autocracy in the Virgin Islands; I..... 470
Man of destiny. G. B. Shaw; D..... 688
Man with a load of mischief; D..... 584
Man's man. P. Kearney; D..... 521
Manufacturers' aircraft association
Aircraft monopoly. H. L. Scaife; S..... 697
Whitewashing the air-grafters. H. L. Scaife; S..... 753
Many gentlemen. L. R. Gottschalk; P..... 578
Marat, Jean Paul
In praise of Marat. W. F. Ellis; C..... 303
Marketing. See also Farm produce—marketing
Marriage; Dt..... 280
Marriage law
New Soviet marriage law; I..... 656
Marshall, Edward
Dayton; C..... 168
Martin, Miles R.; EP..... 266
Marx, Wilhelm; EP..... 746
Masquerade. H. Mullins; P..... 251
Masses, The
May days. G. Taggard; S..... 353
Masters, Edgar Lee
American background; S..... 226
Walter Hines Page; P..... 599
Mathewman, John A.
Crude sugar; refined politics. F. Kunz; S 279
Mathewson, Christopher. Obituary; EP..... 451
Matteotti, Giacomo
Court explains; EP..... 692
Italian choka; EP..... 450
Maverick, Maury
Comment from the south; C..... 332
Mayakovsky, Vladimir
Decree to the army of art; P..... 537
Our march; P..... 537
Poems of revolution; P..... 537
Mayers, Isabel L.
Other side of Los Angeles; C..... 95
Mayo, Morgan
Drink and modern industry; C..... 598
Me; D..... 689
Meeting. J. Chichester; P..... 761
Meighan, Arthur; EP..... 747
Mellon, Andrew W.
Aluminum trust; EP..... 502, 637
Mr. Mellon's "tax relief"; E..... 222
These grave-robbing taxes; E..... 588
Mencken, H. L.
In Tennessee; S..... 21
Merchants of glory. D..... 765
Merrick, Lula
Dorothea Dreier; A..... 629
Merry, merry. D..... 446
Metropolitan life insurance company
Houses without profiteering; E..... 107
Mexico
Emerging Mexico. E. Gruening; S..... 28
Fabricated news. EP..... 191
Mexico today. F. P. Calles; S..... 18
Mexico's agricultural slump. I..... 704
Mexico's new oil law. I..... 215
Political parties; EP..... 345
Mumia the mighty. E..... 183
Midgley, Wilson
British miner's prophet; S..... 407
Military training
C. C. N. Y. discussion; EP..... 668, 718
In land, naval and college. EP..... 151
Militarizing America's youth. E..... 694
Revolt against military training; E..... 616
Miller, Thomas W. EP..... 507
Mims, Edwin
Vanderbilt university's liberalism; C..... 358
Miranda, J. L. Halsey. C..... 346
Missionaries
Two missionary statements. I..... 340
Mississippi
New Albany lynching; EP..... 449
Missouri, Kansas and Texas railroad
Receivership in force. EP..... 200
Mr. Jones. A. Hall; P..... 358
Mitchell, William
Air inquiry; EP..... 475
Charges against air service; EP..... 291, 317
Court martial. EP..... 515, 548
Disciplining the mind of man. E..... 582
"More power to the guns." S. Dunscomb, C..... 774
Mother. M. Eastman; P..... 355
Mumma, Lemuel
Guess Paper. Criticism. J. W. Krutch, D..... 550
Monopolies. See also Trusts
Music. Word
Wedlock; P..... 119
Morals. L. Thoma; D..... 713
More, Virginia
Dilemma; P..... 121
Moritzen, Julius
Disarmament for Denmark; IS..... 695
Morocco
Adventurous test in Morocco. M. M. Knight; S..... 376
Armistice. EP..... 67, 244, 579
Vote for the Riff. M. M. Knight; S..... 327
France's disappointing adventure. R. Dell; S 408
French war in Morocco; I..... 78
Krim faces Europe. M. Knight; S..... 252
Riff rebellion. EP..... 84, 265, 369
Spanish gains. D. Harman; S..... 376
Suppressing atrocities. D. Finney; C..... 189
Morton, David
Artists. EP..... 619
Moving art quarterly
Resolves against. J. W. Krutch, D..... 765
Moses, George H.
Ten senators on the world court..... 741

Mesopotamia
America and Mosul. L. Fischer; S..... 756
Turkey-Iraq question. EP 292, 344, 717
Motor cars
Gridlock arrives in N. Y.; EP..... 632
Moving, Dr 300
Moving pictures
"Art" in the movies. G. Seldes; D..... 148
British pictures. EP 69
Chaplin and some others. G. Seldes, D 332
Kane endowment offer. EP 76
Movie, a month in the. R. L. Wolf 240
Movies in Korea. F. Hibben, S 199
Scarface. J. W. Krutch, D 484
Mueller, W. C.
Retribution; C 140
Muir, Edwin
British books; autumn; S..... 577
James Joyce. S 681
Stephen Hudson. S 661
T. S. Eliot, S 162
Mullen, Charles A.
Wanted: a bootlegger; C..... 71
Mullins, Helene
Dorothy P 628
Masquerade; P 251
Municipal government
Making the cities' business businesslike. X. Y. Z.; C..... 703
Municipal ownership
San Francisco's electricity; EP 561
Munsey, Frank. Obituary; EP..... 447
Munter, Paul
For viands and vamps; C..... 143
Murphy, James
Italy's despotism. IS 605
Music
Lachowska's contribution. P. Seibert, M 155
New and old. H. Straus; M..... 739
Royal gift. M 164
Music. See also Jazz music
Mussey, Henry Raymond
House sale. S 9
Mussolini, Benito
Autocracy and murder; EP 150
Despot's language; EP 528
Plot against his life; EP..... 585
Suppression of newspapers. EP 87
Musraphia, Kemal Pasha. See Kemal Pasha

N

Nagler, Ellen Torelle
Fragment of war-time history. S 568
Nagler, L. B.
Fragment of war-time history. E. L. Nagler; S 568 Nation, The
Arkansawyers, attention!; C..... 735
Birthday greetings. T. L. McCoy and others; C 232
Books and The Nation. C. Van Doren; S 11
Comment from the south. M. Maverick; C 332
Discriminating praise. C. L. K.; C..... 37
From "kiver to kiver." O. F. Grahame; C 624
Greeting. F. G. Villard. C 51
He wants facts. S. W. Eiges; C..... 332
Horse sale. H. R. Massey, S 9
Hobo, tramp, bum. International brotherhood welfare association; C..... 489
The Nation 1865-1925. O. G. Villard, S 7
Nation's poetry prize 50, 580, 585, 603, 628, 685, 712, 738, 764
Our gallery of iniquity. R. Olzendam, C 653
Our prejudices; E 202
Reasonable demand. E. J. O'Connell; C.. 410
Reviewing in 1865 18
Secret thinking. S. M. Keeny; C..... 38
Sixtieth anniversary; E..... 6
We couldn't find him. W. E. Leonard, C 84
Why they stop their subscriptions. R. F. DuBois, P. Tomasch, W. W. Swaine, M. Cavanaugh, R. L. Johnson, Alice H. C. Sweetser, C 87
Word of praise. E. R. Schermerhorn, C 100
National forests
National forests or stockmen's profits?; E 241
Nation's business. 293
Natural resources
Capitalizing calamity; E..... 479
Naturalization
Colors and citizenship. D 160
Land of the free! C. Kinnaird; C..... 571
Naughty Cinderella. A. Hornaday, D 684
Nearing, Scott
British labor vote to the end. S 205
Neff, Clarence A.; EP..... 105
Negroes in the United States
John Carter. EP 241
Common sentinel. EP 116
How to locate the cause of 1
D. R. Liberthal; S 72
Negro in the north. E. B. Weaver, C 144
Negro segregation comes north. W. White; S 148
Our prejudices; E..... 202
Rhinelander case. EP 241
Trial by fury. E. F. Frazier; C..... 205
Will of J. W. Underwood; EP..... 529
Nervo, Amado
Sion, P 176
Nevinson, Henry W.
That a few words for The Nation's sixtieth birthday; S..... 13
New Mexico
Out where bureaucracy begins. H. Terrazon; S 112
New Statesman. War propaganda; EP..... 475
New York (city)
Hooch without prohibition; E..... 107
Housing inquiry; EP..... 613
Mayoralty campaign; EP.....220, 343, 502
Modern Sodom; Dt..... 462
Public library's finances; EP..... 221
Special traffic privileges; EP..... 221
New York (state)
Governor Smith's victory; E..... 562
New York Herald Tribune; EP..... 131
New York historical society; EP..... 719
New York Lawyer
Purging of Christianity; C..... 94
New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad company; EP 152
New York Times
G. Washington letter; EP 141
On Detroit's oil leases; EP 87
New York World
Reports Russo-Italian treaty; EP..... 560
White Court Mexican news; EP..... 131
Newspapers
He knew the newspapers. R. Patterson, C 180
Newspapers—Bulgaria
Press comment in Bulgaria; IP 448
Newspapers—Great Britain
Baby of Courbeck Loo; E..... 590
"Just a few words" for The Nation's sixteenth birthday. H. W. Nevinson, S 15
Newspapers—United States
Keiths and the Boston papers, EP 72
Miami the mighty; E..... 183
Picture papers win. J. Swerling; S..... 455
Publishers will be publishers. M. Travel, C 736 Newspapers—U. S. See also Chicago Daily news; New York Times; New York Herald Tribune; New York World; Richmond Times-Dispatch; Sacramento Bee; Springfield Republican, Wilmington Every evening
Nicaragua
Our marines in Nicaragua, IP 245
Spirit of independence; EP..... 79
Withdrawal of U. S. marines; EP 189
Nicholl, Louise Townsend
Gracey, P 90
Nicholas in Mexico. W. Bynner, P 280
Norman, Charles
Island house, P 736
Norrie, Margaret
Profanation; C 37, 72
Norris, George W.
Escape from within, S 567
North Africa
France's color line; E..... 134
North Dakota
Nye appointed senator, EP 587
Now had three two ..... J. Reese, P 307
Nye, Gerald P. Senator, EP 587
Nye, Rowland F.
"Provably," not "probably"; C..... 734
William Montgomery Brown; C..... 653

O

O'Brien, Timothy
Indignities to citizens; C..... 358
O'Connell, E. J.
Reasonable demand; C..... 410
Odell, George T.
Herbert Hoover—super-business man; S.. 325
Offenses, O 1004
Office assistant
Income Tax office appointment, EP 87
Oh, oh sister, D 1
Ohio university
Rise, extension, and character, S 71
Oil. See Petroleum
Oklahoma
Oil. A. L. Bass, S 188
Olmsted, Allen S., 2nd
Lillian M. Gilbreth, engineer, S 7
Olzendam, Roderic
Our gallery of iniquity; C..... 653
O'Neill, Eugene
Fountain, Caribbean, J. W. Krutch, D 7
Opera
Parsifal, music as expression, P. Sargent, M 1
Ohio Arts and the Innocents 1004
Opium trade
International control of, S 5
Opium conference, EP 1
Smuggling, Chinese, S. N. Lo, C 3
Traffic, C 3
Our gallery of iniquity. R. Olzendam; C 653
Outside looking in. M. Anderson; D. 1

P

Pacific relations, Honolulu 4
Pageant, E. Carter, SP 41
Painted Rocks, Idaho 1
Copper mines, and C 1
Page, Walter Hines
Wallis, Hugh, Page, A. G. Page, C 1
Walter Hines Page, E. L. Masters, P 1
Walter Hines Page, editor and author, C. H. Grattan, C 1
Palestine
Pacific relations, Honolulu 4
Palestine
Workers in, D. L. Lesser, C 4
Zionist view of Palestine. L. Stein; IS... 742
Panama
Rent strikes; EP..... 476
Parsons, Herbert. Obituary; EP..... 345
Payne, C. E.
Morality and clothes; C..... 234
Peace
Boston insults its heroes. R. L. Lurie; S 596
Ca marche. M. Massey, C 487
Ohio point to peace. J. R. MacDonald; S 15
Pelham, D 321
Pennsylvania
Anthracite country. A. Hard; S.....592, 621
Anthracite country, another view. W. E. Bohn; C 760
Pennypacker, Isaac R.
Centennial, IP 281
Pepper, George Wharton
Exuberance of Senator Pepper. F. R. Kuhl, S 700
Pepper speaks on the world court 751
Periodicals
Down with editors! R. A. Frame; C..... 463
Perkins, J. Nash
This chief is a lady; C..... 545
Persia
Shah deposed; EP..... 559
Peru. See also Tacna-Arica question
Peters, Frazier F.
Farmer goes into business; S..... 67
Petroleum industry
America and Mosul. L. Fischer; S..... 756
Public lands; EP 84
Mexico's new oil law; I 415
Municipal trading; EP..... 153
Oil. A. L. Bass; S..... 188
Oil, fishes, and the law. P. D. Cravath, J. Lippman; C..... 190
Phelps, William Lyon
Falstaff and his "green fields"; C..... 234
Philadelphia. Chinatown raids; EP..... 317
Philippine Islands
"Ambassador of Friendship"; EP..... 105
Binding the Filipinos. C. Baldwin; C.... 572
Philosophers or fools; E 200
Pilgrimage. C. Vildrac; D..... 604
Pinkney, Bruno
Suspicious silence; C..... 489
Pirates
Lead us to it. J. W. B.; C..... 37
Plant quarantine
Worms and Dutch bulbs. N. Van Aken; S 701
Platt, Chester C.
Hope for Wisconsin university; C..... 69
Poe, Edgar Allan
Poe and his contemporaries. D. F. Ash; C 282
Wayward genius; E..... 59
Poems
After the recital. L. Ridge..... 403
Alcaeus to the tenth muse. M. T. Ritter.. 278
All that by any feat of light. R. Holden.. 424
Autumn nocturne. D. Morton..... 619
Bird music. J. Reese 405
Paris. R. Jeffers 333
Boats in a fog. R. Jeffers 333
The box. M. Arnold 295
Carmichael. K. Fearing..... 359
The cheat. R. J. Parker 200
Object dead. M. Bates 144
Conception. J. Daly 406
Composed while under arrest. M. Y. Lher- 546
...raries. L. Ridge..... 403
...Little boys. A. Tate 663
...for a dr...room. H. Gregory 285
...the name of art. V. Mara- 597
H. Mullins..... 625
N 191
. F. Damon..... 12
ècle. E. L. Walton..... 490
..... 32
Jeffers..... 333
F. E. Hill..... 664
... and R. Jeffers 333
L. T. Nichol 583 country. R. Jeffers..... 333
... Rixon 729
the dead. L. S. Herald..... 517
... J. Reese 484
W. S. Smith 487
... C. Norman 704
... M. Eastman 355
love. C. Cullen..... 32
f happiness. E. Sapir..... 72
... J. R. Grieshaber 578
... P. Morris 704
J. Cavanaugh 704
A. Tate 288
... M. Eastman 355
Mexico. W. Bynner..... 280
... J. Reese 405
... V. Marsh 597
... V. Marsh 597
... R. F. Dunbar 111
M. Y. Lher- 546
L. Ridge 403
N. 170
... L. Ridge 403
J. Reese 405
... J. Reese 707
... Page. E. L. Masters..... 599
V. Marsh 119
... G. Taggard..... 403

Words to be flung up a stairway. R. Humphries 16
Your portrait. L. Herald 96
Poetry
Nation's poetry prize; E.....506, 582, 603, 628, 685, 712, 738, 764
On defending poetry; E..... 453
Poincaré, Raymond
Marx in Foreign affairs; EP..... 743
Poincaré in his own defense; E..... 322
Poincaré's guilt in the war. H. E. Barnes; S 380
Poland
Evicting the Germans; EP..... 179
France's treaties in eastern Europe; I.... 80
Polar exploration
Amundsen and MacMillan; EP..... 3
Poliomyelitis. See Infantile paralysis
Political parties—Mexico
Number of parties; EP..... 345
Political parties—United States
A. F. of L. nonpartisan; EP..... 181
Political science
Facing our world; E..... 248
Pollock, Channing
"Enemy"; E..... 696
Enemy. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 551
Porridge; Dt..... 759
Porter, James F.
Dayton; C..... 169
Porto Rico; EP..... 718
Portrait in the horizontal. R. F. Bartlett; P. 211
Portuguese East Africa
Modern slavery in Africa; I..... 195
Postal service—United States
Effect of new postal rates; EP..... 692
Postal service, Aerial
Government propaganda; EP..... 451
Pound, Roscoe; EP..... 267
Prices
Advance in woolen fabrics; EP..... 587
Princess Flavia; D..... 584
Princeton university
Student conference; EP..... 718
Prisoners
He would welcome letters. H. Windrath; C 545
Prisons. See also San Quentin
Procter, William Cooper; EP..... 396
Profiteering
Seven years after; E..... 134
Profits
Are profits the cause of war? S. Bent; C 281
Progress
Novelty or progress? E..... 477
Progressive movement in politics
Canadian progressives divide and fall. D. MacKay; S..... 727
Prohibition—United States
Behind this prohibition. L. Cline; S..... 250
Does prohibition prohibit? J. H. Holmes, L. Cline; C..... 410
Drink and modern industry. M. Mayo; C. 598
Failure of prohibition; E..... 372
Gloucester fats a calf; E..... 87
Prohibition. M. Norrie; C..... 572
Rum, radicalism, and rebellion; E..... 721
Those behind prohibition. M. Norrie; C.. 357
Propaganda
Mass opinion at work; E..... 749
Propaganda. See also War propaganda
Proportional representation; EP..... 220
Prosperity
Mr. Gary prophesies prosperity; E..... 530
Public opinion
Philosophers or fools? E..... 269
Public speaking
"I thank you"; E..... 642
Public utilities
Do the people realize? E. L. Thompson; C 256
Publishers and publishing
Fall books in France. R. Lalou; S..... 576
Pullman company
Porters organizing; EP..... 613
Pullman porters have grievances. A. P. Randolph; C..... 357 Punishment of children; Dt..... 68

Q

Quigley, James W.
Deflated farmer; S..... 140
Quinn, Arthur
Dayton; C..... 168

R

Race prejudice
France's color line; E..... 134
In South Africa. EP..... 105
Races of man
For viands and vamps. P. Munter; C..... 143
Nordics find a defender. L. J. Cullen; C 188
Radich, Paul
Serbo-Croat dispute. H. F. Armstrong; IS 101
Railroad labor institute. EP..... 240
Railroads, United States
Increased rates; EP..... 152
War among the railroads. H. G. Andrews; S..... 184
Rakosi, Carl
Holy books; P..... 29
Ralston, Samuel M. Obituary; EP..... 477
Randolph, A. Philip
Pullman porters have grievances; C..... 357
Rarig, Arthur
Speaking of Shanghai; C..... 234
Reeve, Sydney A.
Einstein's relativity; C..... 116
Rehoboths
Rehoboth question. A. E. Johnson; S..... 186
Reimann, R.
Quality and prices; C..... 71
Relativity. See also Einstein theory
Religion
Religion becomes news. C. W. Wood; S.. 204
Saving Genesis? E..... 87
Republican party
Little Bob wins. F. R. Kent; S..... 758
Reswick, William
Experiment in freedom; S..... 535
Revolvers. See Firearms
Rhinelander case; EP..... 691
Richardson, Sarah S.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Richman, Arthur
All dressed up. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 364
Richmond Times-Dispatch
On colored Elks convention; EP..... 292
Ridge, Lola
After the recital; P..... 403
Contemporaries; P..... 403
Shadow; P..... 403
Still water; P..... 403
Ripley, W. Z.
More power to the bankers; S..... 618
Ritter, Margaret Tod
Alcaeus to the tenth muse; P..... 275
Robertson, William J.
Du Ponts and the press; C..... 210
Robinson, Arthur R.; EP..... 502
Robinson, J. R.
Coal strike from inside; C..... 734
Robinson, William J.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Rodeos. See Wild west shows
Roe, Gilbert E.
"Young Bob"; C..... 210
Roller, Arnold
White terror in liberal Chile; IS..... 415
Roman Catholic church
Our prejudices; E..... 203
Romance
Still lives; Dt..... 384
Rorty, James
Bird music; P..... 403
Now that these two ——; P..... 302
Walls of Jericho; P..... 707
Rosenberg, James N.
Article 13; S..... 622
Power to decide, none to enforce; S..... 650
Reservations; S..... 699
Ross, Edward A.
Modern slavery in Africa; I..... 195
Rosseel, Frank R.
Control through cooperation; C..... 304
Rostand, Edmond
Last night of Don Juan. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 603
Russell, Bertrand
Einstein's relativity. S. A. Reese and C. L. E.; C..... 116
Russia
At a peasant Soviet. M. G. Hindus; S... 533
Back-country Bolshevik. A. L. Strong; S. 460
Chicherin and the Russian debt. P. Hiben; S..... 732
Document forger; EP.....105, 153
Easter holiday; EP..... 557
Experiment in freedom. W. Reswick; S..... 535
Home thieves learned. EP..... 688
Moratorium in Russia. H. Wagstaff; C..... 611
Moscow in Russia. P. Hibbert; S..... 456
New Soviet marriage law; I..... 656
Revival of the Russian peasantry; I..... 393
Russia in Wall Street. E..... 451
Russian agricultural progress. H. M. Ware; C..... 396
Science and the workers' revolution; I..... 556
Soviet leaders two Jews; I..... 393
Textile industry; EP..... 715
That second Anglo-Russian treaty; I..... 556
Theater and cinema. M. Gill; S..... 606
What they read in Soviet Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 538
Will Russia return to capitalism? H. E. Wood; S..... 91
Russian-American relations
Art of the Russian revolution. EP..... 477
Bolshevism in China. P. Blanshard; S..... 484
Russian theater in New York; EP..... 557
Russian-Finland relations
Communism in Finland. L. Fischer; S..... 113
Russian literature
Why they read in Soviet Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 538

S

Sacramento Bee
Opinion of. E..... 48
Saifulina, L.
Tale of Lenin and the Czar; S..... 160
Sait, A. M. S. Correspondence. P..... 93
Saintsbury, George
Saintsbury, octogenarian; E..... 615
Saklatvala, Shapurji
Britain and U. S. S. R. EP..... 240
Salvadorean Confederation fears. R. Smyth; S..... 97
Menace of British empire; S..... 378
"Threatening" Americans; E..... 401
Sanborn, Pitts
Berryville today, an impression; M..... 500
Landowner's contribution; M..... 176
San Francisco
Gas and electricity; EP..... 561
San Quentin prison
Bars The Nation; EP..... 395
Sapir, Edward
Lovers of happiness; P..... 72
Sarvadhikary, Sir D.
Indian on opium; I..... 242
Satire
Literary executioner; E..... 695
Scaife, H. L.
Aircraft disgrace; S..... 643
Aircraft monopoly; S..... 697
Whitewashing the air-grafters; S..... 753
Schnitzler, Arthur
Call of life. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 494
Schnitzler, Arthur, and others
Appeal for Holzapfel; C..... 654
Schönberg, Arnold
Arnold Schönberg. R. Specht; M..... 444
School for scandal. R. B. Sheridan; D..... 551
Schwarzschild, E.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Science
Saving Genesis? E..... 87
Science and the workers' revolution; I.... 556
Science league's purpose. M. Shipley; C.. 257
Scopes trial. See Tennessee evolution controversy Sculpture
This chief is a lady. J. N. Perrin; C..... 515
Seldes, George; EP..... 152
Seldes, Gilbert
"Art" in the movies; D..... 128
Chaplin and some others; D..... 549
Seligman, Edwin R.
Word of praise; C..... 69
Sellin, Thorsten
Fascism at work; S..... 513
Serbia
Serbo-Croat dispute. H. F. Armstrong; IS 101
Shadow. L. Ridge; P..... 403
Shadwell, Bertrand
Massacre of the innocents; C..... 286
Speed-murder; C..... 734
Shakespeare, William
Falstaff and his "green fields." W. L. Phelps; C..... 234
Falstaff's "green fields." M. T. L. Gannett; C..... 143
Shakespeare's time; Dt..... 256
Shaw, George Bernard
Androcles and the lion. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 688
Arms and the man. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 384
Man of destiny. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 688
Message from G. B. S..... 7
Shaw, J. M.
Visas and immigrants; C..... 598
Sheean, William Henry
Sheean, Lloyd and Rose Brown; C..... 787
Shenandoah, dirigible; EP..... 240, 241
Sheridan, Richard B.
School for scandal. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 551
Sherwood, Isaac R. Obituary; EP..... 477
Shipbuilding
Big Navy ships; E..... 296
Shipley, Maynard
League's purpose; C..... 257
Ships
Clipper ship's end; E..... 632
Shipstead, Henrik
Encroachments on the world empire..... 54
Shotwell, Charles J. W. Krutch; D..... 511
Sigman, Morris
Victory in the fur wars; C..... 142
Sign. A. Nervo; P..... 170
Silver, Wilfrid S. EP..... 715
Sinclair, Upton
Editor of the Montrose; EP..... 477
New Republic, Inc.; C..... 652
Sklansky, Efraim M. Obituary; EP..... 564
Smith, Arthur D.
Operation Smith; E..... 632
Mystery in Boston; EP..... 557
Smith, Bessie; EP..... 64
Smith, Jessica, translator
Tale of Lenin and the Czar. L. Saifulina; S..... 160
Smith, Reuben
Man whom Coolidge fears; S..... 784
Smith, Wyman Sidney
Soldiers, Discharged
Marine attacked on 42d street. P. L. Prentis; S..... 114
Solid fuel..... 656
Solitude
"Sweet contented land"; EP..... 85
Solomon
New Deal version of Solomon. D. Sweetser; C..... 652
Wise decision cited. E. Edgerton; C..... 790
Solomons, Isaac
America's debt. L. Friedman; C..... 95
Somerville, Anne
Women's suffrage in Belgium; IS..... 574
South
Last days of the farming lady. A. Tate; S..... 185
South Africa
Chinese in; EP..... 105
Southwest Africa. See Africa, Southwest

Spain
Arms for the Riff. M. M. Knight; S..... 327
France's dangerous adventure. R. Dell; S 277
Speaking. See Public speaking
Specht, Richard
Arnold Schönberg; M..... 144
Speech factory. Di..... 116
Spingarn, Amy E.
Artists, take notice; C..... 95
Spiwak, C. D.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Springer, Nelson Junius
Rising tide of youth; C..... 332
Springfield Republican
Keith's theater item; EP..... 529
Stallings, Laurence, and Anderson, M.
First flight. Criticism. J. W. Krutch, D 99
Statues
Hail to the chief!; E..... 156
Stein, Leonard
Zionist view of Palestine, IS..... 732
Stevenson, Malcolm. Suspended; EP..... 587
Still water. L. Robe, P..... 103
Stinnes, Edmund
Financial interests. EP..... 79
Stinnes, Hugo; EP..... 191
Stockholm, 1925. R. C. Francis; S..... 594
Stocks
Do the people realize? E. L. Thompson; C..... 256
Stokes, I. N. Phelps; EP..... 719
Stolberg, Benjamin
Predicament of American labor; S..... 350
Straus, Henrietta
New and old; M..... 739
Street railways
Detroit report; EP..... 246
Strikes—China
Meaning of Shanghai. H. T. Ward, S..... 108
Strikes—Hawaii
Crude sugar; refined politics. F. Kunz; S..... 279
Strikes—United States
Amalgamated wins; EP..... 612
Anthracite country. A. Hard, S..... 621
Coal strike from inside. J. R. Robinson; C..... 534
Coolidge and coal; E..... 564
Letter to the miners' chief; E..... 268
Settling the coal strike; E..... 641
Standing in the need of prayer; E..... 269
Strong, Anna Louise
Back-country Bolshevik; S..... 460
Submarine
Abolition demanded; EP..... 586
Sugar
Crude sugar; refined politics. F. Kunz; S..... 279
Prices and the tariff; EP..... 344
Sumner, Allene M.
Holy Rollers on Shin Bone Ridge; S..... 137
Supreme court of the United States
Anita Whitney and the courts. F. Frankfurter; C..... 652
Judges not always judicial; EP..... 318
Power to decide, none to enforce. J. N. Rosenberg, S..... 670
Sweet, Ossian H.
Has the negro the right of self-defense? D. E. Lilienthal; S..... 724
Negro segregation comes north. W. White; S..... 458
Sweeten, Mrs. H. C.
Why they stop their subscriptions; C..... 282
Swerling, Jo
Picture papers win; S..... 455
Swimming
Hints for swimmers; E..... 224
Swimming. See also Diving
Switzer, W. W.
Why they stop their subscriptions; C..... 282
Sylvain, Georges. Obituary; EP..... 179
Syria
America, the League and Syria. M. O. Hudson; C..... 628
Druse revolt, EP..... 282
France in Syria, EP..... 501, 536, 539

T

T., M.
Birthday greetings; C..... 234
Tacna-Arica question
Tacna-Arica plebiscite. A. Woods; IS... 416
Taggard, Genevieve
Final; P..... 32
Max days; S..... 599
Words for the chisel; P..... 403
Talley, Marion
At the Metropolitan; EP..... 587
Tanner, Vaino
Finnish politics, I..... 744
Tariff
Tariff happy family; E..... 614
Tariff—China
Chinese customs. P.-T. Chen; IS..... 631
Tariff—United States
Mr. Coolidge heralds the [illegible]; S..... 721
Taxes; III..... 582
Tate, Allen
Death of little boys; P..... 693
Last days of the steamship lady; S..... 587
Mr. Peter, P..... 258
Taxation—United States
Budget, surplus and relief, E..... 748
Democratic debacle, J. R. Kerr, S..... 710
Lower taxes for the rich, EP..... 418
Mellon reductions; EP..... 501
Mr. Mellon's "tax relief"; E..... 222
Soup, soap, and shoes. S. Chase; S..... 728
Taxation by misrepresentation. L. W. McKernan; S..... 566
Taxation—U. S. See also Inheritance tax
Taxicab drivers
Coat and collar case; EP..... 132
Taylor, Richard B; EP..... 746
Taylor, William
Dayton; C..... 169
Teapot Dome scandal; EP..... 2
Tennessee
Peabody college and evolution; EP..... 397
Tennessee evolution controversy
Darrow vs. Bryan. J. W. Krutch, S..... 188
Dayton. C. F. Dole and others; C..... 167
Dayton—and after; E..... 155
In Tennessee. H. L. Mencken; S..... 21
Plumber's view. F. Lanigan; C..... 396
Professors, pastors, reporters; EP..... 103
Strategy of the Scopes defense. A. G. Hays; S..... 157
Tennessee vs truth, E..... 78
Tennessee; where counsels rule. J. W. Krutch; S..... 88
Tennessee's dilemma. J. W. Krutch; S... 110
What lies beyond Dayton. R. L. Hartt; S..... 111
Tetraethyl lead
Deep water runs still. S. Bent; S..... 62
Theater
Timotheus; E..... 641
Theater—Russia
Theater and revolution. M. Gold; S..... 536
Theater—U. S.
American paradox; E..... 731
Theater, Little
Other side of Los Angeles. I. L. Mayers; C..... 95
Thode, Henry; EP..... 132
Thoma, Ludwig
Morals. Criticism. J. W. Krutch, D..... 713
Thomas, Norman; EP..... 502
Thompson, E. L.
Do the people realize?; C..... 256
Thurstone, L. L.
Psychological tests for judges; C..... 516
Tittmann, Edward D.
Morality and clothes; C..... 234
Tomaselli, P.
Why they stop their subscriptions; C..... 282
Towle, James A.
Sauce for the gander; C..... 370
Trade unions—Great Britain
British labor turns to the left. S. Nearing; S..... 10
British miner's prophet. W. Midgley; S.. 407
British trade unionism at Scarborough. J. R. MacDonald; S..... 404
Trade unions—United States
Porters organizing; EP..... 613
Predicament of American labor. B. Stolberg; S..... 350
Railroad labor institute; EP..... 200
Trade unions—U. S. See also Amalgamated clothing workers; American federation of labor; International ladies' garment workers' union
Tramp. L. Byrnes; P..... 305
Tramps
"Hobo" and "say-cat." S. T. Bejarano, C..... 477
Hobo, tramp, bum; EP..... 371
Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., EP..... 583
Trivet, Mark
Publishers will be publishers; C..... 703
Trusts
Bread and water, E..... 504
Trustification of Germany; E..... 400
Tucker, Benjamin R.
Publications. R. J. Baker; C..... 697
Tugwell, Rexford Guy
Hired man; S..... 164
Turkey
A Turkish divorce. L. Bryant; S..... 253
Twelve miles out, D..... 455

U

Unamuno, Miguel de
Miguel de Unamuno. W. Pitt, C..... 77
Underhill, Charles
Beauty the [illegible]. C. Baldwin, C..... 77
Underwood, John W. Obituary, EP..... 82
United States
American and [illegible]. J. Wagner, S..... 75
Cosmetics and [illegible], EP..... 75
United States—Army
Aircraft doctrine. H. L. Scaife, S..... 686
Aircraft monopoly. H. L. Scaife; S..... 20
Hamlet calling, H. S. Bass, S..... 756
Investigation, EP..... 307, 335
Investigation of the [illegible], E..... 78
Spokesmen against, EP..... 611
Army-military unity, S..... 31
Why publish the [illegible]. H. L. Scaife, S..... 706
United States—Army
[illegible]..... 422
United States—Federal [illegible]
Beginning, ways and means, E..... 748
United States—Congress
[illegible] special, EP..... 691
United States—Economic conditions
Business why should they smile. J. A. Hobson; S..... 24
United States—Federal trade commission
And the Aluminum company; EP..... 370
Hoping from within. G. W. Norris, S.. 297
Federal trade commission. H. V. [illegible]; C..... 84
United States—Finance. See [illegible]
United States—Foreign relations
Coolidge in Nicaragua, EP..... 180
Irreconcilables. W. Hard, C..... 571
Our marines in Nicaragua, EP..... 243
Russia in Wall street, E..... 453
What are we doing in China?, E..... 106
United States—History
Citizen papers appear; E..... 5
United States—Insular possessions
Thou shalt not whistle—in Guam. A. Warner; S..... 206
When we acquired Guam, I..... 216
United States—Intellectual life
American background. E. L. Masters; S.. 226
Can an artist live in America? I. Lewisohn, S..... 710
Can an artist live in America? S. Lewisohn; S..... 662
United States and the artist. Z. Gale; S.. 22
United States—Interstate commerce commission
Boring from within. G. W. Norris; S.... 297
Woodlock and Taylor; EP..... 746
United States—Library of Congress. See Library of congress
United States—Navy
Shenandoah inquiry; EP..... 611
United States—Politics and government
Democrats desert. F. R. Kent; S..... 620
Government by guess; E..... 640
[illegible]. Chinatown and in China, E..... 78
Mr. Coolidge faces a test; E..... 346
Mr. Coolidge's new-old message. F. R. Kent; S..... 570
White House and debt negotiations; EP.. 343
United States—Post office department
Effect of new postal rates; EP..... 692
United States—President
Clerk of White House; EP..... 529
United States—Religious institutions and affairs
Bishop Brown's beliefs. S. P. Delany; C 331
Religion becomes news. C. W. Wood, S 201
What lies beyond Dayton. R. L. Hartt; S..... 111
United States—Senate
Little Bob wins. F. R. Kent; S..... 758
United States—Shipping board
King Calvin; E..... 296
More quarrels; EP..... 250
United States—State Department
Man whom Coolidge fears. R. Smith, S 579
"Protecting" America, E..... 647
Sakhatvala and Kendyl cases, EP..... 746
United States—Supreme court. See Supreme court of the United States
United States—Tariff commission
Boring from within. G. W. Norris; S.... 297
Selection of E. B. Brussard; EP..... 103
Universal Christian conference on life and work
Stockholm, 1925. R. C. Francis; S..... 594

V

Valle, Julio César
Loan to Honduras?; C..... 142
Van Aken, Neil
Worms and Dutch bulbs; S..... 701
Vanderbilt university
Vanderbilt university's liberalism. E. Mims; C..... 358
Van Doren, Carl
Memorial to Walt Whitman; C..... 96
Van Doren, Mark
First glance; S.....72, 119, 170, 211, [illegible], 578, 583, 625, 664, 737, 760, 761
Van Druten, John
Young Woodley. Criticism. J. W. Krutch, D..... 583
Van Rhyn, Willy H.
Red-blooded vegetarian; C..... 760
Vegetarianism
Red-blooded vegetarian. W. H. Van [illegible]; C..... 760
[illegible] and the tiger. E. S. Bates, [illegible]..... 726
[illegible]e of youth. N. J. Springer; C 332
[illegible] EP..... 247
[illegible] Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 604
[illegible] EP..... 3
[illegible] Garrison
[illegible] C..... 84
[illegible] Carpenter
[illegible]n 1865-1925; S..... 7
[illegible] the Virgin Islands, I 474
[illegible], EP..... 266
[illegible] H. R. Fleming, C..... 73
Obituary; EP..... 691
[illegible] [illegible]
[illegible] and [illegible] straw; C..... 87
[illegible]ward; D..... 391
[illegible] E.
[illegible] national song; C..... 143

W

[illegible]rd
[illegible]oday. P. Sanborn; M..... 520

Wald, Lillian D.
Birthday greetings; C..... 233
Walls of Jericho. J. Rorty; P..... 707
Walsh, T. J.
Ten senators on the world court..... 751
Walter Hines Page. E. L. Masters; P..... 599
Walton, Eda Lou
Fin de siècle; P..... 490
War
Are profits the cause of war? S. Bent; C 281
Canada and Britain's wars; EP..... 747
Making criminals out of soldiers. F. L. Holmes; S..... 114
Outlawing war by the world court; E..... 183
Preparing for the next; EP..... 151
Seven years after; E..... 134
War propaganda
Baby of Courbeck Loo; E..... 590
Charteris story; EP.....475, 502
Freckled boys; E..... 60
General Charteris falsifies again; E..... 563
Peddling discredited stuff. T. E.; C..... 71
Ward, Harry F.
Law and order in Japan; IS..... 289
Meaning of Shanghai; S..... 108
Will Russia return to capitalism?; S..... 64
Ware, Harold M.
Russian agricultural progress; C..... 598
Warner, Arthur
Canyons and Camerons; S..... 481
Thou shalt not whistle—in Guam; S..... 206
Warren, Charles Beecher
Boring from within. G. W. Norris; S... 297
Washington (state)
Governor's education program; EP..... 613
Washington conference
China and the Washington conference; I 124
Washington elm; EP..... 80
Wassman, H.
Menshevik on Russia; C..... 654
Waste
Labor combats waste; E..... 565
Water power
Maine's tide power project; EP..... 344
Water power. See also Hydroelectric power
Wealth and occupations; Dt..... 330
Wedlock. W. Moore; P..... 119
Weeks, John W. Retirement; EP..... 475
Welliver, Judson C. Resignation; EP..... 529
Wendell, Lehman
Believe it or not; C..... 331
Westchester county, N. Y.; EP..... 560
Wester, P. J.
French colonies and debts; C..... 386
Western Reserve university
Chair of banking and finance; EP..... 57
McIntosh chair of banking. F. Charles; C..... 118
What little Mary learned about history. J. Criswell..... 166
Wheeler, Burton K.
Second indictment; EP..... 527
Wheeler defense committee; EP..... 57
Whelan, Edward H.
Concerning France; C..... 573
White, Walter
Negro segregation comes north; S..... 458
Whitman, Walt
Literary executioner; E..... 695
Memorial. C. Van Doren; C..... 95
New York exhibition; EP..... 719
Whitney, Charlotte Anita
Anita Whitney and the courts. F. Frankfurter; C..... 652
Anita Whitney's conviction. M. F. Coughlan; C..... 759
Guilt by association; E..... 505
Wild west shows
Humane societies protest; EP..... 561
Wilkinson, Ellen
Press comment in Bulgaria; IP..... 523
Williams, Gertrude Marvin
India and opium; S..... 229
Williams, S. T., and Bourdin, H. L., editors
Crèvecoeur the loyalist; S..... 328
Willis, Frank B.
Ten senators on the world court..... 751
Wilmington Every evening
Du Ponts and the press. W. J. Robertson; C..... 240
Wilson, Woodrow
Lord Grey's story; EP..... 396
Wilson and Lodge. V. S. Yarros; C..... 653
Windrath, Harry
He would welcome letters; C..... 545
Windsor castle
Drifter's visit; Dt..... 34
Winston, Robert W.; EP..... 104
Winters, Fred H.
Negro in the north; C..... 145
Wisconsin
Making criminals out of soldiers; S..... 114
Wisconsin university
Hope for Wisconsin university. C. G. Platt; C..... 69
Issue; EP..... 693
Shall state universities take "tainted money"? Z. Gale; S..... 249
Wolf, Robert L.
Loony; a modern movie..... 270
Wolfers, A.
Hindenburg as president; C..... 70
Woman
Women, bless 'em!; E..... 135
Woman Employment
Jobs for women. R. A. Black; S..... 648
Women's capacity for work. M. Anderson; C..... 760
Woman suffrage
Women's suffrage in Belgium. A. Somerhausen; IS..... 571
Women and politics
Britain's labor women. C. Eastman; S... 92
Wood, Charles W.
Religion becomes new; S..... 204
Wood, Leonard
Campaign fund suit; EP..... 396
Woodlock, Thomas F.
Boring from within. G. W. Norris; S.... 297
Nomination for I. C. C.; EP..... 746
Woods, Amy
Tacna-Arica plebiscite; IS..... 416
Words for the chisel. G. Taggard; P..... 403
Words to be flung up a stairway. R. Humphries; P..... 16
Wordsworth, William
Third poet; E..... 374
Writer, The. Symposium; EP..... 477

Y

Yarnell, Esther Lea. G. K.; C..... 143
Yarros, Victor S.
Wilson and Lodge; C..... 653
Yellowstone national park
Proposed addition; EP..... 561
Young, Owen D.
Seven years after; E..... 134
Young blood. J. Forbes; D..... 713
Young Woodley. J. Van Druten; D..... 583
Your portrait. L. Herald; P..... 96
Youth movement
Rising tide of youth. N. J. Springer; C.. 332

Z

Z., X. Y.
Making the cities' business businesslike; C..... 703
Zionism
Jewish relief abroad. D. A. Brown, M. R. Cohen, H. M. Kallen, J. De Haas; C..... 511
Palestine or Russia? L. Lewisohn, B. Glasberg; C..... 385
Zionist view of Palestine. L. Stein; IS 742

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

A B C of atoms. B. Russell; B..... 538
Adams, Ephraim Douglas
Great Britain and the American civil war; B..... 737
Adventure of Wrangel Island. V. Stefansson; B..... 654
Adventures of Pinocchio. C. Collodi; AN..... 699
Af. See Russell, George William
Agriculture in Europe and America. N. S. B. Gras; B..... 784
Agriculture in the northern United States. P. W. Bidwell and J. I. Falconer; B..... 708
Aldington, Richard
Food of the gods; AN..... 71
Aldington, Richard, translator
Dangerous acquaintances. C. de Laclos; AN..... 152
Alexander, Ruth S.; R..... 156
Allen, Hervey
Earth, moods and other poems; B..... 143
Allen, Leslie H.
Bryan and Darrow at Dayton; AN..... 141
Almedingen, E. M. Young Peter; B..... 778
Ambassador [illegible]. M. Pearson; B..... 671
America of the fifties. E. Bremer; AN..... 363
American idealism. G. Myers; B..... 362
American poetry, 1922; AN..... 141
American [illegible]. H. D. Merriman, [illegible]; B..... 654
Anderson, Maxwell
Gods of the lightning, [illegible]; B..... 680
Anderson, Sherwood
Dark laughter; B..... 626
Anecdotes of the late Samuel Johnson, LL.D.; H. L. Piozzi; AN..... 139
Arabian Jewel. P. Wentworth; AN..... 708
Anthology of modern Latin. S. Gandar, editor; AN..... 141
Aristotle. J. Burnet; AN..... 141
Arne, Michael
Mad Carew; B..... 142
Art [illegible]. R. [illegible] M. Cortissoz; AN..... 442
Atoms and [illegible]. J. W. N. Sullivan; B..... 538
Atoms and rays. Sir O. Lodge; B..... 236
Austin, Walter
Wilmer Armour; B..... 164

B

Bacon, Francis, Lord
New Atlantis; AN..... 423
Baldwin, Faith E., and L. L. Stecher
Psychology of the preschool child; B..... 113
Baring, Maurice, editor
Oxford book of Russian verse; AN..... 241
Barnard, Lady Anne, at the Cape of Good Hope. D. Fairbridge, editor; AN..... 241
Barnes, Harry Elmer
Sociology and political theory; B..... 46
Barnes, Harry Elmer, R..... 95, 359
Barnes, William
Twenty poems in common English; AN 337
Barnouw, A. J.
Vondel; AN..... 100
Barrus, Clara
Life and letters of John Burroughs; B... 664
Barton, William E.
Life of Abraham Lincoln; B..... 285
Bausman, Frederick; R..... 240
Beatrice d'Este and her court. R. de la Sizeranne; AN..... 140
Beer, M.
Social struggles and socialist forerunners; AN..... 425
Bell, Aubrey F. G.
Luis de Leon; AN..... 77
Bell, Sir Charles
Tibet past and present; AN..... 309
Belloc, Hilaire
Cruise of the Nona; AN..... 85
Benét, Laura; R..... 519
Benét, Stephen Vincent
Tiger joy; B..... 680
Benét, William Rose, editor
Poems for youth; AN..... 100
Bennett, Arnold
Arnold Bennett. Mrs. A. Bennett; AN... 549
Bennett, Charles A.; R..... 97
Bennett, Jesse Lee, editor
Essential American tradition; AN..... 310
Benson, Adolph B., editor
America of the fifties. F. Bremer; AN... 363
Bercovici, Konrad
Hanna; B..... 680
Marriage guest; B..... 680
Bernard, L. L.
Instinct; B..... 88
Bertie, Lord, Diary of, 1914-1918. Lady A. G. Leveson, editor; B..... 672
Best plays of 1923-1924. B. Mantle, editor; AN..... 199
Bidwell, Percy Wells, and Falconer, J. I.
History of agriculture in the northern United States; B..... 708
Blake, William. H. Bruce; AN..... 363
Bleackley, Horace
Casanova in England; B..... 194
Blockade and sea power. M. Farrar; B.. 247
Blumgart, Hermann; R..... 287
Bodkin, Anne and the French classical critics in England. A. L. B. Clark; AN..... 715
Book of American negro spirituals. J. W. Johnson; B..... 167
Bottomley, Gordon
Poems of thirty years; AN..... 53
Bousfield, Paul
Sex and civilization; B..... 292
Bowden, Witt
Industrial society in England toward the end of the eighteenth century; B..... 186
Boyd, Ernest
H. L. Mencken; B..... 384
Studies from ten literatures; AN..... 548
Boyd, Thomas
Points of honor; AN..... 194
Boyle, Kay, and others
Broom; an international magazine of the arts; AN..... 304
Brace, Joseph
Psychology of Peace Officers; AN..... 77
Brace and company. W. F. Woodward; R 54
Brennan, Charles
Memory of the future; AN..... 777
Brennecke, Ernest, Jr.
The English Bible; B..... 111
Thomas Hardy's universe; B..... 111
Brewster, Dorothy, and Burrell, A.
Dead yesterdays in fiction; C..... 295
Brimmer, Martin; R..... 54
Briggs, Isaac G.
Reminiscences; B..... 779
Brotherton, Alice L.; R..... 156
Brougham, Eleanor S.
Through the shadows; B..... 783
Brown, Van Wyck
Paintings of Henry James; B..... 197
Brown, Alice
Anatole France himself; B..... 119
Brown, Alice
Charles Lamb; AN..... 310
Brown, Harry Gunnison
Economics of taxation; B..... 389
Brown, Ivor, and R. Jameson
Speaking of Shakespeare; AN..... 114
Brown, Ivor W., and R. Jameson
Speaking of Shakespeare; AN..... 114
Brown, Ivor W., and R. Jameson
Speaking of Shakespeare; AN..... 114
Brown and Bullock, L. H. Allen
AN..... 442
Brown, Walter Allen
Southern station; AN..... 199
Buddhist birth-stories; AN..... 123
Budge, E. A. Wallis
Life [illegible]..... 386
Bukharin, Nicolai
[illegible] a syllabus of historical materialism; B..... 247
Bullett, Gerald
Mr. Godly beside himself; AN..... 194
Walt Whitman; AN..... 100

Burgess, Robert Louis; R. ... 145
Burgess, John
Aristotle; AN ... 147
Burnham, William H.
Normal mind; B ... 238
Burrell, Angus, and Brewster, D.
Dead reckonings in fiction; B. ... 708
Burrell, Angus; R. ... 121, 680
Burroughs, John, Life and Letters of. C. Barrus; B ... 664
Butler, Geoffrey C.
Handbook to the leagues of nations; AN ... 582
Bye, Raymond T.
Principles of economics; AN. ... 174
Bynner, Witter
Caravan; B ... 680

C

Cairns, William B.; R ... 438
Calhoun, J. B. S. Haldane; B ... 335
Calverton, V. F.; R. ... 520, 761
Campion, Thomas
Observations in the art of English poesie; AN ... 549
Can business prevent unemployment? S. A. Lewisohn and others; B. ... 763 Caravan. J. Galsworthy; B. ... 258
Caravan. W. Bynner; B. ... 680
Carlyle and marriage. D. A. Wilson; B. ... 75
Carlyle to the "French Revolution." D. A. Wilson; B ... 75
Carque, Odo
Rational diet; AN. ... 310
Carter, Thomas Francis
Invention of printing in China; B. ... 387
Cartwright, Charles E.
Boys' book of ships; AN. ... 603
Carver, Thomas Nixon
Economy of human energy; AN. ... 493
Casanova in England. H. Bleackley; B ... 193
Case, Shirley Jackson; R. ... 307
Case for the central powers. M. Montgelas; B ... 305
Cather, Willa
Professor's house; B ... 336
Catholic reaction in France. D. Gwynn; B. ... 240
Cautela, Giuseppe
Moon harvest; AN. ... 241
Chafee, Zechariah, jr.; R. ... 171
Challenge of Asia. S. Rice; AN. ... 174
Channing, Edward
War for southern independence. B. ... 334
Charles Lamb. A. Brown; AN. ... 310
Chase, George Henry, and Post, C. R.
History of sculpture; AN. ... 240
Chase, Stuart
Tragedy of waste; B. ... 601
Chase, Stuart; R ... 138
Chemistry and atomic structure. J. D. M. Smith; B ... 236
Chew, Samuel C.; R ... 193, 253, 136
China and Europe. A. Reichwein; AN. ... 99
Chinese theater. A. E. Zucker; B. ... 625
Chirol, Valentine
Occident and the Orient; B. ... 172
Chittick, V. L. O.
Thomas Chandler Haliburton; B. ... 72
Chi-wee. G. Moon; AN. ... 603
Christianity and the race problem. J. H. Oldham; B ... 40
Clark, A. F. B.
Boileau and the French classical critics in England; AN ... 711
Cobbett, William. G. D. H. Cole; B ... 308
Codices lugdunenses antiquissimi. E. A. Lowe, editor; B. ... 466
Coe, George A.
Law and freedom in the school; AN. ... 214
What ails our youth; AN. ... 287
Cole, G. D. H.
Life of William Cobbett; B. ... 308
Cole, G. D. H. and M.
Death of a millionaire; AN. ... 738
Coleridge, Hartley
Essays; AN ... 597
Collodi, C.
Adventures of Pinocchio; AN ... 603
Colonial women of affairs. E. A. Dexter; B. ... 260
Color. C. Cullen; B ... 705
Colum, Padraic
Voyagers; AN ... 807
Commercial yearbook of the Soviet Union, 1925; AN ... 147
Common reader. V. Woolf; AN. ... 76
Congress, the constitution, and the supreme court. C. Warren; B. ... 723
Conrad, Joseph
Suspense; AN ... 705
Conscience of the newspaper. L. N. Flint; B ... 200
Conservatism, radicalism, and scientific method. A. B. Wolfe; B ... 96
Contemporary political thought in England. L. Rockow; B ... 199
Contemporary techniques of poetry. R. Graves; AN ... 529
Conversations on contemporary drama. C. Hamilton; AN ... 100
Cotsay, Nicolas
Mechanization in Soviet Russia; AN ... 49
Coulomb. O. Mendax; AN ... 96
Crane, Stephen
Red badge of courage; B ... 705
Crawford, Nelson Antrim; R ... 387, 705
Crazy fool. D. O. Stewart; P ... 584
Creative life. L. Lewisohn; B ... 473
Crofts, Freeman Wills
Groote Park murder; AN. ... 146
Cronwright-Schreiner, S. C., editor
Letters of Olive Schreiner; B. ... 435
Crookshank, F. G.
Mongol in our midst; B. ... 40
Crotchets. P. A. Scholes; B ... 90
Cruise of the Nona. H. Belloc; AN. ... 337
Cuchulainn. T. Gray; AN. ... 549
Culbertson, W. S.
International economic policies; AN. ... 582
Cullen, Countee
Color; B ... 705
Cummings, E. E.
XLI Poems; B. ... 72
Cushing, Harvey
Life of Sir William Osler; B. ... 387

D

D., H. Collected poems; B. ... 211
Dangerous acquaintances. C. de Laclos; AN ... 123
Daniel, Samuel
Defence of ryme; AN. ... 549
Dargan, Olive Tilford
Highland annals; AN. ... 764
Dark laughter. S. Anderson; B ... 424
Darrow, Clarence
Farmington; A ... 100
Dataller, Roger
From a Pittman's note-book; AN. ... 444
David goes voyaging. D. B. Putnam; B. ... 602
Day of atonement. L. Golding; AN. ... 241
Dead reckonings in fiction. D. Brewster and A. Burrell; B. ... 708
Death of a millionaire. G. D. H. and M. Cole; AN ... 738
De Casseres, Benjamin
James Gibbons Huneker; AN. ... 147
December the fourteenth. D. S. Merezhkovsky; B ... 547
Defence of ryme. S. Daniel; AN. ... 549
Delafield, E. M.
Mrs. Harter; AN. ... 194
Delbrück, Hans
Government and the will of the people; AN ... 441
Dellenbaugh, Frederick S.; R. ... 203, 404
Dennett, Tyler
Roosevelt and the Russo-Japanese war; B. ... 172
Dennis, Geoffrey
Harvest in Poland; AN. ... 443
Deutsch, Babette
Honey out of the rock; B ... 661
Deutsch, Babette; R. ... 260, 705
Dewey, John
Experience and nature; B. ... 430
Dexter, Elizabeth Anthony
Colonial women of affairs; B. ... 260
Dexter, Lord Timothy of Newburyport, Mass.
J. P. Marquand; B. ... 656
Dibble, R. F.; R. ... 49, 676
Dickson, Harris
Old-fashioned senator; B. ... 426
Digeon, M. Aurelien
Novels of Fielding; B. ... 425
Disappointed squirrel. W. H. Hudson; AN ... 602
Disinherited family. E. F. Rathbone; B. ... 307
Dobie, J. Frank; R ... 297
Dobrée, Bonamy
Histrionic; AN ... 549
Doctor Dolittle's zoo. H. Lofting; AN. ... 603
Dodd, Lee Wilson
Sly giraffe; AN. ... 603
Donne, John, A study in discord. H. J. A. Fausset; B ... 235
Donne, John, A study of the prose works of. E. M. Simpson; B ... 235
Doodab. H. Loeb; AN ... 738
Douglas, Donald; R. ... 171, 491, 671
Douglas, Paul H.
Wages and the family; B. ... 438
Douglas, Paul H.; R. ... 307
Drake, William A.; R. ... 580
Drama year book, 1925. J. Lawton, editor; AN ... 100
Drejer, Thorkild. E. Rasmus; B ... 581
Dryden, John, Characters of. A. L. Strout; AN ... 711
Dublin, Frances; R ... 172
Durrett, James G.
Will rogers; AN ... 221

E

Earle, Edward Mead; R ... 704
Early Victorian novelists. W. H. G. Flood; AN ... 147
Earth hunger and other poems. H. Vachell; P ... 745
Easel painting. G. Bigot. H. F. O. Smith; AN ... 147
Eaton, Walter Prichard; R ... 203
Economic basis of politics. L. Hamilton; AN ... 174
Economic problems. T. Brown; B ... 763
Economics of welfare. A. C. Pigou; AN ... 174
Edgeworth, R. T. Paul; AN ... 174
Edgeworth, Maria. H. G. Pearson; B ... 425
Education of freedom. T. N. Carver; AN ... 438
Edwards, Jonathan
P ... 680
Egan, Maurice F. L. B. Walsh; AN ... 654
Egerton, Frederick P. R. Buckingham; B ... 200
Egypt. E. A. W. Budge; AN. ... 100
"Elizabeth"
Jasmine; AN ... 174
Ellis, W. Y.; B ... 183
Ellis, Mrs. Havelock
Stories and essays; AN. ... 241
Eloesser, Arthur
Thomas Mann; B ... 147
Employees' representation in coal mines. B. M. Selekman and M. Van Kleeck; B. ... 665
Employees' representation in steel works. B. M. Selekman; B. ... 665
English comic characters. J. B. Priestley; AN ... 549
English language in America. G. P. Krapp; B ... 705
Enright, Richard E.
Pictures of the dark; B ... 172
Essays and soliloquies. M. de Unamuno; B 386, 572
Essential American traditions. J. L. Bergen, editor; AN ... 910
Ethan Quest; his saga. H. Hervey; AN ... 147
Ethical basis of the state. N. Wing; B ... 185
Ethics—origin and development. Prince P. A. Kropotkin; B ... 57
Evolution of American political parties E. E. Robinson; AN. ... 241
Evolution of French Canada. J. C. Fyfe; AN ... 910
Ewart, John S.
Rights and duties of the war; B ... 202
Experience and nature. J. Dewey; B. ... 430

F

Faber, J. Wassermann; P ... 579
Fachiri, Alexander P.
Permanent court of international justice; AN ... 782
Fairbridge, Dorothea, editor
Lady Anne Barnard at the Cape of Good Hope; AN ... 241
Falconer, John I., and Bidwell, P. W.
History of agriculture in the northern United States; B ... 708
Farmington. C. Darrow; AN. ... 100
Fat of the cat, and other stories. G. Keller; AN ... 603
Faussett, Hugh l'Anson
John Donne; B. ... 235
Feiling, Keith
History of the Tory party; B. ... 492
Fenn, Ernst; R ... 74
Feldman, Herman
Regularization of employment; B. ... 763
Ferenczy, Arpad
Kunsik; AN ... 761
Fichte, J. G., Briefwechsel; AN. ... 581
Fiedler, Novels of M. A. Dignon; B ... 425
Figures of the passion of Our Lord. G. Miró. AN ... 128
Finger, Charles J.; R. ... 439
Finot, Jean
Race prejudice; B. ... 40
Fireworkers. C. Van Vechten; B ... 491
Fish and actors. G. Sutton; AN ... 128
Flake, Otto
Der gute Weg; AN. ... 261
Fleming, Walter L.; R. ... 121
Flint, Leon Nelson
Conscience of the newspaper; B ... 200
Flood, William H. Grattan
Early Tudor composers; AN. ... 123
Fool i' the forest. R. Aldington; AN. ... 77
Ford, Worthington C.; R. ... 492, 737
Foreign policy of Canning. H. W. Temperley; B ... 671
Foreign policy of Castlereagh. C. K. Webster; B ... 671
Forgione, Louis
Reamer Lou; AN. ... 442
Forman, Henry James
Sudden wealth; B ... 705
Foundations of Christianity. K. Kautsky; B 307
Fox, C. F.
Threshold of the Pacific; B. ... 44
Fox, Genevieve. Some modern appreciations; AN 237
Freedom Else. A. Schnitzler; B ... 573
Fragments from my diary. M. Gorky; B ... 192
France, Anatole
Little sea boys; AN. ... 602
France, Anatole himself
J. J. Brousson; B ... 110
Francke, Kuno
Geschichte der deutschen Literatur in geschichtlicher Entwicklung; B ... 74
Frankau, H. G. Muddled and
AN ... 581
Frazer, M. ages; AN ... 911
a, M. ervation; B ... 98
Fred, Jacob
R. Dataller; ... 444
Frost, Paul Revere
; B ... 492
Fuller, Sally tree. A. E. Wilcox; AN 442
Furnas, Brush and chisel; AN. ... 216

G

Gabriel, ... 600
Gadalla; AN. ... 214
Gale, B ... 278
Gallup, S; R ... 141, 672
Gann, B ... 519
Gardiner, editor
Gaster, of medieval latin; AN. ... 811

"Gentlemen of the jury." F. L. Wellman; AN 174
Genzmer, George; R. 664
George, M. Dorothy
London life in the XVIIIth century; AN 99
George, W. L.
Story of woman; AN 240
German books; AN 581
Germany. G. P. Gooch; B 432
Gibbs, A. Hamilton
Soundings; AN 171
Giddings, Franklin Henry
Scientific study of human society; AN 390
Giddings, Franklin Henry; R 663
Glamour. S. Young; AN 443
God of might. E. Tobenkin; B 146
Gold by gold. H. S. Gorman; AN 146
Goldberg, Isaac
The man Mencken; B 664
Golden door. E. Scott; B 76
Golding, Louis
Day of atonement; AN 241
Gompers, Samuel
Seventy years of life and labor; B 119
Gooch, G. P.
Germany; B 432
Good man. G. F. Hummel; AN 337
Gorky, Maxim
Fragments from my diary; B 192
Gorman, Herbert S.
Gold by gold; AN 146
James Joyce, his first forty years; B 75
Gorman, Herbert S.; R 193
Gottschalk, Louis R.; R 192
Government and the will of the people. H. Delbruck; AN 441
Governments of Europe. W. B. Munro; AN 582
Graetz, Leo
Recent developments in atomic theory; B 236
Graffe, Dorothy; R 602
Gras, Norman Scott Brien
Agriculture in Europe and America; B 708
Grattan, C. Hartley; R 238, 361
Graves, Robert
Contemporary techniques of poetry; AN 549
Gray, Terence
Cuchulainn; AN 549
Great Britain and the American civil war
E. D. Adams; B 737
Greater France in Africa. W. M. Sloane; AN 146
Greatest book in the world and other papers. A. E. Newton; AN 628
Grey of Fallodon, viscount
Twenty-five years; B 490
Groote Park murder. F. W. Crofts; AN 146
Growth of civilization. W. J. Perry; AN 287
Gruening, Ernest; R 362
Guedalla, Philip
Gallery; AN 214
Guilloton, Vincent; R 709
Gulliver's travels. J. Swift; B 664
Der gute Weg. O. Flake; AN 261
Gwynn, Denis
Catholic reaction in France; B 240
Gwynn, Stephen
Ireland; B 432

H

Haines, C. M.
Shakespeare in France; B 432
Haldane, J. B. S.
Callinicus; B 336
Half-uncial manuscripts. E. A. Lowe; B 466
Haliburton, Thomas Chandler. V. L. O. Chittick; B 72
Hall, William Edward Treatise on international law; AN 711
Hamilton, A. E.
Real boy and the new school; AN 711
Hamilton, Clayton
Conversations on contemporary drama; AN 100
Hand-list of half-uncial manuscripts. E. A. Lowe; B 466
Hankins, F. H.; R 238
Happy dragon. A. Thatcher and C. J. Hogarth; AN 603
Hard, William; R 517
Hardy, Thomas
Life and art; B 192
Hardy, Thomas. E. Brennecke, jr.; B 192
Hardy, Thomas Hardy's universe. E. Brennecke, jr.; B 192
Harrison, Shelby M. and others
Public employment offices; AN 190
Harrow, Benjamin; R 364
Harvest in Poland. G. Dennis; AN 443
Hatvany, Antonia, and Kellor, F.
Security against war; B 144
Hauptmann, Gerhart
Island of the Great Mother; B 577
Hawker, Robert Stephen
Twenty poems; AN 707
Heidenstam, Werner von Tree of the folkungs; B 150
Heller, Frank
Thousand and second night; AN 708
Henderson, E. F.; R 240
Henderson, George C.
Keys to crookdom; B 579
Herford, C. H., and Simpson, P., editors
Ben Jonson; B 333
Herrick, Robert
Waudemere; B 708
Hervey, Harry
Ethan Quest; his story AN 707
Hervey, Marion
House of seclusion; AN 146
Hesperides. R. Torrence; B 170
Heyward, DuBose
Porgy; B 711
Highland annals. O. T. Dargan; AN 764
Historical materialism. N. Bukharin; B 520
History of sculpture. G. H. Chase and C. R. Post; AN 230
Histriophone. B. Dobrée; AN 549
Hitler, Adolf
Class justice in Germany; C 256
Hobson, J. A.; R 285, 425
Hoffmann, General von
War of lost opportunities; B 546
Hogarth, C. J., and Thatcher, A.
Happy dragon; AN 603
Holcombe, Arthur N.
Political parties of today; AN 241
Honey out of the rock. B. Deutsch; B 601
Hotson, J. Leslie
Death of Christopher Marlowe; B 193
House, Roy Temple; R 286
House of seclusion. M. Hervey; AN 146
How to be free and happy. B. Russell; B 122
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
Memoir of the Harvard dead in the war against Germany; AN 147
Hudson, Manley O.
Permanent court of international justice and the question of American participation; B 144
Hudson, W. H.
Disappointed squirrel; AN 603
Hummel, George F.
Good man; AN 337
Huneker, James Gibbons. B. De Casseres; AN 147
Hunter, Dard
Literature of papermaking, 1390-1800; B 387
Hypatia. D. Russell; B 201

I

Iliana. K. Bercovici; B 680
Illinois. T. C. Pease; AN 123
In the land of youth. J. Stephens; AN 100
Industrial ownership. R. S. Baker; B 585
Industrial society in England towards the end of the eighteenth century. W. Bowden; B 665
Inman, Samuel Guy
Problems in Pan Americanism; AN 582
Inside passage to Alaska. W. W. Woollen; AN 684
Instinct. L. L. Bernard; B 278
International economic policies. W. S. Culbertson; AN 582
International law. W. E. Hall; AN 711
Invention of printing in China. T. F. Carter; B 384
Ireland. S. Gwynn; B 432
Irwin, Margaret
Who will remember; AN 714
Island of the Great Mother. G. Hauptmann; B 577
Isles of wisdom. A. Maurois; AN 707
Italian landscape in eighteenth century. Ireland. E. W. Manwaring; AN 237

J

James, Henry, Pilgrimage of. V. W. Brooks; B 181
Jeffers, Robinson
Roan stallion, Tamar, and other poems; B 709
Jesse, F. Tennyson
Murder and its motives; B 240
Jewett, Sarah Orne
Best stories; AN 100
Joan of Arc. A. B. Paine; B 336
Johnson, James Weldon
Book of American negro spirituals; B 337
Johnson, Samuel. Arrangement of H. L. Piozzi; AN 180
Johnson, Stanley
Professors; AN 341
Jones, L. Rufus, and Braun, F. W.
North America; AN 443
Jones, Matthew. Accountancy; B 85
Jones, Wm. C. H. Hatfield, and P. Simpson, editors; P 707
Joyce, James. H. J. Gorman; B 75
Jungle mud and the Hottentot. C. A. Wright; B 708

K

Kaplan, Mordecai
New approach to the problem of Judaism; B 78
Kayser, Karl
Printing of contemporary; B 707
Keith, Orrin; B 177
Keller, Gottfried
Epic of Seldwyla; AN 707
Kellermann, Bernhard
Ninth of November; B 707
Kellner, Leon
Reducing Shakespeare; B 432
Kellor, Frances, and Hatvany, A.
Security against war; B 144
Kemp, H. W. E. [illegible]; B 707
Secret of the coup d'etat; AN 390
Kent, C. [illegible]; B 707
Kepler, Hermann Alexander [illegible]; B 707
King-Hall, Stephen
Western civilization and the Far East; B 432
King's breakfast. A. A. Milne; AN 603
Kirchwey, Dora W.; R 260
Knowledge and virtue. P. N. Wagner; AN 442
Krapp, George Philip
English language in America; B 599
Kropotkin, Prince Peter A.
Ethics—origin and development; B 97
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R 43, 336, 388, 465, 518, 579, 626, 708, 762
Kuczynski, R. R.; R 120
Die Kulturwerte der deutschen Literatur in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung. K. Francke; B 74
Kunala. A. Ferenczy; AN 764
Kunitz, Joshua; R 547

L

Labor movement in a government industry. S. D. Spero; AN 468
Laclos, Choderlos de
Dangerous acquaintances; AN 123
Lady of quality
Serena blandish; B 43
La Fayette, Mme de
Princess of Cleves; AN 123
Lane, Winthrop D.; R 238
Lange, Frederick Albert
History of materialism; AN 337
La Sizeranne, Robert de
Beatrice d'Este and her court; AN 440
Laski, Harold J.; R 45, 432, 671
Law and freedom in the schools. G. A. Coe; AN 234
Lawren, Joseph, editor
Drama year book, 1924; AN 443
Lawrence, D. H.
Movements in European history; AN 711
Laxdaela saga; AN 77
League of Nations. Handbook. G. C. Butler; AN 582
Legislative assemblies. R. Luce; AN 214
Lennox, Lady Algernon Gordon, editor
Diary of Lord Bessborough; B 672
León, Luis de. A. F. G. Bell; AN 77
Leonard, William Ellery
Two lives; B 336
Letters from America, 1770-1779. R. W. Pettengill, translator; AN 628
Letters on the American revolution, 1774-1776. M. W. Willard, editor; AN 628
Leuba, James
Psychology of religious mysticism; B 685
Lewis, Cleona, and Moulton, H. G.
French debt problem; AN 581
Lewisohn, Ludwig
Creative life; B 640
Lewisohn, Ludwig; R 447, 667
Leyasht, Sam A., and others
Can business prevent unemployment; B 708
Liberating liberal Judaism. J. W. Wise; B 78
Life and art. T. Hardy; B 192
Lincoln, Abraham. A. Maurois; B 284
Lincoln, Abraham. W. E. Barton; B 284
Lincoln the lawyer. W. H. Townsend; B 284
Literature of papermaking, 1390-1800. D. Hunter; B 387
Literature of the native American Indian. R. L. Rede; B 640
Little dark man. E. Poole; AN 711
Little Karoo. P. Smith; AN 261
Little new moon. A. Fraser; AN 707
Lives and times. M. Minnigerode; B 193
Locke, Alain, editor
New Negro; B 754
Lodge, Henry Cabot
Story of the Revolution; B 337
Lodge, Sir Oliver
Ancient and man; B 708
Loeb, Harold
Doodab; AN 707
Lord, the rain forest; B 711
Lorimer, Hugh
Under Dogberry's sky; AN 707
London life in the XVIIIth century. M. D. George; AN 99
Love [illegible]; AN 179
Lowell, Robert Traill Spence
Edgar Wharton; B 581
Lowe, E. A.
Handlist of half-uncial manuscripts; B 466
Palaeography and the Bobbio Missal; B 466
Lowe, E. A., editor
Codices Latini antiquiores; B 466
Lowell, Amy
Wheels; AN 707
Lucas, Robert H.; R 44
Lucifer, Alice
Character of Lord Douglas; AN 149
Luce, Robert
Legislative assemblies; AN 214
Ludovici, Anthony
Lysistrata; B 81
Ludwig, Emil
Napoleon; AN 174
Lutz, Hans
Mosul and minorities; B 764
Lynd, Helen
[illegible]; B 707
Lynd, Robert S.
Middletown; AN 774
Lyonnaz, V. [illegible]; B 707

M

Macaulay, Rose
Orphan Island; AN 179
MacClure, W. T.; R 120

McClure, Wallace
New American commercial policy as evidenced by section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1922; L. 676
MacCurdy, John T.
Psychology of emotion, morbid and normal; L. 668
MacDonald, J. Ramsay
Wanderings and excursions; B. 428
MacDonald, William; R. 213, 258, 334, 676
McFee, William
Swallowing the anchor; AN. 146
MacLeish, Archibald
Pot of earth; AN. 77
Macy, John
Story of the world's literature; B. 517
Mallet, Charles Edward
History of the University of Oxford; B. 258
Man of [illegible] G. Watson; AN. 744
Mann, Thomas
Der Zauberberg; B. 667
Mann, Thomas. A. Eloesser; B. 667
Mantle, Burns, editor
Best plays of 1923-1924; AN. 100
Manwaring, Elizabeth Wheeler
Italian landscape in eighteenth-century England; AN. 337
Marat, Jean Paul. S. L. Phipson; B. 192
Marks, Percy
Martha; AN. 174
Marlowe, Christopher, Death of. J. L. Hotson; B. 198
Marquand, J. P.
Lord Timothy Dexter of Newburyport, Mass.; B. 676
Marriage quest. K. Bercovici; B. 189
Married life. E. O'Shaughnessy; AN. 764
Marshall, Lenore G.; R. 711
Marston, John
Scourge of villanie; AN. 549
Martha. P. Marks; AN. 174
Martial
Twelve books of epigrams; AN. 123
Massingham, Harold J., editor
"H. W. M.," a selection from his writings; B. 283
Materialism. F. A. Lange; AN. 337
Mather, E. Powys
Sung to Shahryar; AN. 77
May days. G. Taggard, editor; B. 761
Mayfair. M. Arlen; B. 43
Mears, Eliot Grinnell
Modern Turkey; AN. 493
Memoir of the Harvard dead in the war against Germany. M. A. DeW. Howe, and others; AN. 147
Men and policies. E. Root; AN. 288
Mencken, H. L.
Prejudices; B. 664
Mencken, H. L., editor
Americana 1925; B. 664
Mencken, H. L.; R. 426, 599
Mencken, H. L. H. L. Mencken. E. Boyd; B. 664
Mencken, H. L. The man Mencken. I. Goldberg; B. 664
Merezhkovsky, Dimitri S.
December the fourteenth; B. 547
Meynell, Mrs., and her literary generation. A. K. Tuell; AN. 288
Meynell, Viola
Young Mrs. Cruse; AN. 261
Miller, I. C.
New psychology and the preacher; B. 73
Miller, Herbert Adolphus
Races, nations, and classes; B. 627
Milne, A. A.
King's breakfast; AN. 603
When we were very young; AN. 603
Minnigerode, Meade
Lives and times; B. 198
Mirk, Gabriel
Festyvall of the passion of Our Lord; AN. 177
Mirrlees, Hope
Counterplot; AN. 261
Mirrors. M. T. Ritter; B. 259
Mirsky, Prince D. S.
Modern Russian literature; AN. 683
Mr. and Mrs. Haddock abroad. D. O. Seaver; B. 784
Mr. Godly beside himself. G. Bullett; AN. 191
Mrs. Harter. E. M. Delafield; AN. 194
Mistress of Hyrcaby. S. Undset; B. 179
Mitchell, William
Winged defence; B. 673
Modern Russian literature. Prince D. S. Mirsky; AN. 683
Modern Turkey. E. G. Mears; AN. 493
Mongol in our midst. F. G. Crookshank; B. 90
Montesquieu, Robert de
Les pas effacés; B. 580
Montgelas, Albrecht, graf
Abraham Lincoln; B. 783
Montgelas, Max
Case for the central powers; B. 578
Montgelas, Max; R. 578
Montrose, Lyon
Wolf of Edzell; AN. 764
Moon, Grace
Chosen; AN. 403
Moon [illegible] G. Cartela; AN. 240
More, Sir Thomas
Utopia; AN. 129
Morgan, Charles
My name is legion; AN. 191
Morley, F. V.
Dick Wardlaw; AN. 160
Moses, Montrose J., editor
Representative American dramas; AN. 443
Mosul and its minorities. H. C. Luke; B. 764
Moszkowski, Alexander
Isles of wisdom; AN. 685
Moulton, Harold G.
Reparation plan; B. 120
Moulton, Harold G., and Lewis, C.
French debt problem; AN. 581
Movements in European history. D. H. Lawrence; AN. 711
Mulberry bush. S. Lynd; AN. 174
Mullin Glen; R. 97
Munro, William Bennett
Governments of Europe; AN. 782
Murder and its motives. F. T. Jesse; B. 259
Murdock, Harold
Nineteenth of April, 1775; AN. 123
Mussey, Henry Raymond; R. 285, 289, 682
Muzzey, David Saville; R. 30
My name is legion. C. Morgan; AN. 191
Myers, Gustavus
History of American idealism; B. 362

N

Napoleon. E. Ludwig; AN. 174
Natural history of Selborne. G. White; AN. 780
Nature of intelligence. L. L. Thurstone; AN. 309
Neff, Emery; R. 75, 308
Negro in South Carolina during the reconstruction. A. A. Taylor; B. 213
Negro spirituals
Book of American negro spirituals. J. W. Johnson; B. 707
Nevinson, Henry W.; R. 428
New American commercial policy as evidenced by section 317 of the Tariff act of 1922. W. McClure; B. 676
New approach to the problems of Judaism. M. Kaplan; B. 98
New Atlantis. Lord Bacon; AN. 123
New negro. A. Locke, editor; B. 761
New psychology and the preacher. H. C. Miller; B. 73
Newton, A. Edward
Greatest book in the world and other papers; AN. 628
Next year in Jerusalem. J. and J. Tharaud; B. 487
Niemann, Alfred
Wanderungen mit Kaiser Wilhelm II; AN. 580
Nineteenth of April, 1775. H. Murdock; AN. 123
Ninth of November. B. Kellermann; B. 487
Normal mind. W. H. Burnham; B. 198
North America. J. R. Smith; AN. 403
North America. L. R. Jones and P. W. Bryan; AN. 403
Northend, Mary Harrod
We visit old inns; AN. 100
Northern muse. J. Buchan, editor; AN. 100
Noyes, G. W.
Religious experience of John Humphrey Noyes; B. 73

O

Obedience. M. Sadleir; AN. 100
Observations in the art of English poesie. T. Campion; AN. 580
Occident and the Orient. V. Chirol; B. 132
Old-fashioned senator. H. Dickson; B. 198
Oldham, J. H.
Christianity and the race problem; B. 40
Once in a blue moon. M. Strobel; B. 260
One hundred drawings. A. Walkowitz; B. 97
Opium as an international problem. W. W. Willoughby; AN. 582
Les origines immédiates de la guerre. P. Renouvin; B. 578
Orphan island. R. Macaulay; AN. 100
Osborn, Henry Fairfield
Earth conquest; AN. 707
O'Shaughnessy, Edith
Married life; AN. 764
Osler, Sir William. H. Cushing; B. 487
Other provinces. C. Van Doren; B. 600
Otto, M. C.
[illegible] B. 198
Our debt and duty to the farmer. H. C. Wallace; AN. 403
Our heir to Greece and Rome; B. 211
Our [illegible] machine. S. C. Wells; AN. 240
Our united kingdom. J. M. Williams; B. 467
Overstreet, H. A.; R. 711
Oxford book of Russian verse. M. Baring, editor; AN. 241
Oxford, University of. C. E. Mallet; B. 258

P

Paine, Albert Bigelow
Joan of Arc; B. 578
Palace murders. A. Henry; B. 709
Palaeography of the Bobbio Missal. E. A. Lowe; B. 126
Palestine Mandate
Anglo-Jewish memoirs; B. 672
Pamphleteering; AN. 515
Pandit, Joan
Letters to Indians in the seventeenth century; AN. 711
Parmelee, Maurice
Bolshevism, Fascism and the liberal-democratic state; B. 710
Passing, Alfred Hoyt; B. 580
Pastor, Ludwig
The history of the popes; B. 580
Paul Bunyan. E. Shephard; B. 237
Paul Bunyan. J. Stevens; B. 237
Pease, Theodore Calvin
Story of [illegible]; AN. 148
Peck, Harvey Wheeler
Taxation and welfare; B. 389
Penetration of the [illegible] Rubicon, author; AN. 685
Permanent court of international justice. A. F. Lucas; AN. 582
Permanent court of international justice and the question of American participation. M. O. Hudson; B. 144
Perry, W. J.
Growth of civilization; AN. 286
Pettengill, Ray W., translator
Letters from America, 1776-1779; AN. 628
Die Pfalz unter französischer Besatzung; AN. 442
Phipson, Sidney L.
Jean Paul Marat; B. 192
Piérard, Louis
Tragic life of Vincent Van Gogh; AN. 628
Pilgrimage of Henry James. V. W. Brooks; B. 191
Piozzi, Hesther Lynch
Anecdotes of the late Samuel Johnson; AN. 100
Poe, Edgar Allan
Letters; B. 198
Poems for youth. W. R. Benét, editor; AN. 100
Poems of thirty years. G. Bottomley; AN. 123
Poems of [illegible] T. Boyd; AN. 764
Political parties of today. A. N. Holcombe; AN. 241
Pompadour, Madame de. M. Tinayre; B. 286
Poole, Ernest
Little dark man; AN. 241
Porgy. D. Heyward; B. 711
Portrait of a man with red hair. H. Walpole; B. 651
Portrait of Zélide. G. Scott; AN. 100
Portraits of the eighteenth century. C. A. Sainte-Beuve; AN. 685
Portraits of the seventeenth century. C. A. Sainte-Beuve; AN. 685
Post, Chandler R., and Chase, G. H. History of sculpture; AN. 240
Pot of earth. A. MacLeish; AN. 77
Pott, J. A., and Wright, F. A., translators
Twelve books of epigrams. Martial; AN. 123
Powell, Thomas Reed; R. 736
Powys, Llewelyn
Library and poetry; B. 490
Poole, D. W.; R. 122, 173
Pratt, Caroline; R. 493
Prejudices. H. L. Mencken; B. 664
Priestley, J. B.
English comic characters; AN. 549
Princess of Cleves. Mme de La Fayette; AN. 123
Problems in Pan Americanism. S. G. Inman; AN. 582
Professor. S. Johnson; AN. 241
Professor's house. W. Cather; B. 586
Pruette, Lorine R. 678
Psychology of emotion, morbid and normal. J. T. MacCurdy; B. 668
Psychology of religious mysticism. J. Leuba; B. 668
Psychology of the preschool child. B. T. Baldwin and L. I. Stecher; B. 493
Public employment offices. S. M. Harrison; AN. 140
Public finance. H. L. Lutz; B. 389
Public life. J. A. Spender; B. 425
Public utilities and the law. W. M. Wherry, Jr.; B. 678
Putnam, David Binney
David goes voyaging; B. 602

R

Race [illegible] and heredity. H. W. Siemens; B. 40
Race prejudice. J. Finot; B. 40
Races, nations, and classes. H. A. Miller; B. 627
Raleigh, Lord. Life of Lord Raleigh; B. 361
[illegible] R. 466
[illegible]; B. 361
[illegible] family; B. 207
[illegible] O. Carqué; AN. 310
[illegible] economic history of American [illegible] L. B. Schmidt and E. D. [illegible]; B. 708
[illegible] New School; A. E. Hamilton; [illegible] 711
[illegible] L. Forgione; AN. 442
[illegible] ment in atomic theory. L. [illegible] 236
[illegible] J. D. Whitney; B. 173
[illegible] M. Sinclair; B. 121
[illegible] S. Crane; B. 776
[illegible] dates. H. J. Spinden; B. 306
[illegible] I. G. Briggs; B. 259
[illegible] of employment. H. Feldman; B. 768
[illegible] f [illegible] Europe; AN. 99
[illegible] lth to welfare. W. A. Robson; [illegible] 672
[illegible] United States. H. K. Rowe; [illegible] 73
[illegible] ce of John Humphrey Noyes; [illegible], B. 73
[illegible] e [illegible] immédiates de la guerre; B. 578

Edmund Spenser; AN ... 77
Reparation plan. H. G. Moulton; B ... 120
Representative American dramas. M. J. Moses, editor; AN ... 443
Restoring Shakespeare. L. Kellner; B ... 436
Rice, Stanley
Challenge of Asia; AN ... 174
Ridge, Lola; R ... 601, 710
Rignano, Eugenio
Social significance of the inheritance tax; B ... 389
Riley, Woodbridge; R ... 73, 608
Ritter, Margaret Tod
Mirrors; B ... 260
River of life. J. St. L. Strachey; AN ... 494
Roan stallion. R. Jeffers; B ... 599
Robinson, Edgar E.
Evolution of American political parties; AN ... 241
Robinson, Luther E.; R ... 283
Robson, William A.
Relation of wealth to welfare; B ... 672
Rockow, Lewis
Contemporary political thought in England; B ... 359
Rogers, Lindsay; R ... 492
Roosevelt and the Russo-Japanese war. T. Dennett; B ... 172
Root, Elihu
Men and policies; AN ... 288
Roots and causes of the war. J. S. Ewart; B 212
Rosenberg, James N.; R ... 710
Ross, Earle Dudley, and Schmidt, L. B., editors
Readings in the economic history of American agriculture; B ... 708
Rowe, H. K.
History of religion in the United States; B ... 73
Royse, M. W.; R ... 673
Ruhräh, John, editor
Pediatrics of the past; AN ... 685
Rural Pennsylvania. R. L. Watts; B ... 708
Rusk, Ralph Leslie
Literature of the middle western frontier; B ... 423
Russell, Bertrand
A B C of atoms; B ... 235
How to be free and happy; B ... 122
What I believe; AN ... 494
Russell, Dora
Hypatia; B ... 201
Russell, George William
Voices of the stones; B ... 170
Russia today; AN ... 582

S

Sadleir, Michael
Obedience; AN ... 100
Sailor's return. D. Garnett; B ... 519
Sainte-Beuve, C. A.
Portraits of the eighteenth century; AN .. 685
Portraits of the seventeenth century; AN 685
Sanborn, Pitts; R ... 99
Sapir, Edward; R ... 40, 212
Sarg, Tony
Tony Sarg's book of animals; B ... 602
Tony Sarg's wonder zoo; B ... 602
Saxby, I. B.
Education of behavior; AN ... 684
Schmidt, Louis Bernard, and Ross, E. D., editors
Readings in the economic history of American agriculture; B ... 708
Schnitzler, Arthur
Fräulein Else; B ... 579
Scholes, Percy A.
Crotchets; B ... 99
Schreiner, Olive, Letters of. S. C. Cronwright-Schreiner, editor; B ... 235
Schulz, Hans
J. G. Fichte. Briefwechsel; AN ... 581
Schuyler, Robert Livingston; R ... 635
Scientific study of human society. F. H. Giddings; AN ... 390
Scott, C. A. Dawson
Turn of a day; AN ... 341
Scott, Evelyn
Golden door; B ... 76
Scott, Geoffrey
Portrait of Zélide; AN ... 100
Scott, James Brown
Sovereign states and suits ... B 748
Scourge of Malaria. J. Macfie; AN ... 340
Sea horses. F. B. Young; AN ... 146
Secret of the coup d'état. Kenny, H. W. P. P. F., earl of; AN ... 290
Secret societies and subversive movements. N. H. Webster; B ... 300
Security against war. F. Keller and A. Hayward; B ... 144
Seitz, Don C.
Under the black flag; B ... 439
Selden, Gilbert; R ... 131
Selekman, Ben M.
Employees' representation in coal mines; B ... 745
Selekman, Ben M., and M. Van Kleeck
Employees' representation in coal mines; B ... 665
Senate and the League of nations. H. C. Lodge; B ... 581
Seven Standish. Lady of conduct. B ... 4
Seventy years of life and labor. S. Gompers; B ... 119
Sex and civilization. P. Bousfield; B ... 390
Shakespeare. Restoring Shakespeare. L. Kellner; B ... 436
Shakespeare. Topographical dictionary to the works of Shakespeare and his fellow-dramatists; B ... 436
Shakespeare in France. C. M. Haines; B ... 436
Shakespeare association
Studies in the first folio; B ... 193
Shanks, Edward
Bernard Shaw; AN ... 123
Shaw, Bernard. E. Shanks; AN ... 123
Shephard, Esther
Paul Bunyan; B ... 237
Sheridan, Clare
Stella defiant; B ... 237
Shipley, Joseph T.; R ... 75
Sidelights on Elizabethan drama. H. D. Sykes; AN ... 684
Siemens, Hermann W.
Race hygiene and heredity; B ... 40
Simpson, Evelyn M.
Study of the prose works of John Donne; B ... 235
Simpson, Percy, and Herford, C. H., editors
Ben Jonson; B ... 333
Sims, Newell L.
Society and its surplus; AN ... 288
Sinclair, May
Rector of Wyck; B ... 121
Sitwell, Edith
Troy Park; B ... 359
Sizeranne, Robert de la. See La Sizeranne
Skaggs, William H.
Southern oligarchy; B ... 121
Sloane, William Milligan
Greater France in Africa; AN ... 146
Sly giraffe. L. W. Dodd; AN ... 603
Smertenko, Johan J.; R ... 98, 146, 284
Smith, J. D. Main
Chemistry and atomic structure; B ... 236
Smith, J. Russell
North America; AN ... 468
Smith, Logan Pearsall
Words and idioms; AN ... 628
Smith, Pauline
Little karoo; AN ... 261
Social progress; B ... 477
Social significance of the inheritance tax. E. Rignano; B ... 389
Social struggle and socialist forerunners. M. Beer; AN ... 628
Society and its surplus. N. L. Sims; AN ... 288
Society women of Shakespeare's time. V. A. Wilson; B ... 256
Sociology and political theory. H. E. Barnes; B ... 46
Soundings. A. H. Gibbs; AN ... 174
Southern oligarchy. W. H. Skaggs; B ... 121
Southey, Robert
Lives and works of the uneducated poets; AN ... 76
Sovereign states and suits ... J. B. Scott; B ... 748
Soviet culture; B ... 548
Soviet union. Commercial yearbook ... AN 147
Spender, J. A.
Public life; B ... 425
Spencer, Edward W. L. Renwick; AN ... 77
Spero, Sterling D.
Labor movement in a government ... AN ... 685
Spindler, Hedwig J.
Reduction of Maxwell ... B ... 341
Standard oil company. I. M. Tarbell; B ... 665
Starr, Harris E.
William Graham Sumner; B ... 680
Stecker, Lydia L. and Ludlum, B. L.
Psychology of the preschool child; B ... 493
Stefansson, Vilhjalmur
Adventure of Wrangel Island; B ... 144
Stella defiant. C. Sheridan; B ... 237
Stephens, James
In the land of ... AN ... 340
Stevens, James
Paul Bunyan; B ... 237
Stevenson, Robert Louis
Wrecker; AN ... 340
Stewart, Donald Ogden
Candy; B ... 341
Mr. and Mrs. Haddock ...; B ... 341
Stockton, Frank R.
Queen of the pirate isle; B ... 439
Stoddard, Lothrop
Rising tide of color; AN ... 194
Stoddard, Maxwell
Orchids of the world; B ... 339
Studies from the Smithsonian; B ... 341
Studies in the history of political philosophy ... B ... 46
Sullivan, J. W. N.
Atoms and electrons; B ... 235
Sumner, William Graham. H. E. Starr; B ... 680
Sun in Shakespeare. E. D. Matthews; AN ... 77
Supreme court of the United States ... A. A. Ballard; AN ... 581
Supreme court ... M. M. Fribourg; B ... 48
Supreme court ... C. Warren; AN ... 778
Sutton, Graham
Pitch and toss; AN ... 133
Swallowing the anchor. W. McFee; AN ... 146
Swift, Jonathan
Gulliver's travels; B ... 664
Sykes, H. Dugdale
Sidelights on Elizabethan drama; AN ... 684

T

Taggard, Genevieve, editor
May days; B ... 761
Tale of Genji. A. Waley; B ... 505
Talmy, L. ... R ... 548
Tarbell, Ida M.
History of the Standard oil company; B .. 665
Tate, Allen; R ... 680
Taxation and welfare. H. W. Pick; B ... 389
Taxation of unearned incomes. H. G. Brown; B ... 389
Taylor, Alrutheus Ambush
Negro in South Carolina during the reconstruction; B ... 213
Temperley, H. W.
Foreign policy of Canning; B ... 671
Thamyris. R. C. Trevelyan; B ... 453
Tharaud, Jerome and Jean
Next year in Jerusalem; B ... 47
Thatcher, A., and Hogarth, C. J.
Happy dragon; AN ... 603
Things and ideals. M. C. Otto; B ... 173
Things I shouldn't tell. Uncensored recollections. Author of; B ... 49
Thousand and second night. F. Heller; AN .. 708
Threshold of the Pacific. C. E. Fox; B ... 44
Thurstone, L. L.
Nature of intelligence; AN ... 309
Tibet past and present. Sir C. Bell; AN ... 309
Tiger joy. S. V. Benét; B ... 680
Timotheus. B. Dobrée; B ... 641
Tinayre, Marcelle
La vie amoureuse de Madame de Pompadour; B ... 286
Tobenkin, Elias
God of might; B ... 146
Topographical dictionary to the works of Shakespeare and his fellow dramatists. E. H. Sugden; B ... 436
Torrence, Ridgely
Hesperides; B ... 176
Tory democracy. W. J. Wintringham; B ... 492
Tory party. K. Feiling; B ... 492
Townsend, William H.
Lincoln the litigant; B ... 283
Toynbee, Arnold V.
Survey of international affairs for 1920-1923; AN ... 581
World after the peace conference; AN ... 581
Tragedy of words. S. Chase; B ... 691
Travel diary of a philosopher. H. A. Keyserling; B ... 213
Travel in England in the seventeenth century. J. Parkes; AN ... 711 Tree of the sages. W. ... H ... B ... 140
Trevelyan, R. C.
Thamyris; B ... 453
Trotsky, Leon
Whither England?; AN ... 778
Tuell, Anne Kimball
Mrs. Meynell and her literary generation; AN ... 388
Turnbull, Richard Gurr; R ... 96, 467
Turner v. ... C. A. D. Scott; AN ... 261
Twelve books of epigrams. Martial; AN ... 123
Twenty poems. R. S. Hawker; AN ... 337
Twenty poems in common English. W. ... AN ... 77
Two lives. W. E. Leonard; B ... 546

U

Unamuno, Miguel de
Essays and soliloquies; B ... 336, 572
Unconnected reflections. Author of ... B ... 49
Under the lion ... D. C. Scott; B ... 139
Undset, Sigrid
... Hostess; B ... 20
... B ... AN ... 76
... Mistress; AN ... 147

V

Van Doren, Carl
... B ... 388
Van Doren, Carl; R ... 670, 738
Van Dyke, Mary; R ... 119, 149, 211, 305, 340, 341, 511, 546, 638, 699, 625, 761
Van Loon, Hendrik Willem; AN ... 678
Van Kleeck, Mary, and Selekman, B. M.
... 665
Van Valkenburg, ... D ... 491
Van Waters, Miriam
Youth in conflict; AN ... 287
Vaughan, C. E.
... the bases of political philosophy ... B ... 46
Venetian glass nephew. E. Wylie; B ... 165
La vie amoureuse de Madame de Pompadour ... M. ... B ... 286
Village Orchard ... R ... 146

Vivas, Eliseo; R. ... 336
Voices of the stones. G. W. Russell; B. ... 170
Vomel, A. J. Barnouw; AN ... 100
Voyageurs. P. Coumi; AN ... 603
Vultures of the dark. R. E. Enwald; B. ... 280

W

Wager, Charles H. A.; R. ... 240
Wages and the family. P. H. Douglas; B. ... 438
Waggett, P. N.
Knowledge and virtue; AN. ... 442
Waley, Arthur
Tale of Genji; B. ... 305
Walkowitz, Abraham
One hundred drawings; B. ... 97
Wallace, Henry C.
Our debt and duty to the farmer; AN. ... 439
Wallace, Schuyler C.
Our governmental machine; AN. ... 240
Walpole, Hugh
Portrait of a man with red hair; B. ... 671
Wanderings. R. Herrick; B. ... 388
Wanderings and excursions. J. R. MacDonald; B. ... 478
Wanderungen mit Kaiser Wilhelm II. A. Niemann; AN. ... 581
War for southern independence. E. Channing; B. ... 334
War of lost opportunities. General von Hoffmann; B. ... 546
Warner, Arthur; R. ... 173
Warren, Charles
Congress, the constitution, and the supreme court; B. ... 736
Wassermann, Jacob
Faber, or The lost years; B. ... 579
Waterman, William Randall
Frances Wright; AN. ... 310
Watts, Ralph L.
Rural Pennsylvania; B. ... 705
We. E. Zamiatin; B. ... 237
We visit old inns. M. H. Northend; AN. ... 100
Webster, C. K.
Foreign policy of Castlereagh; B. ... 671
Webster, Nesta H.
Secret societies and subversive movements; B. ... 309
Wellman, Francis L.
"Gentlemen of the jury"; AN. ... 174
Wells, Cravath
Jungle man and his animals; B. ... 602
Wells, H. G. I. Brown; AN. ... 123
Wendt, Gerald L.; R. ... 236, 335
Wentworth, Patricia
Annam Jewel; AN. ... 738
Werner, M. R.
Brigham Young; B. ... 144
Western civilization and the Far East. S. King-Hall; B. ... 172
Wharton, Edith. R. M. Lovett; B. ... 361
What ails our youth. G. A. Coe; AN. ... 287
What I believe. B. Russell; AN. ... 494
What's o'clock. A. Lowell; B. ... 710
Whelpley, J. D.
Reconstruction; B. ... 176
When we were very young. A. A. Milne; AN. ... 605
Wherry, William M., Jr.
Public utilities and the law; B. ... 678
White, Gilbert
Natural history of Selborne; AN. ... 100
White, William Allen
Woodrow Wilson; B. ... 171
Whitham, James Mills
Windlestraw; AN. ... 443
Whither England? L. Trotzky; AN. ... 548
Whitman, Walt. G. Bullett; AN. ... 100
Who will remember. M. Irwin; AN. ... 214
Wiggam, Albert Edward
Fruit of the family tree; AN. ... 442
Wilcox, Delos F.; R. ... 678
Wild asses. J. G. Dunton; AN. ... 241
Wilde, Norman
Ethical basis of the state; B. ... 285
Willard, Margaret Wheeler, editor
Letters on the American revolution, 1774-1776; AN. ... 695
Williams, James Mickel
Our rural heritage; B. ... 567
Williams, John Sharp. An old-fashioned senator. H. Dickson; B. ... 426
Willoughby, W. W.
Opium as an international problem. AN. ... 582
Wilson, David Alec
Carlyle till marriage; B. ... 75
Carlyle to the "French revolution"; B. ... 75
Wilson, Grove
Man of strife; AN. ... 764
Wilson, Violet A.
Society women of Shakespeare's time; B. ... 285
Wilson, Woodrow
Messages and papers; AN. ... 137
Wilson, Woodrow. W. A. White; B. ... 171
Wind, Edgar; R. ... 213
Windlestraw. J. M. Whitham; AN. ... 443
Winged defence. W. Mitchell; B. ... 677
Winkinson, William J.
Tory democracy; B. ... 592
Wise, James Waterman
Liberalizing liberal Judaism; B. ... 98
With pencilbrush and chisel. E. Fuchs; AN. ... 240
Wolfe, Albert Benedict
Conservatism, radicalism, and scientific method; B. ... 71
Wolfson, Theresa; R. ... 491
Woodward, W. E.
Bread and circuses; B. ... 762
Woolf, Virginia
Common reader; AN. ... 74
Woollen, William Watson
Inside passage to Alaska; AN. ... 654
Words and idioms. L. P. Smith; AN. ... 628
Wordsworth, Dora. E. V. Marsh; AN. ... 100
World after the peace conference. A. V. Tyrrell; AN. ... 581
World's most famous court trial; AN. ... 444
Wright, F. A., and Platt, J. A., translators
Twelve books of epigrams. Martial; AN. ... 128
Wright, Frances
Frances Wright. W. R. Waterman; AN. ... 310
Wrong, George M.; R. ... 72
Wylie, Elinor
Venetian glass nephew. B. ... 467

X

XLI Poems. E. E. Cummings; B. ... 72

Y

Yazmolinsky, Avrahm; R. ... 132
Yerkes, Robert M.
Almost human; B. ... 74
Yes, we have dreams. M. Anderson; B. ... 650
Young, Brigham. M. R. Werner; B. ... 144
Young, Francis Brett
Sea horses; AN. ... 146
Young, Kimball; R. ... 144
Young, Stark
Glamour; AN. ... 448
Young, Mrs. Cruse. V. Meynell; AN. ... 581
Youth in conflict. M. Van Waters; AN. ... 287

Z

Zamiatin, Eugene
We. B. ... 237
Der Zauberberg. T. Mann; B. ... 667
Zeitlin, Jacob; R. ... 237
Zucker, A. E.
Chinese theater; B. ... 625
Zucker, Adolf E.; R. ... 172

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 1, 1925 No. 3130

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
Robert Marion La Follette 4
Out of the East 5
The Clinton Papers Appear 5
The Sixtieth Anniversary 6
THE NATION 1865-1925. By Oswald Garrison Villard 7
A MESSAGE FROM G. B. S. 7
THE HEROIC AGE. By Henry Raymond Mussey 9
BOOKS AND THE NATION. By Carl Van Doren 11
DUSK. By S. Foster Damon 12
"JUST A FEW WORDS." By Henry W. Nevinson 13
THE ONLY ROAD TO PEACE. By J. Ramsay MacDonald 15
WORDS TO BE FLUNG UP A STAIRWAY. By Rolfe Humphries 16
THE POLICY OF FRANCE. By Edouard Herriot 17
A WORD FROM ACROSS THE RHINE. By Harry Kessler 17
MEXICO TODAY. By Plutarco Elias Calles 18
AN AMERICAN VIEWS THE HUNS. By Sinclair Lewis 19
IN TENNESSEE. By H. L. Mencken 21
THE UNITED STATES AND THE ARTIST. By Zona Gale 22
THE ECONOMIC URGE TOWARD FREE TRADE. By John A. Hobson 24
EMERGING MEXICO:
IV. Democracy. By Ernest Gruening 28
POEMS:
The Loss of Love. By Countee Cullen 32
A Sail. By M. Y. Lhermontov. (Translated by Max Eastman) 32
Final. By Genevieve Taggard 32
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 34
CORRESPONDENCE 34
BOOKS AND MUSIC:
Reviewing in 1865 38
The Race Problem. By Edward Sapir 40
A Lesson for Ladies. By Joseph Wood Krutch 43
In the Solomon Islands. By Robert H. Lowie 44
Pure Political Philosophy. By Harold J. Laski 45
The Sociological Invasion. By H. A. Overstreet 46
Censored Recollections. By R. F. Dibble 49
Music: The Bach Festival. By Charles S. Ascher 50

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MANAGING EDITOR FREDA KIRCHWEY
LITERARY EDITOR MARK VAN DOREN
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

To the memory of

EDWIN LAWRENCE GODKIN

WENDELL PHILLIPS GARRISON

HENRY VILLARD

HORACE WHITE

GUSTAV POLLAK

HAMMOND LAMONT

and to

FANNY GARRISON VILLARD

PAUL ELMER MORE

HAROLD DEWOLF FULLER

this Sixtieth Anniversary Issue of The Nation is gratefully dedicated.

SOME MILITARIST once called China a "jellyfish nation." The spineless nation that will not fight is showing the West the vast power of non-violent resistance. There is, of course, sporadic violence in China. A few foreigners have been killed—and very likely more will be—in the course of tremendous mass demonstrations against the domineering alien; but the great power of China today lies not in the arms and fists of her millions but in their capacity for silently thinking and acting alike. The officials of British factories in China beckon to the warships when one of their number is beaten to death by an angry mob; but when their servants steal away in the night, and their faithful employees desert them, when the hotels are without help and the stores without clerks, they stand puzzled and helpless. Chinese national sentiment five years ago built up a boycott against Japanese trade that forced the Mikado's empire to change its tactics. Today the harbor of Hongkong is filled with little ships carrying Chinese away from Britain's great Eastern port; and the foreign settlement is busily struggling to do its own work. Will the Western Powers be stubborn, stand on their "rights" until the silent resistance crystallizes into a lasting hate of the entire Western world, or will they follow Thomas F. Millard's advice in the New York Times? He says:

> The following conditions are probably the minimum that would satisfy the Chinese, insure suspension of the anti-foreign demonstrations and disorders or prevent serious prolongation: First, the powers must publicly agree to an early conference wherein the entire body of Chinese questions shall be placed in the agenda unreservedly for full discussion and revision; second, the powers, in conjunction and consultation with the Chinese Government, must quickly appoint a time and place for this conference; third, a public declaration must be made by the powers of a non-aggressive policy toward China and a purpose not to use force to coerce her to yield to unacceptable conditions.

INCH BY INCH Europe moves toward peace. The new peace-pact proposals are an advance on those discussed three years ago, as those marked progress over peace-conference days. France is ready to make the guaranty of the Rhine frontier mutual—and that is a long road from Clemenceau days, when the German delegates were caged like wild beasts and were told what they might do in terms purposely made insulting. But if some solitary explorer should venture without a radio outfit into the jungle or the Arctic and stay there a year or two, he could probably return to civilization and begin reading the peace-pact discussions without realizing that he had ever been away.

THE GERMANS on February 9 substantially repeated the Cuno proposals which Poincaré contemptuously ignored two and a half years ago. They offered an agreement not to wage war, together with comprehensive arbitration treaties with all nations, and a reciprocal guaranty of the territorial status of the Rhine. It is difficult to understand what further guaranty of security France could ask Germany to give. The French replied on June 4 courteously and at length, but with what was apparently studied ambiguity. The note, of course, followed a long exchange of views with England. England made it plain that while she might guarantee the Rhine frontier she would give no pledges regarding Germany's Eastern border. France in her reply insisted that before any agreement was made Germany must enter the League; that the agreements must involve no modification of the treaties nor of the obligations noted in the covenant of the League; and that while she would be glad to talk about arbitration in general she could not consent to abrogate any of her rights under the Treaty of Versailles.

IN PLAIN WORDS France is willing to be polite now, but not to promise to act decently in future. Two things naturally and properly disturb the Germans. They want France to promise not to undertake any more invasions of the Ruhr or of any other part of their territory; and they will give no pledge, express or implied, to transport French troops across their territory in order to aid Poland—either against Russia or against Germany herself. On both these points the French are distressingly vague. They do not expressly say so, but the evident meaning of their phrases about treaty rights and League obligations is that they intend to reserve just such freedom of action as they exercised in the Ruhr, and that they still insist upon their claim to send troops across Germany. Both these points will require further protracted negotiation—and time. Perhaps France, with an African war on her hands, will forget her war-born fear of her disarmed Eastern neighbor. The liberal, as Ramsay MacDonald points out in his article in this issue of The Nation, will distrust any of these peace schemes which seek to fortify peace by military alliances and pledges; he will not believe any document based upon the Treaty of Versailles likely to be a useful asset for peace; and, while glad that Germany is at last treated as something like an equal, he will look forward to the day when Russia, too, is treated as a part of the concert of Europe.

THE MOST IMPORTANT ACHIEVEMENT of the League's conference on the traffic in arms, which has been meeting in Geneva for six weeks, was the protocol for the abolition of poisonous gas in warfare. The protocol, which was based on Article V of the Washington treaty, was drafted at the insistence of Representative Theodore E. Burton. General Amos Fries, chief of the Chemical Warfare Service, and Dr. Charles H. Herty, president of the Synthetic Organic Chemical Manufacturers Associations, have already declared that any such treaty can exist only on paper; that with the approach of war the treaty would be ignored. Of course efforts to "tame" war are always doubtful and uncertain. A nation with its back against the wall will surely use poison gas if it can; thus far in the history of warfare no effective weapons once used have ever been given up. Our government, however, has placed its faith in this method of control, has urged it in the face of opposition, and the least we can do is to ratify the protocol and the general arms limitation convention as soon as possible. Failure to ratify would be a setback to any future attempts at international agreement. The general convention is regarded as stronger than the original draft; warships, airplanes, and armored cars which at first were excluded from the convention have been brought back under the publicity provisions.

THE ACTION of Judge Kennedy in upholding the validity of the lease of the Teapot Dome oil reserve to Harry F. Sinclair is most important, perhaps, as new proof of the fallibility of our courts—as a public demonstration that our so-called science of jurisprudence is largely a myth. Those who argue for the wisdom of permitting our courts to annul the will of the people as expressed through Congress and State legislatures dwell on the advantage of taking points of law out of the field of partisan controversy and leaving them to the clear, cold logic—the impersonal science—of our judges. But here is one impersonal interpreter, Judge Kennedy, differing on identical points of law and evidence from his colleague, Judge McCormick, who recently declared as fraudulent and invalid the lease of California oil lands to E. L. Doheny. In the language of the street, How come? Both judges are of high and equal rank—each presides over a United States district court—and each, we must assume, lives in the same rarified air of clear, cold logic, unswayed by personal opinion or environment. We think the laugh is on the courts and we hope it will be a loud, uproarious guffaw, for nothing nowadays needs laughter more than the so-called majesty of the law.

MAJESTY OF FIDDLESTICKS! The courts have their place, and so have judges, but the sooner we strip them of their robes, their verbiage, their medieval ceremonial, their autocratic punishments for contempt, and all the sanctified nonsense about their superiority to ordinary mortals, the nearer we shall come to justice. Of course the Teapot Dome case and that in California are not precisely alike. The evidence of conspiracy was less direct in the former, possibly due to the fact that four prominent oil men whom the government wanted as witnesses fled to Europe. But in other respects the two cases involved almost the same facts. Indeed the chief counsel for Mr. Doheny is quoted as saying: "There is no distinguishing between the two cases. On the real facts either Judge McCormick or Judge Kennedy is wrong." And the New York Times is much too hopeful when it says: "Until the Supreme Court passes on the question, perhaps a couple of years from now, we shall not really know what the law is." We shan't know then. All we shall know will be the opinion of nine men—or possibly of five against four—and it will be an opinion as inevitably mixed with human error as that of Judge Kennedy or Judge McCormick.

THE FAVORITE FOOD of New York City, according to a poll conducted by the United Restaurant Owners' Association, is corned beef and cabbage. Of some 180,000 ballots cast 23,061 were for this dish, as against 18,549 for vegetable dinner, 14,208 for veal cutlet, 13,864 for roast Long Island duck, 12,515 for filet mignon, 10,586 for roast beef, and smaller votes for other choices. Beefsteak received only 1,354 votes, lamb chops 1,288, ham and eggs 903. We do not think this poll amounts to much; it is about on a par with the contests for the most beautiful bathing girl (who always turns out to be a fright in the rotagravure supplements) and the most popular school teacher—whose vote is worked up chiefly by pupils who think activity in that direction is their best assurance of passing. So far as the choice of corned beef and cabbage has any significance, it is more a vote of lack of confidence in New York cooks than of approval of the dish in question. For it is probably true that corned beef and cabbage can resist more bad cooking than any other known dish. Even the most atrocious of cooks (of whom there are thousands of millions in the metropolis) cannot quite take the kick out of well corned beef or deprive the lowly cabbage of its pungent and persistent flavor.

AS TO THE VEGETABLE DINNER of the great city, it bears only a historical relation to anything ever grown in a garden. It comes out of a cold-storage warehouse or a can, without any relation to the season, consisting generally of a gob of spaghetti (one of New York's best-known vegetables) a potato baked at 10 a. m. to be served at 7 o'clock at night, some spinach from which the life has long since been sucked by protracted boiling, and a dab of string beans (in which the string predominates) served with no dressing other than a residue of the slightly brackish water in which they were cooked. Hence the vote for vegetable dinner, like Nat Goodwin's successive marriages, represents the triumph of hope over experience. The ballots were cast not by persons who had just finished such a dinner but by individuals safely buttressed behind a beefsteak or a plate of ham and eggs (which despite their small vote are generally good even in a New York eatery). Such persons, probably so fortunate as never to have ordered a vegetable dinner à la New York, were licking the chops of their imagination over some sweet and succulent green peas eaten ten years ago before they left the old town in Ohio, or were recalling an eggplant fried at home in such a way as to make it taste different from a pepper or a cucumber. We suggest that the victims of New York restaurants vote next time not for the best dish but for the worst cook. Whoever is elected will deserve to be.

THE LONG-CHERISHED DREAM of a direct air service between Egypt and India carried on by a subsidized private company is about to come true. The British Air Minister, Sir Samuel Hoare, has announced that he hopes to terminate next winter the fortnightly flights of the Royal Air Force from Egypt to Mesopotamia and to substitute a regular passenger line from Mantara in Egypt, to Ramleh in Palestine, Amman, and thence to Bagdad, Basra, Bussir, and along the coast to Karachi, at the mouth of the Indus. The distance is about 2,500 miles and the flight is expected to take two and one-half instead of the eight days now required; if night flying proves practicable the trip may be reduced to a day and a half. Proposals have already been invited and Sir Samuel is confident that there will be a responsible bidder to carry not only the mails, but the large passenger traffic which is expected. We have not a single such service planned in America and nothing corresponding to the daily cross-Channel flight, and yet the anonymous committee on civilian air development in America which recently reported to President Coolidge in opposition to government aid for civilian flying had the impudence to declare that America leads all the world in this field of endeavor.

AIR EXPLORATION fits the Chinaman's description of coasting: "Pling! Then back-walkee mile." Speed machines have their own diabolical economy, and their revenges. But Amundsen and his crew managed to dig out a frozen plane and to level crags of ice with knives and wooden spades, to transfer heavy equipment over treacherous ice floes, fall into the sea and be fished out—all on short rations that left them weak with hunger—and still to meet their leisurely rescuers in the King's Bay Harbor. The correspondents who saw them return never tire of describing their emotions, but the greatest moment must have been when the captain of the lonely sealer Sjoeliv, taking the N-25 for a patrol plane, shouted across "Any news of Amundsen?" and heard the answer "Yes—I am Amundsen." Donald MacMillan, undaunted, follows Amundsen, well equipped with two steamers, planes, and radio. In spite of all the reports of deep water around the pole, he still hopes to find land. His fellow-citizens expect him to claim it in the name of the State of Maine.

WE NOTE WITH REGRET the announcement that "The Villager," carried on for eight years and four hundred issues by Samuel Strauss and Kate Parsons, has decided to suspend publication. It has been delightful reading, full of wisdom and replete with knowledge, so that it has been perused with pleasure by many who would have liked a sharper viewpoint and a more clear-cut definition of aims. Its literary quality alone made it a welcome weekly visitor and we sincerely regret its disappearance, if only because it showed how a little journal of opinion of only four pages, without advertising, can make its way. Fortunately the editors intimate that they are going to try something else, though as to that they have not yet made up their minds. And so they have devoted their last issue to talking about their achievements. They stress The Villager's freedom from propaganda, their having had no other aim than to express their views, "to help make things a little clearer." This unquestionably they have done with a coolness, a good nature, and a detachment most welcome in the heat of these arduous years. We have the greater pleasure in The Villagers' undoubted success because until he began to write for this publication Mr. Strauss was known chiefly as a business man. Every reader of his and of Miss Parsons will await eagerly their next venture.

SENATOR LADD, who died four days after La Follette, was born in Maine, and his early years were passed in the laboratory, far removed from the hurlyburly of politics. Fate took his laboratory into politics. He was chief chemist of the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station when he discovered that good flour could be made from a grade of grain for which the farmers were receiving less than half the usual rate. A little arithmetic showed him that the millers were making five times the normal profit from the rust-affected Dakota wheat for which they paid so little. Bulletin 119 of the State Experiment Station aroused a terrific storm in the Northwest and made the chemist a hero among the farmers. He soon became president of the State Agricultural College; then the Nonpartisan League made him United States Senator. The scientist turned politician perforce was always a bit uncomfortable in Washington; he did not shine in public debate. He presided over the Committee on Public Lands in the famous sessions which revealed the oil scandals; but his selflessness never sought to claim a share of the credit which Senator Walsh's masterly inquisition brought him. It was inevitable that a man of his background and sympathy should enlist under the La Follette banner; and his last public act was to press a measure close to his chief's heart, the Ladd resolution against use of the armed forces of the nation to collect debts or protect private interests.

Robert Marion La Follette

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE was American to his fingertips. No other country could have produced a man just like this nor one truer to his convictions and his principles. It seems to us that he was closer to the people and closer to the soil of America than almost any other great politician since Lincoln. He knew what they wanted in a public servant and he gave it to them, and they in return who knew him and saw him at close range clung to him with a fidelity and devotion which were not in the least shaken by the unjust storm of abuse and calumny which burst upon him in 1917 when he dared to vote according to his beliefs on the matter of the declaration of war. Thereby he kept untarnished the oath he took when he became Senator. Thereby he kept his conscience clear, his soul his own. It is idle to prophesy what history will or will not say about such a figure, but if that fickle muse writes truly of him it will assign to him one of the noblest places in the annals of America—the man who deliberately chose what seemed political death and perpetual contumely rather than yield one iota of convictions held to the last drop of blood in his body. Like Bright and Cobden, Campbell-Bannerman and Ramsay MacDonald, he survived the attacks upon him for opposing his country's going to war. He has died stronger in the affection of the masses of the American people than ever before. Time has justified almost his every stand. The tributes, however grudging, paid him by the hounds of daily journalism, who for years snapped at his heels at their masters' behest, are proof that in the final test even the most vindictive must yield in respect to a character that knows no fear and is true to itself.

A very great American he was. Not in the sense of statesmanship. From the Old World standpoint he would hardly be classed as a statesman. His range of vision, until his later years, was too narrowly circumscribed by domestic issues, so that he was long debarred from profiting by European knowledge and experience. In Wisconsin he fought the devil with fire—he played the local political game with the bitter partisanship he had learned from his enemies. They gave no quarter, and he followed suit—in Wisconsin political enmities are almost as deadly as in Kentucky. He used the public offices and patronage of every kind to build up his machine. This was as natural a step in the process of political evolution as had been, until La Follette broke their grasp, the mastery of the State by corporations and the bosses whom they created and owned. He broke their hold not only by taking a leaf out of their book. He card-catalogued the State; he wrote to thousands upon thousands, establishing personal relations with them. Thus he offset the hostility of the daily press and established his own leadership. It goes without saying that that leadership, however established and maintained, could not have continued for a long political lifetime had he not been buttressed by principle, had he not been genuinely devoted to the popular welfare, had he not been absolutely selfless in giving himself to his causes. This it was, together with his understanding of them, that gave him that hold upon the plain people which nothing could shake, which made 5,000,000 voters acclaim him as their national last fall.

That he fought his admirable fight for popular control of our institutions and our government by piecemeal rather than with a comprehensive program or in accordance with far-reaching policies is undeniable. Our readers will remember that during the last campaign we frankly stated that Mr. La Follette's platform was not thoroughgoing enough for us. He was against privilege, but he failed to see that the tariff is the greatest bulwark and creator of privilege that we have; he opposed corruption, but he voted regularly for the tariff system which for generations gave rise to more political corruption than anything else. He was opposed to war, but he was not a pacifist—he could not see that he who compromises with this evil and refuses to break with it at all times, under all conditions, merely helps to continue it—helps it more than does the outright advocate of war. He believed in cooperation, yet lacked the vision to see what enormous benefits the whole nation would derive if it were made of paramount importance. In the matter of monopoly and the trusts, he based his last campaign upon conditions and policies which time had outlawed. He was only a recent convert to government ownership of railroads.

Yet, recording all this, we count it as one of the greatest privileges to have known and to have been able to support this man. For he was one of the small but noble company of whom it can be said that, whatever their mistakes, they were inevitably and eternally right. Accused of being an actor because of his histrionic manner, he was in reality destitute of pose. He spurned opportunity after opportunity to advance his fortunes and to trumpet abroad his virtues and achievements. Though accused of vanity he was often, in his disregard of slander and falsehood, the despair of his friends—not until a year after the Associated Press's abominable misreporting of his St. Paul speech, directly misquoting him, did he seek to set the public right. Once a brilliant journalist joined the Senator's office force for the express purpose of challenging misrepresentations of Mr. La Follette and getting the truth about him before the public. In vain; after some months the journalist resigned because he could not get the maligned man sufficiently interested in himself to make the task worth while. It was his causes alone which interested him and it was they that roused him and carried him through the slough of despond of war days, in which he daily met old associates who no longer spoke to him although they knew he was right and in their heart of hearts wished that they had had the courage and the manliness to do as did this outcast of the hour. Lonely he could never be because of his devoted family, the host of friends who adored this warm, this intense, this absolutely honest personality, with its record of actual constructive achievement far outweighing that of any other of his contemporaries. Here was a true leader of men, here a true patriot.

"I don't know how the people will feel toward me," he said to his son, Robert, as he lay dying, "but I will take to my grave my love for them which has sustained me through life." Never were truer and never were more sincere words uttered by a public man. Somehow we have no fears for Robert La Follette's posthumous fame. Historians may write what they please, in the hearts of the plain people Robert La Follette is safe, for their love echoes back to love.

Out of the East

FIVE years ago C. R. Das was the leader of the Calcutta bar. His practice was said to bring him an income of $50,000 a year; he lived in one of the show residences of Calcutta. Then he came under the influence of Mahatma Gandhi. For four years he did not take a single case as a lawyer. He turned his estate of some $800,000, including his house, over to a trust fund to serve India, part of it to go toward a university for women. The other day he died, a poor man dwelling in an attic room which a friend gave him rent-free. But he died mayor of Calcutta and president of India's Swaraj Party.

It was Das who persuaded Gandhi two years ago to permit the Swaraj Party to moderate the absolutism of its non-cooperation program. Das adopted the old Parnellite program of entering the legislatures and fighting the Government from within. It was his leadership which reduced the British scheme of diarchy in Bengal and the Central Provinces to ashes. He commanded a majority in his own legislature, and he boldly refused to vote salaries for the ministers of the "transferred departments." Diarchy provides that the less important departments of government shall be in the hands of native ministers, but it does not give them final power. Das said that the Government must accept responsibility where it had control; he would permit no camouflaged measures of near self-government.

The power of his personality was revealed last March when the final votes were taken on the ministers' salaries. Some of his followers were wavering, and there was danger that the salaries would be voted. Das was ill, but, disregarding his doctors, he had himself carried on a stretcher into the legislative chamber. British officials were so fearful that they would issue no passes that day; even the stretcher-bearers were barred at the door, and Das's colleagues had to carry him in. The sick man's followers rallied, and voted against the Government.

Das was more the politician than Gandhi—although he, too, sat at his spinning-wheel and wore chaddar—far more interested in the method and detail of self-government. At the Bengal conference of the Swarajists in May he appealed to the Government, offering cooperation: "Providing some real responsibility is transferred to the people there is no reason why we should not cooperate with the Government," he said. Such cooperation, he added, must depend upon a change of heart in the rulers and a definite guaranty of Swaraj in the near future. Will England give that?

Western leaders do not move toward political power by renouncing this world's goods. Das, like Gandhi, was beyond thought of self. And the power of these Eastern personalities drifts across the intervening oceans with an appeal like that of the ancient prophets. Do we in the West respond to such men? Are we as far from them as the economy program and modest twelve suits of Calvin Coolidge? Would we listen to such an appeal as this of Das's to his followers?

> Be it yours to offer yourselves as sacrifices in the interest of truth and justice, so that your children and your children's children may have the fruits of your sufferings.

If India can rise to that, we need not worry over the decay of Western civilization, for the East will offer us something better.

The Clinton Papers Appear

WHERE is the American historian who has not thrilled at the news that probably the most important collection of papers and documents, as yet unpublished, relating to American affairs between 1741 and 1780 is about to be sold? We refer to the papers of Admiral George Clinton, collected during his tenure of office as Governor of New York from 1741 to 1751, and those of Sir Henry Clinton when commander-in-chief of the British forces in America during the final years of the struggle for independence, 1778-1780. That such important historical material is not in the British archives or in the British Museum is no less than astounding, particularly when it is known that there is included in it Sir Henry Clinton's two manuscript volumes of his history of the American war of independence in which he sought to justify his conduct of the war to posterity.

What renders this collection the more tempting for Americans is that among the 12,000 letters and documents are many captured letters written by Washington, Lee, Gates, Putnam, and other American generals. Many of the letters are in the handwriting of Major John André, the unfortunate and gallant adjutant-general of Clinton, who deciphered many of the captured documents and also British correspondence from codes. Much of this matter has never been thoroughly worked over—the librarian of the London Library, Dr. C. H. Wright, declares that there is much hitherto unpublished matter dealing with the treason of General Benedict Arnold. Even Dr. Wright does not know the extent of these treasures, though an occasional letter like André's farewell to Clinton has been published in various histories. What is more important is the fact that there are here enormous sources of material dealing with the loyalists and their unhappy fate—a phase of the Revolution which has not yet received altogether adequate treatment. Indeed, from reading the current school histories one might almost believe that the American colonists were solidly behind the revolutionists. Few know that Washington was so much in enemy territory that when Mad Anthony Wayne undertook the short night march from Fort Montgomery to Stony Point rangers were sent to every farm house along the line of march, and for some distance on each side, to hold the farmers and their families prisoners in their own homes during the night lest one slip out and warn the menaced garrison.

Here is a treasure trove indeed, and the only question is who shall gain possession of it. Dr. Wright warns his countrymen that they must raise large sums of money if they would head off the American dealers, who seem to dominate all such sales. For ourselves we are indifferent as to where the papers remain if only they can be made available and the contents published at the earliest possible date after completely unbiased editing. Why some publisher does not jump at Sir Henry Clinton's completed work we cannot understand; it would be a best-seller, indeed, in the historical field. The danger, of course, is that this magnificent collection will be dissipated by being sold in small lots; if the British Government does not want it, it would seem that public-spirited American citizens or some one of our many patriotic societies, like the Daughters of the American Revolution, should place this wonderful collection in the Library of Congress, accessible to English and American students alike.

The Sixtieth Anniversary

THE ten years which have passed since the jubilee issue of The Nation in 1915 have been as pregnant with grave events as any decade in the world's history. In July, 1915, Europe had been for a year steeped in blood because its statesmen were too stupid or too criminal to find an end to a struggle destined to achieve none of the aims for which men died by the million. The foul propaganda which deceived all the world was under way from both guilty sides; in America simple-minded people were really beginning to believe that civilization was at stake, that out of war would come a cure for war, that international righteousness could be achieved and the kingdom of God more firmly established if only enough men of the other side were slaughtered. What the net result was all honest men must now admit: War has not been ended. Democracy was never less safe and is daily being stabbed in the back in America not less than in Europe. In Europe today there are more armed men than in 1914; bitterness, malice, hatred, the spirit of revenge, are enthroned. The crushing of great peoples offers no safeguard for the future. All Europe still hovers on the brink of financial ruin.

The Nation's experiences during and after the war Henry Raymond Mussey has set forth elsewhere in this issue. Suffice it to say that in those thrilling years The Nation resumed its separate existence and found, to the surprise of the editors, a tremendous accession of readers, giving it three to four times as many supporters as were ever won for it in its earlier days. More than that, The Nation suddenly discovered that its new course brought it friends the world over—Gandhi in India, Ramsay MacDonald in England, Anatole France, and many another fine spirit in every one of the embattled countries and in the nations of Latin America. From New Zealand, from China, from Tahiti, from Madagascar have come messages of good will and appreciation. Such success confirms the belief of its editors that the intelligent public is ready for accurate news—and that was Mr. Godkin's belief repeatedly stated when he founded this journal in 1865.

This is not the hour to recall at length any of The Nation's achievements since 1915. But on this anniversary we cannot forbear to remind our readers that we were the very first journal of opinion to denounce the Treaty of Versailles—calling it by its right name, the "madness of Versailles," the minute it appeared. The editors would like to believe that if The Nation had done nothing else in this decade it would yet have justified itself by the position it then took and has maintained ever since. They still think that as long as that infamous document survives the world is inevitably divided into two camps. The Nation will give support to no document, no league, and no alliance for security which is tied up to the Treaty of Versailles or helps to perpetuate it unchanged. Six years have only confirmed us in our belief that there can be no health and no peace and no real tranquility in Europe until that treaty is undone. Meanwhile, The Nation has had to fight for democracy in its every issue, precisely as in 1865, for, curiously enough, the lords of our political, social, and economic life who shouted loudest in 1917 that it was a war to preserve democracy are the very ones who more than anybody else are subverting and destroying democracy today. The Nation is undismayed in this struggle by the rise of one despotism after another abroad, or by the apostasy of great groups at home who demand mental subservience and slavery to the existing order under pain of excommunication for those who dare to exercise the old-fashioned American right to free thought, free speech, and free action. Service to those principles and to those human rights remains as compelling for The Nation as it was with the founders of the paper sixty years ago when they created a journal of opinion to be the organ of no church, or sect, or party.

The ten years that we are surveying have witnessed vast damage to the American press, first because it became so readily the tool of government propaganda and of wholesale lying, and second because of the growing cynicism and commercialization of its publishers. In the weekly field we have seen the rise and fall of the Freeman, that brilliant organ of criticism, and of the Review, which was to have refuted and confounded both The Nation and the New Republic. During this period the Independent, one of our oldest and most respected contemporaries, has changed hands twice, to arise Phoenix-like out of the ashes of its dead self full of new promise. Meanwhile, the New Republic has continued to flourish, which is the more gratifying because the journals of conformity, for all their incessant and tiresome acquiescence in everything that is said and done by authority, are no stronger than before. These ten years have also seen the extraordinary rise of the tabloid picture daily, which may yet make serious trouble for the commercialized daily of the old type. This new phenomenon is in keeping with the mental and moral exhaustion of the bulk of the people and their desire to read only such things as will cater to the senses but make no appeal to the brain.

As to the political situation, our readers know well what we think of it. Bad as it is, the reaction and corruption which followed hard upon the Civil War probably seemed as black to our predecessors. Certainly the world is infinitely better off today than ten years ago when men and women were perishing hourly by hundreds and thousands. Who can be discouraged because the odds are great? Robert E. Lee once said to his retreating soldiers: "We cannot win all the time." Fundamentally, The Nation's causes can never be beaten, because they are based on doctrines of brotherhood which must triumph in the long run unless the race is to destroy itself. It is this belief which gives The Nation such a zest for its causes and keeps its editors optimists. How could they be anything else? The gaudium certaminis is theirs in far richer and fuller degree than was the case in 1865. Then, in its beginning, The Nation was absorbed in purely domestic issues. Now it must interest itself in every country, and from the struggle in every clime it draws good cheer and inspiration. The lid of despotism may be clamped down in Hungary; it is suddenly lifted in China or in India.

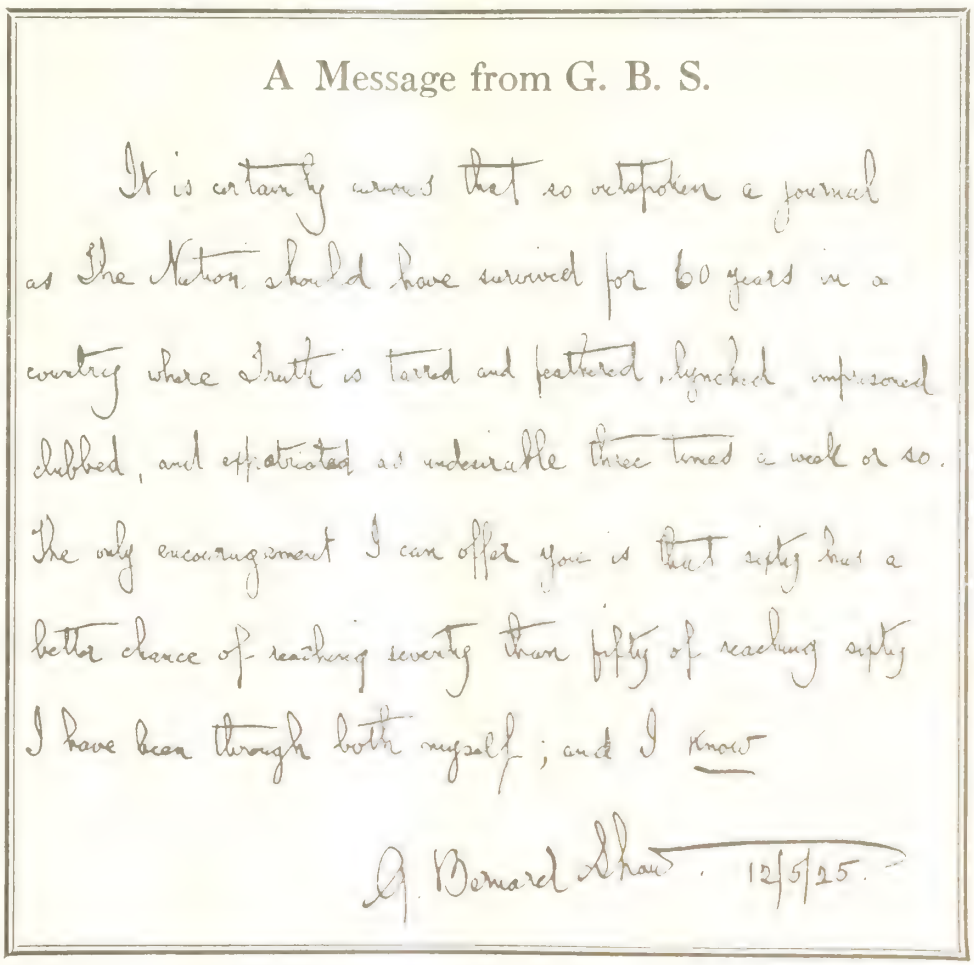
Finally, we should be recreant, indeed, if we failed to record our gratitude to the legion of friends who by their support, both financial and moral, have made the new-old Nation possible. May we be permitted to say that thanks to them the past is secure and the future full of hope?

The Nation 1865-1925

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"THE NATION?" "Oh, yes. It used to be a fine, conservative weekly. But now!" And then there follow the usual references to the radicalism, the bolshevism, the wildness of The Nation under its present wicked editorship. Well, the interesting thing about it is that The Nation was founded in the immediate aftermath of a great war to champion certain unpopular beliefs, to advance causes which speedily brought down upon it calumny and abuse unending. More and more it found itself compelled to a policy of criticism of the government, its policies and then, in Grant's regime, its far-reaching corruption. That critical attitude which compelled it to go counter to many an established privilege and prepossession is alone enough to have accounted for its failure to achieve a great circulation—that it never had more than 11,000 readers at any time under Mr. Godkin's and Mr. Garrison's management. Fortunately for its future existence, it fell, after sixteen years, into the hands of owners who not only put principles above profits but gave absolute freedom of control and utterance to its editors. They were willing to have it tilt at new and old wrongs and they valued it only as it cut to the bone in exposing shams and falsities; it never took too radical a stand for Mr. and Mrs. Henry Villard.

A Message from G. B. S.



It is certainly unusual that so outspoken a journal as The Nation should have survived for 60 years in a country where Truth is tarred and feathered, lynched, imprisoned, dubbed, and effaced as undesirable three times a week or so. The only encouragement I can offer you is that sixty has a better chance of reaching seventy than fifty of reaching sixty. I have been through both myself; and I know

G. Bernard Shaw 12/5/25.

But the fact that The Nation of 1865 was prepared to challenge much in the existing order and that it was edited by an Irishman led to trouble from the outset and stamped it a disturbing influence in the community. A Richmond daily at once declared that its modest capital was made up of "British gold" supplied, as Mr. Godkin quoted it, for the purpose of "overthrowing our glorious, etc."—there are many who still think it bent on overthrowing our glorious Republic, our glorious self-satisfaction, our glorious belief that everything in America is perfect beyond all cavil. Many similar charges appeared in the first year of The Nation's life. Within a month Mr. Godkin protested at the "countenance which seems to be given in Boston to the semi-barbarous practice of taking the editor by the throat when anything objectionable in matters of taste and opinion appears in his paper, and digging into his private life in search of unworthy motives." In the sixth issue of The Nation, August 10, 1865, this editor was already so embattled as to have to express himself thus in his own defense:

> Of one thing our experience fully satisfies us. There is throughout the country an enthusiastic desire for an "independent" and "impartial" paper, which shall always take each reader's own side of every question. It is impossible for anybody who is not in constant contact with the public to understand how widely diffused this feeling is; and the bitterness of the complaints which come in, when it takes somebody else's side, are evidently due to a sort of vague impression that when a man subscribes for a newspaper or review the editor enters, by implication, into an agreement to supply him with his (the subscriber's) own opinions ready cooked.

All of which protests availed Mr. Godkin not at all—how could they? The criticisms that he bewailed, and the attitude of the ordinary subscriber which he set forth, are the daily experience of the present editor, the sixth this journal has had, as they have been of every other. Human nature does not change in such matters, only human recollection. Mr. Godkin was anathema to many from the day that he began his editorial career, for he was radical on a number of issues, he applied the yardstick of his foreign experience (and in those days America was far more sensitive to criticism from the European standard than is the case today), he compromised not at all, he had singularly high ideals, and he had vision. Now, all of these things are, in journalism, deadly sins. He who is possessed of them must be prepared for unpopularity, for non-success, for being writ down a scribe and a Pharisee. For his nonconformity he must be prepared to pay the price at all times, just as Mr. Godkin and his staff did.

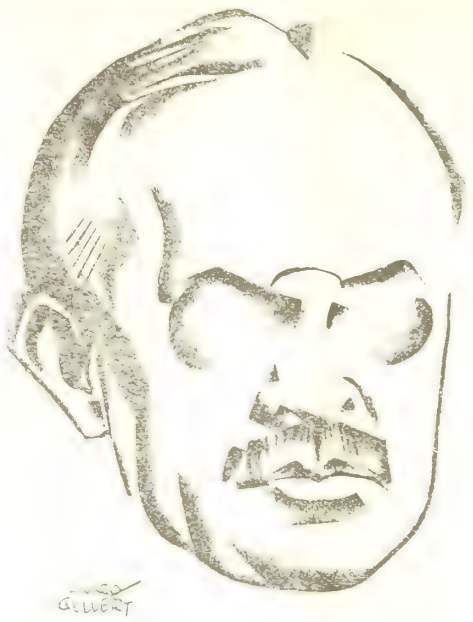
The charge that he was subventioned by British gold pursued Mr. Godkin to the end of his career—he became editor of the New York Evening Post in 1882. His British birth was the simple explanation of many a criticism of America which was born of the most ardent Americanism, in its highest and noblest sense, that could possibly be found in the American press. It amused him in his old age to remember the charge, seriously printed, that he daily called the staff of the Evening Post together to sing "God Save the Queen" before beginning the editorial council—in 1918 it was alleged that the tune had been changed to "Deutschland über Alles." To the very end of his career he was written down a carping critic satisfied with nothing, a cynic, a pessimist, a "little-American," a traitor, one always destructive and never constructive, and all the rest. The recently published letters of Roosevelt and Lodge reveal how wicked those American worthies thought the great editor of The Nation. Writing to Lodge on November 16, 1892, the future President said:

> I read an article in the New York Nation the other day so foolish, so malignant, so deliberately mendacious, and so exultant that it fairly makes we writhe to think of the incalculable harm to decency that scoundrelly paper, edited by its scoundrelly chief, Godkin, has done.

From which it would appear that Mr. Godkin had trod on somebody's toes. And once in 1898 the McKinley Cabinet was in session for a morning to decide whether it should arrest Mr. Godkin and the editors of The Nation and the Evening Post, and Mr. Samuel Bowles and his staff of the Springfield Republican, for treason in time of war—Lyman J. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury, subsequently informed me of this fact.

So when I hear people bewailing the departure of the present-day Nation from the conservative standards and the conformist point of view of the earlier Nation, I know at once that those critics never read The Nation in the "good old days" of which they speak. For Mr. Godkin not only had an exceedingly exacerbating style; he every now and then said things which profoundly shocked people of good form. He began by writing himself down a "nigger-lover," for the earliest issues of his paper were given to an ardent championship of the demand that the Negro be enfranchised forthwith. He, the aristocrat of the press, a man of highest intellectual attainments, actually wanted to have every last untutored, black freedman given the right to vote, yes, to vote in all his rags and in his ignorance, with his total lack of any training for citizenship except that provided by master or overseer. Such was the measure of his faith in democracy and universal male suffrage. He early shocked people by refusing to accept the Republican Party, savior of the Republic that it was, at its own face value. Protection had then not become the fetish and the prolific source of privilege and blackmail it has since grown to be, but Mr. Godkin's radicalism went to the furthermost limit—he was until his death for absolute free trade. In the matter of the civil service he was one of the first to take the dangerously new and radical viewpoint that the offices ought not to be the spoils of political victory—which was, of course, described as a brazen effort to saddle a bureaucracy upon America.



Oswald Garrison Villard

But he did not stop with this shocking of the conservatives. Having been an eyewitness of two wars, notably The Crimean, he came to abhor war in its every form. He once actually wrote that the soldier's trade would some day be ranked where it belonged —"next after the hangman's," a sentiment that would have put him in jail not so long ago and would at best have made him socially impossible today in many of the salons he once graced. As for the modern hundred-percentism, the worship of the flag, the enthronement of the President as a sacrosanct being, and our generally pitiful imitation of foreign imperialism and rampant nationalism, there was nothing against which he launched so readily his barbed arrows. So he opposed not only the war with Spain but President Cleveland's mad proposal that we go to war with England over an unheard-of boundary dispute in Venezuela.

When he began devoting his attention to the political conditions in New York City he turned his guns upon the citadels of privilege and of wealth by showing that the bosses were allowed to wreak their will in and on the greatest city of America because they were owned and financed by crooked corporations and their officials. Naturally, only a part of this fight was carried in the columns of The Nation because of the limited space of a weekly, but it did its share, and as I survey Mr. Godkin's career I do not believe that he ever rendered a fine service to America. Had the term been invented then he must have repeatedly been called a Bolshevist. A radical he certainly was, save only in the field of labor and along certain economic lines. This was not unnatural, for he grew up in the Manchester school and, as Mr. J. A. Hobson has pointed out, Cobden, Bright, and Gladstone were so filled with the spirit of revolt against the artificial restrictions upon individual liberty by class governments that they failed to recognize "in the distribution of the ownership of land and capital, the control and motivation of industry, and the visible class cleavages thus created, social diseases even deeper seated than those which engaged their reforming energies."

To belabor the point is needless. I venture only to point out further that many of the so-called revolutionary changes in The Nation in 1918 were merely a return to its original plans and, in some degree, to its original make-up. The earlier years of The Nation were its richest. After it became affiliated with the Evening Post in 1881 it lost much of its spontaneity and under Wendell Phillips Garrison's influence (1881-1905) it became less and less polemical and more and more the organ of an intense scholarship—not forgetting still to advocate unpopular and far-reaching reforms such as woman suffrage. What he did for scholarship in America was declared inestimable by many a scholar on Mr. Garrison's retirement, yet there was almost no official university recognition of this life of extraordinary devotion to literary and scholarly ideals. He, the son of William Lloyd Garrison, ranked, of course, as a radical and a dissenter.

Wendell Phillips Garrison, one of the most devoted, self-controlled, and self-effacing of men, who ordered his own life with extraordinary asceticism and gave everything there was in him for thirty-five years to The Nation, hoped ardently that it would die with him—until he found that his successor was to be Hammond Lamont. To know Mr. Lamont was to conceive the highest opinion of his intellectual integrity, his devotion to truth, his readiness to meet any new issue or cult and to challenge it to prove that its doctrines, or The Nation's preconceived ideas, were wrong. Under this admirable character, with its extraordinary combination of a judicial temperament and passionate championship of certain causes, The Nation began to flower again, its circulation rising slowly from low-water mark. Unfortunately Mr. Lamont's untimely death, as he was reaching the fulness of his powers, ended his career just as he was beginning to reach out and to impress his individuality more strongly upon this weekly. The Nation's debt to him can never be forgotten. Nor can the present management fail to record once more its indebtedness to Paul Elmer More and Harold de Wolf Fuller. They had their visions and their policies and they held to them ably and honestly—as gentlemen and editors ought all to do.

As for the revolution in The Nation of 1918, the most significant facts about it were its resumption of its separate existence and its rebirth in the middle of the war which altered the world and achieved none of its purposes. It is not for me to pass upon the worth of its achievements since. No one realizes better than its staff of 1925 its present shortcomings. It has no longer the note of pure scholarship, perhaps not that of deep political knowledge. Its editors would be the last to compare themselves to Edwin Lawrence Godkin and his associates in either training or skill in presentation. But they yield to no one in their passion for human liberty and for international brotherhood and righteousness. If they do not see eye to eye with Mr. Godkin and Mr. Garrison in matters of labor or of economics, it is not because they deem their judgments infallible, but because times have changed and new problems, which the elder generation could not have foreseen, challenge all thinking men.

Finally, they heartily rejoice when they find The Nation and its editors blacklisted by the reactionaries and denounced as destructive critics who seek to "overthrow our glorious, etc." For it makes them feel that their blows are occasionally telling; that possibly they have at times reached the midriff as did Mr. Godkin's rapier so regularly, and that they are, in their own way and in some degree, following in the footsteps of the two founders who never knew what it was to compromise or to count the cost. What more priceless heritage than that could one generation of editors bequeath or another receive?

The Heroic Age

By HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

IS it possible to have a heroic age without heroes? If so, it is perhaps not inappropriate to place the heroic age of the new Nation in the unhappy far-off times of 1918-1919, times of war and revolutionary upheaval, times when the church blessed mass slaughter and the universities scientifically taught hate, times when, in consequence, unpopular opinions often meant tar and feathers or a beating up by patriotic thugs. Now, The Nation had always held unpopular opinions, and held them proudly—defiantly, if need be—from those very earliest times when Mr. Godkin was fighting a brave battle for free trade and civil-service reform among a people besotted with protective plunder and the spoils of office. But The Nation's opinions had never been more unpopular than in those days when it stood for a just peace of reconciliation while all about it surged the roaring flood of public passion hell-bent on victory alone, stood for truth amid the raging storm of lies religiously whipped up by every possible agency of public and private mendacity, stood for tolerance and fair play amid a mob who called tolerance treason and labeled fair play pro-bolshevism. It is not that The Nation was always right, though I think that its major positions have already been vindicated. It is not that we possessed any monopoly of righteous emotions, though I can say with all honesty that we fought the best fight we knew how for all the truth we could find, and fought it, too, without rancor against a host of enemies who would have crushed us without compunction had they been able. But the days demanded, above all, courage in the servants of unpopular truth, and though they might call us slackers, no honest man ever dared call us cowards.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Perhaps the hardest thing was to follow your own judgment and convictions against the judgment of men whose thought you respected almost more than your own—and particularly when no one could certainly tell what was right, and when every government in the war was using its unrestrained power to make you believe lies, to the supreme end of victory. You wondered, is the whole world wrong, or am I? For comfort and assurance you sometimes sought the company of the little group of like-minded doubters.

It was in January, 1918, just as the old bonds were breaking, that I came to The Nation, came without the slightest experience in such editorial work. Four weeks later, with rare daring, trusting my cheerful assurance that I couldn't wreck The Nation in a month, the editor departed on a thirty-day speaking trip through the West, leaving the paper to my tender mercies—and God took care of us. The anxious months of the spring and early summer wore on, while the military situation grew more tense. Every mail brought us batches of cancelations from grieved and scandalized oldest subscribers. We pushed ahead, and our issue for July 6 announced the entire separation of The Nation from the New York Evening Post. We had cut loose from the last of the old moorings. Thenceforth we must sink or swim alone—and the morning mail always made it look extraordinarily like sinking.

Then Mr. Burleson came to our aid. We irreverently referred to the late Mr. Gompers, who was touring Europe with the blessing of our government, as a bagman of the war. A vigilant and stupid censor pounced down on us and held up our issue for five days, till the President himself, according to report, freed it—but not till after the editor had shown fight. Our attempted suppression marked the nadir of liberty of the press. Meanwhile the news reports of our fight had advertised The Nation all over the country, and our circulation began to climb. The Nation had suddenly ceased to be what our London correspondent once described with entire accuracy, but with unconscious humor, as "a periodical that lies on the table in college libraries."

Another month, and we started the International Relations Section, under the greatest difficulties, and in the face of a universal government conspiracy of silence. Friends who for twenty years had deserved well of every good cause made it financially possible, and we began publishing foreign documents that could be had nowhere else in the United States, though we had no extraordinary facilities for getting them. We fed real foreign news to a public hungry for facts, for years systematically starved of such facts by government censorship. Thenceforth even our enemies—and under our wholly independent auspices, with the flag of peace and reconciliation nailed to our masthead, they multiplied like flies in summer—even those who hated us worst had to come to us for facts at a time when facts were most unwelcome to those in authority. The circulation manager began to smile, but all the while the deficit mounted threateningly.

The armistice and the departure of the editor for the peace conference only brought fresh difficulties in the office. The utter disorganization of mails, interrupted cable communication, and censorship, together with the multiplicity of immediate and insoluble world problems for which we had to furnish a final solution every Thursday morning—and a solution, too, that would not do violence to the deepest convictions of an absent and inaccessible editor, to say nothing of our own—made those months a time when we in the office occasionally thought that the best thing would be to go away and study astronomy. Sometimes devoted readers (of the newer type) tell me of the help they got from our consistent policy in those days. I recall the uncertainties and disagreements in our editorial council at 20 Vesey Street, the blundering gropings after truth—and I remember with gratitude that God looks after fools and children and the United States.

One cold December afternoon a Russian business man turned up at the office. How much would we give him for a book of laws and decrees of the Soviet Government? Not so much as he thought them worth. How had he got them past our sleepless censor? By tearing the book into separate leaves and crumpling them up as packing for his baggage on his recent journey from Vladivostok. Might we have the documents competently examined? Yes, he thought we might.

Next day Providence again helped us. A patriarchal-looking man, a translator in the Library of Congress, in New York for a few days, dropped in to urge us to publish in the International Relations Section translations of Russian documents that were being received by the library. We showed him our mysterious book of laws. Oh, yes; the library had all those, and more too. Thereafter our first visitor held his book at lower price. We printed a collection of the decrees in our issue of December 28, 1918, and followed them with Russia's new constitution on January 4, 1919. For February 1 we had to print just double the number of copies that we issued on January 4. We began to see The Nation as a rival of the Saturday Evening Post, but we soon learned wisdom, though not without cost to our absent editor and proprietor, who paid the bills.

It was an exciting winter, and I suppose that nobody enjoyed that dark period more heartily than we did, as we hammered away week by week at the iniquity that was being shaped in Paris, and as we dragged to light carefully hidden facts that we dug up from every out-of-the-way corner of the world. The editor's letters gave the country some of its earliest real information concerning revolutionary Germany. We saw armed intervention in Mexico impending. A bold editorial, to our great delight, brought a counter-blast from the oil men, against whom we had made no charges, provided us with a fresh crop of enemies, and incidentally brought us a visit from a delightful lady who had just been touring Mexico (in the pay of those same enemies) and who was eager to enlighten our darkness. We lambasted the inanities of the Overman Committee broadcasting drivel about Russia, and we poked fun at the incredible Archie Stevenson, who counted that day lost in which he had not discovered a new mare's nest. We kept busy, we told the truth, so far as we could discover it, no matter whom it hit, and we said what we thought about things at a time when most periodicals had made themselves into mere government megaphones. And if the common people did not hear us gladly, at least the uncommon ones did.

At last the peace conference was over, and President Wilson brought home the treaty. Our editor, too, returned, and we took up with even greater vigor the fight against the iniquitous and foolish pact of Versailles, not with the slightest hope, at first, that its ratification could be prevented, but simply with the idea that it was our task to fight international wrong-doing. For once we were on the winning side. It is only fair to say, I think, that we helped make it the winning side.

The currents of popular hatred, so sedulously stirred up, and so skilfully directed against the Germans, were then turned with amazing swiftness against the economic and social "radicals." We had the witch-burning mania of the Lusk Committee, and the anti-Red propaganda that wrecked the steel strike. We had the government breaking its pledged word in order to break the coal strike, and we had business coming back into its own, determined to teach labor a lesson after the war debauch. The Nation, as usual, found itself on the unpopular side, defending the constitutional rights of "Wobblies" and "Wops," of political prisoners, of browbeaten strikers, of helpless aliens. And, as usual, it was cursed for advocating doctrines that it never espoused, but whose utterance it rightly held to be lawful.

The revolutionary unrest that ran through all Europe in 1919 was not without its feeble stirrings here. The sober and godly, believing still in force, sat grimly behind their riot guns, terrified yet determined. The Nation greeted the movement with sober joy, not as the precursor of violent change but, too hopefully perhaps, as the assertion by common men of a well-justified claim to a fuller life. We hoped too much, but it was a generous and noble hope, and, by contrast with the selfish craven fear that drove on many of the masters of our industrial life, it appears only the finer. As I turn again the pages we wrote in those days, I see nothing for which we need apologize; only I see occasion for regret that the common man, and the uncommon one too, were not able to live up to what we hoped of them. It is an old story, and because humanity goes on hoping, it goes on forward.

Yes, they were great days, and The Nation, boldly facing the new day with a new policy and outlook, lived up to its traditions. We who had a chance to help make it what it was in those days were grateful because we could speak truth as we saw it in a world where few had such freedom. Whatever our mistakes, they were not those of cowardice, pusillanimity, or voluntary ignorance. And at a time when everyone was unhappy because he was compromising with evil and falsehood, we were happy because we were fighting as best we knew how for truth without evasion. It was a great fight. It is good to have had part in it.

Books and The Nation

By CARL VAN DOREN

WHILE I cannot claim to be one of those oldest subscribers who are the backbone and the terror of any magazine, I have been a reader of The Nation for precisely one-third of its existence and one-half of my own. Moreover, I was its literary editor for three exciting years, and for three more have been associated with it, particularly with its literary department, on terms which have made me feel as close as a brother, if not, at times, even closer. And when I remember the hours I have spent scouring its files for material on the history of American literature, I do not hesitate to claim for myself some degree of familiarity with its critical career. These facts I state, with proper modesty, as my excuse for the superlative upon which I hereby venture. That superlative is: The Nation has set itself, and has held to, a higher standard of book reviewing than any other American or British review has ever done over a period of sixty years.

CARL VAN DOREN

The anonymity of its reviews during the early days hid from the public the eminence of its reviewers. Among them, however, were the weightiest scholars of the universities, particularly of Harvard, whom Godkin enlisted in his new venture. Howells, back from his Italian consulship, and Henry James, still see-sawing between two continents, lent their delicate pens at the outset. In time came William James, learned and audacious, and the three Adams brothers, who were as learned as anybody and so audacious that they set the fathers of the republic revolving in their austere tombs. The list of all the writers who reviewed books for The Nation in its first quarter century would amount virtually to a list of all the critical writers who adorned the last quarter century of America's silver age of literature, from the close of the Civil War to the more disturbed and argumentative nineties. If the next generation was perhaps less eminent, it was not less expert. The nature of the change is to be found in the fact that American literature had arrived at a point where a division of labor had become necessary. Poets like Longfellow and Lowell could no longer be expected to carry the added burden of criticism which those men carried. Some created, and some criticized; few did both. The natural tendency for The Nation, with its tradition of expertness, was to become more and more interested in critical and learned books, and to grow more and more minute in its discussions.

This tendency was interrupted by the break in 1918, which reconcentrated the attention of the paper upon international chicanery and upon the danger to civil liberties of unrestrained majorities, which turned its attention to phases of economic exploitation not hitherto regarded as so important. With the break went a large increase in circulation, among readers, furthermore, who were notably concerned in the creative and speculative aspects of current literature, rather than with the erudite and technical. The literary department of The Nation, not so quick to respond to the change as its political columns, nevertheless gradually did respond. It had the tact to see that its task was not to become less expert but to carry its old expertness into wider fields. For the past half dozen years it has gone on the assumption that, though it might not be called upon to examine every treatise or encyclopedia, it was called upon to examine every outstanding novel or play or book of poems or philosophy or religion or political planning or economic reconstruction with the same precision which it would formerly have used with a treatise or an encyclopedia. That the department has always been correct in its opinions under the new regime no one associated with it would think of contending. Vigor, of course, not correctness, is the mark of good critical, as it is the mark of good creative, writing. And The Nation has been almost uniformly vigorous. Mere noisiness, indeed, it has eschewed, as it has eschewed the easy triumphs of singularity. It has preferred, instead, the weight of criticism which comes from the marriage of only two qualities: knowledge and reason. Though the reviewers make little parade of learning, they are as a rule actually learned, rarely surprised into thinking an idea novel to the world merely because it is novel to them, and unlikely to touch a book upon any topic concerning which they have not already read many books. With this initial advantage, they combine the further advantage of exact analysis which they owe not only to their own habits but to the freedom of statement which The Nation permits them. The combination wants nothing further to make it ideal except an edged and rapid style. This the literary department has at least regularly sought for, and often found.

Though I say this of the department as lately administered, I could as well be saying it about the department from the first, so far as its methods go. The distinction often drawn between the "new" Nation and the "old" Nation seems to me somewhat meaningless. There is, for example, the remark sometimes made that the paper under Godkin had an array of contributors not to be matched by any similar array since 1918. This, I believe, is an illusion of time. When Howells came upon the staff he was an obscure young man, as was Henry James in those years. Their fame rose later. If I were a prophet, I should be willing to prophesy that in 1985 the list of Nation reviewers between 1918 and 1925 will look as distinguished as the list between 1865 and 1872 or any other septennium in its record. I would go further and say that this later list promises to have a livelier look than the old list. To mention only one reviewer and one review, I doubt that any critic has ever written more dashingly for the literary department than Preserved Smith or that any discussion of a book has been more searching and yet readable than that devoted in 1920 to Wells's "Outline of History." And in general, it seems clear to me that the group of writers who have lately commented upon literary matters for The Nation, though some of them are as obscure as Howells was in 1866, are certain to emerge a long way from obscurity as they grow older.

These same writers have written also for other critical journals. The Nation has to sustain an amount of rivalry today which it did not have even to dream of sixty years ago, for the republic of letters is more populous, more varied, and more active than it then was in the United States. No review can now claim unchallenged priority. One is more bulky and timely, perhaps, than the others; one more diversified in the range of books it notices; one more generous in the space it allots to individual books; one more personal and assertive; one more nearly the organ of some special coterie. Though I cannot, writing in The Nation, quite decently discuss this rivalry in detail, I can at least say that on those occasions when I have seen a single reviewer notice a book for The Nation and for some other review as well, I have almost invariably found that his best work did not go elsewhere. Often given less space in The Nation, he would generally say more. He would be more evidently on guard against lax assertions. He would be customarily more thoroughgoing and outspoken.

I admit that I here hint at what may be called Nation virtues, and I know that there are other softer, sweeter, kinder, more optimistic virtues. Indeed, throughout the paper's history it has had the reputation of being exacting if not cantankerous. Roosevelt, for example, hated it for its drastic assaults upon such ways of compromise as he liked to practice under cover of a tumult in behalf of righteousness. Nor have The Nation's opponents generally been mollified by realizing in the end that it and not they was justified by the outcome. So in the matter of book-reviewing, it must often have irritated many persons to see that The Nation refused to take certain windy reputations seriously and that it insisted upon praising certain authors whom the public overlooked. But it has held emphatically to its principles of rigor. Even where it was plainly in the wrong, as in its reviews of the first part of Thomas Hardy's "Dynasts" and of Theodore Dreiser's earlier books, it has at least made its stand in a fashion to be respected if not approved. Its faults have been almost always the defect of its virtues.

This, perhaps, is as much as may be asked of any critic or critical organ. Criticism is a trying art. All around it flows the stream of creation. It is a violent, incalculable stream, coming from a head no one has discovered and moving toward a level about which no one can be sure. Often it is but partly intelligible. It leaves few permanent traces, cuts many new banks, now lags and now rushes, deposits strange sediments, sweeps away ancient landmarks. The critic, though he thinks he is fixed upon some rock in midchannel, may find out that he is suddenly adrift in a spinning boat or that he has been left stranded unaware. He can trust to no provisions for his adventure besides such knowledge as he has been able to obtain from a study of the past behavior of the torrent. He can trust to no method for his art except the method of reason. His temptation is either to drift complacently or else to deny that there is any current. Both temptations are fatal. To be a critic at all, he must work with the tools he has, no matter what the rest of the world may think of his performance. This The Nation, it seems to me, has done. If it has resisted more than it has flattered, that is what knowledge and reason always combine to do. And for sixty years books at large have fared better from The Nation than they could have fared from a merely amiable review.

Dusk

By S. FOSTER DAMON

Through the dull dusk my loved one stole
Into the graveyard. Tenderly
She bent, searching knoll and knoll;
But each time the crumbling soul
Answered: "I am not he."

She found the grave she sought for soon—
My grave—but silent was my voice.
An hour then under the sickle moon
She sang tune after familiar tune,
Hoping I might rejoice.

"Just a Few Words"

For The Nation's Sixtieth Birthday

London, May 7

DEAR VILLARD: I cannot say how many happy returns —returns in every sense, except copies sent back—I wish yourself and your paper. Sixty! Believe me that is a fine age; and to have kept a reputation all those years! I too am sixty, and over. But I am as fresh as a lark or your paper. You never know what may happen to you at sixty. The other day Captain Amundsen urged me to fly with him to the North Pole. I replied I was too young to begin Arctic exploration yet, but would consider it when I came to maturity. Except for its wisdom and knowledge, your paper is very much like me. In its love of freedom and its moderation, exactly like.

By Bertrand Zadig

HENRY W. NEVINSON

I suppose that is why I have taken it so long, and have always been so delighted when you have asked me to write for you. But let me tell you what I do in the way of reading and writing now —in journalism, I mean. Every morning at 7:30 an invisible hand pushes the Times and the Daily Herald through my letter-box. I take the Times because it is such a decent old institution, and has returned to the paths of virtue since Lord Northcliffe's death. You lively Americans may call it dull, but oh, it is so deserving! Everyone who follows "The Public Life," on which my old friend J. Alfred Spender has just published so excellent a book, must of necessity read the Times. On the whole it has the best foreign correspondence all over the world, and long experience has taught me how difficult is a foreign correspondent's work. It is never finished. Morning, noon, and night the wretched man is kept continually on the strain of anxiety. Suppose he is in the Balkans. Hardly has he sent off his last wire and settled down in bed when there is a revolution, or a cathedral is blown up with a disturbing bang, or the telephone summons him to the Prime Minister, or a messenger crashes at his door with a telegram from his editor in London demanding details of the fighting, which has not yet begun. I have suffered all that. I know the lot of a foreign correspondent, how restless it is. Yet the foreign news in the Times is nearly always good, except perhaps when the correspondent is excluded from the country he has to tell about, as now from Russia.

And then the "leaders"—as a rule how sensible they are! Of course I hardly ever agree with them, but that does not matter. I recognize their general good sense and fairness. Reading them is like talking to a worthy old gentleman in one of our most comfortable clubs—not a sporting or literary club, but one like the Carlton or Reform or Devonshire. It gives you the opinion of the solid, well-dressed, kindly old boy, who knows nothing about the "lower classes," but would like to see them doing the necessary work of the country under happy and contented conditions. And then those "middles"—those nice little essays that go in as the third or fourth "leader" every morning, new as the love of God! How sweet and gentle they are! With what a sense of style and literature they pervade the day! But I never read them.

Besides, I always like to hear what dear old Walkley (A. B. W.) has to say about the drama, for his quotations from Aristotle and Molière remind me of my happy boyhood. And he gives me a sense of permanence, for he was writing just the same thirty years ago. And, again, in the Times one finds such excellent letters on vital and diverse subjects, such as plovers' eggs, Anglo-Catholicism, rating, Kenya Colony, women's stockings, the Gold Standard, or the first cuckoo heard in Surrey. How could one live without that fine confused feeding for the mind? And occasionally, following the "leaders," comes some special article written with such knowledge and freedom that one is astonished at the editor's boldness in inserting it. Such was the article last Monday upon Huxley and his centenary. I read and read, expecting some qualification of the praise, some admission that the great biologist had been mistaken in his assaults upon orthodoxy, but none came. The article was of a piece throughout, and I remember the time when it would have wrecked any British paper.

But also, as I said, the invisible hand thrusts the Daily Herald into my letter-box, folded up in the Times, like a child's powder in jam. I look at the Herald because I belong to the Labor Party, and the Herald is its organ. It shows the general tendency of Labor desires and Labor criticisms. Sometimes it has a good article from a Labor leader, and the comic or satiric verses by that woman, "Tom Fool," nearly always hit the mark. Its sporting news is thought fairly good too, though I did once go to the Derby with its racing expert and two women who by following the expert's counsel lost all the money they put on. But somehow the paper is not the success it ought to be. I admit all the difficulties in the way of any Labor paper—the want of good advertisements, the consequent shabbiness in appearance, the general seriousness that rather frightens the working man, and the persistent note of complaint, always so wearisome in man, woman, child, or paper. I see the difficulties, but I do wish the Herald had greater influence; for in fact it has little.

About an hour after the arrival of the Times and its antidote, a cycle draws up at my front gate (don't think me purse-proud, but I have a back gate too, though it is never used except by the dustman), and, dismounting the cycle, a boy inserts a copy of the Manchester Guardian. It has reached London by the night train from Manchester, with about 20,000 other copies, I believe, but I do not suppose the boy is aware that in the sack slung on his back he carries the greatest daily paper in the world. You will think that vain boasting, because I have done such a lot of work for the paper in various parts of the world, including your own peculiar country. But I am too old for vanity and as to boasting, let others speak. Two nights ago, at the dinner of the Newspaper Society in London, our present Prime Minister, a fair-minded man and yet a Tory, quoted the following words as his ideal of the highest journalism:

> Fundamentally the conduct of a newspaper implies honesty, cleanness, courage, fairness, the sense of duty to the reader and the community. The newspaper's primary office is the gathering of news. At the peril of its soul it must see that the supply is not tainted. Neither in what it gives, nor in what it does not give, nor in the mode of presentation, must the unclouded face of truth suffer wrong. Comment is free, but facts are sacred. Propaganda, so called, by this means is hateful. The voice of opponents, no less than that of friends, has a right to be heard. Comment also is justly subject to a self-imposed restraint. It is well to be frank. It is even better to be fair.

After quoting that passage, Mr. Baldwin continued:

> Those are noble words, and it is counsel possibly of perfection, but in that is the ideal of the highest type of English journalism, which is the highest type in the world, and they are the words of Scott of the Manchester Guardian.

Well indeed does C. P. Scott deserve that high praise, all the more remarkable in coming from the leader of his political opponents. I think Massingham was the greatest editor I have ever worked under—so impulsive, passionate, courageous, and yet at heart so fair, so placable when justice was at last accomplished. But in Scott I do recognize a solid dignity and a confidence in righteousness which were sometimes obscured by Massingham's passionate detestation of wrong. And what a paper the "M. G." always has been and steadily continues! How full of quiet wisdom! How accurately written! Abounding in what variety and charm! And on two pages at least illustrated with reproductions that are the astonishment of all the picture papers in London. The only fault of Scott is that he is old. I believe he still cycles the three miles from his house to the office every day, edits the paper, writes a leader, and cycles back at night. It is magnificent, but he cannot choose but be old. I fear he is some ten years older even than myself.

Then again, on Friday morning, wrapt up with the Times and the Herald, comes the New Leader, best of the Labor weeklies, edited by my friend Brailsford, my doughty comrade in so many embattled fields both of war and politics. All the world knows the man's courage and pertinacity; not so many know, as I know, his extreme sensitiveness, his wide knowledge of music and art, his love of the best literature, and his acute perception of beauty in every form. In old days he foretold that neither of us would ever be an editor, chiefly owing to our reputation for violence—so false a reputation in my case, but in his partly true, as is seen in his hair that always stands on end, like a Russian revolutionist's. Yet his prophecy was right in my case, but wrong in his. The New Leader that he has edited from its foundation is nominally the organ of the "I. L. P." (Independent Labor Party) that is supposed to be the thrusting spear-point of the Labor Party whether in office or opposition. His small staff, of which I have the honor to be one, meets every Monday for lunch in the "1917 Club," founded at the time of the first successful Russian revolution. There the members of the staff, usually including one or two "distinguished strangers," discuss the prominent subjects of the week, and as far as possible formulate a policy, the editor of course retaining supreme and final control. It is something like the old London Nation lunch under Massingham, or like your own lunch in the beautiful upper chamber that I remember with such pleasure. As on similar occasions, I generally sit silent, because my mind moves more slowly than others, and I usually think of my witty observations on the way home. Also the discussions are often on points of doctrine or other abstractions, which belong to a higher world than mine. For sight is my only faculty, and doctrines or abstractions sometimes pass out of sight.

Some complain that the New Leader is a trifle "high-browed" for the working man. I think they are wrong. Some of the articles, like Bertrand Russell's on Epstein, may have puzzled the average worker, but they were utterly incomprehensible to me also, and I think the brains of the average working man, especially in the North, are every bit as good as mine. However, perhaps for this reason, or because Brailsford's staff are not "advanced" enough for the Left Wing, dear old George Lansbury, whom I have called "The Last of the Christians," and who is the only man I can endure to call me "brother," has lately started a rival called Lansbury's Workers' Weekly, and it is running well on lines of sweetness, general benevolence, and all-share-alike. I suppose our party cannot have too many papers, and certainly what we want most is a first-rate Sunday paper, containing all the news and all the suitable comments—a paper that the British workman may really enjoy reading on his one leisure morning, and the British workwoman may also enjoy on her leisure afternoon when she has cooked the Sunday dinner and done the washing-up.

For Sunday, I myself always read the Observer, a paper that the spirit and resolution of J. L. Garvin have raised from the depths to become the finest weekly in the country. He is an extraordinary man. Have you ever trained a colt? You tie him by a long rope and let him run. He runs this way and that, dashing off in all directions, or circling round you, enough to make you dizzy. But by degrees he grows reasonable, and if you give him rope enough, instead of hanging himself, he learns to keep the road and trot or canter along quite prettily. Garvin often reminds me of such a colt. At first he doesn't care which way he goes provided he goes fast. You see it in his eye, in his talk, in the rapidity of his handwriting. Often enough he starts all wrong, but give him time and he will almost invariably come to hand and take the straight and useful course. Besides, he has a real love of the best literature, and a genuine knowledge of it, and the man who possesses those two qualities cannot go far wrong. I write as his opponent at one time or another on nearly every political subject, but still as his friend.

Well, dear Villard, those are the British papers I read as a rule. As long as the Westminster Gazette was an evening paper, edited by J. A. Spender, I generally read that also, just to keep my balance trim; for I suppose Spender is the most accurately balanced man in the world. I ought to read the Morning Post more, for it is excellently written, it represents "Society," aristocracy, and the fastidious or educated scorners of the crowd—just the kind of people I ought to abhor most, and yet I love their charming manners and their satiric wit. Besides H. A. Gwynne, the editor, has been with me in various campaigns, and one always likes a comrade-in-arms. And then there is Punch. I try to see that, partly for its occasional joke, partly because Sir Owen Seaman, the editor, was at school with me, and though I am violently opposed to him on every principle, I like him for that ridiculous reason.

Of course there is the Daily Mail, too—the Mail and all its imitators, which I have neither time nor desire to see. I detest them for many reasons, but especially because they seem to me often to "color their news," in breach of the very principles laid down by C. P. Scott and Mr. Baldwin, as quoted above. The numerous picture-papers seldom concern me, for what do I care whether Countess this has twins, or Marchioness the other keeps lap-dogs, or Lady the third wears a divided skirt when she goes in pursuit of a wretched little fox with thirty or forty large dogs? After all these things do snobs and the vulgar seek, and I admit that snobs and the vulgar are numerous enough to make silliness pay. But, as Virgil said to Dante, let us look and pass. Or rather let us pass without looking.

And lastly, dear Villard, there is one other paper that I read every week. It arrives usually on Saturday night, and I spread it over two or three days according to the pressure of my own work that has always to be done against time. I read it to keep me in touch with your complicated but enviable country, and with the many friends whose names appear in its pages from time to time. But I read it especially to maintain the assurance that across the ocean one may find an editor and a staff who in courage, in fair treatment, in the passion for justice, and in the power of expression follow the highest traditions of noble journalism. You may guess that paper's name, for I am, dear Villard, your grateful friend,

HENRY W. NEVINSON

The Only Road to Peace

By J. RAMSAY MACDONALD

I OFFER my heartiest congratulations to The Nation and hope it has many years of life to give to the service of America and democracy. A journal of intellectual distinction that is both fearless and independent is a precious possession for a nation to have. In these days the press tends to become more and more the property of rich men who use it to advance their own whims and foibles, or to give them the substance of power greater than that of governments and institutions, and so to control the policy of nations as they do menus for their dinners. The call of great causes is thus drowned in the shrieks of fussy stunts, and fever and falsehood take the place of reason and reflection. In these days of adult suffrage, the danger of states does not lie in the ignorance of the neglected masses (always rather a class delusion) but in the gullibility of the semi-educated grades of the middle classes —the people who think that they are somebody. In that broad untilled soil grow the noxious weeds of timorous reaction that shiver and sway in every puff of wind.

The work of The Nation has always been to reclaim that soil, and like every doughty cultivator you have been covered with the burrs that grow thick on the weedy land.

I take no sides in your policies. I welcome courage and distinction to whatever party or cause they profess allegiance. I have valued in particular your international spirit expressed from the American standpoint. America is like a city that has stood alone for generations but up to the borders of which, in the due course of time, neighboring cities have grown so that it can no longer remain apart. It will never enter into alliances and get mixed up with other people's affairs, but the world needs its influence and it cannot neglect the world. Its capital has become international; it will seek security and markets; it will more and more look for a world stability in its own interest if for no other reason. Wise is the state, however, which devises a policy in accordance with its sense of justice and of right; and does not content itself with following capitalist adventures or have responsibilities thrust upon it from which it can have no honors and no respect. The British statesman who is to guide his country through the difficulties of the coming generation will have to possess a mind very clear upon this and it is not only British statesmen that are to be so placed.

This moment is unique in its opportunities. Europe has not yet emerged from the war nor will it do so for years. Poverty and unsettlement is the lot of every community—victorious or vanquished—after a war. At the time when I write the docile conservative press in this country is heralding as a piece of statesmanship an agreement which it is alleged has been reached by which we are to help France with armed force if its Rhine frontiers are challenged and with diplomatic backing if the boundaries on the east fixed by the Treaty of Versailles come to be disputed, as inevitably they must be. If this report is true, all that it does is to expose the perilous condition of Europe and the utter hopelessness of its existing state of mind. We have had our chance to remove the causes of war; we are only taking steps to secure victory when the next war breaks out. Admittedly to all the world, the last war settled nothing, removed no menaces; apparently it only multiplied dangers to be provided against. None of the explosions of the last war have been powerful enough to blow governments out of the old deep militarist ruts, and we are back to 1900 or 1906, consulting the same oracles, resorting to the same remedies, and provoking the same fate. Apparently at Geneva in September the voice of peace will be stilled, and the world will go forth for alliances and armaments to pander for the moment to the nerves of nations and to lead them in the end to inevitable destruction. And the worst of it is that the peoples that are supposed to be punished are only being hardened and tempered on the anvil. We are not beating the life out of them, we are beating the steel into them. These nursery escapades get palmed off upon the world as triumphant statesmanship.

The closer one gets to the realities of government, the more one sees, I think, that the first thing which the reformer with clear conceptions of what he wishes to accomplish has to do is to strengthen the will of the nations to do what is right. A new outlook always rouses fear, and the cry of "Radical" or "Red" can always be raised to overawe our Pilates and stir up our mobs. Risks always look formidable on paper, and no journalist worth his salt can fail to stir up, for any or for no reason, agonies in the breast of his readers. In the taking of risks there is always an alternative—but that is all. No policy which really attacks dangers can be without risks. The only question which intelligent people are asked to answer is: "Which body of risk are we to take?" The question before Europe now is: "Are you going to take the risk of military alliances to defend certain points—for instance, the Rhine frontiers as defined by the Treaty of Versailles; or are you to take that of establishing a general system by which every cause of war will be the subject of arbitration or conciliation?" In view of history, the first risk, I should think, is no risk at all. It is a certainty. If this is the defense that France wants, France is doing nothing more than making its own invasion as sure as anything in this life is sure. The very best thing that happened for the peace of Europe was the refusal of America to join the pact of guaranty arranged at Versailles; the worst thing that is now happening is the revival of that pact. Good soldiers study the tactics and the strategy of battles fought long ago; accepted statesmen appear to study nothing except how to get over the problems of the moment—anyhow and irrespective of consequences. How little has really been learned from the progression of events from 1900 onwards!

For this there are several reasons. One is the myth that Germany was solely responsible for the war. This carries with it a policy regarding Germany which assumes that for the rest of time Germany can be kept in a kind of compound watched by armed warders. This notion of preposterous impossibility is at the back of much of the policy that, for the time being, dominates Europe. If all we care for is the literal fulfilment of the prayer: "Give peace in our time, O Lord!" that policy may just see this generation to their graves. But another and more firmly rooted reason is our psychology. Europe is still being taught to trust to arms and a diplomacy that issues from such a trust. It has the best intentions, and those who support it are not lacking in sincerity or good will. The simple fact is that Europe is only frightened enough to rush to arms and not frightened enough to rush away from them. Communities are still, strangely enough, in the cavemen state of mind when fear possesses them, and only men shivering in dark corners dreading what is to come and moved solely by emotion make military alliances and compacts to preserve themselves.

From much of this the Atlantic has preserved America, as indeed the Channel has preserved us from some of it. But as national responsibility and interest widen, and, conversely, as the world shrinks by the thousand new devices for encompassing it, and, still more, as the quickening of the moral conscience proceeds slowly, geographical situation must play a diminishing part in national policy. This century is to be a century of world policy, which will have to be developed alongside of, and consistently with, national self-determination. The state that can combine both will take the lead in the councils of the world. Such a state will for the present be guided by several broad rules:

1. It will give neither countenance nor aid to any military alliance however it is cloaked or by whatever name it is called.
2. It will give no financial or diplomatic backing to any of the militarist developments of today under the guise of providing for national security.
3. It will give what support it can to every attempt to reach general agreements to keep the peace.
4. It will allow no state to treat debts as though they were gifts, though it will help a general liquidation if it has some guaranty that economies, especially in military expenditure, will be practiced.
5. It will frown actively upon traffic in arms.
6. It will not act on the assumption that the war is still on, but will consider the state of Europe objectively; particularly it will avoid the error of assuming that military alliances of convenience indicate friendships which can be counted upon as problem after problem arises for attention. Looking deeply into this European situation, it will see that the goal to aim at is the establishment of a friendship which will reason and tolerate, rather than one of alliance against some dreaded event which is of itself not being removed.

The nation that pursues such a policy and works it out in relation to actual problems, and not merely in sentiment or on paper, is the nation that is to gain honor and authority in the world of the future.

Words to Be Flung Up a Stairway

By ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Never you mind about my milksop heart!
If I no more shall be the full of the door
In your high hallway, O be very sure
That I have learned at least the way to part.
Taller than ever now, and haughtier,
The arrant body smolders, magnified
And swollen by the hot internal pride,
And saying "Ha! Well done, well rid of her!"

So to the street, my body and pride and I
Stumble?—not we, but walk the paving-stones
In rage and passion, feeling in our bones,
Under their singing tension, that whereby
We live and nourish our condign estate—
Our final precious food, the marrow-fat of hate.

The Policy of France

By EDOUARD HERRIOT

WHAT is the policy of France on the morrow of the elections of our municipal councils? I am glad to explain this through The Nation to our friends of the United States, for, as I have often observed, peoples may admire without understanding each other. Just as Frenchmen often have a superficial and erroneous view of American politics, so our American comrades who did so much for us in the last war may be ignorant of the realities of French public life and of the public opinion of our provinces, which is often falsely reflected in the great newspapers of Paris. Yet if the world is really to have the regime of work and peace which it needs, mutual understanding is indispensable.

I am a party man. During my ten months in office I sought to realize a program upon which I was elected, but I would not be so foolish as to believe that my fall from power was more than a banal incident of politics, and I shall attempt to judge without passion—objectively, as they say—the political situation of my country.

The war clarified that political situation. In 1919, after Parliament had voted a strong electoral law which provided neither for majority vote nor for proportional representation, a group came into power which bore the name of the "Bloc National." The pre-war Republican majority suffered a harsh defeat, and the middle parties, as in various other countries, were crushed. One might give several explanations of this event; one is enough. The Socialist Party had not yet cast out the Communist elements from which it has since so brilliantly separated itself. The terror inspired by the Russian Revolution was ably exploited by the conservatives. In one way Socialism aided them. It refused any form of alliance with the Radical Party, which in France corresponds with the British Liberal Party. The coalition of the Bloc National, aided by the electoral law, easily defeated the Radicals and Socialists, who fought under separate banners. For four years this bloc held office. We owe to it the policy of M. Millerand and that of M. Poincaré, as well as the more liberal experiment of M. Briand, which was brusquely interrupted by the incidents to which the conference of Cannes gave rise.

The lesson was hard but healthy for the men of the Left, for the French Democrats. In the course of the last session of Parliament it became clear to them that French policy could not be returned to its traditional course and reestablished in its pre-war equilibrium unless the Left parties in their turn formed a coalition. That is the essential condition of success under the present electoral law. In other words, it was necessary to unite those radicals who had remained in opposition, those who had not rallied to the Bloc National (in politics as in love it is sometimes hard to await one's hour!) with the Socialists who had rid themselves of the Communists and openly broken with the Moscow International. Out of this union grew the "Cartel," which included and still includes four essential groups: the Radical Left, in which Loucheur is the most representative figure; the Radical and Radical Socialist Party, over which I have the honor of presiding; the French Socialist Party, with MM. Painlevé and Aristide Briand; and the United Socialist Party (the French Section of the Second International), led by MM. Léon Blum, Vincent Auriol, and Paul Boncour.

In the elections of May, 1924, this Cartel won a great victory; in its turn it was able to dominate the hostile Bloc National and to provide solid parliamentary majorities for the ministries which followed — provided that the doctrines of the majority were reflected in the acts of the Government. Difficulties arose only because of the contrast between a Chamber of Deputies, which resolutely faced Left, and a Senate, which was infinitely more moderate and strongly anti-Socialist. I can speak of this difference between the two houses with a certain assurance, although without rancor. For to it I owe my fall from office and my return to relative liberty.

The municipal elections of May, 1925, marked a decisive and categorical indorsement of the Cartel and of its policy. The Right cannot deny the gains of the Left Bloc. These gains were marked not only at Paris and Lyons, in our largest cities, but also in departments like the Ardennes, where the cruel memories of recent invasions might have stirred the nationalist spirit. Bordeaux fell into our hands at one blow. Marseilles, where our opponents attempted to exploit the Communist outbreaks, remained faithful. A great department like the Pas-de-Calais, where our American friends fought so heroically, turned so resolutely to the Left that there, as in the Rhone, every Senator will soon belong to the Cartel. Even the West, where the clerical propaganda had been so active and audacious, brought us unlooked-for gains.

At the same time communism fell to pieces. That confirmed an opinion which I had often expressed, that communism could not take root in our country if the Government followed a determined democratic policy, clearly pacific abroad and devoted to fiscal justice and social progress at home. All the propaganda of the great Paris papers of the Right cannot overcome this indisputable law. It is, incidentally, one of the great mistakes of foreign opinion to believe that France is truly represented in a few old newspapers, malevolent and bigoted, which weigh upon our policy like a dead body and owe their remnant of authority to the timid

A Word From Across the Rhine

Periodicals like The Nation are the salt of journalism; their courage and enthusiasm accumulate for the rest of the press the moral capital on which it lives. The influence of The Nation extends far beyond America. Liberals everywhere owe it a debt. We Germans are happy to acknowledge it on The Nation's sixtieth birthday.

Berlin, June 10 HARRY KESSLER complacency of governments which fear their senile pedantries. France is not truly represented in these leaden journals. It lives in the good sense of its villages, in the generous ardor of its workers, in the enthusiasm of its republican youth, in the determination of its ex-soldiers, as devoted to peace as to the honor and security of France.

There is no possible doubt. Twice—and even more strongly in 1925 than in 1924—France has spoken for the policy of the Cartel. Until 1928, when the term of the present Parliament expires, no other policy can claim the support of the country. The only normal action for the Government of France will be that of this group.

The leaders of the opposition, beaten by the voters, may attempt to take their revenge inside Parliament. They can become strong only if the victors are weak or false to their faith. Never has France marked with more force its devotion to the Republican policy of pre-war days, appealing neither to the Right nor to the Communists. Friends of America, do not believe those who tell you that the policy of the Cartel is a step toward communism. That poor bit of polemic was reduced to nothing at the last election. It was the Republicans who defeated the Communists, and they alone.

What is, then, this policy of the Cartel, more vigorous than ever? It asks nothing that is not just. Abroad it asks peace in a world in which the security of France will be assured. We cannot permit our country to remain exposed to future offensives by her enemies of yesterday. The drama which drenched our soil in blood from 1914 to 1918 must not be repeated. We want to be able to work freely within our frontiers. We beg our American friends to understand how legitimate it is for us to speak thus and how necessary it is that we be helped to obtain this indispensable security. But if we are thus ardently patriotic it is still true that we repudiate all imperialism and even all nationalism. We were happy to sign the agreements of London. At Geneva we offered peace to all people in a voice which unfortunately was not sufficiently heeded. We protest against any idea of conquest or annexation. We demand peace through justice. We are ready upon the basis of treaties sincerely respected by both sides to resume or even to develop our relations with a democratic and pacific Germany. We follow with interest efforts like those of Fritz von Unruh. We know that the world will never have a durable peace until France and Germany have been able to reach a sincere reconciliation based on mutual respect.

We also want to see Russia reenter the concert of nations. Beware! Russia is moving forward. An industrial reawakening is making itself felt there. Her budget is being balanced, thanks to the success of monetary reform. The diverse national aspirations of the Ukrainians, of the White Russians, and of the peoples of Asia are developing, and the territory of the Union is tending to grow. Henceforth one may look forward to a possible cooperation between the nationalized industry of Russia and Chinese industry. These are developments to be watched.

At home we want financial justice, to be obtained by applying more and more precisely the fiscal system to which France, perhaps too late, has come. We want to pay our debts. But be just to us! Because of Germany's long bankruptcy poor France, already weighted down by the charges of the war which raged upon her soil, has had to pay from her own pocket the formidable sums required to rebuild her ruins. What people, I ask, has ever known such tragic obligation? So sometimes we seem to bend under the burden. I have known hard hours; my successors perhaps will pass through others. We do not ask such postponements as laziness or bad faith would seek; we ask the credit, even the long credit, which men who are zealously rebuilding a structure destroyed by the cruel will of the enemy feel they deserve. Who among those who have seen France would deny the power of her laboriousness and thrift? Does it not merit confidence in her future?

For we have other tasks, too. We must move forward and give the people who have fought and suffered with so much courage the new institutions which they deserve, develop the school system, organize social insurance, protect childhood and babyhood. If there are lazy folk among us, if the visiting foreigner is sometimes shocked by the vulgarity of certain displays of luxury, I dare plead that the true post-war France is something very different. It is a nation which has broken absolutely with the forms of the past, which would never for a single week endure a monarchist adventure or a Communist enterprise, which intends to remain in the front rank among the nations which want progress, which sets no other condition for the peace of the world than its own security, which is working, through order, toward a new set of social values.

That is the France which the policy of the Cartel represents. That is the France for which I am fighting.

Mexico Today

By PLUTARCO ELIAS CALLES

THROUGHOUT its career The Nation has consistently battled for its conception of what was right. In the confusion of ideas that have overwhelmed our present-day world it has taken an advanced position uninfluenced by outworn tradition or intrenched interests. It has therefore come quite naturally to espouse repeatedly and courageously the cause of the weak, of the oppressed, of those whose pleas and yearnings would otherwise have gone unheard. And so, though now ripe in years, it has happily remained young in spirit.

In Mexico, the Mexico emerged from the turmoil of revolution, we are confronted with the problem of making heard and felt, and of answering, the long inaudible cry of a submerged people, a people which throughout centuries was enslaved mentally and physically, politically and economically.

In part the shackles of our people have been broken, but the devastating effect of their long serfdom is still visible on every hand. It is to the task of completely emancipating them, of making them happy, healthy, hopeful men, women, and children, citizens of the republic in the fullest sense of the word, conscious of both their rights and their duties, that the present government is dedicating its every effort.

The task is not an easy or a short one. The evils of the long past are deeply rooted in our midst. Prejudice and hostility meet many of our efforts at every turn—opposition from those whose fundamental philosophy is incapable of admitting that every human being has, as your own Declaration of Independence one hundred and fifty years ago so well put it, an inalienable right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Nevertheless, despite all obstacles, we are progressing steadily and shall hold to our course unflinchingly. The economic condition of a great number of our people is still deplorable, but there is hope in their hearts, for they have begun to know and to feel instinctively that the way out and up for them is no longer barred. The premises of our revolution, a revolution which in varying forms has gone on for a century, of which the last decade and a half has witnessed merely a fuller manifestation, have been generally accepted. The carrying out of a definite program of material betterment remains before us.

At present Mexico, probably potentially the richest land on earth for its size, needs and welcomes the entry of foreign capital. It will fully protect all capital that is willing to obey the nation's laws. These laws are not drastic and confiscatory as some persons hostile to our purposes continue to allege. The laws do aim to make sure that the worker is not unconscionably exploited as formerly, and that he receives a just proportion of the fruits of his labor. These principles are fundamental with us and no power on earth can induce us to change or modify them. We know that these very laws, if properly applied, not only do not damage but protect capital that has the proper appreciation of its responsibilities.

It is true that in the working out of Mexico's problems instances of abuse of labor's new-found power, of failure to understand the reciprocity of service and responsibility that must exist between capital and labor, have occurred. They are deplorable, although not in any way comparable in their effect to the ruthless abuses which were the rule and not the exception of capital here in the old days. These occasional current errors are not unnatural, considering the rapidity with which our new social edifice has been erected, but they do not represent the oft-declared and demonstrated purpose of the present Mexican Government. The truth is that the Mexican worker, whatever his mistakes may have been and may be, is in an extraordinary and gratifying way rising to his new opportunities.

Today Mexico is at peace. Life is more secure than it has ever been. The violence of the struggle has passed into history. The era of reconstruction has been fairly launched. We welcome to our land of sunshine, of beauty, and of opportunity those elements from all parts of the world which can genuinely contribute to the development of our nation in consonance with the deep-seated and long-deferred aspirations of our people.

An American Views the Huns

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

THIS is not a learned article upon economic conditions in Mitteleuropa. It is the letter home of a Cook's tourist; it is an impression of Central European morale by a first-time traveler in Germany and Austria.

During the Great War I learned thoroughly at the skilled hands of Mr. George Creel that whatever the Germans were, they were brutal. I learned that all German officials were tyrants, and that everywhere in Germany there were signs "Strengstens Verboten." It was with a certain thrill of risk that I entered Germany four months ago.

At the first station beyond Strassburg—Strassburg, that unfortunate city in which people with the names of Schwartz, August Hofburg, and Emil Botz have for all these years since Daudet recounted the tragedy of the War of 1870, longed for the return of the French—I first encountered the evil German functionary. He was a customs man. He looked as though he might have killed babies in Belgium, or have rejoiced in blowing up the "Lusitania." To my regret he was for a moment not acting properly as a German. He touched his hat, he asked me how long I was going to be in Germany, and passed all of my bags without asking me to open them. But immediately afterward I received my first authentic impression of the brutal petty official. Before I left the custom-house I had to show my ticket, and I was unable to find the ticket. There was a very dreadful man at the door. He refused to let me return to the train without seeing the ticket, and any free-born American has a right to take any train without the trifling duty of having a ticket.

SINCLAIR LEWIS
(of Main Street)

While I searched through my waistcoat pockets for the ticket, this dreadful functionary barked out the discomforting insults with which we are familiar in our popular fiction (meaning magazine articles) about Germany. He said that it was a warm day. He said that the cherry trees would soon be blooming. He said that it was a great shame that the gentleman could not find his ticket. He said that it was a great joke that the gentleman's friend had been able to find his ticket at once, while the gentleman himself was unable to find his. He said that the gentleman must be an American, and he himself had a cousin in Wisconsin and he wondered if the gentleman knew Wisconsin. In fact, he gave a perfect exhibition of German viciousness and when the gentleman (pro tem.) had found his ticket—having carefully placed it in his pocketbook in order that he might not lose it and, therefore, having lost it—he said that it had been a great privilege to have discussed Wisconsin with the gentleman and he hoped the gentleman would have a joyous journey to Munich.

And so we came to Munich, and saw on the streets the grim military police who have now been forbidden by the overlords of Germany. The first time I asked a direction of one of these villainous Huns, I had a shock. Instead of saying, like any free-born American cop, "What d'yuh want, Billy?" the policeman saluted and stood at attention. Worse than that, he brought out a map and made clear the directions. By this time I realized the dangers of the military police in Germany. They were trying, by subtle propaganda, to win over the Americans.

After this early initiation into the horrors of German brutality, matters became worse and worse. In Munich I met a publisher. As a part of his propaganda he spoke English (incidently he also spoke French, Italian, and two or three other languages). He received my friend and myself with a shocking question as to what authors in America were most honestly expressing the spirit of the American people, so that he might have their books translated into German. He particularly asked me for the names of books by people who could not be suspected of German affiliations. Using the dangerous propaganda by which Germany won the war, he insisted that what they wanted today was to understand America in its vices and virtues, its strength and weakness, its pep and its beauty. After that we were invited to a party at the publishing house.

Perhaps seventy people were assembled for the party, in the drawing-room of what had probably once been the house of a Duke. They were all Germans. Therefore they were all grim and fond of baby-killing. But they disguised it in the most dismaying manner. All through the evening, people whom we had never met smiled at us and said, in uncomfortably perfect English: "Are you enjoying yourselves? Is there any one here whom you would like to meet?" It was another form of propaganda. Despite the fact that all of those tall, slim men, so much like English officers, had killed babies in Belgium and raped virtuous peasant wives in France, they pretended to be friendly to the two lone Americans. And when we gathered for supper my friend and I had six different invitations to join as many tables.

Then we met a typical Hun. He was not only a Hun but a Baron. And to be a Hun and a Baron is, of course, to be the lowest type of animal life—to be a cruel, humorless, vicious fellow. He said to us in his Hunnish manner, although in English: "What are you doing for lunch tomorrow? Will you be so good as to join my wife and myself?" And then began the downfall. And then began the confusion of a reporter who had been trained thoroughly to know that all Huns are sadists. The Baron was of an old Viennese family, and, worse than that, he was a banker. And it was he who accompanied us to Vienna, carrying out the propaganda. He pretended that many of the Germanic families are not rich now and that, whatever their social position, they prefer to go second-class rather than first.

The train to Vienna was two hours late and M. le Baron went out on the station platform to buy oranges. Worse than that, still carrying on the propaganda against the decent part of the Nordic races, he made us all play catch with the oranges in our second-class compartment. And when we had come to Vienna he further insisted on introducing us to his brothers and sisters and father.

By this time it was only with the greatest difficulty that a True American could keep up the hatred of the Middle European which befits any True American. To go to the Heuringen and to hear the yodeling—to go to the Redoutensaal and hear perfect chamber music—to go to the Hermes Villa and see the rooms of the ex-Emperor—to drive through the lovely hills—and most particularly, to meet peasants on the road at sunset and to have them cry "Grüss Gott" as though they meant it—these things made it difficult to keep up a respectable hatred for the Hun.

But perhaps worse than any of these shocks was the attitude of the waiters in all of the hotels and all of the restaurants. It was an unfortunate fact that 97 per cent of them spoke English. It is a still more unfortunate fact that they recognized one as an American and, without being intrusive, tried to give their greetings. It is an unfortunate fact also that they insisted that, whatever their opinion of France, they loved England and America and wanted to join with them in a firm alliance.

In fact, the whole trip through Germany was thoroughly discouraging.

Now may I give my greetings to The Nation on its sixtieth birthday?

One of the most agreeable spots in America is the Adlon Bar in Berlin—not Berlin, Kentucky, or Berlin, New Jersey, but Berlin, Germany. To the Yankee tourist who is enjoying his adventure yet who is never quite content without having a hint as to what is happening in America, there is no more perfect scene for news. The first time I ventured into that bar—in search of Coca Cola—I found a group of six American newspaper men gathered before the bar—also drinking Coca Cola. I suggested mildly that I was a newspaper man myself and I was welcomed. We discussed at some length the question as to whether Spike Hunt or Billy Hard was the most popular newspaper man in the world; we shook for drinks; we gave our views on William Jennings Bryan. This, however, was merely the pleasant greeting of the international tramps. The real moment came when one of the men at the bar suggested: "Have you seen The Nation for the last few weeks—I happen to have all the latest arrivals in my pocket."

Then I realized that the thing for which I was most hungry in my wandering through Austria and Germany was a glimpse of The Nation.

I do not approve of The Nation. I am a safe, sane, conservative citizen of the United States. I must be, because I am a best seller. Therefore, I insist that in writing for the Sixtieth Anniversary of The Nation I am doing so under protest, merely because I like to read the darned sheet. I find that it gives the other side of all the affairs which are so confidently and so inaccurately reported in all of the really respectable periodicals.

In fact, to paraphrase that greatest of poems, Tobacco is a Filthy Weed, may I wind up by saying:

The Nation is a yellow scold.
I like it.
It's subsidized by German* gold.
I like it.
It makes you hot, it makes you sore,
It's either silly or a bore;
It's all the things I most abhor—
I like it.

* Also Bolshevik, Irish, and probably Haitian Gold.

In Tennessee

By H. L. MENCKEN

ALWAYS, in this great republic, controversies depart swiftly from their original terms and plunge into irrelevancies and false pretenses. The case of prohibition is salient. Who recalls the optimistic days before the Eighteenth Amendment, and the lofty prognostications of the dry mullahs, clerical and lay? Prohibition, we were told, would empty the jails, reduce the tax rate, abolish poverty, and put an end to political corruption. Today even the Prohibitionists know better, and so they begin to grow discreetly silent upon the matter. Instead, they come forward with an entirely new Holy Cause. What began as a campaign for a Babbitt's Utopia becomes transformed into a mystical campaign for Law Enforcement. Prohibition is a grotesque failure, but the fight must go on. A transcendental motive takes the place of a practical motive. One categorical imperative goes out and another comes in.

H. L. MENCKEN

So, now, in Tennessee, where a rural pedagogue stands arraigned before his peers for violating the school law. At bottom, a quite simple business. The hinds of the State, desiring to prepare their young for life there, set up public schools. To man those schools they employ pedagogues. To guide those pedagogues they lay down rules prescribing what is to be taught and what is not to be taught. Why not, indeed? How could it be otherwise? Precisely the same custom prevails everywhere else in the world, wherever there are schools at all. Behind every school ever heard of there is a definite concept of its purpose—of the sort of equipment it is to give to its pupils. It cannot conceivably teach everything; it must confine itself by sheer necessity to teaching what will be of the greatest utility, cultural or practical, to the youth actually in hand. Well, what could be of greater utility to the son of a Tennessee mountaineer than an education making him a good Tennesseean, content with his father, at peace with his neighbors, dutiful to the local religion, and docile under the local mores?

That is all the Tennessee anti-evolution law seeks to accomplish. It differs from other regulations of the same sort only to the extent that Tennessee differs from the rest of the world. The State, to a degree that should be gratifying, has escaped the national standardization. Its people show a character that is immensely different from the character of, say, New Yorkers or Californians. They retain, among other things, the anthropomorphic religion of an elder day. They do not profess it; they actually believe in it. The Old Testament, to them, is not a mere sacerdotal whizz-bang, to be read for its pornography; it is an authoritative history, and the transactions recorded in it are as true as the story of Barbara Frietchie, or that of Washington and the cherry tree, or that of the late Woodrow's struggle to keep us out of the war. So crediting the sacred narrative, they desire that it be taught to their children, and any doctrine that makes game of it is immensely offensive to them. When such a doctrine, despite their protests, is actually taught, they proceed to put it down by force.

Is that procedure singular? I don't think it is. It is adopted everywhere, the instant the prevailing notions, whether real or false, are challenged. Suppose a school teacher in New York began entertaining his pupils with the case against the Jews, or against the Pope. Suppose a teacher in Vermont essayed to argue that the late Confederate States were right, as thousands of perfectly sane and intelligent persons believe—that Lee was a defender of the Constitution and Grant a traitor to it. Suppose a teacher in Kansas taught that prohibition was evil, or a teacher in New Jersey that it was virtuous. But I need not pile up suppositions. The evidence of what happens to such a contumacious teacher was spread before us copiously during the late uproar about Bolsheviks. And it was not in rural Tennessee but in the great cultural centers which now laugh at Tennessee that punishments came most swiftly, and were most barbarous. It was not Dayton but New York City that cashiered teachers for protesting against the obvious lies of the State Department.

Yet now we are asked to believe that some mysterious and vastly important principle is at stake at Dayton—that the conviction of Professor Scopes will strike a deadly blow at enlightenment and bring down freedom to sorrow and shame. Tell it to the marines! No principle is at stake at Dayton save the principle that school teachers, like plumbers, should stick to the job that is set before them, and not go roving about the house, breaking windows, raiding the cellar, and demoralizing the children. The issue of free speech is quite irrelevant. When a pedagogue takes his oath of office, he renounces his right to free speech quite as certainly as a bishop does, or a colonel in the army, or an editorial writer on a newspaper. He becomes a paid propagandist of certain definite doctrines and attitudes, mainly determined specifically and in advance, and every time he departs from them deliberately he deliberately swindles his employers.

What ails Mr. Scopes, and many like him, is that they have been filled with subversive ideas by specialists in human liberty, of whom I have the honor to be one. Such specialists, confronted by the New York cases, saw a chance to make political capital out of them, and did so with great effect. I was certainly not backward in that enterprise.

The liars of the State Department were fair game, and any stick is good enough to beat a dog with. Even a pedagogue, seized firmly by the legs, makes an effective shillelagh. (I have used, in my time, yet worse: a congressman, a psychiatrist, a birth controller to maul an archbishop.) Unluckily, some of the pedagogues mistook the purpose of the operation. They came out of it full of a delusion that they were apostles of liberty, of the search for knowledge, of enlightenment. They have been worrying and exasperating their employers ever since.

I believe it must be plain that they are wrong, and that their employers, by a necessary inference, are right. A pedagogue, properly so called—and a high-school teacher in a country town is properly so called—is surely not a searcher for knowledge. His job in the world is simply to pass on what has been chosen and approved by his superiors. In the whole history of the world no such pedagogue has ever actually increased the sum of human knowledge. His training unfits him for it; moreover, he would not be a pedagogue if he had either the taste or the capacity for it. He is a workingman, not a thinker. When he speaks, his employers speak. What he says has behind it all the authority of the community. If he would be true to his oath he must be very careful to say nothing that is in violation of the communal mores, the communal magic, the communal notion of the good, the beautiful, and the true.

Here, I repeat, I speak of the pedagogue, and use the word in its strict sense—that is, I speak of the fellow whose sole job is teaching. Men of great learning, men who genuinely know something, men who have augmented the store of human knowledge—such men, in their leisure, may also teach. The master may take an apprentice. But he does not seek apprentices in the hill towns of Tennessee, or even on the East Side of New York. He does not waste himself upon children whose fate it will be, when they grow up, to become Rotarians or Methodist deacons, bootleggers or moonshiners. He looks for his apprentices in the minority that has somehow escaped that fate—that has, by some act of God, survived the dreadful ministrations of school-teachers. To this minority he may submit his doubts as well as his certainties. He may present what is dubious and of evil report along with what is official, and hence good. He may be wholly himself. Liberty of teaching begins where teaching ends.

The United States and the Artist

By ZONA GALE

ONE'S first light thought was: "What United States? New York—or the Middle West—or Pasadena?" It must be difficult for an artist to function in New York, with so few hours and so much food; and still more difficult in California, with all the scenery and the leisure. If I were an artist in the United States, I should work in the Middle West, with dashes to New York for brief vacations (not for stimulus) and with occasional golden dragging days across the desert, to establish a relationship with actual space. And when I came home again, from either direction, my town would say: "I suppose you go away to get points, and come back and write them up?"

It should be a small Western town, with a lawn running down to a river, a river intent not to say distrait. On the other shore there should be only green, with a far brow of hills. At noon one could go out and lie in the sun, and stay there through the whole afternoon. If winter came, the lawn and the farther shore would be white, and the whiteness would not darken; and one's window would have a long chair and a primrose.

Nothing would happen. Morning would be four hours long, sunny or in the ancient expressionism of cloudy light. A squirrel, the Westminster clock, a chickadee or a grosbeak, and the wheels or the runners under a passing load of straw would offer the principal sounds. Afternoon would end when it chose, in a walk across the river, the levee and the open fields being not a ten minute distance, the white or the green intimately at hand. The evening would be for reading or for writing or for friends. All the days would be the same. One wouldn't be invited to lunch because one doesn't play bridge. One wouldn't be invited to dinner because one isn't married. One's evening would be intact because one doesn't dance. But an intimate touch with the town would be held in other ways—by school, park, library, and many a hearth. Above all, by children.

ZONA GALE

Can an artist exist and function freely in the United States? I think that he can do so if he knows where and how.

Unless he falls upon a place or a period of cliques, extolling new conformities and their resulting classification, the artist leads among men the loneliest life of them all. This he must do, because his work is as solitary as being born—more so, when you come to think of it. And it is true that in whatever country he works, even in one long ridden by prejudice and standardization, his four walls and his tools are all that he needs—during his actual hours of creation; and that in the ripest nation as in the most callow, while he is at work, the artist is independent of the state. But it is when he emerges from that room and becomes again a social being that he sighs to think—if he does—of the disabilities of his country as a garden for his growth. It is then that he fears its effect—if he does fear—upon his exalted hours of creation.

A former sigh for the lack of adequate criticism he need no longer breathe. Synthetic criticism arrived among us abruptly. The last ten years, having seen the rise of the liberal weeklies and reviews, have welcomed the rise of a critical estimate as high and free for literature, including drama, as for government, including the pageant of politics. Careful criticism of music and of painting was known in the United States much earlier than was significant literary criticism. The proportion of critical work to the totality of mere review work is still approximately that of the new pyramidal architecture of Manhattan to its old expressionless acreage of brick and brown stone; but of such cardinal criticism there is a surprising weekly amount, and it is a momentous part of our new national life in art. The growth in general art criticism is provable not only in New York, Boston, and Chicago, but in the newspapers of Detroit, Cleveland, St. Louis, St. Paul, and in the fascinating bulletins of print shops, book departments, the small galleries, and non-professional dramatic groups in Minneapolis, Milwaukee, and the Far West. There are writers putting out such subtle and synthetic comment as a dozen years ago was quite unknown to us, outside the established reviews; or inside, either. To what nation shall we turn, however, for an accurate estimate of all artists; and what have even the mellow nations not done to both the little artists and the giants?

A modern international tendency to revalue prize offers and even "learned societies" is saving the artist of this country regret that his land goes in so gingerly for both. The artist is in a mood to criticize the efficacy of prizes, and to say that these are to art what the Golden Rule is to conduct—something for a people to outgrow in favor of the thing itself. Likewise he questions the function of the older art organizations—boldly if he is a pictorial or a plastic artist; shyly, for some reason, if he is an artist in literature. For such lusters and elevations the American artist might have longed a half century ago, but now, having made out without them, he openly challenges them in both old world and new. To be sure, pensions and their like the artist of either world may regard wistfully, especially on being admonished: "Go out and prove that you can earn your living with your hands, and then you'll have the right to be an artist."

I am unable to believe that the United States is flawed for the creative worker by that which may be called a Constitutional taint. In a land in which all men are created equal, there are yet many who one can be perfectly sure are wiser than oneself. The search for mental superiors to rub up against is assuredly rewarded, for in every town are beings ripe, wise, international in their literary and musical loves; and these, created equal though they may have been, have become undeniably and even unpatriotically more interesting and more stimulating than their fellows. I do not speak, of course, of the privileged as such, but of the great and simple. There is in the United States a growing body of those with whom Henry Adams might now adventure toward his spiritual inconclusions. It may be charged that the American scene abounds in those who are neither great nor simple; but even the English artist of humor has some uncongeniality to meet. For such a name —to improvise—as Araminta Throgmorton is not humorous in London. And once a celebrated British critic cried, apropos of free verse: "If this goes on, what is to become of the iambic pentameter?"

Certain hazards among us then are to be conceded and survived. Others there are, and if the artist is a Negro, his difficulties are needlessly greater in this country than in any other land in the civilized world. In general the great United States handicap is none of these. It lies deeper and is not to be conquered by praise or fellowship or loaf and flask. It is that which we know well, that whose despair is in the very form of the query put by The Nation. It is the lack in the national life of that indefinable control by the ordered, the accustomed, the mellow, the dreaming, the old. For there can be no doubt that we have of these nothing to enjoy that is at all commensurate with our wistfulness. That rhythm, that murmur, that balanced movement which is confident but not complacent, which is exquisitely practiced and withal a little weary—we have not its moderations or its measures. In one hour of Rome or of Chartres, before proportion, relationship, serenity, equilibrium, we follow the line that goes straight from the human spirit to its evocation in art; and thereupon an image of our industrial city or of our frontier town becomes a weariness. We know that we are without memories or echoes. Time is neither our asset nor our despair, but merely our hope. We are not the old world.

We are not the old world. But yet this cannot be called precisely the condition from which, in order to function creatively, we are seeking to recover. The memory of the Mayflower must have been, at moments, a weariness to the Pilgrims who had chosen her. Still, on completing a meeting-house in the woods, none did inquire: "Where is the nave and where the transept?" Nor did one of them step upon Cape Cod or Plymouth Rock and observe: "This place appears to lack the austerity of the tombs in the Abbey." Or if anybody did we shall never know it, for the fathers dispensed with him into the deep. They had come in search of liberty of expression and not to mourn old power or beauty. They had come to express themselves in a life which had yet to be born; which is still being born, when traditionalists and fundamentalists will keep out of the way. Unluckily no effective revolutionists in art accompanied the Pilgrims. We had to wait for Whitman to begin that nascency; but since Whitman, it has not been so leisurely a business. Now we face our native art at a moment comparable to that of 1776 and after. And who was there in 1776 and after who was saying: "Yes, aristocracy best fosters us. We have made our experiment, we have proved that England is more mellow than the colonies. We wish to be mellow."

Now, in 1925, we are still committed to our experiment. And it was not made of political and religious bread alone. Laboratories in faith and in government have added unto themselves laboratories in social theory, in industrialism, in science, in behavior. And quietly our art is arising. Art is not a department by itself. Art is the imaginative interpretation of the life of the people, whatever that life may be.

If I were an artist I should, in the light of my experience, stay here and confidently expect to do my work. I should know that from out the decays of Italy and the fatigues of France and the deepening impassivities of Great Britain one could look and imagine no more challenging artistic adventure than waits in this land with the unimaginative name. (Perhaps our name is our only artistic handicap. Perhaps if we had to ourselves the lovely word America, or if we were called Columbia, we should already be acquiring a fragrance as of harvests.) Name or no name, I should know that if in the ancient days I had gone questing for a field I should very likely have renounced everything in exchange for the terms of our unique life. Our breathless North American industrial towns, plump suburbs, motionless farms, preoccupied mountains; our desert, either as pure color today or as seed of the cities of tomorrow; and our little towns, faintly figuring the velvet of their vast fields, white or green—these are not mere material for art. These are the stuff of the life of art. That definition is a repetend for our thinking: Art is the imaginative interpretation of the life of the people, whatever that life may be.

Art is more than this. Art seeks to interpret the human spirit, naked in the universe, itself without nationality or academy or learned society or pension or past. The chief claim to be an artist which any artist has is his incurable gift of discerning that lovely laboring progress of the spirit. If, then, an artist looks out upon that spirit hard enough, even in this land so lacking in the scrutiny, the pattern, or the label of the past, albeit not without something of the fragrance of the universal breath, it may be that he will forget the difficulties of keeping his covenant in the United States.

He will be in no illusion. He will know, sadly enough, that he has turned from the flowered debris, the resonant footsteps, the delicate somnolence, the emanations of genius and of ruin. He will be in no illusion. And when our one hundred percenters come and tell him that he has the best country on earth to write in, he will emphatically demur. He will reply that there is no best country to write in. There are only an old world and a new. You make your choice.

This is the fourth of a series of articles by American writers, answering in the light of their personal experiences the question: Can a literary artist function freely in the United States? Articles by Willa Cather, Edgar Lee Masters, Eugene O'Neill, and Floyd Dell will follow. Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, and Sherwood Anderson have hitherto contributed.

The Economic Urge Toward Free Trade

By JOHN A. HOBSON

THE principle or policy of Free Trade, which The Nation has persistently advocated year in and year out during the sixty years of its activity, is subject to much misapprehension because it is so often torn from its broader economic and human context and relegated to the category of a purely trading policy. But, rightly conceived, Free Trade is much more than a profitable interchange of surplus goods on easy terms between members of different nations. It is a continuous and various cooperation between the inhabitants of our world which, transcending the barriers of nationality, helps to generate and nourish the wider interests and sentiments of a common humanity, each section of which needs the rest and has some special contribution to make towards the welfare of the whole. From earliest history, upon trade routes have flowed those currents of thought and knowledge, feelings, customs, and institutions, religious, cultural, political, which have extended the bounds and enriched the contents of civilizations. To confine trade within national limits is to cut off these sources of intellectual and spiritual enrichment.

America's tariff system has admittedly been consistent with the growth of a higher standard of material prosperity, not only for a few but for the many, and it is natural enough for the interested supporters of protection to press the propter hoc. The Free Trade rejoinder, that this prosperity itself attests the gain of free and ever extending intercourse within the wide area of the forty-eight States, and therefore the greater gain that would attend the still further enlargement of free commercial intercourse, though quite valid in reason, has so far failed to carry political conviction to a people drenched with the sophisms of protectionism and endued with an insufficient understanding of the true sources and supports of American prosperity. An unfortunate conjuncture of circumstances has led many Americans for the time being to envisage their country as a separatist experiment in democracy, needing for its full fruition safeguards against the contaminating influences of European failure and decay. Let America keep out as far as possible, the inferior population, the dangerous ideas, the alien institutions and valuations, the sweated goods which foreign countries, in their unsettlement and distress, seek to intrude into this happier and more prosperous country! Protection is an important ingredient in this new or more conscious concept of Americanism.

This brief analysis may suffice to make it evident that American protectionism is a plank in a wider nationalist policy, transcending the purely economic interests, and incorporated in the pride of a manifest destiny which bestows upon America the role of God's own country and his "peculiar people." Such a statement doubtless overstresses the consciousness of the meaning of what is happening. But the policy itself is so strongly seated in the saddle of government, attested by so many acts and signs, that its immediate dominion is undeniable. Restrictive immigration acts, prohibitive for Asia; a cordon sanitaire against unsettling speeches and publications of alien origin, with deportation of offenders; repression or discouragement of foreign languages and presses; the active steam-roller of the standardizing public school with its falsifications of history for the glory of America—all these political and intellectual pressures cooperate with national economic self-sufficiency for the withdrawal of America from internationalism and cosmopolitanism.

During a recent long stay in America I found among men and women of liberal minds who bewailed this narrow nationalism a feeling of deep discouragement, almost of despair. Reactionary government was a different and a worse phenomenon in America than in Europe where it was a passing phase in the post-war disturbances. Reaction, or at any rate conservatism, in America appears as a popular acquiescence in things as they are, or a rejection of any risky proposals to alter a state of things which upon the whole gives satisfaction. In discussing with liberal economists the tariff question, I found a pretty general conviction that Free Trade in any large sense, though sound in theory, was impracticable as an American policy. The economic system had there been built up so closely, and buttressed so firmly, by tariffs, so many and so strong were the interests involved, that even believers in Free Trade would neither urge nor support any but a slow and tentative reduction of the tariff. Nor was this, they thought, a favorable time even for such amelioration of the burden. Indeed, the actual pressure of economic interests, or policy, lay in the direction of a higher, fuller, and more balanced protection. Agriculture, hitherto left free to the casual intrusions of foreign foods and materials, must be accorded a due share of protection for wool, hides, sugar, fruits, and other exposed products; while the textile industries, especially cotton, must be rescued from their present depression by the strong right arm of restrictive duties upon competing foreign goods. Free Trade economists in general seemed to regard themselves as so impotent to influence policy upon an issue which the practical business men who rule America had taken firmly in hand, that it was not worth while troubling about the matter. Indeed, with few exceptions, economic teachers appeared to relegate alike the logic and the utility of Free Trade to a subordinate, even an insignificant, position in their teaching. The contrast in this respect between academic political economy in England and America is most significant, as indicating how this supposedly disinterested science is insensibly but powerfully affected by the dominant business points of view. Though English economic teaching is less dogmatic and unreserved in its free-trade doctrine than it was a generation ago, both neo-classical economists and social economists adhere to its principles and policy, in spite of the strong wave of political protectionism that has marked the past two decades. But in America it appeared to me that the younger and more vigorous economic thinkers accepted and acquiesced in the protectionist policy, and preferred to busy themselves in other issues where their thinking might have greater efficiency. As regards politically-minded Americans in general, it is quite evident that the wave of isolationist sentiment, following the disillusion of the war episode, imparts new confidence into the prophets of high tariff. Let America keep as free as possible from foreign entanglements, and to this interest let her live as far as possible upon her own economic, political, and moral resources! The basis of true Americanism is economic self-sufficiency!

Yet I venture to predict that the very war experience, which has seemed to intensify this resolve and confirm this policy, will be its undoing. This change will not come about by process of intellectual conversion, a repudiation of protectionist fallacies and follies, but will proceed from a change in the balance of economic interests. There is nothing recondite in the transformation of the economic situation of America which the war has helped to bring about. Before the war it was more important for America to sell abroad than to buy. For on balance she was a debtor, and had to pay a substantial sum per annum in exports. The last decade has converted her from debtor into creditor, and she is entitled to receive a large sum per annum in imports. Whereas before the war American investments abroad were estimated at some two billion dollars, much more than offset by indebtedness to foreign investors, American investments abroad amount now to some ten billions, while her indebtedness is reduced by some three billions. This rough estimate takes no account of the huge war loans, amounting, with accumulated interest, to nearly twelve billions. The ten billions already invested abroad mean an annual income of more than half a billion, taking a low figure for the rate of interest. But the process of investing abroad has not ceased, nor is it likely to cease. Hitherto trade statistics show that Americans have been reinvesting a large part of this foreign interest, instead of receiving it in goods or gold. In addition, they are continuing to invest abroad a large amount of new savings. During the first quarter of this year European governments and corporate enterprises alone absorbed $139,000,000 of borrowed money. Last year some billion and a half was added to the aggregate. Is this a merely temporary policy? I think the weight of evidence goes to prove that it is not. In the first place the volume of American savings has been growing rapidly. Partly, this is due to the higher price and income level, but largely to increased productivity and prohibition. In 1923 the total addition to national wealth by savings was computed at some twelve billions, last year at about ten billions.

Such large additions cannot find full lucrative employment at home. Even in prosperous times with large demands for industrial enterprise there will remain a considerable surplus that will flow abroad and help to swell the annual tribute due from foreign nations to America. Hitherto the habit of foreign investment has been confined to sections of investors in the more educated East. As it spreads, larger sums may be expected to go abroad. When we reflect that foreign investments can only take real shape in export trade, we realize how powerful will be the propelling force of this foreign investment urge. It will probably proceed, both from the need of foreign markets to take off agricultural surpluses and so maintain home prices, and from the growing competition of the great standardized manufactures in the world market. If, as some hold, agriculture may dwindle towards the level of a slowly expanding home market reduced in its rate of expansion by restricted immigration and decreased birthrate, the larger flow of population into city industry will stimulate greater efforts to dispose of the industrial surplus in foreign markets.

This movement will proceed, not by a considered national policy, but as an aggregate of the pressure of private trading and investing interests. But it must have the effect of forcing at no distant date large modifications of the tariff. For the present policy of reinvesting foreign interest, and supplementing it by increasing flows of new investment the interest upon which shall in turn be reinvested, is so palpably absurd and wasteful as to force early reconsideration of the instrument for refusing payment, viz., the protective tariff. It is one thing to flout the helpless consumer in favor of an organized business interest, quite another to refuse to business interests the opportunity to take payments for sales abroad and for foreign investments. A country in the situation of England, needing to pay large annual sums for necessary supplies of foreign foods and raw materials, may reasonably continue for an indefinite time its policy of reinvesting foreign interest on past loans and furnishing new loans. But America, virtually self-reliant for foods and materials, must soon face the necessity of taking in imports the large growing sums due to her for foreign interest. By no expansion or expenditure on foreign travel, or philanthropic aids or scooping in of barren gold, can she long evade the internal pressures of business interests compelling her to let in the foreign goods which are the rightful property of her citizens and which come knocking at her doors for entry.

BROTHER

The "Forward" Cong

The foremost American newspaper in Yiddish greets the foremost enlightened American weekly in English with the mailed handclasp of Brothers in Arms.

For more than a generation the Forward has fought the cause of the Jewish immigrant masses in America, while The Nation has been the champion of every cause the world over. Both have used the common weapons of education, truth and justice. Both have worked towards a fuller realization of American idealism, for a truer understanding of a better and happier humanity.

Twenty-eight years ago the Forward was brought into existence by an "endowment" contained in a hat passed around at a mass meeting of several hundred sweat shop workers. It was to be a sword, a battle axe for the oppressed and exploited immigrant masses that found themselves in an environment that was alien and an industrial system that was hostile.

Forward Building
New York

THE JEWISH DAIL

World's largest Jewish

FORWARD ASSOCIATIO

ADOLPH HELD, President A

B. C. VLADECK, Ma

IN ARMS

tulates "The Nation"

In its twenty-eight years of development, the Forward, like The Nation, found that the greatest warrior is the educator, the awakener of reasoning intelligence and public conscience. The militancy of the Forward was directed against ignorance and oppression, like the militancy of The Nation is always directed against injustice and bigotry.

Today the Forward is the largest Jewish newspaper in the world, not only in size but geographically, not only geographically but in scope, in appeal, in influence and in the faith of hundreds of thousands of its readers. From a circulation of 6,000 in 1897 it has grown to a circulation of more than 200,000 daily in 1925.

MAY WE WISH THE NATION THE SAME SUCCESS!

FORWARD paper

ublishers

AM CAHAN, Editor

Forward Building
Chicago

Emerging Mexico

By ERNEST GRUENING

IV. Democracy

MEXICO has never enjoyed democracy. For the first half-century of autonomy a power and loot-seeking oligarchy gave the country some fifty rulers—"regular" presidents, provisional presidents, dictators, not to mention a couple of emperors, regencies, and other special-directing bodies. Change of office was always wrought by force—never by constitutional methods. Diaz merely had the strength to maintain himself in power and the processes of self-government were even further atrophied. Revolutionary Mexico continued the same tradition until Obregon. His greatest achievement was that he moved for a peaceful and democratic succession.

He didn't succeed wholly, of course. Calles's title to the Presidency, like Obregon's, had to be cinched on the field of battle. But the fault was not theirs. Whatever the unavoidable circumstances, Calles's election marked the epoch-making and unprecedented event of one President completing his full term, peacefully and voluntarily retiring from office and leaving there a duly elected successor.

But just as one swallow does not make a summer neither does one such election make democracy. It will take a generation of similar and even better elections—for they should be without the military prelude—to establish the constitutional method firmly as the Mexican practice. And a national election is only the culmination of a political system which must express itself in village, city, and state. Under Diaz, governors and their local subordinates, the jefes politicos, were appointed, as were senators, deputies, and judges, although the farce of an election form was generally complied with. Under the revolutionary regime most of the elections for governors have exhibited varying degrees of force or fraud or both. The struggle has generally centered on possession of the ballot-boxes, and whoever counted the ballots won. Some few elections were honest—generally in which the winner was so dominant or popular that he had no real competition. Such was the election of Felipe Carrillo in Yucatan in 1921. Much was properly made of the fact that after the "free," i. e., honest election in Guanajuato in 1923, the defeated candidate, Aranda, shook hands with and publicly pledged his support to the winner, Colunga. The old method, the Diaz method, which Carranza tried, of imposing governors on states, is passing. Obregon tried to do away with it entirely and let each state really conduct its own elections. But what happened? The local struggle became bitter, often bloody; the tabulation of votes would never be conceded by the vanquished—usually with reason. Rival governors and legislatures would declare themselves elected and start functioning. Three of each at once were not uncommon. The ensuing chaos and anarchy would oblige the central government to intervene. It was Obregon's practice to hear both sides, study the evidence, and decide in favor of one of the two or three contestants. Naturally, such a decision was beset with the utmost difficulty. Evidence of fraud on both sides was generally plentiful. Obregon tried in the majority of cases to base his decision on the testimony available while allowing his belief as to which of the candidates was the more popular to be a factor. It was impossible, of course, to omit the human element, and in some of his later decisions it showed. I strongly suspect that he repaid Vasconcelos for his inexcusable "neutrality" in the De la Huerta rebellion by awarding the Oaxaca governorship to his opponent.

In the case of the bitterly contested election of San Luis Potosi in 1923 the evidence of intimidation, violence, and fraud was so marked that Obregon adopted the course of declaring the election void and refusing to recognize either contestant. Calles has already followed this procedure in two cases that have come to him, the governorships of Puebla and Chiapas. The executive then presents a slate of three other candidates of which Congress names one as governor. The advantage of this method, as President Calles sees it, is that it will serve as a powerful deterrent to corrupt electoral practices. A candidate is far less apt to compete in dishonesty if such procedure may disqualify him no matter how great the total of alleged votes he presents.

The elections to Congress for the last fourteen years have been similarly corrupt. The significant thing, however, is that nullification of democratic procedure has rested not so much with the largely illiterate electorate as with the supposedly educated legislators. I know of numerous instances where the undoubted choice of his district in an election of reasonable regularity has been shamelessly thrown out by the Chamber of Deputies, which under the Constitution can decide the validity of its members' elections. This has been one reason why the number of labor deputies has remained so small. The bureaucratic majority has been determined to keep its majority.

This group secures cohesion only because it is actuated by a common yearning for spoils. It has no other political philosophy or program, despite high-sounding pronouncements, and no popular following. Its members change their allegiances as easily as their coats. The Liberal Constitutionalist Party of four years ago became the Cooperatist Party. When the De la Huerta rebellion which found there its political support wrecked the party, its survivors coalesced as the Confederates. Last November a fusillade broke out in the Chamber of Deputies. Its object was to kill Morones, who it was known would be influential in the Calles administration. Morones, severely wounded, recovered by a miracle. The intellectual author of the attempted assassination, it was generally conceded, was General Jose Maria Sanchez, a former "revolutionary" Governor of Puebla and one of the majority. The stain for the crime, however, rested on the entire group. So it changed its name overnight and, reorganizing without Sanchez and a few of his followers, became the Socialists of the Left. Yet this group under its varying nomenclature has managed thus far to hold its dominance in Congress, to choose the judges, and to elect most of the state governors. The Labor and Agrarian parties, which, on the other hand, have a real economic program and a following through the country, have between them but one-fourth of the seats.

To keep pace with the march of events..

read the BALTIMORE SUN

Men of international reputation regularly contribute to the

SUNPAPERS

Napoleon once said that the man who speaks seven languages is worth seven men—he will be abreast of affairs in seven differing traditions.

The Baltimore Sunpapers speak at least seven languages—and possibly eight, when you count the American Language as used by H. L. Mencken, who has been for years a member of The Sun staff.

The Baltimore Sunpapers have recently secured exclusive rights in the United States to all the news stories, editorials and feature articles appearing in the Manchester Guardian and the Manchester Guardian Weekly. These articles are not syndicated to any other newspaper in the United States.

A London Bureau has been opened at 92 Fleet Street, in charge of Mr. John E. Owens, well-known to Nation readers as a former member of The Sun's Washington Bureau and a political observer of uncommon brilliance and acumen.

Everything in Baltimore Revolves Around

THE SUN

MORNING EVENING SUNDAY

Regular Contributors

From England

Henry W. Nevinson, a man of great personal charm, for thirty years a leader among British journalists, and (for perhaps as long) familiar to Nation readers.

George Young, an influential member of the British Labor Party, author of "Nationalism and War in the Balkans"; "Diplomacy, Old and New"; "Portugal: A History"; "New Germany"; and a Compilation of Ottoman law.

Hector C. Bywater, a leading naval commentator and a regular contributor to various scientific and literary periodicals, author of "Sea Power in the Pacific."

From France

Georges Lechartier, former Washington correspondent of Petit Parisien, a member of the editorial staff of the Journal des Debats, representing the conservative French point of view.

Jean Longuet, an influential member of the French Socialist party, representing the radical French point of view.

Pertinax, the brilliant editor of L'Echo de Paris, a vigorous representative of the extreme Right.

Robert Dell, former Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, recently returned to Paris after having been expelled during the war for his too frank dispatches to the Guardian.

Harold Stearns, author of "Liberalism in America" and "America and the Young Intellectual," whose descriptive letters from various picturesque corners of the old world make most delightful reading.

From Germany

S. Miles Bouton, an American long resident in Berlin, author of "The Kaiser Abdicates; The German Revolution."

From Japan

John A. Brailsford, an English journalist for some time resident in the Far East and a close student of developments there.

K. K. Kawakami, the American correspondent of several Japanese Chinese and Korean newspapers including the Jiji Shimpo of Tokio. He is author of several books including "The Real Japanese Question."

From India

Sir Nihal Singh, lecturer and writer, author of "Essays on India," "The Rajahs and Their Topics," "The Road to India's Past," "India's Problems," etc., etc.

From China

Edward H. Hume, a graduate of Johns Hopkins Medical School and president of Yale-in-China University at Changsha.

At Home

Leo Pasvolsky, member of the American Institute of Economics, author of "Economics of Communism," and "Russia in the Far East."

Capt. Dudley W. Knox, U. S. N. (retired), who is a regular contributor on naval affairs, writing as an American Naval officer, as contrast to the articles of Hector C. Bywater.

H. L. Mencken, of The Sun staff, who needs no introduction, writes a weekly article for The Evening Sun, specially [illegible] articles a week, and will write exclusively for The Morning Sun on the forthcoming Tennessee Evolution trial.

Baltimoreans Don't Say "Newspaper"—They Say "Sunpaper"

When writing to [illegible] please mention The Nation

The disintegrating effect on the nation may be imagined. "Justice in Mexico is really much more satisfactory than in the United States," a prominent American business man told me about two years ago, "because at home you never know how your case is coming out. Here you know to a peso the price of each judge, and if the stake involved in your litigation is worth that price you pay it."

One of the sincerest revolutionaries said to me about the same time: "State governors who do not enrich themselves through their office are the rare exceptions. Of the twenty-eight I know just two at present for whose honesty I'll vouch. Two others are entitled to the benefit of the doubt. The difference between a good governor and a bad one in Mexico is not between one who helps himself and one who does not but between the executive who while feathering his own nest does something for his state and its people while in office and the executive who is so greedy that accumulating his own fortune alone occupies him."

It was a member of President Obregon's personal staff, an extremely intelligent young man, who once rebuked me when I applied the word "grafters" to the gang of politicians who were looting the municipality of Mexico City, a rich prize eagerly sought. "'Grafters' is not the word," he said. "The word 'graft' implies a certain finesse; it connotes skill in extracting a fraction of the public revenues. These people are just plain thieves; there is nothing fractional about their activities; they take everything and leave nothing."

The condition of the capital's streets eloquently testifies that little of that wealthy metropolis's income has been spent on its maintenance.

As for the army—it has always lived by and for graft.

Needless to say, the deputies, governors, judges, municipal officials, and high army officers here referred to all proclaim themselves fervently to be "revolutionaries."

Now the juxtaposition of these glimpses of various branches of Mexican bureaucratic life may possibly paint the picture in blacker colors than it deserves to be. I know many Mexican public officials who are scrupulously honest. I have known men who have done business for years with Mexican officials and never paid nor been asked to pay one cent of graft or bribe money. On the other hand, the number of officials, penniless a few years ago, who have recently erected great houses in the capital, and in other ways flaunt their new affluence, is revealing.

President Calles is meeting the situation head on, and in doing so is undertaking the most radical, the most fundamental, and the most beneficial reform possible in Mexico. Apart from the vast sums which such a policy can save for the country's benefit—for schooling, public works, sanitation, and countless other needs—the transcendent significance of such a policy lies in its spiritual effect on the Mexican body politic.

It has been considered axiomatic that democracy cannot be imposed, cannot be handed down from above, must evolve slowly from within. Yet if one fact has impressed me above all others in Mexico it is of the great possibilities that inhere there in personal leadership. Both the country and the revolution need supremely a great leader. Obregon was a great general, an able diplomatist, an attractive personality, a just and civilized executive, and the one really sincere dominant figure in the first revolutionary decade. But he fell short of great statesmanship because in his internal policies he allowed himself to drift rather than to lead. I know that the belief is current that leadership no longer counts much in this world; that change responds to impersonal forces beyond the power of any individual to alter; that progress comes through the accretion of myriads of minute factors. To whatever extent this may be true in a highly organized country like the United States, it is certainly not true in Mexico. There the executive's power is enormous—he is bound down by the Mexican heritage, cabined by his environment, but despite the constitution his powers are virtually unlimited without the necessity of infringing on the written law. His influence is so great that he could if he chose, and managed wisely, tactfully, and firmly, fill the important electoral as well as the appointive offices in the land. Obregon did not do it, and there is likewise a strongly revolutionary, a strongly democratic, instinct in Calles that is likely to militate against his doing it. The revulsion among the true revolutionaries against the Diaz practice is so strong that Calles, I know, would dislike to inject himself ever so slightly or indirectly into gubernatorial or judiciary elections. Yet in my judgment he will have to do this if he wants to give the country a strong impetus into a democratic path, if he wants to become a hundred per cent efficient in the reconstruction of Mexico, if he wants to carry out to the utmost the promises of the revolution—the three objects are synonymous.

And for this reason. He is raising a new standard of efficiency and honesty in public office—a Herculean labor. Space is lacking here to go into details. But he has set his face like flint against the idea that office is a perquisite, and in pursuance of the "public service" ideal is weeding out, reorganizing in every branch. I believe the force of this example will go far, but it will not go far enough unless he has a far greater number of capable subordinates in national, state, judicial, and municipal offices than he can now count on. The people in his immediate entourage will be subject to his magnetic and virile personality—at a greater distance their responsiveness will be slighter. It is essential that governors that measure up to his standards and judges unversed in corruption fill their respective offices. At present democracy is served neither by the method of their election nor by the performances of many of them in office. It would be more nearly served in the long run if the presidential influence were directly exerted to bring a better type of official to the fore.

Nor is there any guaranty of honest and enlightened government in a Labor label per se—although I believe the Mexican Labor movement holds out the possibility and hope of being the most constructive organized force in the country. Labor has just got control of the municipality of Mexico, and the administration will be and must be judged by its fruits, not by its declarations. It cannot help improving on its predecessors. Morones himself said to me: "We are of course not prepared as we should like to be." Labor, as I have pointed out, is still too young and still too close to its misery to function restrainedly and effectively. Such episodes as a Labor mayor of a Labor-controlled suburb caught flagrantly grafting, or the expressed regret of one of the most prominent figures in the movement that "Comrade" Ezequiel Salcedo (one of the sterling revolutionary figures) had not used his office as temporary governor of Zacatecas to get railroad passes for Labor men, show that Labor in Mexico is, quite naturally, subject to the weaknesses and temptations of the environment. Calles has need to be discriminating within as well as without

Count Hermann Keyserling's

THE TRAVEL DIARY OF A PHILOSOPHER

"Many self-absorbed people will find their minds expanding and opening by reading this book, and the writer himself may yet emerge as one of the great ones of the earth."—N. Y. Times.

"The publication of this diary is a spiritual event of national importance."—Glenn Frank, Century Magazine.

2 vols. $10.00

Katherine Mayo's

ISLES OF FEAR

"Thanks to her skill as a trained observer, and to her ability as a writer, Miss Mayo has given us one of the most readable and informing volumes about the Philippines yet published."—N. Y. Times.

Illustrated. $3.50

Harold Bruce's

WILLIAM BLAKE IN THIS WORLD

"Not only does Blake live in these pages, but so, too, do all the persons who came into contact with Blake in any important relationship."—N. Y. Herald Tribune.

Illustrated. $3.00

Harcourt, Brace and Company

M. R. Werner's

BRIGHAM YOUNG

By the Author of "Barnum"

Joseph Smith, Jr., Inspecting the Golden Plates of the Book of Mormon. From a contemporary woodcut.

"Mr. Werner is able to be dramatic and picturesque, while being at the same time studious, thorough, and accurate."—N. Y. Times.

"This is Mr. Werner's subject: An impecunious Vermont boy with only a few weeks of schooling rises to be prophet, priest and king, head of a church, general of an army, governor of a territory, possessor of an estate worth $2,000,000, husband of 27 wives and father of 56 children."—Stuart P. Sherman in the N. Y. Herald Tribune.

Illustrated from old prints, $5.00

383 Madison Avenue
New York

Virginia Woolf's

THE COMMON READER

In this volume Mrs. Woolf attempts to look at books and literature, not as a critic or scholar, but through the eyes of "the common reader."

"Her critical essays have the quality, the individuality, and some of the intensity of works of art."—Clive Bell, in the Dial.

$3.50

MRS. DALLOWAY

"In Mrs. Woolf's new novel the visible world exists with a brilliance, a luminous clarity. To the reader, London is made for the first time to exist. It emerges, shining like crystal, out of the fog in which all the merely material universe is ordinarily enveloped in his mind."—The Saturday Review.

$2.5[illegible]

Sinclair Lewis'

ARROWSMITH

"'Arrowsmith' contains all 'Main Street' and all 'Babbitt,' and much more besides. [illegible] other character I know of in modern American fiction equals her in absolute reality."—T. K. [illegible] N. Y. [illegible]

$2.00

John Palmer Gavit's

COLLEGE

"[illegible] work that there is not a parent who has a son or daughter at college or expects soon to have one, not an undergraduate, nor an alumnus, not a member of a college faculty, not a college president in the United States, who will not find Mr. Gavit's book worth his time."—N. Y. Times.

$2.00

the ranks of organized labor—and apparently he has been.

It is useless to argue that a one-man government isn't democracy. Neither is a many-men chaos. Let Mexico have a generation of economic reconstruction, of intelligent universal education, of political peace without militarism, and democracy will, I am convinced, evolve spontaneously. But the beginning must be made on a clean and firm foundation.

The one-man government has weaknesses too obvious to need elucidation. The good work of one administration can easily be swept away. This is precisely what happened in Yucatan, where the heroic efforts of Felipe Carrillo are visible for the moment only in the good roads that he built. His successors, of course, call themselves "revolutionary" and invoke his name for their purposes, but they are merely political spoilsmen. Yet I believe that much of what Carrillo did for Yucatan in his short twenty-two months' governorship could be recovered with the right kind of successor. It is continuity, continuity, continuity that Mexico desperately needs—the working out of a program without interruptions by rebellions, by change of administrations. At present the first and last years of a presidential term are apt to be wholly wasted, and much time is spent undoing what someone else has done instead of proceeding uninterruptedly to further achievement.

I was introduced last December to the new head of the Division of Fine Arts in the Department of Education. What was to be his program, I asked. "First of all to abolish all this charlatanry of Diego Rivera," said he, sweeping his hand toward the magnificent frescoes of Mexico's foremost painter, "and of Best-Maugard"—the artist chiefly responsible for the artistic revival in the Mexico City schools.

"But," said the man who had introduced us, "Diego Rivera is a good friend of Calles."

"Ah, in that case—" the new director of art raised his hand deprecatingly—"I should, of course, inform myself fully as to that before taking action."

Apparently the difference between an artist and a daubster lay in the degree of one's intimacy with the powers that be. Certainly that kind of intellectual subserviency is a tragic legacy of the past, which Calles's policy of rewarding efficient and honest service will go far to dispel.

It would be well for those who are impatient with Mexico and her ways to remember that democracy is a recent innovation in the world; that it exists as yet on only a limited part of the globe; that nowhere does it approach perfection; that in those countries where it has been most successful special predisposing factors—historical, racial, and physiographic—have fostered it. Despite setbacks, and all manner of beclouding intromissions which will long dog her upward climb, Mexico is today more nearly a country governed for the Mexican people than it has ever been. It remains to be seen how soon it can evolve into one governed also by the people.

Poems

The Loss of Love

By COUNTEE CULLEN

All through an empty place I go,
And find her not in any room;
The candles and the lamps I light
Go down before a wind of gloom.

Thick-spraddled lies the dust about,
A fit sad place to write her name,
Or draw her face the way she looked
That legendary night she came.

The old house crumbles bit by bit:
Each day I hear the ominous thud
That says another rent is there
For winds to pierce and storms to flood.

My orchards groan and sag with fruit,
Where, Indian-wise, the bees go round;
I let it rot upon the bough;
I eat what falls upon the ground.

The heavy cows go laboring
In agony with clotted teats;
My hands are slack; my blood is cold;
I marvel that my heart still beats.

I have no will to weep or sing,
No least desire to pray or curse;
The loss of love is a bitter thing:
They lie who say that death is worse.

A Sail

By M. Y. LHERMONTOV

Translated by MAX EASTMAN

White is the sail and lonely
  On the misty infinite blue;
Flying from what in the homeland?
  Seeking for what in the new?

The waves romp, and the winds whistle,
  And the mast leans and creaks;
Alas! He flies not from fortune,
  And no good fortune he seeks.

Beneath him the stream, luminous, azure,
  Above him the sun's golden breast;
But he, a rebel, invites the storms,
  As though in the storms were rest.

Final

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

A far barbaric sadness haunts these hills
In mist of autumn and magnificence
Of clear unearthly color—
  I have crossed the wall
Past mortal sorrow and its single sense;
I am a human dying of my ills
Who comes upon a cosmic funeral
And the still splendor of indifference.

The BORZOI feels an especial kinship with THE NATION for the liberal attitude and the courageous diligence in presentation of truth which animates THE NATION is also characteristic, we believe, of the BORZOI policy. Therefore we feel that every reader of THE NATION is either actually or potentially a member of that intelligent minority which supports BORZOI Books. The following editors and contributing editors of THE NATION are BORZOI authors: Oswald Garrison Villard, J. W. Krutch, H. L. Mencken

Among our authors are also these contributors to the columns of THE NATION*: Manuel Ugarte, Carl Van Vechten, Witter Bynner, Willa Cather, Will Irwin, James Stevens, Ruth Suckow, Katharine Anthony, Thomas Mann, Thomas Beer*

THE HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION

This series is one of the greatest and most interesting publishing ventures of the day. It may be described as a Universal History of Mankind which will present to the layman and scholar the results of modern research and modern scholarship in the whole range of the social sciences. It will comprise about 200 volumes.

THE EARTH BEFORE HISTORY
By EDMOND PERRIER, Maps $5.00

PREHISTORIC MAN
By J. DE MORGAN, Illustrations $5.00

LANGUAGE: A LINGUISTIC INTRODUCTION TO HISTORY
By J. VENDRYES, $6.00

HISTORY AND LITERATURE OF CHRISTIANITY
FROM TERTULLIAN TO BOETHIUS
By P. DE LABRIOLLE,
Foreword by Cardinal Gasquet $7.50

A GEOGRAPHICAL INTRODUCTION TO HISTORY
By LUCIEN FEBVRE, Maps $6.00

A THOUSAND YEARS OF THE TARTARS
By E. H. PARKER, $5.00

SOCIAL ORGANIZATION
By W. H. R. RIVERS, F.R.S. $4.00

CHINA AND EUROPE:
INTELLECTUAL AND ARTISTIC CONTACTS IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
By ADOLF REICHWEIN, Illustrated $5.00

ON THE THRESHOLD OF THE PACIFIC
By C. E. FOX, LITT.D., Illustrated $6.00

LONDON LIFE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY
By DOROTHY GEORGE, Illustrated $6.50

To those interested full descriptions will be sent on request.

BORZOI BOOKS

ST. MAWR

a new novel by D. H. LAWRENCE

It is a subtle study of the unconscious relationship between human beings and animals. It concerns two American women and is set partly in America, partly in England $2.00

COMPLETE

THE PEASANTS

by LADISLAS REYMONT

AUTUMN SPRING
WINTER SUMMER

All four volumes of the Nobel Prize Novel now published, boxed $10.00 [illegible] each

DAY OF ATONEMENT

by LOUIS GOLDING

Exalted prose and undeniable significance raise this story of a Jew, who seeks in Christianity an outlet for his religious fervor, far from the general run of fiction $2.00

Following The Patriarch

THUNDERSTORM

by G. B. STERN

An amusing novel in Miss Stern's most felicitous vein. $2.00

THE BORZOI POCKET BOOKS

Reprints of good books with a uniform, attractive format and binding and offered at a price that places them within reach of everyone, $1.25 net per volume. The latest volumes added to this series are:

CASANOVA'S ESCAPE FROM THE LEADS
Translated with a new introduction by ARTHUR MACHEN
One of the most thrilling episodes in THE MEMOIRS taken from the definitive English edition.

THE BLIND BOW-BOY
by CARL VAN VECHTEN
The war defense of 1925's action

YOUTH AND THE BRIGHT MEDUSA
by WILLA CATHER
A collection of short stories that are some of the finest products of Miss Cather's art.

A few of the 26 previously published volumes

TARAS BULBA
by NICOLAY V. GOGOL

HUNGER
by KNUT HAMSUN

PREJUDICES
First series: by H. L. MENCKEN

THE ANTICHRIST
by F. W. NIETZSCHE
Translated by H. L. MENCKEN

CHELKASH
by MAXIM GORKY

A ROOM WITH A VIEW
by E. M. FORSTER

A BOOK OF BURLESQUES
by H. L. MENCKEN

THE FAIR REWARDS
by THOMAS BEER

Alfred · A · Knopf · 730 Fifth Avenue · New York

Publisher of THE AMERICAN MERCURY

In the Driftway

A SPARKLING spring day; an hour's run in a third-class carriage and the Drifter found himself at Eton. What visions does the name conjure up of infant noblemen in chimney-pot hats and orators in their dewy babyhood: future prime ministers and leaders of His Majesty's opposition. There they all were, to be sure, only with that difference, that superior savor that reality holds over the imagination. Up and down the streets they walked, assorted according to sizes; the little ones together, round, pink, naughty, lovable, their clothes, excepting for the short jacket, in quaint semblance of manhood and astonishingly dirty. The older ones lanky and sheepish in cutaway coats, but with bright complexions and noble hawk-like noses emerging from faces of childish softness—splendid barbarians; bearers of great names, clad in a soiled travesty of a gentleman's conventional afternoon costume.

* * * * *

WHAT an incongruous garb for boyhood! Would a mere American Drifter dare to call it snobbish? In any event, the stains incidental to time and boyish tussles showed that the youths had been in no awe of their genteel habiliments and had distributed soup and minute particles of the cabbage family (known to the lowly as veg.) over them with complete impartiality. The Drifter thought he caught a resemblance to the elder Pitt in one youngling, half of whose top hat was brushed the wrong way and whose hobbledehoy shoes were somewhat in need of repair; and was that golden-haired cherub a Georgian Shelley feeling the bourgeoning of a great poem, or was it a suppressed longing for tuck that gave his eye an inner glow?

* * * * *

THE Drifter and an English friend were on their way to Windsor. Scillas bloomed, daffodils twinkled from the gardens, and the snow-drops looked as though they had forgotten to remove their night-caps and were hanging their heads in shame. Windsor is a country retreat of the present royal family. They and their retainers withdraw to its icy halls for a few weeks yearly; otherwise, its chief use seems to be to inspire awe in Americans and provide a livelihood for sundry elderly gentlemen who serve as guides and caretakers. The one who herded a large group of us through the interminable rooms was free of information, which the Drifter has, alas, forgotten. He can only remember that the outstanding associations of Windsor are for him Charles the Second and Queen Victoria—the antipodes of vice and virtue. Unfortunately for the moral, Charles had all the taste, at least in interior decoration; while the good queen's ideas in upholstery, of which there was a generous supply, were undoubtedly gaudy rather than neat.

* * * * *

"AND now 'ere, ladies-'n-gen'lemen, is the finest gem of 'Er Majesty Queen Victoria's collection; this 'ere peacock is solid gold, there ain't no alloy, an' 'e is covered clean over with rubies, emeralds, and diamings. It was took from the top of a Indian prince's umbreller, in a raid by honest British redcoats. That's all right sir, 'ave another look."

* * * * *

IN the Drifter's ear, his English friend muttered smiling: "Well really; Queen Victoria . . . stolen goods . . . they might at least not be quite so frank about it. . . ."

Then as we filed out, the grassy Windsor courtyard once more, and a stroll through the old town, with its lush lawns, winding streets between brick walls, jasmine-covered, English gardens, cool, fragrant—the impassive perfection of English manners. What ages of training at Eton, followed by conquest and rapine, had gone to making the security wherein this calm beauty could flourish; but the beauty was there, and the Drifter found it good.

Softly I trod, and with repentant shoon,
Half fearfully in sweet imaginings,
Where lay, like courtyard of departed kings,
The old quadrangle, paved with afternoon.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Greeting

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As one who for so many years was chief proprietor, I cannot let the Sixtieth Anniversary of The Nation pass without expressing my congratulations and my happiness at its continued growth and virility. I am greatly pleased to know that its circulation is now four times what it was when the present management took hold.

It has seemed to me of late to be better than ever and I rejoice that it still champions those unpopular causes which must be won if the world is to progress and America is to be kept true to its boasted traditions.

No one living has had longer or closer ties with the paper than I, and I have read it during the entire sixty years of its existence. I am sure that it has never stood more clearly and more fearlessly for its principles than today.

May it carry on its work of education sixty years longer!

New York, June 20 FANNY GARRISON VILLARD

The Federal Trade Commission

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: With reference to your editorial in The Nation of May 27 concerning the Federal Trade Commission, wherein you make the statement that only 42 cases out of 8,661 complaints were dismissed for lack of proof, we question the figures. They are divergent from those of the bulletins issued by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and also divergent from facts presented in Forbes Magazine in three recent issues.

It so happens that this company is one of those whose case was dismissed for lack of proof. The charges, presented by a competitor in this particular case, arose from the fact that the competitor had been beaten in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in the Court of Common Pleas by this firm, which secured an injunction against him for the use of certain dies and advertising matter which had been taken from our premises. The case was appealed by this firm to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, where the competitor lost his appeal. Then, in a spirit of revenge, he made certain charges to the Federal Trade Commission. It did not cost anything to make these charges. He did not even have to employ an attorney. The Government prosecuted the case on the charges presented, gave the matter widespread publicity, and our competitor used the publicity against us for a period of two or more years during which the Federal Trade Commission was trying to reach the case.

On all of the charges presented to the Federal Trade Commission, the competitor had ample recourse at law under the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, but had he made these charges to any court in this State he would have been liable to a return suit and damages in event of his failure to prove the charges which he made against us; not so when the charges were made through the Federal Trade Commission.

A Selection of Distinguished New Books

Accepted as Standards

THE GROWTH OF THE UNITED STATES

By RALPH V. HARLOW, Boston University

Each aspect of this energetic narrative is related with the certainty of intellectual freedom; and though daringly critical in judgment, its scholarly acumen is unerring. Written in a trenchant style. $5.00

INSTINCT:
A Study in Social Psychology

By L. L. BERNARD,
University of Minnesota.

"Dr. Bernard has done something which was very much needed. His keen and critical analysis of instinct will do much to clarify thinking on the subject. His work is invaluable to sociologists."—Professor J. P. Lichtenberger. $3.60

THINGS AND IDEALS:
Essays in Functional Philosophy

By M. C. OTTO, University of Wisconsin

"This book places the author in the front ranks of present writers on philosophy. This . . . because of its brilliant reinforcement of a view of 'Things and Ideals' that is steadily making its way in the world."—Professor A. W. Moore in the International Journal of Ethics. $2.50

PROBLEMS OF CITIZENSHIP

By HAYES BAKER-CRothers and RUTH A. HUDNUT, Dartmouth College

An authoritative study of the numerous important civic problems, such as Immigration, Labor, Civil Liberty, International Relations, etc. $2.75

ROMAIN ROLLAND'S
Study of a Woman's Soul

Annette and Sylvie

Translated by BEN RAY REDMAN

Just as Jean Christophe encompassed everything in the life of a man, here is an equally great study of a woman. The mighty story of a girl torn between idealism and a passionate nature as contrasted with her sister, who lives each gay moment unfettered by spiritual aspirations. "A marvelous piece of literary craftsmanship."—New York Times. $2.50

THE TURN OF A DAY

By C. A. DAWSON SCOTT

Three people experience life to the uttermost during the course of one day. "The eternal triangle presented in an absolutely new way—holds the reader tense until the very last line."—New York Times. $2.00

MARRIED ALIVE

By RALPH STRAUS

A hilarious novel. The New York Times calls it "lively and entertaining. The characters seem to come to life even while their absurdities are making us laugh—vivacious and natural, witty at times, humorous at others. Indeed one could not ask more of Mr. Straus." $2.00

HOME BOOK OF MODERN VERSE

Compiled by BURTON E. STEVENSON

"An incredible job," says Laurence Stallings in the New York World, "of new books it is to be acquired first." Uniform in format with the "Home Book of Verse." $7.50

THE FAR PRINCESS
Edmond Rostand's Superb Play

[illegible] $1.75

STORIES OF OLD IRELAND AND MYSELF

Sir William Orpen's [illegible] gathered together in this charming book. [illegible]

THE BRITISH EMPIRE

[illegible]
An authoritative survey of the British Empire by a group of distinguished scholars [illegible] in twelve volumes, each sold separately. Descriptive circular on request. Each $4.00

Succeeding
ANNETTE & SYLVIE
SUMMER
By [illegible]
in which the further spiritual and emotional development of Annette and Sylvie are portrayed. Ready in September $2.00

ESSAYS TOWARD TRUTH

Selected by K. A. [illegible], W. S. [illegible] and M. [illegible] COLLUM of Dartmouth College.

Essays on such subjects as Education, Culture, Industry, Democracy, Religion, Science, Literature by the foremost [illegible] of our day. $2.00

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY Publishers 19 West 44th Street New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

We had no opportunity of return suit then, and for a period of two years or more the charges, not being tried but having been given widespread publicity by the commission, stood against us as true, until finally the entire matter was dismissed by the commission for total lack of proof on any of the charges.

Again, when the investigator from the Federal Trade Commission came to this office he was, by advice of our attorneys, given free access to our private papers, documents, etc. The next time the writer saw these papers they were in the hands of the president of the competing firm sitting side by side with the Federal Trade Commission's attorney in the city of Philadelphia. Now we presume, of course, that you are human and, if you are, you surely have certain documents and papers in your possession that you would not care to hand to your nearest competitor, even though the government's agent performed the trick for you.

The hearings in this particular case were held in Philadelphia, Boston, and Washington. The government probably spent about $2,500, which is about what this firm spent to defend the charges. This is a very flagrant case of abuse of the powers of the Federal Trade Commission, and when the matter was finally settled, we got about four lines of publicity on the inside of the trade papers, whereas, when the case was first started, they spread the news in large headlines over the front of the paper.

There was no use of an appeal to the Federal Trade Commission in this particular instance or no necessity therefor except the spirit of revenge. If one firm can do this, other firms can do it. As far as the Federal Trade Commission is concerned, their work since the inception of the commission has not in any way made crooked people more honest.

The Federal Trade Commission is just another useless expenditure of money on the part of the government. It could be done away with without affecting the rights of the people in any way whatsoever.

In conclusion we would say that we do not read The Nation because we like it; we read The Nation because we get another angle on pretty nearly everything from your paper. We do not agree with you 50 per cent of the time, but we are fair enough to say that we like to get the slant of the opposition. Should we confine our reading to just such papers or magazines as entirely agree with us, we would lose a judicial attitude of mind which we strive for. However, to our mind, there is so much in this editorial which is erroneous that we could not help writing you regarding it.

North Philadelphia, May 26

THE CHAS. H. ELLIOTT COMPANY,
HARRY V. ELLIOTT, Vice-President

Birth-Control Laws in Europe

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Dr. Marie C. Stopes of London writes in your issue of May 27 to correct a statement by Dr. Aletta Jacobs that Holland in 1882 was perhaps the only European country which did not forbid the giving of contraceptive information. Dr. Stopes says that England has never had any laws against contraception.

So far as I can discover, with a single exception, no other European countries have had such laws either. That exception is France, which experienced a depopulation scare after the war, and passed a law prohibiting access to contraceptives. I have repeatedly inquired, but have as yet been unable to find any such statutes in other countries, though there is said to be in Holland a regulation against the display advertising of contraceptives.

These United States of ours seem to be the only country with a wholesale and long-standing prohibition of this sort, and by way of having the prohibition as obnoxious as possible it was made a part of the "obscenity" statutes. In this regard we are unhappily unique among nations. It is a thousand pities that our country should have to stand alone as the prize benighted

"The 'Alice in Wonderland' of modern American urban life"

The CRAZY FOOL

by

donald Ogden Stewart

Author of "Perfect Behavior" "Mr. and Mrs. Haddock Abroad," etc.

"NOW and then there comes along a rare book which is so good that our natural professional vanity makes us wish to be among the first on the band wagon in proclaiming its excellence. The Crazy Fool comes as near being the perfect satire on modern American life as anything I can think of."
—BURTON RASCOE

$2.00

New Titles in
The American Library

The Works of
AMBROSE BIERCE
In the Midst of Life
Can Such Things Be?
The Monk and the Hangman's Daughter
The Devil's Dictionary

"SO far in this life I have encountered no more thoroughgoing cynic than Bierce. Out of the spectacle of life about him he got an unflagging and Gargantuan joy."
—H. L. MENCKEN.

Each $2.00

The Works of
HERMAN MELVILLE
Israel Potter
Redburn
Moby Dick
Mardi

Each $2.00

Albert & Charles Boni, - Publishers

nation of the earth, with its fifty-two-year-old Comstock contraceptive prohibition. How much longer will Americans enjoy this unlovely distinction?

New York, May 25 MARY WARE DENNETT,
Chairman of the National Council of the Voluntary Parenthood League

Lead Us to It

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A friend of mine showed me a copy of your paper today in which I see you give the Pirates a knock. I personally don't read your magazine and never seen a copy of it before and in fact didn't know there was such a paper. I looked the whole works over and would much rather have the Saturday Evening or Liberty for a nichol than a bound file of your whole thing.

But that's neither here nor there. I can see you're one of those guys that would rather be right than be Rockefeller. However, I don't care for the kind of cheap publicity you people give and the slur on my friend the commissioner, Teddy Glynn. The paper that printed the story on the Pirates dance is the best paper in Boston, or the Hub as you call it, and if you people think the Pirates dance didn't have any news value I just wish you had a been there. It was the biggest dance ever run in Roughan's Hall. I don't want no apology or nothing like that, because personly I can stand those kind of knocks, but if your paper had any kind of circulation in Charlestown, for the sake of the Pirates, I would ask for an apology.

Just to show you that I'm a good fellow, though, I'll extend to you right now, a cordial invitation to you and the other member of your staff to attend the dance and see for yourself if it wasn't worth all the publicity we got on it.

Boston, June 2 J. W. B.

"More Hair and Less Straw"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The straw hat is a nuisance at best and much warmer than many a felt one—and, besides, the wearing of hats in general is positively harmful to the hair and scalp and conducive to the loss of hair, which many of us would surely like to avoid.

I tried last year to discard my straw hat for a three-day period. I was comfortable, never sweltered about the brow, and kept cool. My neighbors looked at me jokingly and had me classified as one of the many "nuts" who infest the community. I proclaim that I am perfectly sane, and demand that each person who feels as I do discard all headgear from May 1 to November 1, at least.

Let us form a hatless brigade and combine for the common good. I am prepared for the opposition of the hat industry and would gladly debate the question with such giant opponents as Truly Kaufman or Young Long Stetson, who will look with dread upon this healthy movement.

I know that thousands of your readers will welcome my league. Let us start at once. Let the slogan be "A Hatless Manhattan," or "More hair and less straw," or better still, "Let straws show which way the wind blows."

New York, May 4 ABRAHAM VOGEL

Discriminating Praise

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your eternal yawping about having the Government do it makes me tired, but even at that The Nation is the best edited magazine in the country and I am sending you the $5 for a renewal.

Akron, Ohio, May 23 C. L. K.

CRUEL FELLOWSHIP

By Cyril Hume

"A novel not for sentimentalists," says the Boston Transcript. . . . "One who is honest with himself cannot fail to recognize that Claude Fisher is closely related to most of us. . . . It must be reckoned with as one of the notable books of the year." $2.50

By the author of "Wife of the Centaur"

SERENA BLANDISH

Or, The Difficulty of Getting Married

Behold! A novel for hopeful maidens, wary bachelors, disappointed spinsters, complacent matrons, safe husbands, calculating hostesses, and all others involved in the perils of matrimony.

"Here is a skit of genius!" exclaims Carl Van Doren.

Serena says:

"It is only by the keenest enquiry and the most vigilant alacrity that one can contrive to meet a bachelor when he is temporarily free." $2.50

By A Lady of Quality

MAY FAIR

By Michael Arlen

Revealing the Last Follies, Misadventures and Galanteries of "These Charming People."

The New York Times says: "Mr. Arlen is a writer and he proves it again in fifty places in 'May Fair.' . . . Those who liked 'These Charming People' will like 'May Fair' even better. For those who did not, nothing can be done. $2.50

By the author of "The Green Hat"

HELEN

By Edward Lucas White

N. Y. Times: "In his new novel Mr. White has achieved the remarkable feat of making us follow Helen's heroic story with the same breathless interest we give to a tale new-told." $2.50

N. Y. Sun: "Audacious and subtle paralleling of modern life with legendary."

By the author of "El Supremo," "Andivious Hedulio," etc.

GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY
244 Madison Avenue New York
DORAN BOOKS

Books and Music

Reviewing in 1865

(Extracts from three book reviews in the first issue of The Nation, July 6, 1865)

CARLYLE

(From a review of the "History of Frederick The Great," by Henry James, Sr., father of the novelist and of William James)

We should shrink very keenly from doing any personal injustice to Carlyle. All his friends know him, and indeed all his books show him, to be a man of even a genial practical morality, an unexceptionable good neighbor, friend, and citizen. All we want to say is, that in respect to the public questions which are now soliciting examination, he is incompetent even to puerility. Probably no man connected with public affairs in England is so utterly deficient in the instinct of statesmanship, if statesmanship involve any respect for the principles of human nature; and yet he larrups Peel, Cobden, Palmerston, and the rest in his voluble pedantic way, as if he alone in all England possessed the true secret of governing. He is all the while himself a literalist of the most unqualified pattern, pinning his faith upon some futile person or other, and incapable of uttering an inspiring or even soothing word in behalf of any struggling manifestation of human hope. True, he abuses every acknowledged and every aspiring guide of the political world with such an insane relish, that many thoughtless persons, bewildered by his audacious oracles, begin timidly to count upon him as a statesman of the new order; as an intelligent herald of the new or spiritual Divine advent in human nature. But the claim is absurd. With much picturesque squinting in that direction, Carlyle has no philosophic belief of a real Divine presence and efficacy in human affairs. He feels a vague menace in his understanding that there is somewhere on high some very peremptory person or other—some huger Cromwell or more unscrupulous Bonaparte—who will infallibly have his own will in the end, simply by coercing all other wills; and he is able consequently to variegate his conversation and writing on occasion with certain devout lights and shades that seem most orthodox and pious to innocent imaginations, and would make the ghost of John Knox roll up the whites of his eyes in grateful astonishment. But that is literally all. He is an amateur prophet exclusively, having as little real resemblance to Isaiah or John, as Charlotte Cushman has to Lady Macbeth. He is a prophet "on his own hook," in the sole interest of his own irritable cuticle, without a glimmer of sympathy with the public want, or a gleam of insight into its approaching Divine relief; a harlequin in the guise of Jeremiah, who feeds you with laughter instead of tears, and puts the old prophetic sincerity out of countenance by his broad persistent winks at the bystanders.

THE NOBLE SCHOOL OF FICTION

(From a review of Henry Kingsley's "The Hillyars and the Burtons," by Henry James, Jr.)

The main object of the novels of Mr. Charles Kingsley and his brother has seemed to us to be to give a strong impression of what they would call "human nobleness." Human nobleness, when we come across it in life, is a very fine thing; but it quite loses its flavor when it is made so cheap as it is made in these works. It is emphatically an occasional quality; it is not, and, with all due respect for the stalwart Englishmen of Queen Elizabeth's time and eke of Queen Victoria's, it never was the prime element of human life, nor were its headquarters at any time on the island of Great Britain. By saying it is an occasional quality, we simply mean that it is a great one, and is therefore manifested in great and exceptional moments. In the ordinary course of life it does not come into play; it is sufficiently represented by courage, modesty, industry. Let the novelist give us these virtues for what they are, and not for what no true lover of human nature would have them pretend to be, or else let him devise sublime opportunities, situations which really match the latent nobleness of the human soul. We can all of us take the outside view of magnanimity; it belongs to the poet to take the inside one. It seems to us that the sturdy and virtuous Burtons in the present tale have but a narrow scale of emotions. Mr. Kingsley would apparently have us look upon them as heroes, which, with the best will in the world, we cannot succeed in doing. A hero is but a species of genius, a genius pro tempore. The Burtons are essentially commonplace. The best that can be said of them is that they had a good notion of their duty. It is here, as it seems to us, that praise should begin, and not, as Mr. Kingsley would have us think, that it should be content to end. The notion of duty is an excellent one to start with, but it is a poor thing to spend one's life in trying to compass. A life so spent, at any rate, is not a fit subject for an epic novel. The Burtons had none but the minor virtues—honesty, energy and a strong family feeling. Let us do all justice to these excellent qualities, but let us not shame them by forever speaking of them with our hats off, and a "so help me God!" The only hero in Mr. Kingsley's book is, to our perception, the villain, Sir George Hillyar. He has a spark of inspiration; he is ridden by an evil genius; he has a spirit of his own. The others, the good persons, the gentlemen and ladies, whether developed by "a year and a half at boarding school," or still in the rough, have nothing but the old Kingsleian air noble. We are informed that they have "great souls," which on small provocation rush into their eyes and into the grasp of their hands; and they are forever addressing each other as "old boy" and "old girl." "Is this ambition?" Has the language of friendship and love no finer terms than these? Those who use them, we are reminded, are gentlemen in the rough. There is, in our opinion, no such thing as a gentleman in the rough. A gentleman is born of his polish.

WHITE'S SHAKESPEARE

(From a review of Richard Grant White's "The Works of William Shakespeare", by Charles Eliot Norton)

We are glad to announce this long-expected volume as soon to issue from the press. Mr. White's Shakespearian labors are worthily concluded, and his edition of "Shakespeare's Works" completed, by this publication. The merits of Mr. White's previous labors are now established. His "Shakespeare's Scholar," which preceded his edition of the work, not only displayed a degree of scholarship highly creditable to its author, but also gave evidence of his possessing a fine critical taste and genial appreciation, as well as a fund of good common sense—that rarest and most needed qualification in a commentator. His "Notes and Introductions to the Plays" fulfilled the expectations he had thus awakened, and in England as well as in this country his edition has taken rank among the best. An editio optima of Shakespeare does not exist. Mr. White has had many competitors in the field. Knight, Collier, Halliwell, Dyce, Wright, and Aldis, to say nothing of Staunton, and in our own country of Verplanck and Hudson, have each in their respective editions exhibited especial and distinguishing excellencies. Each has his distinct place. The thorough critical student of the letter or the spirit of the text can spare neither. . . . It is creditable to Mr. White that by the side of these recent editions his holds an even place. In certain not unimportant respects it is better than any one of them. He possesses a rare faculty of delicate and acute literary criticism and insight, combined with a hardly less rare faculty of expressing fine distinctions of thought. These valuable qualities are frequently displayed in his comment on passages of which the meaning is obscure or has been disputed, and in his longer discussion of points connected with the origin or composition of the plays. His essay on the authorship of Henry VI . . . is a masterpiece.

Daily Reading of

The World

is a Daily Education

The World's intelligently edited news columns keep you constantly informed on the progress of civilization.

The World's forceful editorial columns, supplemented by contributions of the best cultural thought, keep you well advised on the prospects of civilization.

The World's extensive system of communications, utilizing telegraphs, cables and wireless, circumnavigates the globe every twenty-four hours to put before you at breakfast a terse, accurate record of what happened everywhere.

The World's trained correspondents in all the important capitals of the civilized world digest daily the important happenings in each country and forward it for your information.

The World's reputation for accuracy, honesty and fairness has made it the recognized leader in America of intelligent liberal thought.

The best informed New Yorkers are those who have the daily habit of reading The World—Are you one of them?

The Nightingale. A Life of Chopin.
By Marjorie Strachey

"Marjorie Strachey has achieved more than she probably could have in any other way. By the most purely objective chronicle, working always with a most admirable restraint, she has presented Chopin in a series of semi-fictional portraits. . . . Her very simplicity and directness of approach are dictated by a very evident sympathetic insight. She knows too well that there is a sense of tears underlying mortal things, all too well to attempt heightening effects which need no heightening. . . . She has contrived, always without sentimentality, to impart to her work something of the emotional quality of music itself."—New York Times Book Review.

Cr. 8vo. $2.50

Great Britain and the American Civil War
By Ephraim Douglass Adams

Many books have been written on America's diplomatic controversies with Great Britain during the Civil War and upon American indignation with what seemed a "cold" British neutrality. Few have attempted to examine the matter from the point of view of the British government and public, nor has this been possible owing to the fact that the essential documents were not until recently open to historical investigation. These documents have now been studied in detail for the present work, as also the personal papers of the members of the British Cabinet, such as Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston and Gladstone, and of Lord Lyons, the British Minister to America. Research has also been made in the diplomatic correspondence at Washington, the private correspondence of James Mason, Confederate envoy to Great Britain, the Russian diplomatic correspondent at St. Petersburg, etc.

2 Vols. 8vo. $10.00 net

A Handbook of the League of Nations
By Sir Geoffrey Butler, K.B.E., M.A.

In this new edition the author has attempted to explain what the League of Nations has done, and what it has failed to do, during the first five years of its activity. The book is furnished with a table indicating what, month by month from its foundation to the present day, the League has been doing, and there are collected together in appendices for the first time under one cover all the chief pertinent documents.

8vo. $3.75 net

Internal Improvements and State Debt in Ohio:
An Essay on Economic History.
By Ernest Ludlow Bogart

8vo. $2.50 net

Air Power and War Rights
By J. M. Spaight, Author of "War Rights on Land" and "Aircraft in War"

8vo. $8.50 net

The Two Cities:
or Statecraft and Idealism.
By M. D. Petre

Cr. 8vo. $1.50 net

Instinct, Intelligence and Character:
An Educational Psychology.
By Godfrey H. Thomson

8vo. $3.50 net

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.
55 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

The Race Problem

The Mongol in Our Midst: A Study of Man and His Three Faces. By F. G. Crookshank. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.50.

Race Hygiene and Heredity. By Hermann W. Siemens. Translated by Lewellys F. Barker. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

Race Prejudice. By Jean Finot. Translated by Florence Wade-Evans. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

Christianity and the Race Problem. By J. H. Oldham. George H. Doran Company. $2.25.

A GOOD meal generally begins with a nibble of celery and so we can hardly do better in plowing through some nineteen hundred pages of race matter, now minatory, now pacificatory, than to start with Mr. Crookshank's fantastic brochure on the Mongol in our midst. It is as light as the vegetable, but it is completely devoid of vitamines. The author's thesis need only be stated to be refuted with a laugh. Mr. Crookshank is a man of considerable literary taste who knows how to quote aptly from Sir Thomas Browne, and one would like to believe that his interest lies in the whimsicalities rather than in the truth of his race theories, very much as Charles Lamb is known to have relished the manner of his Hooker and Burton without being in the least disquieted by their ponderous matter. Our guess, however, would be that he is serious. Should it appear, in the wash, that Mr. Crookshank has been holding a huge chuckle in reserve, we should be the first to take off our hat to him as one of the most brilliant hoaxers in contemporary scientific literature.

The thesis may be summarized as follows. Man is derived from three distinct apes, the orang, the gorilla, and the chimpanzee. The descendants of the orang are the peoples of Mongolian race and the so-called "Mongolian" imbeciles among the whites, whose resemblance to the true Mongolians is generally regarded as superficial. The gorilla is the ancestor of the negroid peoples. From the chimpanzee stem the whites, particularly, it would seem, the Semites. The chief evidence for these genetic theories is furnished by instinctive posture and by characteristic lines of the palm. The Mongolian or "orangoid" posture is the one illustrated by the sitting Buddha, who, one may irrelevantly remark, was a Hindu invention. Orang, "Mongolian imbecile," true Mongolian, and sitting Buddha form a series. Chimpanzee, cases of dementia praecox, and White form another. It all works out rather neatly and we learn many curious bits of information by the way. The temptation to quote a number of charming passages is great, but we must limit ourselves to two. "It is . . . singular," says Mr. Crookshank, "that the Mongolian imbeciles should not only love to sit like a Buddha but to sway the head, backwards and forwards, like a porcelain mandarin, whilst I have seen a baby Mongolian idiot prostrate himself in his cot, for hours at a time, doing the kotow. Now, when an English idiot of Mongolian physique performs in his cot the symbolic act of humiliation practiced by the Chinese race, and does it instinctively and persistently, it is idle to declare airily that no real homology is involved!" Cultural anthropologists to the rescue! But they are probably too busy to take up light skirmishing. Further on we read: "Mongolian imbeciles speak late, and it is remarkable that they alter many consonantal sounds, saying 'lellow' for 'yellow' and so forth, like a stage Chinaman, whilst they never construct long sentences. They tend, in fact, to employ only monosyllabic and asyntactic forms of speech." Chinese monosyllabism, one infers, is an instinctive reaction of the Mongolian-orangoid-imbecile stock. The fact that English has more and more tended to a Chinese-like structure must, we fear, be construed to mean that Anglo-Saxon civilization is going to the orangs.

Why such books are published it would be hard to say, but it is undeniable that they are delightful interludes in the grim and weary drama of race-discussion that we are in for these days. Mr. Siemens's book, to which the translator has appended a very useful bibliography and a technical glossary, is of a very different sort. It consists of two parts, an admirable and not too technical introduction to the theory of Mendelian heredity and a far less closely reasoned section on the degeneration which he believes to be threatening the more valuable strains in German society—and in European society generally. His fears for the future of European culture are grounded in biology pure and simple, not in a philosophy of culture such as a liberal anthropologist or historian could honestly follow. The gist of his thesis—for the sober chapters on heredity merely pave the way for a thesis—is probably contained in the following passage: "Now the threat of extinction of all existing European culture lies precisely in the fact that the leading circles, which include with respect to both bodily and mental make-up the greatest number of the best hereditary stocks, are succumbing in the struggle for existence with those that they lead, because their fertility is not great enough even to maintain their present numbers. Thus, gradually, all those hereditary stocks that are capable of preserving and advancing our civilization are being exterminated from the earth by a progressive 'proletarianization of our rising youth.' The disappearance of so many noble and patrician families is only one symptom of that great 'dying out' which, more frightful than the most terrible war, demands its sacrifice from the peoples of European culture." And "the first task," he proceeds in italics, "of the racial hygiene of today seems to me, therefore, to lie in an attempt to arrest the dying out of the socially higher classes which seems now to be in full swing." The conservative wing of eugenist opinion could hardly be stated more bluntly. In other passages of his book the author takes it quite for granted that the mingling of German and alien, particularly East European, blood is tantamount to the introduction of biologically inferior strains into the German-speaking dominions.

Like so many biologists concerned with the problems of society, Mr. Siemens sees in cultural achievement a direct indication of the working out of the physical and psychic traits of the hereditary endowment. He suffers from the characteristic illusion of the biologist, who is persuaded into accepting his genetic technique as a sufficient interpretative guide to the cultural behavior of man. It requires but little consideration of the data of history and of the social sciences to realize that the levels of culture, both within the national group and as between nationalities, are the complex and cumulative product of historical factors which possess continuity not on the biological plane but on that of social inheritance. Now the process of social inheritance is simply the continuous imitation, both consciously and unconsciously, of socially, that is conventionally, significant reactions of an acquired, non-instinctive, and indefinitely plastic sort. The cultural process is carried by human organisms, to be sure, but it is no more truly explainable in terms of biology than the ever-changing aspect of the wind-blown sea is explainable as a specific resultant of the chemistry of sea water. Such terms as "our civilization," "noble and patrician families," and "backward peoples" are highly derivative concepts of a cultural, historical order. They have no relevance for the biologist whatever, and if the biologist, as biologist, does nevertheless insist on being interested in them he indulges in an application of his science which is not in essence different from the astrological labors of the early astronomers. It is very remarkable that in the earlier part of his book Mr. Siemens is at the greatest pains to prove that the acquired or "parakinetic" features of the organism are of no influence on its properly hereditary or "idiokinetic" features but in the later chapters forgets or misapplies his own principles. The colossal assumption that the conventional values ("higher" and "lower") that we assign to different types of cultural behavior are at the same time intelligible as

SINCE LENIN DIED

by Max Eastman

WE HAVE rushed into print the American edition of this tremendously important book which on its appearance in Europe was treated like a public document. It reveals the whole astounding story of the fall and return of Trotsky—the man of the hour in Russia. It contains the testament of Lenin and other suppressed documents—candid opinions of Stalin, Zinoviev, Kamenev and Bukharin—the story of the intrigue leading to the fall of Trotsky. It is the exposure by a communist of the present communist oligarchy in Russia. $1.50

BONI & LIVERIGHT GOOD BOOKS 61 WEST 40th STREET NEW YORK, N.Y.

Do You Believe In Evolution?

The Tennessee trial is bringing it to national attention. Several States have taken legislative action. Evolution is at the bar of public opinion. To form an intelligent opinion one must have the latest findings.

THE SCIENCE OF BIOLOGY

By GEORGE G. SCOTT
College of the City of New York

—Just published—is the latest word on the subject. Special sections are devoted to Botany and Zoology, leading up to Man. Clear, comprehensive, authoritative. Profusely illustrated.

600 pages. Net $3.50.
(By mail, $3.65)

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY
393 Fourth Avenue, New York

UPTON SINCLAIR

presents his compliments to The Nation, the most useful magazine now published in the United States.

Steps are being taken to organize the Sinclair Co-operative, to make possible the continued publication of the books of Upton Sinclair. Readers of these books are asked to send a post card for information.

"Mammonart," a study of the world's culture from the point of view of revolutionary economics, continues to provoke controversy. "Upton Sinclair's 384 eloquent, uproarious, sad, wise, noble pages," writes Floyd Dell. Charles Willis Thompson in the "Literary Digest International Book Review": "At last Upton Sinclair has written a good book; and not merely a good book, but a most excellent book, a most admirable book, a most wondrous compound of jazz and depth, of gaiety and scorn, of license and self-government—really a book that quite takes one's breath away. . . . It is of very much moment that Upton Sinclair, after writing tiresome books for so many years, has suddenly produced a revolutionary history of literature written in a manner both jocund and ferocious."

Upton Sinclair has just completed a new play, "Bill Porter," dealing with the story of O. Henry in prison: an expressionist drama, revealing the mental processes of a man of genius at grips with misfortune. There are jailbirds and outlaws, Southern colonels and Texas cowboys, Central American revolutionists and New York shop-girls, Al Jennings and Jimmie Valentine—all the O. Henry pageant of romance, thrills and laughter.

Special combination offer: "Bill Porter," with "Mammonart," cloth, "Plays of Protest," cloth, and the "Sonnets" of Mrs. Sinclair—all for $3.50 postpaid.

UPTON SINCLAIR, Pasadena, California

Dedicated to

"John Thomas Scopes—

Courageous teacher who elected to face squarely the issue that the youth of Tennessee should be freely taught the truths of Science and the fact that these truths are consistent with the highest ideals of religion [illegible]."

The Earth Speaks to Bryan

By HENRY FAIRFIELD OSBORN

President of the American Museum of Natural History [illegible] Author of Men of the Old Stone Age, The Origin and Evolution of Life, etc.

CONTENTS

I. THE TENNESSEE TRIAL.
II. EVOLUTION AND RELIGION
III. A NEW INQUISITION.
IV. EVOLUTION AND DAILY LIVING
V. CREED OF A NATURALIST

$[illegible] at bookstores everywhere

Charles Scribner's Sons, 597 Fifth Ave., New York corresponding biological differentia can only be "excused" if we remember the average biologist's contempt of history.

"Race Prejudice" is a reprint of a work that appeared in the first decade of the present century, but it may still be read with profit. Finot's manner is rather that of the eloquent and idealistic publicist than that of the scientist who has the air of examining his data without knowing until the last chapter what conclusions they lead to. This is not to say that there is not in his book a great deal of telling criticism of the claims made by Gobineau and his tribe for the cultural significance of race, of the supposed differences in the basic psychology of different peoples, of the "Aryan" and "Latin" legends, and of many other exercises in mythology. It is only fair to say, however, that Finot unduly minimizes the biological importance of race.

Mr. Oldham's book is in many ways the most interesting of the four. It is lucid, sympathetic, and admirably free from any taint of bitterness or polemic heat; it exhibits familiarity with the practical aspects of race contact and race conflict and a sufficiently firm control of the biological and anthropological background of race theory—indeed, the chapter on The Significance of Race is the best untechnical summary of the fundamental facts of human heredity that we have seen; and it combines a willingness to see the unpleasant or disturbing facts of the rough-and-tumble world with an obviously sincere and determined Christian idealism.

If anything, Mr. Oldham understands too clearly what are the obstacles that seem to make impossible a simple, sweeping application of the Christian ethic to contemporary and impending race problems. He has no spiritual insight to offer that can burn away prejudice, injustice, political tyranny, and commercial exploitation. The communion of saints in whom color of skin is invisible is hardly more than a verbal formula; it certainly is not a flaming vision. This Christianity of Mr. Oldham's—and we believe it is as sincere a variety as our parliamentary, Protestantized world has to offer—is an exceedingly modest, patient, and well-behaved faith. It is at least as familiar with the interrogatory give-and-take of the committee room as it is with the thunder of the pulpit, the madness of crusade, or the ecstasy of revelation. Perhaps it is ungenerous to expect fervor and the courage of paradox from the guardians of the sublimest and most paradoxical of religious messages, the gospel of Jesus Christ. This is a "reasonable" age, a trimmer's age, in which courage has been surrendered to the limbs and to the angry heart while faith sits frozen and ashamed. The gospel of Christ is not concerned with the philosophy of the germ plasm, nor does it wait on the statistics of intelligence tests for its mandates to become operative. A conditional Christianity will not bring conviction to a world already riddled with inner conflict and skepticism.

"In a church which is conscious of its mission to the world," says Mr. Oldham, "there can be no exclusion or separation on the ground of race. This does not mean that as a matter of convenience members of different races living side by side may not worship in separate congregations. If there are differences of disposition and aptitude between races the genius of each will doubtless find its best expression if the religious life of each is allowed to develop on its own lines. There is nothing in this contrary to the catholicity of the Church of Christ." To quote only this passage, we hasten to add, is not entirely fair to the spirit in which Mr. Oldham's book is written; but the passage is ominously indicative, none the less, of what has happened to the essential gospel of Jesus. A too insistently instrumental habit of thought has tortured this gospel into the semblance of a program buttressed by science and expediency. The gospel itself, smothered by these kindly ministrations, lies either dead or in a state of indefinitely prolonged coma. Only the humblest of incidental services may be expected from its tradition in the solution of race problems.

EDWARD SAPIR

On Current World-Problems

"A fair and judicious presentation of opposing points of view." New York Sun.

The Occident and Orient
By Sir Valentine Chirol

A clear and connected story of the interrelationships, both past and present, of East and West as they affect western civilization today. Through his former position as director of the foreign department of the London Times, Sir Valentine Chirol has had a remarkable opportunity to study the changing relations of the East and West.

"He is well worth reading because he gives an authoritative German point of view, yet is moderate, scientific and lucid." Saturday Review of Literature.

Germany in Transition
By Herbert Kraus

What do the German people think about the Versailles Treaty? about guilt for the war? about the League of Nations? This book describes Germany in transition from war and revolution, a subject of world-wide importance. Dr. Kraus gives a skilful analysis of German problems that cannot fail to help one understand present-day Germany.

"Will do much to give us an understanding of foreign affairs." Boston Transcript.

The Stabilization of Europe
By Charles de Visscher

A logical treatment of the problems of nationality, security, and international communications, problems that are most vital to the moral, political, and economic rehabilitation of Europe. Charles de Visscher brings to this book a wide knowledge of international problems.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
At All Bookstores - - - $2.00 each
From us, postpaid, $2.10 each
5777 Ellis Avenue Chicago, Illinois

The Society for Ethical Culture is entering its Fiftieth Anniversary year.

The Ethical Culture School is about to take a new step in American education.

Five courses are planned, emphasizing a novel pedagogical principle motivated by an ethical ideal.

All subjects in a given prevocational department will be related to their dominant central interest—whether that be business, home-making, art, law, medicine—so that the subjects form one organized body of knowledge. The students will thus bring to general cultural subjects the impetus of special interests and will supplement vocational interests with a cultural background.

The ethical principle will be developed along the line of special application to the vocational problems. Efficiency and material success are not the goals, but rather the kind of life the individual and the group lead on the way to success. The purpose of this school is to help build the bridge from ideals to reality, of technical proficiency coupled with ethical—social and human—purpose. It will be a school of citizenship, defining the chief contribution of the citizen as the kind of influence which he exerts through his calling. [illegible]

Can New York City use business men with this deeper vision? Has it a place for doctors, lawyers, artists, homemakers of this type?

The Ethical Culture School believes that it has, and is planning to erect a long-needed new building in which to house this enterprise.

Contributions are welcome from all those interested in education and in civic betterment. Checks should be made payable to the Society for Ethical Culture School Building Fund, 2 West 64th Street, New York City.

A Lesson for Ladies

Serena Blandish: or The Difficulty of Getting Married. By a Lady of Quality. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.
Mayfair. By Michael Arlen. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

"SERENA BLANDISH" is, as the pseudonym might suggest, cast mockingly into the mold of the classical conte. Mrs. Behn recounted amorous tales in this same grave manner, and Restif de la Bretonne managed through the use of similar means to give to his stories piquancy not wholly in accord with the exemplary lessons in practical morality which they professed to teach. The secret is the secret of deliberate simplicity, of narrative which tells everything while it seems to concern itself only with externals, and it is no easy one to catch. Once caught, however, it furnishes one of the most refined of delights, and it is the form of expression to which sophistication inevitably tends. It is, in part, the secret of assuming that your reader does not need to have explained to him either your point of view or your intentions, and it teaches one to begin not with the exposition of one's philosophy or the elaborate description of a milieu, but thus: "Among all the women who lived in a garden city adjoining the southern docks of London, none was so uncommon as Miss Serena Blandish, a young girl of nineteen to whom nature had given every grace of figure, face, ankle, wrist, and expression." Such is the classical manner, and classicism, as is sometimes forgotten by those who like to explain that its essence is a concern with general nature rather than with peculiar exceptions, can be cynical as well as heroic; for charm of ankle no less than sweetness of character may be assumed as one of the essential traits of a typical young woman.

Serena, heroine of this modern exemplary novel, is a girl whose face and figure are her only fortune, but who is never able quite to realize upon her assets because of too yielding a nature. She has a fresh charm which even green youth can appreciate, combined with a mature experience which only middle-aged roués can value at its proper worth; and, since she is consumed by a wholly unfeigned longing for the security of honorable marriage, she has obviously, according to eighteenth-century standards, the roots of virtue in her. Yet for some reason unknown to herself the men whom she would have propose marriage always propose a little supper in their lodgings instead, and Serena, because she is too modest to seem to set too high a price upon herself and too obliging to deny an agreeable man anything, always goes. Now classicists have always recognized as one of the general traits of the male sex an unwillingness to pay the high price of matrimony for what they can get for nothing; and so Serena, in spite of all those who are willing to make ardent love to her, is left forlornly unwed with nothing to do except meditate upon her tragic defect: "It is, alas, not in my power to refuse any man anything, but how is it that they know so soon how readily they may ask?" The father of the English novel wrote, as every one knows, a great work with the subtitle "Virtue Rewarded" in which he showed his heroine reducing the rake who would seduce her to abject honorableness by exercising her talent for persistent refusal; "Serena Blandish" may be said to point the obverse of this moral. Ladies who cannot say "no" must not hope for more than a second-rate marriage.

Whoever the author of this little jeu d'esprit may be, he is one of the cleverest of contemporary writers, and he has managed by his mastery of the classical manner to produce a narrative in which layer after layer of irony reveals itself to the reader who brings a perception delicate enough to catch it. All the worldly wisdom which eighteenth-century cynicism presupposes is there, and below the surface lies delicately implied the modern criticism of the morality of that same great century. Somehow, and for sufficiently complicated reasons, the injunction: "Always ask to see the wedding ring first and some day you will really get it" does not seem to embrace so satisfactorily

LETTERS OF
ROSA LUXEMBURG
Edited by Luise Kautsky
Letters which tell the story of a brilliant woman's passionate struggle for liberty without ornament or compromise. They reflect one of the strongest and most vivid lives of modern times. Illustrated.
$2.50 net

The Modern American Writers Series
Under the general editorship of Ernest Boyd, there is being prepared a series of studies of the work of outstanding figures in American letters. Three volumes are now ready:
JAMES BRANCH CABELL
By Carl Van Doren
With a map of Poictesme drawn by Mr. Cabell.
$1.00 net
EDITH WHARTON
By Robert Morss Lovett
$1.00 net
THEODORE DREISER
By Burton Rascoe
Ready July 1st
$1.00 net
At All Bookstores
Robert M. McBride & Company, New York

From the first volume of THE NATION

SPECIAL NOTICE TO BOOK-BUYERS

E. P. DUTTON & CO. invite the attention of Clergymen,
Teachers,
Library Committees, and Book-buyers Generally to their large and varied assortment of
STANDARD AND MISCELLANEOUS BOOKS
IN EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE.
They will furnish, gratuitously and with pleasure, any information which Theological,
Medical,
Military, and Scientific Works.
Maps,
Globes and School Apparatus;
Bibles,
Prayer Books,
and Sunday-school Books of the English, French and Continental presses supplied at the earliest Any American Publication sent by mail, on receipt of the advertised
E. P. DUTTON & CO.

And now comes the only change the years require; the address then was in Boston, now at 681 Fifth Avenue, New York.

as once it did the whole scheme of female virtue together with the rewards appropriate to it. Actually, none of the more exalted reasons which have been subsequently urged in favor of continence are so demonstrably sound as this one; but the fact remains that we are not quite classic because we cannot help thinking it at least a little bit funny. If Mrs. Behn had written the story of Serena she would probably have made it considerably more scabrous, but she would never have perceived the irony of its moral.

In "Mayfair" Mr. Michael Arlen has managed somehow to display at full length all his vices as a writer and to conceal completely the virtues which in some of his books, particularly "The Green Hat," deserved the acclaim which they received. Trusting wholly to the exuberance of his style he has allowed himself to concoct the most absurdly meretricious stories and then permitted his manner to sink to the level of his matter, with the result that whereas he was once brilliant he is now merely showing off. "Mayfair" obviously challenges comparison with "Serena Blandish," since both books are intended to be sophisticated satire upon contemporary society; but once the comparison is suggested Mr. Arlen's book is revealed as hopelessly inferior. Long-winded and extravagantly mannered, it never achieves by a whole paragraph the effect of any one of a hundred phrases in the anonymous tale, and it sinks more than once to the level of intolerable silliness.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

In the Solomon Islands

The Threshold of the Pacific. By C. E. Fox, with a preface by G. Elliot Smith. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

THIS work forms the seventh volume of "The History of Civilization," edited by Mr. C. K. Ogden, and is one of those volumes not represented in the parallel French edition of the series. Indeed its appearance in a set of general treatises is intelligible only from its connection with a distinctively British theory of culture history—the well-known pan-Egyptological scheme of Professor Elliot Smith which was ultimately accepted by the late Dr. Rivers, who stimulated and directed Dr. Fox's ardor as an investigator of primitive life. Otherwise there would be no justification for singling out a descriptive account of one of the Solomon Islands from corresponding monographs on hundreds of other regions.

The reader will do well, however, to ignore Dr. Fox's association with a particular school and to enjoy his record of observations. As Goethe said of Byron, so one might say of Dr. Fox: "When he reflects, he is a child." He is quite capable not only of accepting his anthropological friend's interpretations—that is natural enough—but of regarding as real the legendary people known to the natives as kakamora. Considering that these were sometimes described by his informants as straight-haired pygmies from 4 feet 6 inches to 5 feet in height, their existence would be sufficiently interesting to physical anthropology. But in the chapter specially devoted to this race of men we learn that in San Cristoval they average six inches, yet have the strength of three or four men; that they have no arts, weapons, houses, clothes; that they live in the clefts of rocks and sometimes attack men with their long sharp finger nails and even eat them. It is not surprising to gather that Dr. Fox has never seen any himself and that the kakamora actually captured or seen at close quarters by "trustworthy witnesses" are always "about the size of small men, not much smaller than the pygmies of Bugoto or New Guinea."

It should be noted that when the author confines his interpretations to historical relations within Melanesia he scores excellent points. Thus he is undoubtedly right in identifying the masked dancers who impersonate ghosts to terrify the children as an attenuated form of the Dukduk and Tamate societies of New Britain and the Banks Islands respectively, and there are other features characteristic of Melanesia.

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE

EXTENDS 60th ANNIVERSARY CONGRATULATIONS TO THE NATION

The Crisis

A Monthly Magazine

69 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York

Published by

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Devoted to the Interests of the Negro Race

Congratulates THE NATION on its SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Though there is an astonishing variation in the social organization of the several districts of the small area of San Cristoval, the clan division with maternal descent made familiar to us by Dr. Fox's precursors in Melanesia recurs in this island as well; in the district of Baure there are moieties; and bird totems are at least prominently associated with the clans.

Probably it is the chapters on religion that will make the widest appeal. Here again the reader versed in the older authorities on Oceanian ethnography will recognize long-standing acquaintances. The mena (pp. 100, 252) or magical power that is imparted to an object by blowing upon it or that is ascribed to a great warrior—nay, to the club he wields—is nothing but Codrington's mana, a concept widespread in Polynesia as well as in Melanesia, and according to many writers the most basic principle of early religion. Similarly, incantations of the kind so prominently interwoven with every phase of aboriginal life in New Zealand and New Guinea are not less potent in the estimation of the San Cristoval aborigines: every craft had its hereditary spells, without which the technical manipulations—weaving, e. g., or canoe-building—could not be properly carried out.

If the account of supernatural beings is not altogether clear, the fault lies largely in the inconsistency of the native classification. Dr. Fox attempts to correlate their figona and adaro with Rivers's spirits and ghosts respectively; but, like the classifications of grammar, that of the Melanesians is highly capricious and mocks at academic logic-chopping. For by no means all adaro are ghosts . . . there are those of the sea and woods and other natural phenomena, not all of whom are supposed ever to have been ghosts. Incidentally, the weird native drawings illustrating these beings are among the most interesting features of the book. Foremost among all supernatural beings is a figona named Agunua, who is represented as a winged serpent and figures as a creator of the world and man.

Enough has been said to justify the claim that the reader will be rewarded by a capital description of conditions rapidly approaching extinction. Unstinted praise must be given to Professor Elliot Smith for having effected the publication of so specialized a piece of research.

ROBERT H. LOWIE

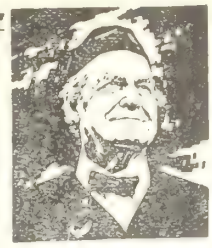
Pure Political Philosophy

Studies in the History of Political Philosophy. By C. E. Vaughan. Longmans, Green and Company. 2 vols. $14.

THIS is, granted its standpoint and method, a most valuable and suggestive work. Professor Vaughan takes the outstanding political thinkers since Hobbes and analyzes with infinite patience and exactness the systems they represent. The analysis is so made that there is combined with it criticism of a high order; and there will be few readers who do not rise from the study of these volumes with greater knowledge and more richly stored minds.

It may perhaps be useful to warn the reader what he is not to expect. There are, in the first place, two great gaps; the treatment of Rousseau—to Vaughan the greatest of all political thinkers—is to be found elsewhere in his magistral edition of Rousseau's political writings, and there is no treatment of the Utilitarians. This last omission is particularly unfortunate since Vaughan himself belonged to the school of T. H. Green; and an indication of the grounds of his dissent from his opponents would have been of great value.

Nor, it should be added, does the work constitute history in the rigorous sense of the word. The studies are arranged in chronological order; but that is all. What Vaughan attempted was the analysis of certain abstract systems of ideas. He did not attempt to place them in historical perspective; he did not inquire into their relationship with the works of contemporaries; he did not even seek to seize the relationship between the thinker and his environment which is so often the



What Are They Thinking?

Freedom of thought will soon be on trial in Tennessee.

The fighting forces of the anti-evolutionists can no longer be ignored. Whatever one may think of their theories, it becomes imperative at least to understand their point of view.

The Commoner is their accepted spokesman. In the July FORUM Mr. Bryan tells just what he is thinking and reveals the working of a mind convinced that the theory of evolution is absurd. This article is by way of answer to PROFESSOR HENRY FAIRFIELD OSBORN'S challenge in the June FORUM on behalf of the evolutionists.

The Literary Editor of THE FORUM, who has recently returned from a trip to the scene of battle in Tennessee, contributes interesting observations upon the impending trial of J. T. SCOPES, indicted under the anti-evolution law of Tennessee for teaching the biology of evolution. THE FORUM predicts that MR. SCOPES will be found guilty and fined $100.00.

The publishers will enter introductory subscriptions —4 months for $1.00—and while the limited supply lasts a copy of the June issue, containing PROFESSOR OSBORN'S article, will be included without extra charge.

FORUM

JULY

On all news stands, 35c.

247 Park Avenue, New York

the best exponent of Jewish culture of the present day."—

THE MENORAH JOURNAL

In the Current Issue:

NAPOLEON AND PALESTINE.....Philip Guedalla
GOMPERS: SYMBOL OF AN ERA.....Sylvia Kopald
PHARISAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.....R. Travers Herford
IS BIALIK A GREAT POET?
YES.....Reuben Brainin
MODERN SYNAGOG ARCHITECTURE.....Lewis Mumford
SIX SKETCHES (Art Insert).....Jules Pascin
ZALMEN THE CONTRACTOR (A Story).....David Pinski
NOTES FOR A MODERN HISTORY OF THE JEWS.....E. E. C.
THE ADVERSARY'S NOTE-BOOK.....H. BEN-SHAHAR

Please enter my subscription to The Menorah Journal for main clue to his ideas. The results, accordingly, need to be judged by scholars who can themselves supply these missing items. We cannot really judge Hobbes save in the background of the Civil War; we cannot, either, really understand him unless we adjust the "Leviathan" to what Aubrey tells us of him in his delightful sketch. And that must lead us to seek to measure the influence upon him of Bacon, who was the pupil of Bodin, who was the pupil of Machiavelli. We cannot explain the marvelous success of Locke unless we think of him as only the most successful of a whole host of writers who were saying the same thing as he, though with less pungency. Vaughan's angle of approach did not allow him to assess these things. The result is, I think, that his book lacks the sense of movement. The ideas become free of those conditions of time and place which gave them birth: and, for example, he is led to blame Hegel and Fichte for professing doctrines which were the quite natural views of men who were passionately anxious for German freedom.

Something, also, in criticism could be said of Vaughan's philosophy. Much of it, I believe, is due to the meaning he pours into the terms he uses. Vaughan was a professor of literature and not an administrator. Accordingly he does not think, as an official would think, of state action as, in daily fact, something done because President Coolidge or Harry Daugherty has ordered it to be done, but as something done in the name of a mystic entity whose minds and hearts and wills are bound into the action achieved. That is, in fact, mythology; and I do not think it is even edifying mythology. It gives to actions of the state a prestige to which they are not entitled. It omits to notice that, a priori, those acts are neutral in ethical substance until we know their intent and consequence. The neo-Kantianism Vaughan so eloquently expounds is, I think, deceptive just because it sweeps into the ambit of its terminology consent and authority to which, if we patiently unravel the facts, it is not entitled.

All of this is not to say that Vaughan's book will not be invaluable to the student. His exact knowledge of his text enables him to help even the closest inquirer into these problems. He had a mind which was sympathetic and generous. If on occasion that tempts him into substituting eloquence for thought, the occasions are rare. It is a tragedy that he did not live to give his book final form. But every scholar will be grateful to his friends for raising to him this noble memorial.

HAROLD J. LASKI

The Sociological Invasion

Sociology and Political Theory. By Harry Elmer Barnes. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE famous battle of Jericho, it will be remembered, was won not by massed frontal attack but by the subtler strategy of circumambulation. It will also be remembered that the besieged Jerichees made unholy sport of the circumambulators. But in the end the walls of the city fell; and they who, throughout their parading, had turned the other cheek to the cat-calls of the foe marched in and solemnly trod on the necks of the scoffers. In like manner, a generation ago, the high lords of political science and political philosophy stood on the ramparts of their city and poked unmerciful scorn at a motley crowd that had streamed up out of the slums of the earth. Sociologists the latter called themselves; and they looked as queer as their name. "Those shoddy brethren take possession of us?" laughed the aristoi tes politikes. So, detailing a few outposts they went back to their metaphysical discussions of sovereignty and of the limits of state interference. But the sociologists began their march—a quiet, polite march at first, nothing menacing; till they began to strike up a little with their charity organization jazz bands; a little louder with their family budget bazoos; and finally, loudest of all, with their statistical socio-psychological toot-horns. It has just been told in this book how the walls of

The Staats-Zeitung and Herold for ninety years the leading newspaper in America printed in the German language with a circulation of more than 100,000 daily and 110,000 Sunday.

A Unique Record

60 years ago WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY was commended as The Greatest Literary Work of the Age.

Today WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL Dictionary—The latest MERRIAM work—is The Supreme Authority

It is the standard of the Federal and State Courts. The standard of the Government Printing Office. The standard of nearly all the schoolbooks. Indorsed by every State School Superintendent.

Regular and India-paper editions.

Universally recommended by Statesmen, College Presidents, Educators, and Authors. Adhered to as standard by over 99% of the newspapers. All States that have adopted a large dictionary as standard have selected Webster's New International.

The above cannot be said of any other dictionary.

50 years ago this announcement appeared in THE NATION:

WEBSTER'S NEW DICTIONARY WITH 3,000 ILLUSTRATIONS

Greatest addition to Philology in Half a Century.—The most important contribution to Philology, during the year 1864, was the publication of the illustrated edition of Webster's Quarto Unabridged Dictionary. This work, which had long been in preparation and on the revision of which years of labor had been bestowed by several eminent scholars, was, in many respects, the greatest addition to the philology of the present age which has appeared within half a century.—Appleton's Cyclopædia for 1864.

More Valuable than Treasury Notes.—How that old cynic Sam. Johnson would have revelled through Webster's massive new Unabridged. How he would have gloated over its magnificent letter-press and its illustrations, beautiful as new Treasury notes, and much more valuable to the student. The Merriams have incurred a fabulous expense in having the whole work rewritten, reset, recast and republished. It is not a mere revision, but a reconstruction. To insure excellence in typography, it comes from the Riverside Press, which is all that need be said about its mechanical execution. It is a marvelous specimen of learning, labor, research and taste. It is by far the greatest literary work of the age.—Baltimore American.

Sold by all Booksellers. Published by G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

(Prospectus)

2,700 pages
6,000 illustrations
407,000 Vocabulary Terms
12,000 Biographical Entries
32,000 Geographical Subjects

Write for specimen pages of both India-paper and Regular edition.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO., SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

For over 80 years publishers of the Genuine Webster Dictionary.

THE INVENTION OF PRINTING IN CHINA AND ITS SPREAD WESTWARD

By Thomas F. Carter

Head of the Department of Chinese in Columbia University

The great art of printing, "Mother of Progress," and its forerunner, paper making, were invented and extensively used in China for centuries prior to Gutenberg's invention in Europe. Professor Carter, after three years of research, comparing the Chinese written records with archaeological evidence in European museums, was able to trace for the first time the course of printing from China to the west. This is the world's authoritative book on this practically unknown subject. Thoroughly illustrated with photographic reproductions of the first book, first printing and first type, and with graphic charts. Complete with reference notes, bibliography and index. Ready July 10th. Price, $7.50.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

2960 BROADWAY NEW YORK

THE WOMAN'S PRESS

600 Lexington Avenue New York, N. Y.

FOLK SONGS OF POLAND 75 cents

Illustrated from FOLK SONGS OF JANA LEVSKY

Edited and Compiled by FLORENCE HINKLE BALTZELL

The glory of Poland is in its music. . . . It is just as necessary to the daily life . . . of the peddler . . . the goose-girl . . . the wandering violinist . . . the tailor . . . the blacksmith . . . and the children . . . as is the bread that they eat. . . .

Civilization may in time do away with the simpler arts of men, but the spirit of these songs will live on, heritages of the Polish nation. . . .

—from the Foreword, by Eric P. Kelly.

Other Reprinted Sections Are

FOLK SONGS OF CHINA AND JAPAN	$0.75
FOLK SONGS OF LATIN AMERICA	.75
RUSSIAN FOLK SONGS	.75
CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR SONGS	.50

"In Mr. Allen is met a poet of great breadth of thought coupled with unusual strength and originality." N. Y. Times

Just Published

Earth Moods

By Hervey Allen

Wherever Books Are Sold. $2.00

Harper & Brothers, Publishers

See Harper's Magazine for Announcements of the better Schools and Colleges.

A Thought-Provoking Series of Discussions for Open Forums

CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP AMONG THE NATIONS

A Series of Discussions on International Relations which bravely faces controversial questions and evades no issue of fundamental importance.

By JEROME DAVIS and ROY B. CHAMBERLIN

"Each discussion is introduced by actual incidents, and which . . . because they are true happenings . . . are much more appealing and thought-provoking than any statement of abstract principles could possibly be.

We have examples of the war-inspired prejudice which leads professedly Christian people to condemn wholesale the population of erstwhile enemy countries . . . the warping of news in order to create hatred . . . the barring from Christian activities of Negroes, Jews, Japanese . . . and even sensible reasonable attitude of the many questions that [illegible] in general!

It is good to see a pamphlet issued for study of the international implications of Jesus' principles and spirit, which neither evades crucial issues nor presents its material in a one-sided manner."—The World Tomorrow.

Stout Paper Covers, 25 cents

Library package for the use of the leader containing supplementary pertinent material, $1.50. Send for a returnable set today.

14 Beacon St. Boston — CONGREGATIONAL PUBLISHING SOCIETY (THE PILGRIM PRESS) — 19 So. La Salle St. Chicago that older political science began to tremble; how, in the end, they fell; and how the despised sociologists marched in and routed the last—or almost the last—defenders from their bulwarks of abstraction.

One needs to be reminded that this actually happened. It makes the whole enterprise of social and political thinking far less a matter of tag-ends and tatters to know that something radically transformative has occurred; that the point of view and technique of a basic social science have changed. The typical older political science, in brief, no longer exists. Its concepts have been so riddled by the apparently innocent observations of socio-psychologists that they have no force today; they are simply pathetic.

So the state no longer exists as "a single unique entity existing alone in a circumambient void," to quote Cole's ironic phrase, nor as the "perfected rationality," the "eternal and necessary essence of spirit" of Hegel, but rather as a tentative, growing, compromising, functional organization of fairly ordinary and more than fairly unintelligent human beings. So "sovereignty" is no compulsive metaphysical principle handed down by God into the austere hands of Austin et al.; it is seen to have been, for the most part, a rather shoddy, man-made defense of the dominant interests. So "liberty" and "individual rights" are no longer "pure ideas," discussable in abstracto; they are conditions, more or less realizable, in lives subject to all kinds of psychological and environmental obstruction. So the state is no longer, in legalistic spirit, regarded as a policeman set up to guard the innocent and clap the guilty into jail; it is rather an imperfect but improvable organization for adjusting the conflicting interests of groups. So it is only in the backwaters of political intelligence that the national state is regarded as final and inviolate; the national state, like everything else that really lives, is only a stage in an evolution. So also that curious misobservation of Montesquieu's about the "division of powers" has come to be discounted; so the hoary classification of states into monarchies, aristocracies, etc., has given way to classifications grounded upon the interplay of human nature; so the mythologies of race superiority, etc., except in the stagnant regions of prejudice, have been transformed into critical ethnological and psychological analyses.

The primary value of Mr. Barnes's book lies in the fact that by marshaling before us in a remarkably accurate and comprehensive way the wide and intricate work of sociologists he is able to produce a vivid sense of the extent to which the older metaphysical views in politics have been effectively undermined. This is a very real service. Most of us read one or two or a half dozen books on social problems. We get, let us say, the slant of Lippman, or Wallas, or Follett, or some one else. But for the most part we are quite ignorant of how these particular views fit into the larger enterprise of socio-psychological thinking. We fail to realize the extent to which the many diverse, often conflicting views have contributed to a very basic reorientation in the field of social and political thinking.

Mr. Barnes, however, is not the kind of sociologist who believes that the sun began to rise only on the first of January, Anno Comte-iensis. He gives credit wherever in older centuries the essential sociological spirit and technique have manifested themselves. That spirit and technique have lain in the attempt "to analyze the social process as a whole" rather than to abstract parts of it into independent, self-enclosed entities. In the United States he finds this more comprehensive kind of analysis to have been retarded chiefly by the ascendancy of the lawyer type of mind, the "aristocracy of the robe"; but here again his book has value in calling to our attention the powerful present-day sociological trends as exhibited in such men as Gierke, Maitland, Duguit, Pound, Freund, Goodnow, and in such judges as Harland, Holmes, Brandeis, Hand, G. W. Anderson, Cardoza, and others.

There is only one suggestion we should like to make with regard to Mr. Barnes's book. Save for references here and there, it omits consideration of the field of economics, in which DURING its sixty years of progress and enterprise The Nation has seen remarkable changes wrought in American Shipping. In 1865 the volume of American vessels employed in foreign trade aggregated 1,602,583 tons; today there are about 17,000,000 tons of ocean-going shipping under the Stars and Stripes. Graceful clipper ships still mingled with the early types of steamers in the harbors of the world; over ten days were required for the passage from New York to Liverpool, and the announcements of the dates of sailings were qualified by the inclusion of the phrase "As tide serves." Today we have 50,000-ton liners; then, shipping men were discussing the possibilities of the construction of a 5,000-ton ship. During the past sixty years The Nation has kept pace with all these changes and has led the way in the promotion of the finest principles of American ideals.

A true picture of the transformation that has taken place in American shipping during the past fifty-four years has been recorded in the pages of

The Nautical Gazette

America's Oldest Shipping Weekly

—Founded 1871—

20 Vesey Street New York

This Building of the Garrison Realty Co. is the fourth home of The Nation.

It also houses the New York Evening Post, the Nautical Gazette, the Banks Law Publishing Company and many other concerns.

Why not place your business under this roof?

A business is known by the company it keeps. There are a few offices to rent.

Apply Superintendent,

GARRISON REALTY CO.

20 Vesey Street

New York City

much the same kind of subtle undermining has been taking place, with important bearings upon political theory. It is to be hoped that a companion volume will before long appear in which the same comprehensive marshaling of views will be carried out and the same stimulating sense given of a fundamental and perhaps even more important reorientation taking place among economists. H. A. OVERSTREET

Censored Recollections

Things I Shouldn't Tell. By the author of Uncensored Recollections. J. B. Lippincott Company. $4.50.

THE more or less anonymous author—"sweet, hectic babe," he calls himself—of "Uncensored Recollections" has been persuaded, not against his will, to write a second book about things that are generally not worth telling. To speak precisely, he did not write either book, but "gave the material to a friend, who not only put it into shape for the press but introduced some anecdotes and matter of his own." It is clear, therefore, that the "author," whoever he may be, has led a consistent life, for in his old age he toadies in literature as he has toadied for some sixty years to a curious collection of celebrities, most of whom were not worth knowing.

He tries his best to be very correct, very nice, and withal rather naughty. His desire "to be accurate; and to avoid, even in my gossip, anything resembling the blague of the boulevardier . . . to be lenient and generous" is constantly thwarted by his enormous zest for decorous scandal. He piously comments that he could tell some things "quite unfit for publication," but of course he won't; then, with the strangely perverted morality that always distinguishes minds of his type, he exudes this bit of innuendo: "He [Lord Charles Beresford] delighted in calling the Duke of Edinburgh 'darling Mathilda' for reasons I cannot chronicle, but which referred to midshipman days." With goatish glee he chuckles over memories of the time when he—sweet, hectic babe!—slept in ladies' bathrooms, played a noble part in dozens of ignoble episodes, and reveled in "the most delicious wine I ever tasted, except perhaps Yquem Lur Saluces." He gloats over country house parties at which "when the ladies began to ascend the stairs to go to their rooms, they would be pelted with all kinds of articles of a more or less intimate, personal, or domestic character: socks, pants, jerseys, pyjamas, would come floating down from above; brushes, combs, boots, etc., etc., come rattling about." But when he speaks of persons who publicly flouted all the accepted canons of morality he becomes deliciously moral. "I never spoke to Wilde; his appearance was quite enough for me." "I have referred to Raymond Seillière as a scoundrel. He certainly was all that . . . he had a hideous passion for ruining poor little helpless girls."

Of all the persons who fill his crowded canvas, the Prince of Wales and Swinburne are most entertaining. The Prince, it appears, "was very well read, and he appreciated anything that savored of literary knowledge—if used lightly, of course, and with nothing of the Précieux about it—in general conversation." When the author noted with deep concern that the fair-skinned Prince was becoming very wrinkled he performed the only constructive piece of work that he ever did. "I knew the real reason; he was in the habit of washing his face with soap. . . . Now, soap on the face is a mistake." He gently hinted the awful truth to the Prince, who thenceforth, it seems, led a soapless and unwrinkled life. As for his "dear friend, squirming, hand-wringing, red-haired little Swinburne," he "knew him intimately." Once an American widow, "very rich, from Cincinnati," came to the poet, determined to conquer or die: "she threw herself at him with all the vigor with which her late spouse had packed pork." Gazing fervently at Algernon, "with a very wicked look in her eyes [she] would read to him some of his naughtiest lines:

> Ah, sweet, one sin worth sinning
> With all the whole soul's will."

Our New Store

JUST a few steps west of Fifth Avenue, on Forty-Seventh Street, you will find the splendid new Brentano Store.

We extend to you the invitation to take those few steps to visit us—to see for yourself what we believe to be the most modern Book-Store in all the World.

In fact, the only old note that remains is the Brentano standard of Service—maintained for over 71 years.

BRENTANO'S

Booksellers to the World

1 WEST 47th STREET

Phone: Bryant 5700

Branch Store — 5th Avenue at 27th Street

Sixty Years from Now
What Ideas Will Prevail?

THE WORLD TOMORROW

is a journal which sees Tomorrow's World in the making now, and points out each month some of the half-hidden milestones along the road.

One dollar a year

By Special Arrangement with The Nation

THE WORLD TOMORROW and
THE NATION—$5 a Year

THE WORLD TOMORROW
[illegible] East Ninth Street
New York City

For the enclosed $..... please send THE WORLD TOMORROW for the next twelve months to Name .....

Address .....

and so on, till the frightened poet fled in complete dismay.

As one finishes this book, one would like to know more about certain people. Prince Constantine Radziwill, for instance, who "was a most extraordinary man; deathly pale (I never saw a man with face so white—that is, a live one) and for the most part mute—listening, bowing his head, but hardly ever speaking, and, when he did, only saying 'Oui' or 'Non' or 'Parfaitement.'" In certain moods one would even like to know more about that "complete dinner set in Sèvres china made for the Regent Philippe d'Orléans—everything, every plate, every dish, even the salt cellars, erotic and obscene." But perhaps one eventually will know more; for in one place the author remarks that he once "said something very grotesque to His Royal Highness (I remember very well what it was, but am reserving it for the Christian World)." Subscriptions to the Christian World are now in order.

R. F. DIBBLE

Music

The Bach Festival

THE Nineteenth Bach Festival at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, held on the week-end of Decoration Day, was greeted this year with double joy. The extended illness of Dr. J. Fred Wolle which resulted in the cancelation of last year's concerts had caused many to fear that the Eighteenth Festival, in 1923, was to be the last. The thought that Dr. Wolle might not again conduct had led some of us to appraise the prospect of the Bach Choir without him. Its continuance would, of course, be impossible.

If we were called upon to find a successor to Dr. Wolle we should look in the first instance to the great cities where many men conduct Bach. But what can these men bring to Bethlehem, these men who squeeze Bach into the occasional afternoons not occupied by their symphonic engagements, American tours, or European visits as guest conductors; and who face from the podium an orchestra drafted from the opera house and singers rehearsed by a chorus master? The Bach Choir prepares for its Festival from October to May. Frankly, the gentlemen from the cities cannot be bothered.

They will say, doubtless, that the finer voices and the better trained minds with which they work would make eight months of rehearsal unnecessary, even if city life made them possible. And though the gentlemen might not express it they would add the thought that eight months' study of a single composition on their part would be supererogatory. I suppose Dr. Wolle would be the first to admit that his chorus is not a galaxy. I imagine he has often wished that he could have such a group as the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto to work with. How much greater their beauty of tone! Dr. Wolle's tenors upon a forte entrance tend to bawl; Dr. Davidson's Harvard boys would always sing purely. Yet when the Mendelssohn Choir sang several choruses from the B Minor Mass Dr. Fricker tore them through at such a breathless rate that the audience was left dizzy; and the Harvard Glee Club singing Cum Sanctu Spiritu could produce nothing but a blur of sound.

These and similar incidents must make Dr. Wolle smile. Apparently it does take eight months—and eight months through many years—to instil a conductor's thoughts even into sophisticated minds. And even more apparently it takes many times eight months for a leader to penetrate far enough into the complexities of the Confiteor (probably one of the most terrific choruses ever written) to have any thoughts to instil.

And if the Bach Choir is hopelessly out of what the haberdashers call the New York manner, is some other town which boasts a community chorus going to supply Dr. Wolle's successor? The question almost answers itself. The timidity which offers only sentimental banalities even in communities like those which partook in the recent Westchester County

Two WORLD CRUISES on the beautiful
RESOLUTE
(Queen of Cruising Steamships)

THESE cruises visit Hawaii, Japan, China, the Philippines, Borneo, Java, Singapore, Burma, Ceylon, India, Egypt, Italy, Algeria (or the Riviera), and Madeira. Duration 3½ months.

An expert management looks after all travel details afloat and ashore. The service and cuisine, combining the best American and European features, are world renowned.

The Resolute is an ideal ship for cruising. Spacious and luxurious, yet with a homelike atmosphere. Swimming pool, ballroom, and other attractive features, including the freedom of foreign registry.

From New York
OCT. 24, 1925

From San Francisco
FEB. 9, 1926
Los Angeles, Feb. 10

Rates $1,500 and up including shore excursions.

Inquiries invited. Illustrated booklet on request.

UNITED AMERICAN LINES
(Harriman Line)

[illegible] Broadway, New York 177 No. Michigan Ave., Chicago
181 State St., Boston 260 South 15th St., Philadelphia
87 St. James St., Montreal 574 Market St., San Francisco or local steamship and tourist agents.

Evolution, Social and Organic

A seventh edition of this most useful work by Arthur M. Lewis has just been printed. It exposes many of the fallacious arguments leveled against the Darwinian theory. It expounds the historic process of social evolution, showing the real causes of human institutions. It explains the points of departure between these two great fields of evolutionary thought as well as their points of contact. An eye-opening book. Cloth, 60c postpaid.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
5 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

MEXICO

The American public is once more keenly interested in the affairs of our Southern neighbor due to the utterances of the Secretary of State Kellogg, published and commented by the leading journals and the statement of the President Elias Calles.

Business men and investors are specially concerned as to the conditions of Mexico. Many of them are dealing with that country and cannot realize why impending changes are forecasted as everything looks promising if one is following the developments of the policy of the new Administration.

From the induction into power of President Calles up to a few days ago everybody was optimistic on the outcome of Mexico by reason of the frequent reports regarding the sound policy, the plan of economy and the working out of the platform of the present ruler. Statesmen in the United States and in Europe were elated and reassured of the rehabilitation of a country so long disturbed and apparently settled after the successful suppression of the last revolt enhanced and supported by the large land owners, the reactionary elements and certain greedy foreign elements.

Now the excitement caused by the so-called controversy between the Secretary of State and the Mexican President has greatly subdued and better feeling is shown everywhere. Further and immediate developments will no doubt demonstrate that Mexico follows its destiny according to her own ideals and is trying to fulfill all obligations for the benefit of her own people and the foreign interests cooperating to her development.

For illustration we are giving some accurate data showing the true financial status of Mexico.

BUDGET

According to official figures the Budget for 1925 is about 286,399,372 Mexican dollars expenses and the income taken as basis the Federal Revenue, about 290,000,000 Mexican dollars, which leaves a surplus of several millions. Nevertheless, it has been stated officially and publicly that since General Calles assumed his post as President there has been a sharp cut in the expenses amounting to 40,000,000 Mexican dollars, besides the payment of salaries due to Federal employees amounting to nearly 12,000,000 Mexican dollars and the debt to Merchants estimated in 11,000,000 Mex. dollars. It is calculated that by the coming September after paying to the merchants 3,000,000 Mex. dollars more, the Mexican Government will have in its Treasury a sum of 50,000,000 Mex. dollars. The present Administration has paid 2,000,000 Mex. dollars of a loan made to De la Huerta.

Since April 1st, the stamp revenue on checks, drafts and notes, as well as other documents, has been suppressed. This measure has received a hearty approval by the bankers and business men.

The Federal income in recent years has been:

GENERAL INCOME

1920	$256,734,090.62
1921	298,398,772.10
1922	285,017,576.55
1923	256,259,122.63
1924	270,796,238.70

TAXES ON OIL PRODUCTION

1920	$45,479,168.16
1921	50,604,049.35
1922	58,374,155.66
1923	42,152,722.48
1924	38,952,735.65

TAXES ON OIL EXPORTS

1920	$
1921	12,120,455.08
1922	27,605,988.85
1923	18,382,916.86
1924	15,669,256.45

The Consulate General of Mexico in New York has collected $2,946,037.66 American Currency, it is an average of $589,207.53 American Currency per month.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY

The amount of imports to Mexico in the year of 1924 was 321,315,824.00 Mex. Currency corresponding to the United States the sum of 233,193,644.00 Mex. Currency or about 75%. The remainder was imported from England, Germany and France.

The American imports during the first three months of this year were 76,750,000.00 Mex. Currency, showing an increase of 40% compared with the same period in the previous year.

The exports of Mexico into the United States during the same periods amount to 106,260,000.00 Mex. Currency, which is 43% more than in the first quarter of 1924.

The development of the oil industry in Mexico is on the increase and conditions are very satisfactory according to the reports of the American press.

The Department of National Statistics reports that on the first three months of this year there were coined at the Mint 7,780,000.00 Mex. Currency, of which 5,200,000.00 were gold coins and 2,580,000.00 Mex. Currency in silver coins.

RAILROADS AND HIGHWAYS

The National Railroads of Mexico have been reorganized by the Department of Communications and Public Works. The personnel was greatly reduced and wages readjusted in such manner that the operating cost is now reduced by 30,000,000 per annum, and in a short time the system will be on paying basis.

President Calles being aware of the great need there is in Mexico for highways signed a decree for the building of national roads, which once completed will aid considerably to the commercial, agricultural and industrial development of the country. The highways to be built are: Mexico-Laredo; Mexico-Acapulco; Arriaga-Tuxtla Gutiérrez, and others of lesser importance.

OBLIGATIONS AND PAYMENTS

According to the agreement De la Huerta-Lamont, the obligations of the Mexican Government amount to $508,830,777.00 American Currency, including the debt of the National Railways of $243,734,777.00 American Currency.

The payments of the National debt were discontinued last year due to the revolt headed by De la Huerta, but the present Administration is endeavoring and making all efforts to resume it. To the effect all steps advised by a sound policy are being taken.

The Treasury of Mexico has issued drafts to the Financial Agency of Mexico in New York, from April, 1922, to this date, for the payment of $6,454,602.05 American Currency. Of this sum remain unpaid only the amount of $443,160.94, which will be settled on the coming month of August.

A definite plan for the establishment of a National Bank of issue has been completed, and it is expected that such financial institution will start to operate to January 1st, 1926, with a capital of 75,000,000.00 Mex. Currency. This Bank will render a valuable service for the stabilization of finance in the country.

President Calles desires to see his country entirely rehabilitated at the end of the first year of his Administration, or shortly after. Then Mexico, with the service of its national debt resumed and paying all its internal obligations, building roads, promoting industry, enforcing the Agrarian laws firmly and with the less possible friction, and giving to both national and foreign citizens full protection, will see an era of prosperity if it continues to receive the cooperation of unselfish American interests.

music festival is not going to furnish a substitute for the passion, devotion, and insight of the Moravian organist who, unterrified by the curb-stone cry of "highbrow," has given a community an intimate affection for the great, and taught it to give it forth greatly.

A performance such as that of the Christmas Oratorio this year will make the new visitor feel keenly the deficiency of the Bach Choir: when Dr. Wolle permits individual members of the Chorus to assume the solo parts he discloses too clearly how commonplace and naive many of the voices are.

The Oratorio itself is a work of exceedingly uneven interest. Bach's librettist has as if deliberately avoided every dramatic element of his story, depriving the composer of the opportunities which he has seized so eagerly in the Passion Musics. The most pleasing number, the Cradle Song of Mary to the infant Jesus, Bach had previously used in a quite secular work, "The Choice of Hercules," performed in honor of the Prince of Saxony; and the charming symphony opening Part II has its counterparts in the Brandenburg Concerti. With so large a field of choral works to explore, Dr. Wolle would do better to constitute his Friday programs of motets and short cantatas, in which his choir has appeared to greater advantage.

In the performance of the B Minor Mass the deficiencies of the chorus vanish before a perfection of training, a devotion of spirit, and an understanding guidance that make Bach's magnificent patterns transparently clear and show forth that greatest depth of feeling which a truly rich soul can evoke through a severe and formal medium which it transcends and bends to its purpose—a feeling more satisfying than that aroused by nervous splashings of tone color or emotional wallowing in free developments. This satisfaction is one which the wise will secure for themselves while Dr. Wolle continues in his present restored vigor; and while the problem of his successor is still, I hope, a remote one.

CHARLES S. ASCHER

All Russian Union of Agricultural Cooperatives

SELSKOSOJUS INC.

2 RECTOR ST., NEW YORK

Moscow Office:
Selskosojus, B. Dmitrovka 4, Moscow

Suppliers of Tractors, Agricultural Implements, Binders, Twine and Seeds for Producers' Cooperatives in the Soviet Union.

Distributors of Raw Products Furnished by member cooperative organizations.

AFFILIATED ORGANIZATIONS:
Central Flax Growers' Association.....(LNOCENTR)
Union of Dairy Cooperatives.....(MASLOCENTR)
Union of Potato Growers.....(SOJUS KARTOFEL)
Union of Fruit Growers.....(PLODOVINSOJUS)

THEATRE

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE 466 GRAND ST.
Every evening except Monday, 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

DAVID BELASCO presents
Holbrook BLINN Judith ANDERSON
in
"THE DOVE"
By Willard Mack
Empire B'way, 40th St.
Eves. at 8:20.
Matinees Wed. and Sat., 2:20.

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

A Civilized Picture of Uncivil People
BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK
Intelligently Directed by James Cruze
CRITERION B'way & 44th 2:40 TWICE DAILY 8:40 A Paramount Picture

The Nation Press Printing Company INC.

has printed this publication since 1907

The Nation type forms go to press at noon Tuesday. The entire issue is printed, bound, and mailed by 5 P. M. Thursday.

A day and night staff, automatic presses, and a complete bindery make this possible.

When in need of a similar service, communicate with

THE NATION PRESS PRINTING CO., INC.
57 New Chambers Street, New York City
Telephones: DRY Dock 3400-3401-3402

OFFICERS
President, ARTHUR F. REQUA
Vice-President, JOHN E. WEISS
Secretary, JOHN MCGILVRAY
Treasurer, AMOS H. BARNETT
Assistant Treasurer, ALBERT E. BOCKELMAN

AMTORG TRADING CORPORATION

165 BROADWAY - - - - NEW YORK

Sole representatives in the U. S.

of

Gostorg (State Export and Import Bureau) of the RSFSR, Moscow

Gostorg of the Northwestern Region, Leningrad

Ukrainian Gostorg, Kharkov

Transcaucasian Gostorg, Tiflis

White-Russian Gostorg, Minsk

All the leading industrial and commercial organizations and combinations in the Union of SSR.

and

Arcos Ltd., London

Exporting to the Union SSR:

Agricultural machinery and implements

Electrical machinery

Technical equipment for industries and transport

Drugs and chemicals

Office materials

Objects of general use, etc.

Importing from the Union SSR:

Furs and hides

Bristle, horsehair, wool, casings, and other animal products

Hemp and flax

Peasant art and handicraft productions

Medical roots and other raw materials

MOSCOW OFFICE: KUZNETZKY MOST 14

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

Contributors to This Issue

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD has been editor of The Nation since 1918.

HUGO GELLERT'S portrait sketches have appeared in the Liberator and the New York Sunday World.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW is George Bernard Shaw.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY was managing editor of The Nation from 1918 to 1920, and is now professor of economics at Wellesley College.

CARL VAN DOREN, author of "Contemporary American Novelists," "Many Minds," etc., was literary editor of The Nation for three years.

BERTRAND ZADIG is a young German artist living in New York.

S. FOSTER DAMON is the author of "William Blake."

H. W. NEVINSON, associate editor of the New Leader and author of "Changes and Chances," etc., is a veteran of the British press.

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD was the first Labor Prime Minister of England.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES is one of the editors of the Measure.

EDOUARD HERRIOT was premier of France from June, 1924, to April, 1925.

COUNT HARRY KESSLER is president of the German Peace Society. He was minister to Poland in 1918, and lecturer at the Williamstown Institute of Politics in 1923.

PLUTARCO ELIAS CALLES has been president of Mexico since September, 1924.

SINCLAIR LEWIS, author of "Main Street, "Babbitt," and "Arrowsmith," reported for The Nation the political conventions of 1924.

ART YOUNG has drawn political cartoons for the Masses, the Chicago Tribune, the Metropolitan, Good Morning, Life, and The Nation.

H. L. MENCKEN is editor of the American Mercury.

ERNEST GRUENING'S series of articles, concluded in this issue, was written after his return from Mexico in January. He is now on the way home from another visit in Mexico City.

JOHN A. HOBSON is a British author and economist, and a contributing editor of The Nation.

COUNTEE CULLEN is a young Negro poet who was graduated this year with honors from New York University.

MAX EASTMAN, formerly editor of the Masses and the Liberator, has lived abroad for three years, mostly in Russia.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD has published two volumes of verse: "For Eager Lovers" and "From a Hawaiian Hilltop."

EDWARD SAPIR is a member of the staff of the Victoria Memorial Museum in Ottawa.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is The Nation's critic of drama and fiction.

ROBERT H. LOWIE is associate professor of anthropology at the University of California.

HAROLD J. LASKI, formerly of the Harvard faculty, is on the teaching staff of the London School of Economics.

H. A. OVERSTREET is professor of philosophy at the College of the City of New York.

R. F. DIBBLE is the author of "Strenuous Americans" and "John L. Sullivan: An Intimate Narrative."

CHARLES S. ASCHER is a New York lawyer.

In order to make room for important special articles

The International Relations Section has been omitted from this issue. It will appear as usual hereafter.

Allied American Corporation

Alamerico

IMPORTERS U. S. S. R. EXPORTERS

Operating Under

Agreement with People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade, of the Union Socialist Soviet Republics, dated July 14th, 1923

HOME OFFICE
165 Broadway, New York, N. Y.
"DEILAMERCO"—NEW YORK

RUSSIAN HEADQUARTERS
4 Kuznetzki Most, Moscow
"ALAMERICO"—MOSCOW

EUROPEAN BRANCHES

LONDON
56 Moorgate
"ALLIAMERIC"

PARIS
51 Rue de Paradis
"ALAMERICO"

BERLIN
Augsburgerstr. 47
"ALLAMERICO"

RIGA
Sanstrasse 15
"ALAMERICO"

REVAL
Harju Bank Bldg.
"ALAMERICO"

RUSSIAN REPRESENTATIVES FOR

Ford Motor Company
U. S. Rubber Company
American Tool Works Company
Norton Company
Heald Machine Company
Sprout Waldron & Company
Manning Abrasive Company
Clemson Bros. Company
Cushman Chuck Company
U. S. Machinery Company
Cincinnati Milling Machine Company
Champion Spark Plug Company
American Rolling Mills
Union Twist Drill Company
Goodell-Pratt Company
Greenfield Tap & Die Company
American Rule Mfg. Company
Richardson Scale Company
DeVry Company
Waterman Pen Company
J. T. Slocomb Company
Nicholson File Company
Parker Pen Company
Black & Decker

IMPORTERS OF RUSSIAN PRODUCTS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 8, 1925 No. 3131

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 55
EDITORIALS:
Tennessee vs. Truth 58
"Young Bob." 59
Wayward Genius 59
Freckled Boys 60
IN DAYTON, TENNESSEE. By Howard K. Hollister 61
DEEP WATER RUNS STILL. By Silas Bent 62
WILL RUSSIA RETURN TO CAPITALISM? By Harry F. Ward 64
THE FARMER GOES INTO BUSINESS. By Frazier F. Peters 67
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 68
CORRESPONDENCE 69
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Lovers of Happiness. By Edward Sapir 72
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 72
"Sam Slick." By George M. Wrong 72
Religious Psychology and History. By Woodbridge Riley 73
From the German Past. By Ernst Feise 74
The Importance of Being Earnest. By Emery Neff 75
Cave of the Winds. By Joseph T. Shipley 75
The Saint and Love. By Alice Beal Parsons 76
Books in Brief 76
Drama: Two Revues. By Joseph Wood Krutch 77
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The French War in Morocco 78
France's Treaties in Eastern Europe 80
Child Labor in China 80

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

WILL ECONOMIC CONDITIONS at home force sense into the European chancelleries? Ironic as it may seem, Europe's chief hope of peace today lies in her poverty and in the rise of unemployment. England's Tory Ministry, talking of a break with Russia and threatening reprisals against the Chinese, is brought up short by the demand of Scotch fishermen that they be helped to sell their herring in Russia and by the effects of the Chinese boycott on British goods. The Ministry is faced too by the high tide of unemployment. At the beginning of this year fewer than 100,000 miners were idle. Each week since then has seen new stoppages; today 200,000 miners are out of work, and the total unemployment figure has risen to 1,250,000—the worst record since the early days of post-war deflation. France, too, has her troubles. Caillaux, her miracle man of finance, has discovered no royal road to solvency—only higher taxes and more short-term notes. The radicals are complaining that his new taxes fall more heavily on the poor than on the rich; and no one has yet begun to face the question of financing the dragging war in Morocco. As this week's International Relations Section shows, there is violent protest in France against this war, and a well-grounded suspicion that Marshal Lyautey deliberately provoked Abdel Krim's attack. To make peace now would mean a harsh blow for the "prestige" of the French empire in Africa; but how else can France buckle her budget together?

THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF CHINA cables from Shanghai demanding that the United States cooperate with the other Powers in adopting "a strong attitude" toward China. China, its resolution says, should be held "strictly accountable for all losses of life, property, and business" (a new kind of claim!) due to the present situation. The American Chamber of Commerce of Hongkong cables its protest against Senator Borah's suggestion that extraterritoriality be abolished. Thus the business men stumble blindly along the historic path of bloody imperialism. Since publication of our editorial of June 17 we have been informed on the best authority that the international bankers grouped in the so-called Chinese consortium have not only brought no pressure to bear on our State Department to use force to protect American property interests in China but have even on occasion warned the Department that they believe such use of force likely in the long run to prejudice American interests. That is financial statesmanship with a long look ahead. We hope that the vision will not falter and that the example will spread. But with China four years in default on British and American loans totaling about $25,000,000 and on other American obligations amounting to almost as much, and six months in default on the Four-Power (not Six-Power, as we stated on June 17) Hukuang Railway 5 per cent loan of 1911 ($7,500,000 of which was floated in this country by a syndicate headed by Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co.) angry pressure by investors for "immediate action" and "a strong attitude" is a constant danger.

CALVIN COOLIDGE IS AFRAID—afraid of what other people may say about him, and even of what he says himself. That is the only possible interpretation of his attitude toward the reporters who meet him every week. It has long been the accepted, if ridiculous, rule of official Washington that when the President talks with the reporters he must not be quoted. Every week we read dispatches reporting "opinions of the White House" "an official spokesman," "authoritative quarters"; and everyone who knows Washington knows that what is direct quotation of the President's replies to the correspondents' questions. That is America's curious substitute for the question-hour in the British House of Commons. Instead of [illegible] we leave it to the newspapermen. Of these half-concealed interviews [illegible] ers, if their own notes were inadequate, had recourse to the record. That custom prevailed through the Wilson and Harding administrations, and under Mr. Coolidge until his famous indiscreet reference to M. Jusserand and the Debt Commission. He got out of that by denying that he had said what every reporter knew he had said; and since that day the official stenographic record has been discreetly nonexistent. The reporters, still pathetically eager for accurate truth, thereupon had stenographic records made for themselves. Now Mr. Coolidge has ordered that practice discontinued. Why—unless because he is afraid of truthful reporting of his own words?

WHEN GERMANY'S SUBMARINE WARFARE entered its final and most acute stage in the winter of 1916-1917, and the merchant ships of the Allies were armed to meet it, the question arose whether they did not thereby lose their status as non-combattants, becoming warships. A large body of opinion held that they did, while another group maintained that the exceptional character of submarine warfare justified unusual measures. As a matter of history, though, Great Britain undertook to arm merchant vessels long before submarine warfare had become a danger. Sir Bertram Hayes, who retired last year from the service of the White Star Line, was in command of the Olympic when the war began in 1914. In "Hull Down" (the story of his life recently published by Macmillan) Captain Hayes tells what happened on the first trip the Olympic made to New York after hostilities had begun:

> For some reason or other best known to those who were responsible for putting them on board, four six-inch guns were mounted while we were in dock, two at the forward end of the ship and two aft, and nucleus crews of naval ratings disguised as merchant seamen were shipped to work them with volunteers from my crew to fill up the complement. I protested against this as I considered the presence of the guns would be an added danger to the 2,000 or so United States citizens I was to embark for passage to New York. There was no talk at that time of submarines sinking passenger ships, and I understood that the armament was supplied to the ship for the purpose of defending her from any German raiders we might meet.

"HELLO, PIRATE!" said a naval officer who came on board on sailing day, as he glanced at the armament and saluted the captain of the Olympic.

> That was the last straw [writes Captain Hayes], and I burst out with: "Yes, that is exactly what they have turned the ship into—a pirate ship—but if anybody thinks I am going to be so foolish as to fire the guns if we meet a raider when I have 2,000 Americans on board they are making a big mistake. I wouldn't do it even if Winston Churchill ordered me to."

"Had we been unlucky enough to meet a German raider on our way across the Atlantic she would, to my mind, have been perfectly justified in opening fire on us as soon as she saw we were armed," Captain Hayes goes on to say. No such encounter occurred, but when the vessel reached New York the guns were called in question.

> The United States Government took exception to the forward ones being on board, as according to them they could only be there for purposes of offense, and only defensive guns were permitted by international regulations to enter a neutral port. The question to be decided was whether we were to be allowed the customary twenty-four hours to coal or be interned during the rest of the war.

The Olympic was not interned, and while negotiations went on in Washington there was time to discharge her cargo and load another. The vessel was finally allowed to depart, with the understanding that the offensive guns were to be removed before another trip to New York. They were.

GENERAL BEN H. FULLER, returning from Haiti on June 17, was incautious enough to say to a reporter for the New York Times:

> Contrary to the general impression the marines are not in Haiti on any general mission of sanitation or civilization. We are simply there to prevent the overthrow of the regularly constituted Government.

That is refreshing honesty. We are in Haiti to maintain in office an unpopular and unconstitutional Government, which could not hold office for a minute without the support of the American marines. American marines dissolved Haiti's legislature in 1916 and have not permitted Haiti to hold an election since. All the blather about uplifting the natives which the Marine Corps publicity man spreads so copiously through the Sunday papers is, as General Fuller admits, sheer whitewash. We are there, in fact, to make Haiti safe for the $30,000,000 loan which we forced on her in 1921. Major General John A. Lejeune, commandant of the Marine Corps, followed General Fuller with another announcement. The withdrawal of the marines was remote, he said, although the original occupation force of 3,000 had been reduced to 1,200, and would be down to 800 by October. Simultaneously, the State Department revealed that the ten-year treaty forced on Haiti in 1915 had been extended in 1917 for another twenty years—which, by a natural coincidence, extends American control of Haitian customs for almost the precise period of the American bankers' loan. The marines are not in Haiti, as General Fuller says, for any altruistic reason. They are there to serve American financial interests.

ELMER SMITH, who served as attorney for members of the I. W. W. in many prosecutions on the Pacific Coast, admires both the lumber-jack and the mule; but, he says, he has greater admiration for the mule, who when he has worked eight hours will not lie down and starve to death if there is plenty of food in the next field. Because of this expressed preference, the Supreme Court of Washington has recently sustained Smith's disbarment as an attorney. As evidence against him were used old I. W. W. song-books seized in a Portland hall in 1917 (although Smith is not a member of the I. W. W.), his speeches about the mule and the lumber-jack, and other speeches in which he advocated a general strike for the liberation of the eight men convicted in the Centralia murder trial. Smith, who was made a co-defendant in the Centralia trial, was acquitted; but the conduct of the case so outraged him that he has since spent his small personal fortune in appeals for amnesty. Two members of the Washington court could not see that Smith by this conduct violated his oath to support the Constitution and the laws, and expressed a dissenting opinion. It is noteworthy that the acts charged against Smith were supposed to constitute violations of the criminal-syndicalism law, but he was not indicted under that act—that would have involved a jury trial, which is not required in a disbarment proceeding. It is also interesting that the secretary of the Federated Industries of Washington (an open-shop organization) in his annual report last year stated that "the Federated Industries extended assistance in securing evidence for the prosecution."

SMITH'S DISBARMENT is a symptom of a spirit more dangerous to American institutions than rhetorical indiscretion—even assuming, with the majority of the court, that Elmer Smith permitted himself a latitude of phrase inconsistent with his attorney's oath. This dangerous spirit is broad only in its conception of the relevance and meaning of evidence offered against a person whom, on other grounds, it is desired to punish. A lawyer in a neighboring State was suspended for six months when he was found guilty of helping a "respectable" mob physically oust I. W. W.'s from his county. The difference between that sentence and Smith's disbarment is symptomatic of the state of justice in parts of the West. The true reason for Smith's disbarment was, of course, distinct from any pretext which his injudicious free speech afforded. It was to punish him for energetic professional services to I. W. W. clients and to make it hard for such clients, in future, to feel that they could get fair protection in their "day in court."

UPTON SINCLAIR'S pen is tireless in its war upon autocracy, commercialism, and humbug. Seldom judicial, Mr. Sinclair is nevertheless a gallant and useful fighter. He never wearies and never sleeps, and wherever he sees a wicked head he hits it. Between broadsides of heavy artillery, when other men would use the moments to rest, he picks up a rifle and does a bit of sniping like the following letter recently addressed to the Los Angeles Examiner:

> My attention is caught by an editorial in this morning's Examiner headed Bigotry and Bunk. You very justly reprove a teacher in New York for wishing to suppress modern ideas in the schools, and you say: "Fortunately, in Los Angeles we have a Board of Education, just re-elected, that answers to the homely but eloquent description of being level-headed."
>
> I agree with your judgment upon the New York teacher, but I am afraid that you flatter Los Angeles. Are you aware of the fact that for the past four or five years the school board of Los Angeles has barred from the libraries of the high schools both The Nation and the New Republic—which I find the two most useful magazines now published in the United States? If the Examiner is really interested in educational freedom and common-sense in Los Angeles, will it not take up this issue in an editorial? I look forward with great hope to seeing this action upon your part.

We do not know whether the Examiner printed this letter or not. We imagine not. Anyhow, to make sure that it sees the light, we print it ourselves.

MANY PEOPLE who claim to believe in modern education still shake their heads sadly when it is seriously proposed to permit children to develop naturally and creatively. "What," they ask, "is to become of such children when they must face the crippling realities of our straitjacketed society? How can they, trained under conditions of freedom, adapt themselves to the restrictions and tyrannies of present-day life?" This question was naturally raised at the second annual conference of the Manumit Associates, held at Pawling, N. Y. A. J. Muste, of Brookwood Labor College, proposed that graduates of the Manumit School might be saved from the "abyss" that awaits the child trained in freedom by working under the liberating influences of the labor movement. James Maurer, of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, felt that Manumit children would be "a healthy sprinkling of the brighter minds" so sorely needed in the rank and file of union members. All this is true, and labor's support of the Manumit type of education is the wisest possible statesmanship. Children who are given an opportunity to develop creatively, to deal early with realities and solve real problems, can be trusted later to grapple intelligently with larger social and industrial issues. Instead of adapting themselves to tyrannies they may set about removing them —which is perhaps what those who shake their heads over modern schools like Manumit fear most of all.

A CHAIR OF BANKING and finance has been endowed in Western Reserve University by Henry P. McIntosh, a Cleveland financier, which > shall teach as a fundamental principle the inviolability of both personal and property rights—that even-handed justice holds invested capital sacred and honorably and righteously entitled to a fair return based upon amount and risk involved; that to labor belongs a reward commensurate with its contribution to the conservation and welfare of the enterprise enjoying it, this being the true conception of an ideal society favoring neither capital nor labor, but giving to both that share which their ability and effort respectively justify.

Capital should get "a fair return based upon amount and risk involved," but it is not "sacred." It is accumulated labor at its best; and it should come behind labor, which not only produced it but without which it has no continuing value. A provision like the one in connection with the endowment of this chair is typical of and normal to the business world of our topsy-turvy modern industrialism, but it has no place in any university which hopes to serve the democracy of the future or the honest scholarship of the present. Robert E. Vinson, the new president of Western Reserve, has a chance to align himself with the cause of free education by asking that the terms of the gift be redrafted.

THE NEW YORK COMMERCIAL publishes Report No. 13 in its File No. 19 (indexed for financiers who keep scrap-books) on the Wheeler Defense Committee. Under this name, it says, "one must infer . . . the American Civil Liberties Union hopes to conceal its Socialist and Communist connection and find a way both to secure a little ready cash and 'bore from within' organizations where its work has not been effective in the past." It prints the membership of the committee, including Jane Addams of Hull House, Peter Witt, William Allen White, Samuel Untermyer, and a row of distinguished lawyers, clergymen, authors, and professors. The Commercial comments: "Very few are men or women who have done anything constructive in this country." One wonders what the Commercial considers constructive. Obviously not Senator Wheeler's own work of merely saving the nation from a gigantic robbery by high officials.

HAVELOCK ELLIS thinks that good spelling is rather an uninteresting vice of modern civilization. He preferred the individualistic orthography of the parents of his Bushmen students to the correct versions of the school-taught children. Possibly he may think good proof-reading another vice. And possibly not. One little letter overlooked may make a tremendous difference. There is the tale of the obituary of a New England spinster, which concluded with the pious remark "Lord, she was Thine!" The typesetter ran out of e's, and the final letter was omitted, with disastrous results. Last week many of our readers must have smiled to read, in the editor's tribute to Mr. Godkin, the strange sentence "I do not believe that he ever rendered a fine service to America." It should, of course, have read "finer."

Tennessee vs. Truth

WHEN the prosecution of John T. Scopes, teacher of biology in the Dayton high school, is begun on July 10 it ought to be cried out by the court clerk as the State of Tennessee vs. Truth. For the trial brings to a head the attempt of a great commonwealth to determine science by popular vote, to establish truth by fiat instead of study, research, and experiment.

Not that Tennessee stands alone. Unfortunately, it has plenty of company. Tennessee just happened to be the first State to pass a law designed to prevent the teaching of the doctrine of evolution in its publicly supported schools. Kentucky missed passing a similar law by one vote, while only the upper house of the Texas Legislature prevented such legislation going on the statute books. There are restrictions upon teaching evolution in Oklahoma and North Carolina, and a campaign to that end is under way in California. All over the South and West there is agitation with a similar purpose.

Why the South and West? Merely because those sections are primarily rural and the anti-evolution movement has its springs in the small towns and the back blocks. Its champions are mostly among our much-praised native-American stock. They are the people who are generally held up as the safe-deposit vault of our ancient national virtues, but actually—all too often—a people bled white by the migration of their best individuals to the great cities. They distrust schools which are better than their own. They have been deprived of the vigor they brought into the world and left without leadership, a fine soil for fundamentalism, the Ku Klux Klan, and other manifestations of superstition and ignorance.

The campaign against evolution—against the scientific method—is only part of a larger movement clearly discernible since the close of the World War. On the one hand, there is the growing tendency to regulate all human existence by law—including opinions and personal habits. Coupled with it is a reaction of fear and obscurantism against the intellectual renaissance that began about the time of, and was greatly influenced by, the European struggle. Our tendency to resort to legislation for all purposes is overwhelming our courts and bringing law of all sorts into contempt. The number of cases in our federal courts is more than double what it was ten years ago, while most of our State tribunals are likewise loaded down with increasing pressure. As to our intellectual renaissance, there is a great deal said about the illiberalism that has come in the wake of the World War, but it is sometimes forgotten that this is not merely an arbitrary habit formed during the long years of restriction but still more a counter-action set up against the new ideas and new technique that rose splendidly from the ruins. In Russia and in China, throughout the Old World, the Great War led to a great political and economic awakening; in America, more or less, coincident with and determined by that conflict, we have seen the rise of a new poetry, fiction, and drama. Only a fraction even of our intellectual leaders have read this new literature. But everybody has read about it. They have heard—and believe—that it is blasphemous and indecent. In fear and panic they seek to preserve their ancient customs, their old beliefs.

The first act of fear and panic was the attempt during and just after the war to ward off new political and economic ideas by passing "anti-sedition" and "anti-syndicalist" laws and by trying to hound "radical" and "red" teachers out of the schools. Then the victims of fear and panic sought to save the old-time patriotism by attacking the critical spirit of some of the school history-books. Finally came the defense of the old-time religion through the campaign to suppress the doctrines of evolution in the teaching of science. The important question is not whether the doctrines or theories which these laws seek to suppress are true; it is whether it is ever possible or desirable to determine the content of teaching, to attempt to define truth and suppress error, by law.

To the trial in Tennessee newspapers all over the country are sending special correspondents; a great blare of publicity resounds. But it is not certain that anything of much importance will be accomplished there or in higher courts. Many people think that Mr. Scopes has clearly violated the law and must inevitably be convicted in Dayton, but that he will win eventually on appeal to the higher courts on the ground that the law provides for the interpretation of science according to a particular religious belief. It raises directly the issue of freedom of religion by providing that no theory shall be taught in State-supported educational institutions which "denies the story of the divine creation of man as taught in the Bible" or states that mankind "has descended from a lower order of animals." Thus it is reasonable to hope that whether or not Mr. Scopes is acquitted in the Dayton trial the Tennessee anti-evolution law will be condemned.

But no decision of the Dayton or a higher court will resolve the problem. The Nation, as its readers know, is opposed to the continual nullification of the popular will by the courts, even in a direction which it approves. Truth cannot be established by vote of the courts any more than by vote of the legislature. In the end, a sustained public opinion will have its way. We can hardly question the right of any people to decide how and what the youth in its schools shall be taught. We ought to contest not the right but the wisdom of any limitation which prevents the teacher from presenting all sides of every question, of opening up for the young mind every possible avenue to truth. In this day it ought not to be necessary—but it is—to argue for the scientific method, for the right to research and experiment, with the fearless publication of the findings to all, in school or out. Any other course will take us straight back to the Middle Ages, when scientific truth was determined by vote of ecclesiastical councils and the wisdom of Greece and Rome was lost amid casuistry, obscurantism, and the Inquisition.

Thus the case of the State of Tennessee vs. Truth will not be settled by legislature or courts. It is rather a challenge to our churches and our educators. It is, above all, a challenge to the intelligence and the leadership that center in our great cities and an indictment of a civilization that sucks into them the best, materially and morally, that the nation produces—leaving the rest of the country bankrupt and then expressing ridicule and surprise at the consequences.

"Young Bob"

THE special election to choose Senator La Follette's successor has been postponed until autumn, and various editorial writers conclude that the prospects of Robert La Follette, Jr., are thereby diminished even as the "emotionalism" which would probably insure his election now will have diminished. This view is based on the natural misconception that "young Bob's" claim to the senatorship rests largely on his being his father's son and that his selection by the Wisconsin voters would be a sentimental tribute to the statesman whose name is so imperishably linked with the great midwestern commonwealth. Americans properly view askance any effort to make public office hereditary; New York State voters managed to distinguish between the Theodores, father and son. And while neither two months nor two decades will dim Wisconsin's reverent admiration for the late Robert M. La Follette, it will be well if the interval strips the election of any sentiment other than the aspiration to pick the man best fitted to perpetuate his ideals.

The choice of La Follette's successor of course transcends any ordinary special election. Wisconsin, the Wisconsin of La Follette, has been for a generation an experimental workshop for progressive democracy, a pioneer among the States, a symbol of that vigorous trail-blazing Americanism which we like to associate with the basic concepts of this republic. Upon La Follette's political heir will devolve in large part the duty and responsibility of preserving and further developing the Wisconsin idea. It is inestimably important that he be to the highest degree steeped in its tradition, with the qualities of head and heart to hold together and strengthen the national movement to which it has given birth.

For this reason it is desirable that there be no misconception concerning the qualifications of "young Bob" to fill the seat occupied for eighteen years by his father. For ten years, while officially his father's secretary, he has been also a comrade in battle, a collaborator and counsellor. His responsibilities and the burden of work were unusual. Senator La Follette represented far more than his own State. He was the leader of national movements; spokesman throughout the Union for the seamen, the farmers, the city workers. He was often away from Washington, for his political sagacity showed him the necessity of constant personal contact with his constituents. He did not fall into the error of Progressives like "Mose" Clapp and "Joe" Bristow, whose immersion in their task at the capital allowed their political enemies to undermine them at home. So for considerable periods "young Bob" held the fort in Washington.

The decision to launch a Progressive candidacy last summer was made hopelessly late—at the close of the Democratic convention. Funds and organization were totally lacking. Everything had to be done at once without time or means. Senator La Follette's physical condition was alarming—"now it can be told"—and much of what was done, and left undone, emanated from that overshadowing fact. His ill-health caused the postponement of his speaking tour till mid-October and the cancelation of the Pacific coast schedule—the doctors forbade his crossing the high altitude of the Rocky Mountain plateau. During this period of stress "young Bob" bore the brunt of all criticism, unflinchingly served as buffer for his father, took the responsibility for virtually every important decision, became unofficially but actually the leader and manager of the Progressive campaign. Prodigiously energetic, unfalteringly enthusiastic, sound in reasoning yet quick in decision, always unassuming, he managed somehow to keep together a host of heterogeneous and disparate elements. His cheerfulness was a constant inspiration to every campaign worker. If any man possesses the qualities of leadership it is thirty-year-old Bob La Follette. His father entered Congress even younger, and few Senators after a whole term in office know Washington's problems and pitfalls as well as he. None other in the Progressive group of Wisconsin could speak both for the State and for the nation as effectively.

Wayward Genius

IT was Remy de Gourmont who pointed out the fact that wayward genius is not so much accepted by succeeding generations as carefully regularized by them. Cervantes sets himself against imaginative idealism, but he appears in this day as merely the satirist of depraved romances; Rabelais, celebrating the animal man, has his great work explained away as chiefly a plea for intellectual liberty; Molière, arch-enemy of culture for women, did not mean, so we are assured, to poke fun at any except ridiculous pretenders; and so it goes.

In America conspicuous talent has not tended to be wayward, but the history of the reputation of our most outstanding embarrassing genius—Edgar Allan Poe—follows the regular course. Hated and neglected by his contemporaries, he has been elevated step by step until he now appears as our greatest imaginative writer; but the price he has had to pay for a bust in the Hall of Fame is the complete sentimentalization of his story. A fierce, bitter, and at times utterly malicious wrangler with his contemporaries, he has been gradually softened by his biographers until he appears not the violent controversialist which he was, but the patient recipient of all the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune which he did nothing to provoke. The quarrel with Rufus Griswold, which he certainly appears to have provoked, is generally told with such an abundance of righteous [illegible] against his opponent as to completely disguise his own not too honorable part in it; his envious and wholly unjustifiable [illegible] against Longfellow has been soft-pedaled to the point of inaudibility; and the element of definite pathological morbidity—the element which alone has kept his stories from going to oblivion along with the works of Horace Walpole, Mrs. Radcliffe, and Charles Brockden Brown, to whose school he belongs—is generally left unmentioned.

Not seldom one hears people speak of Poe as though his chief claim to fame were the fact that his detective stories and his critical theories had, respectively, conferred upon us the doubtful boon of the Sherlock Holmes detective stories and the modern correspondence courses in the fabrication of the short story. Thus the busts erected to his memory do not so much celebrate him as they celebrate a censored and regularized legend of a man who was not, in reality, respectable enough to be tolerated in the same rotunda with Susan B. Anthony and Henry Ward Beecher. And, strangely enough, his intemperance has been of the greatest service in this process of regularization. It was, actually, rather a symptom of his neurosis than a cause, but, since Alcohol has become a convenient embodiment of the root of all evil, it has been possible by a discreet reference, made with lowered voice, to suggest that whatever the defects of his temperament they were chargeable entirely to the bottle which the Eighteenth Amendment had, unfortunately, not yet banished.

By a strange irony, his most devoted admirers have usually been those who were temperamentally least inclined to take a realistic view of either life or letters, and it is quite fittingly unbefitting that the prize recently offered by the English Poetry Review for the best poem upon him should be won by Edwin Markham, who, whatever his merits, is very distinctly the thing which Poe despised most —a didactic poet. Unfortunately it cannot be said that the poem in question is likely to take its place along with "Adonais" and Swinburne's elegy upon Baudelaire as one of the very few great poems addressed by one poet to another, but we shall quote what seem to us the best of the twenty-six stanzas published in the New York Times:

> He sought his dream-love there by many names
> Of beauty and of wonder and of peace—
> Lenore, Legeia (burning like pale flames)
> Morella, Berenice.
>
> He trod high chambers lit with ruby light,
> And heard in the hush the ghostly arras stir,
> And stir again, in the deep and secret night,
> With memories of her.
>
> He knew the demon's whispers in the deep,
> And songs of deathless love where seraphs are:
> He saw the cliffs of time, a ghostly heap,
> But over the cliffs a star!

Freckled Boys

HUMAN beings are so pitifully alike in New York and Sauk Center, in Berlin and Shanghai, in Paris and in Fez, that it is sometimes hard to understand the ease with which war lies and propaganda make their evil way. Yet behind the swallowing of atrocity stories is a kind of pathetic loyalty to one's kind. It is easy to believe ill of the stranger; one knows one's own countrymen to be very like oneself. The truth seeps through slowly.

Three weeks ago The Nation referred to the incidental admission of Lieutenant General Robert L. Bullard that the French Moroccans took no prisoners, and that on occasion Americans had "loaned" the Africans some German prisoners. A former American army officer, "one who volunteered before draft and served upwards of nineteen months in the United States army, but nevertheless does not feel that one side of the war ledger was all black and the other white," calls our attention to an article in the June, 1925, issue of Scribner's Magazine. There Captain John W. Thomason, Jr., U. S. A., frankly reports that his soldiers did not wait to "loan" their prisoners to Moroccans. In the heat of battle they bayonetted the prisoners themselves. He reports one freckled underling confiding to his father that he had "shot up a few" of his "damn Heinie" prisoners; and later "the freckled boy saw his brother killed and went himself quite mad among the wounded and the corpses with his bayonet." There is more of the same.

The freckled lad was probably no worse than his fellows. Boys went quite mad and did horrible things in all the armies in those days when blood was cheap and men were honored for their success in killing other men. The officer did not reprimand the boy who came to him in the heat of battle and confessed that he had murdered prisoners; how could he? He told him to "come along." And so, when shells were pounding about him, and machine-guns spitting, and men dying every minute, any officer of any uniform would almost certainly have done. That is war. War, not anything peculiar in his national makeup, sent that boy, and thousands of other boys, mad. In the fierce tempests of battle the pitiful laws of war fade, and men do brutally the brutal thing they are there for—they kill, they murder as many of the enemy as they can. Why not? What is war for? But when the next war comes (or the next threat of war) and the George Creels begin to bombard us with tales of just such freckled lads among the enemy—but tales adorned, torn out of their human setting so that the boys appear monsters—shall we understand them as we understand Captain Thomason's American orderly; or shall we forget what we have been learning, and attribute the mistakes to some inhuman factor in their national blood?

General Bullard tells us a little of the way he helped such freckled boys to make mistakes. He complains that "the average American soldier" always met his hate-tales "with a considerable amount of incredulity, for the simple reason that in his association with the Germans in the United States he had not seen the cruelty and frightfulness." So the general "published to the troops during a long period of preparation and training every recent instance of German frightfulness and cruelty that came to [his] knowledge"—rumored or true, we may safely add. And then he remarks:

> More powerful and of wider reach as a hate-maker was the impression produced by the President's far-published idea that the war was nothing else than a life and death struggle of democracy, on the side of the Allies, against autocracy, on the side of the Germans. Though I could never so see it myself, nor divine its truth from the origin of the war, it was nevertheless a catching idea. It was widely heard in the press and had a great effect among all the Allies and especially among Americans as something American, proposed by an American. Altogether the hate-making produced some effect upon our men.

It did not matter whether the idea was true or not; if it would help stir men to fight and kill, it was a good idea to spread. Anything that would help make hate was good. And that, too, was war.

When The Nation was founded sixty years ago Northerners believed of Southerners much the same things as Americans were thinking of Germans seven years ago (when The Nation took on its new lease of life)—much the same things as we shall soon be believing of the Chinese if events take their natural course and the Great Powers use their armed forces to "establish order" and "preserve liberty," or whatever phrase they use to cloak their imperialistic crusade. When Captain Thomason writes affectionately of his own American men, incidentally revealing that they, too, were guilty of "atrocities," we can almost sympathize; we can at least pity. Cannot we include other people, built of the same human cell matter, within the range of our understanding, and center all our hatred upon the thing that turns all men to beasts—war?

In Dayton, Tennessee

By HOWARD K. HOLLISTER

WE reached Dayton at midnight, and were stopped by a deputy sheriff with a flashlight and a shotgun. A man with a bleeding face was with the sheriff. He had been assaulted by a drunken man, who had fled in a car. Convinced that we were newcomers, the sheriff allowed us to go to the hotel. This hotel is called the Aqua, named no doubt in honor of the delicious water which bubbles from springs everywhere in this beautiful hill country. The Aqua is an American Plan hotel of the kind that has practically disappeared from the East—a place where you get the best the land affords for a flat daily rate. Breakfast starts at seven, dinner is at twelve, and supper at six. At about quarter to seven in the morning the clerk comes and knocks on the doors to announce breakfast.

The farmhouses in these East Tennessee hills have a home-like look. Stetson felts are plentiful, and countrymen carry sticks. The soil produces large crops of strawberries and other fruit, besides corn and potatoes. It is said that Dayton shipped more strawberries than any other town in the United States this year. Through the length of Rhea County, in which lie Dayton and Spring City, flows the Tennessee River, navigable from Knoxville, through the Big Bend in Alabama, past Muscle Shoals and up to its mouth in the Ohio at Paducah. Goods can be shipped from Knoxville to New Orleans on the river, but due to low water and rapids only light draft steamboats can negotiate the upper stretches. There is much talk in Dayton about the Government building dams to improve commerce on the river.

When the proposition was made a month or more ago to commercialize the evolution trial, the Progressive Dayton Club considered and finally rejected it. There was a faction that wanted an outdoor stadium built, where the trial could be conducted like a county fair or a circus, but the temper of the Dayton people was against it. As an officer of the Progressive Dayton Club expressed it, "We have a fine chance here to put Dayton before the world in a favorable light, and we don't want to lose it by doing anything that might cheapen the town." The city of Dayton has remained true to its conservative decision. No prices have been raised. The spirit is entirely one of friendly hospitality. "We want everybody who comes to Dayton to learn the truth about Dayton," says the cashier of the bank. The citizens greet each newcomer with a smile and a handshake, and invite him to sit down in one of the chairs which line the sidewalks outside the stores.

If one settles in front of Robinson's drug-store, where the now famous conversation that led to the indictment of Scopes took place, one hears nothing but opinions on evolution. In such a gathering I found myself the morning after Darrow spoke. The secretary of the arrangement committee of the Progressive Dayton Club was voicing the views of "our side"—the only side one hears about in Dayton. He seemed to have been deeply impressed by Darrow's unassuming attitude and homespun manners. "He uses small words, but he rolls them right up together at you," he said with feeling. Another member of the group said everybody who heard Darrow knew he was sincere. "He made us understand the relation of cause and effect," said a third. There seemed to be no feeling against Darrow as the defender of Leopold and Loeb. "I can understand how those boys just had to do that because of the way they were raised," said the club secretary. Darrow's fatalistic philosophy has evidently taken strong root in Dayton.

But the talk soon turned to pleasantries. "This trial is going to be about the idea of God," I ventured. "Well, there's plenty 'round here that knows all about God," said the club secretary. "There's a farmer out here about six miles; he saw God." This provoked a general laugh. "But that ain't the only one," went on another member. "We had a preacher here in the Southern Methodist Church that signed a contract with God. He met God in the street one night, and God told him He wanted him to come and serve Him the rest of his life. But he wouldn't do it, 'cause he said the spirit was willing enough but the flesh was too weak. So he wrestled with God for an hour or so and then signed a contract to serve Him for seven years and no more. That preacher baptized more people than any other preacher in Dayton, more than all the others put together, I guess. Once he baptized seventy-five at a crack."

Dayton has a dozen churches. The principal denominations are Southern Methodist, Southern Baptist, and Presbyterian. It is an unusually large proportion of churches, even for East Tennessee. The religious feeling of the countryside is reflected in numerous signs along roadsides near the town. One I saw said "Take care lest thy sins find thee out."

John T. Scopes is happier now than he was during his brief visit to New York. He goes swimming every day in a natural pool about a mile from town. He spends the late afternoon, or "evening," as it is called here, in Robinson's drug-store. He takes himself seriously at all times, and the trial even more seriously. The attitude of the Dayton people against profiteering and "jazzing up" the trial has been austerely upheld by him.

The talk stirred up by the evolution question has laid the East Tennessee towns wide open. People are taking sides, but one hears only one side. The Bryanites apparently don't dare to talk. A cartoon of Bryan, showing him in the guise of a monkey, has a great vogue here. The legend is "He denies his lineage." Thousands are being sold in Knoxville and Chattanooga.

The good people of Dayton, at least those one sees about the streets and in the stores, understand that no decent evolutionist claims man is descended from a monkey. And they voice no objection to agnosticism of the Darrow stamp. There is a preacher in Knoxville named Percy Knickerbocker, who is known as the John Roach Straton of Tennessee. He preaches hell and brimstone in the Southern Methodist Church. When the play "Rain" was advertised several months ago, he demanded that the city council forbid the performance. The council appointed a special committee of three to witness a dress rehearsal. This committee never made a report, so "Rain" was given to a packed house. Later this preacher demanded and got a standing vote of confidence from his congregation. Probably no preacher would dare make any such issue now.

When the question of defying the anti-evolution law was first broached in the State, it was several weeks before a single educator could be induced to express an opinion on the subject. Dr. H. A. Morgan, president of the University of Tennessee, himself a science teacher, refused to commit himself to reporters. He has since received high praise from Sunday school associations and the fundamentalist sects throughout the State. The head of the zoology department in the University of Tennessee refused to show his zoology textbook to reporters. The superintendent of schools of Chattanooga refused to express any opinion whatever on the law. Then Scopes stepped into the breach and everything began to change.

Behind the whole fight stands Dr. John Randolph Neal. He is perhaps Tennessee's greatest libertarian. He resigned from his position as dean of the University of Tennessee Law School at the time of the "slaughter of the Ph.D.'s" in 1923. This came about through the imprudence of Professor Jesse Sprowls, teacher of genetic psychology at the university. Mr. Sprowls had the bad taste to order for his class a small consignment of James Harvey Robinson's "Mind in the Making." The final result of this action was the dismissal of six professors of as many sciences, one being a "German sympathizer" as well as an agnostic. Dr. Neal has since established his own school of law, to whose graduating class Clarence Darrow and Bainbridge Colby recently addressed words of encouragement.

Dayton invites everybody to come to the trial. True, the courthouse will not seat everybody, nor the houses hold everybody. But the country is lovely—a softness of atmosphere pervades it, in keeping with the soft-spoken accents of the people. It is hot, but not insufferably hot. There is plenty of room in the hills around the town to pitch tents. The stores have plenty of merchandise. The roads are almost perfect.

And John Thomas Scopes has made the finest mousetrap in the world.

Deep Water Runs Still

By SILAS BENT

> Deep Water, N. J.—Mechanical readjustments in the $1,000,000 tetraethyl lead plant of the Du Ponts here, closed down by the company, would eliminate parts of the manufacturing apparatus from which the fumes might leak, it was said today.

IF you have noted dispatches such as this in the newspapers, you may have wondered about Deep Water, New Jersey. You may have sought to give a local habitation to the name. You may have tried to run it down in an atlas, or in the "Postal Guide." Neither would have enlightened you. The telegraph companies would have told you, if you had inquired, that they had no offices there.

Deep Water has achieved no official recognition, no standing with geographers. Although it embraces a town, it is not a town. Although it is a port of call for ocean-going steamships, nautical charts ignore it. Although it figures in newspaper date lines, no news can emanate directly from it. For it is important as quietly as possible.

Across from Wilmington the Delaware River, here three miles broad, has channeled deepest along a bend of its eastern shore. It is still, this current, with hardly a ripple to catch the casual eye. Still waters run deep; colonial river folk named this bend. But nowadays Deep Water means a reservation of six square miles, dotted with smokestacks, sprawling sullenly along the river bank. During the World War, 25,000 men were busy here at the peak, making smokeless powder; ships slipped empty to the docks, and waddled away with tons of explosives in their bellies. In peace, three of its four powder mills have been dismantled, and the army of recruits has been demobilized. In the phraseology of the Du Ponts, Deep Water is now "the dye works." It is a congeries of poison plants. There chlorine and phosgene and the lethal-benzol series, which turns blue the bodies of its victims, are manufactured for trade purposes. There, until a federal investigation began, the Du Ponts made tetraethyl lead.

To most of us Du Pont means Wilmington. It was at Wilmington the directors met the other day to declare a 40 per cent stock dividend; they had met there a short while before to increase the rate on common from $8 to $10, and all the official statements issue thence. It is a profitable going concern, the E. I. du Pont de Nemours, and Wilmington is its showplace. But only the cerebral ganglions of a complicated industrial and financial organism are to be found there. The dynamite plants and commodity factories are elsewhere. The poison factories are huddled in the propitious obscurity of Deep Water.

Tetraethyl lead, although the plant for making it is in "the dye works," and although the men employed there are called "dye operators," has nothing to do with fabrics. It has nothing to do with dyes. Its commercial significance may be stated succinctly in this, that it will make one gallon of gasoline do the work of two. It is mixed one gallon to a thousand, and the result is an "improved motor fuel." Combustion is better, and the "knock" in the automobile is eliminated; but, best of all, in a high-compression engine, with long and narrow cylinders, it will develop tremendous power. Every automotive engineer in the United States, so it is said, is bending all his energies toward devising a better high-compression engine than the others.

Tetraethyl lead is now a matter of public interest and official investigation because of a disaster last October in the Bayway plant of the Standard Oil near Elizabeth, N. J. General Motors and Standard Oil had joined hands as the Ethyl Gasoline Corporation to make the stuff, and five of their workers went suddenly and violently insane. They died in strait-jackets. They died stark mad, grinning and gritting their teeth.*

Straightway the newspapers coined a phrase, "loony gas." It was a misnomer. In common parlance "gas" means gasoline, and there was nothing to show that anyone had gone loony from the use of ethyl gasoline. It was the fumes from tetraethyl lead which unbalanced and destroyed the workers; either inhaling the fumes, or absorbing the poison through the skin. But the strange and terrible deaths of these five were a nine days' newspaper wonder. The spotlight of publicity beat fiercely upon Bayway, upon Standard Oil, upon General Motors, upon the Ethyl Gasoline Corporation.

* An article on The Standard Oil's Death Factory by Mary Ross appeared in The Nation for November 26, 1924.

"The Du Ponts have been having trouble too," said Thomas Midgley, Jr., inventor of the new use of tetraethyl lead. And rumors began to circulate of deaths at Deep Water, but not much got into the newspapers. There were investigations by New Jersey officials, demands for concerted action by scientists, rulings in this State and that against the use of ethyl gasoline; there were columns and columns of general newspaper discussion, huge headlines, editorials, special articles, but only casual items about Deep Water.

The Deep Water plant had been shut down for improvements by the company, one of the items said; as a fact it had been closed by the New Jersey Labor Commissioner. There had been "some difficulties in the experimental stages," another item said, but none "within the past few months"; as a fact there had been three deaths within "the past few months."

Whereas there had been but five deaths at Bayway, there had been eight in all at Deep Water. Four men had died in a single hospital, the Salem (N. J.) Memorial Hospital, three in a month. To scores of poisonings at Bayway, there had been hundreds at Deep Water. A physician who worked there during but half of the period of production told me he himself handled hundreds of cases.

"But why make all this fuss about tetra lead?" he demanded. "The Du Ponts make other poisons there in even greater quantity which kill a man like that!" (He snapped his fingers.) "And those plants are still going full blast."

Hallucinations overtook the workmen in the Deep Water tetraethyl-lead plant as they chatted at the noonday meal, or went about their tasks. They chalked pictures of winged insects on the walls. They paused to snatch at empty air. Those who escaped poisoning dubbed the place "The House of the Butterflies."

But, amid all the shouting and the tumult about Bayway, none of this got into the newspapers. None of it got even into the newspaper which screamed most loudly about "loony gas," and averred that it was campaigning against the poison "almost single-handed." Deep Water ran still. It escaped the spotlight. It was visible only in the penumbra of the news.

In Wilmington, whence must come all official statements of profits and losses, financial and human, from the Du Pont properties, there are three daily newspapers. All of them are owned by the Du Ponts. All the men who work for them depend upon the Du Ponts for a living. The opposition, if any exists, has no voice. The "news instinct" is stifled. "It's bad for the town," a Wilmington newspaper man told me. "I can say honestly that I've never known the Du Ponts to put over anything in the way of education or politics or business, that I couldn't support with a clear conscience. But they can put over anything they wish. This is their bailiwick. This is their barony."

But what about Salem? Why hadn't the four deaths there been broadcast? The president of the Salem Memorial Hospital is editor of a Salem newspaper. The secretary of the hospital is a newspaper man. The hospital is a public institution, but the Du Ponts equipped the electric laundry; the Du Ponts make donations annually; the Du Ponts pay, for the treatment of patients from Deep Water, sometimes thrice as much as the city of Salem budgets for the hospital. "And I've heard it said," a citizen of Salem told me, "that the Du Ponts pay half the taxes in Salem County. I don't know whether they pay that much, but they pay enough to be entitled to some consideration."

Salem is but a twenty-minute ambulance run from Deep Water. On the Du Pont reservation there is a hospital, with its staff of physicians and nurses, but it is used chiefly for emergency cases. One of the deaths occurred at Carney's Point, an industrial town of one-story rubberoid cottages on the reservation, owned and policed by the Du Ponts. It was said that this death was caused partly by uremic poisoning. Another of the men died in delirium at Penns Grove, a nearby town, and nothing whatever was said about it—nothing publicly. A settlement of $17 a week was made on the widow, to continue four years.

Many of the workers in the poison plants make their homes at Penns Grove, rather than in Carney's Point, on the reservation. The Record, published at Penns Grove, is the newspaper nearest to Deep Water. It is an intelligently edited country weekly. "But whatever we get out of Deep Water," the editor said, "we have to pick up from the workmen. If there's a boiler explosion we find out about it, but they suppress the facts about the tetraethyl lead and other poison plants."

One of the workmen went home to die; and his home was in Bridgeton, in a different New Jersey county About this there was a good deal of publicity; the facts even filtered to New York. About this and three other deaths the Du Pont publicity bureau gave twelve-line items to the Wilmington papers, with orders to print. But somehow the facts did not get out of Wilmington.

In production, not in publicity, there was rivalry between the tetraethyl-lead plants at Bayway and at Deep Water. It was not unfriendly, because the Du Ponts own a third of General Motors, which shared in the profits from Bayway; but at Deep Water all the profits, instead of a fraction, accrued to the Du Pont company; and to facilitate the output a new million-dollar plant was opened the first of this year. When it was opened there had been only four deaths in the old dye plant, where production had begun two years before. The new brick building was well-ventilated, and there seemed a promise that no more fatalities would occur. There would be some poisonings, perhaps, but by now the Du Pont medical staff surely knew how to cope with them.

The new plant had been open but six weeks when the pressure of friendly rivalry made itself felt. The chemists at Deep Water found that their supply of bromine, used in making the ethyl bromide introduced into the process, was inadequate. Bromine is a dark, reddish-brown liquid which gives off an irritating odor. It is difficult and costly to make. There was a prospect that it would be impossible to procure bromine in the quantities necessary for such mass-production of tetraethyl as the Du Ponts contemplated. Why not use chlorine?

Chemically bromine acts like chlorine, which is a greenish-yellow and extremely poisonous substance. Both unite directly with ethyl; and chlorine had this advantage, that it could be produced cheaply and in huge quantities. So ethyl chloride was substituted for ethyl bromide in making tetraethyl lead. And within a few weeks there were four deaths.

It was then that the New Jersey Labor Commissioner closed the plant. It was done quietly. The news item said it was done to make "mechanical readjustments." In fact, these were made. The Du Ponts spent more than $60,000 installing a new ventilating system, which would change the entire atmosphere every forty seconds, warming and moistening the incoming air. Every one will tell you that the Du Ponts spare no expense to protect the health and lives of their employees. So after five weeks Dr. Andrew F. McBride, the Labor Commissioner, gave permission to reopen the plant. But it had been operating only a short while when the federal investigation began, and it was closed the middle of last April to await the outcome.

The federal activities included a pow-wow of scientists at Washington, under the direction of Surgeon General Hugh S. Cumming. There were two camps. One wanted to investigate the whole production of tetraethyl lead as well as the distribution of ethyl gasoline doped with it; the other thought effort should be concentrated on the commercial rather than the industrial phase. A resolution was adopted under which a committee of seven scientists was appointed, and instructed to report by next January "if possible."

The resolution dealt only with the commercial distribution and use of ethyl gasoline; but Surgeon General Cumming, after he had learned belatedly of the deaths at Deep Water, announced that industrial production would be investigated too; if the committee didn't look after it, he would undertake it himself.

Now, 300,000,000 gallons of ethyl gasoline had been distributed through twenty-eight States before the plants were closed. The tetraethyl lead was shipped in small containers at first, and mixed with the gasoline at pumping (filling) stations; then it was shipped in 40-gallon drums, and mixed with the "gas" at various large plants, one of them the General Motors unit at Canton, Ohio. Two men are known to have died there. And a garage man at Weston, West Virginia, went strangely insane. He died at the county hospital, but this was before Weston knew that tetraethyl lead drove men daffy. So far as is known, no motorist has been poisoned from using ethyl gasoline.

Upon the findings of Surgeon General Cumming's committee depends the fate of a new industry involving billions of dollars. Until the findings are made public the five-story brick "House of the Butterflies" stands idle—and silent—at Deep Water.

Will Russia Return to Capitalism?

By HARRY F. WARD

STATE capitalism in Russia, for this and not state socialism is what the New Economic Policy really is, constitutes the intermediate stage between private capitalism and whatever form of socialism will ultimately be worked out. Under state capitalism business goes on as usual. The only difference apparent at first glance is the number of enterprises conducted by state agencies. All the machinery and methods of private capitalism—the market, prices, wages, profits—are being used, but there is a vital difference underneath the surface. It is in the matter of purpose and end. The essence of the situation is the attempt to coordinate this machinery of the market for the purpose of securing the economic means to maintain and develop a definite plan for the cultural improvement of all the people. The methods of the market work as elsewhere. Prices are set partly by the government and partly by competition, wages are determined by a legal minimum and above that by collective agreement through trade unions, profits accumulate in properly conducted enterprises—and then comes the difference. The government takes a larger proportion of profits than in other countries, in the form of taxation from private traders and a share agreed upon in advance from concessionnaires. The profits of state enterprises are divided into three parts, determined at intervals by agreement between representatives of the several parties in the undertaking. One part goes to the state, another to the enterprise for improvement and extension, and a third to the wage-earners for their own welfare work. The further difference between private capitalism in other countries and state capitalism in Russia is that the share of profit which goes to the government is used directly for social well-being, whose promotion through a huge central plan is the chief end of the Soviet state.

The state capitalism of Russia is, of course, not absolute, and herein lies the possibility of its reverting into private capitalism instead of developing into state socialism and then communism according to the forecast of the Russian Marxists. The state is the dominant but not the sole capitalist. It has nationalized the land and other natural resources, but the land is still for the most part administered by the peasants on the ancient communal mir plan of periodic assignments for strip cultivation. It has nationalized banking, export and import trade, transportation, industry, and all buildings except small dwellings. Transportation it operates directly, export and import trade through various subsidiary agencies; banking is a state function in which the cooperatives are permitted to share, and one bank has just been opened by a mixed concessionaire and government company; mining and manufacturing are conducted mostly by state trusts and for the rest by concessionaire companies in which the government is usually a partner; merchandising is done by private traders, the cooperatives, and the distributing agencies of the government trusts.

In this combination of agencies the cooperatives are, of course, working with the state away from private capitalism. While they are necessarily capitalist in part of their method they cut the tap root of capitalism in their handling of profit and provide the consumers' approach to a new economic order. The belated recognition of this fact, as well as political and economic opportunism, has caused a total change of attitude on the part of leading Russian Communists toward the cooperatives. At first they tried to capture or suppress them. Then they ordered universal compulsory membership. Now they are seeking to strengthen them on the original Rochdale voluntary basis by giving them all possible aid and comfort. The slogan now is "through cooperation to communism," and the cooperatives, very large and powerful in Russia, are a major force in the Communist economic strategy. The question then of the possible extension of private capitalism in Russia is, first, whether foreign investment can get a stranglehold and compel a reversal of policy, whether the private trader or farmer can make sufficient money to start again the psychology of profit and the seductions of luxury, and, finally, whether state agencies as operated in Russia can prove themselves more efficient than private enterprise.

The economic strategists of Russia hope to keep foreign investment as a subordinate part of their state capitalism by restrictions written into the bond of every concession. These provide for the enforcement of labor regulations, the ratio for the division of profits, and bring the enterprise periodically under review by the board of economic strategy. So far the Russians have been able to hold to their terms, despite their great need of capital. The destruction of war and revolution has been repaired only to the point of about 70 per cent of pre-war fixed capital, and the state industrial bank is compelled to charge the state industries from 12 to 18 per cent for liquid capital. Nevertheless, they will not yield to the percentage demanded by Japan for developing the oil in Sakhalin, and they have their people with them. The chances are that Russia, with a social ideal, right or wrong, ahead of it, can wait longer than Western surplus capital with the push for profits behind it.

To prevent the private trader from restoring the psychology of capitalism through the making and spending of profit has proved a more difficult task for the Russian government. The immediate effect of the N.E.P., "the restoration of the market," as Lenin succinctly and accurately defined it, was the rise of a horde of successful profiteers and speculators, the beginnings of a new bourgeoisie. The government met this problem first by repression. Decrees defining economic offenses were passed and the Commissariat of Justice was given extraordinary powers to deal with "the economic counter revolution." It was empowered to "send away," that is exile without public trial, those who were accumulating money to the point and by the methods prohibited. This was the origin of the stories of the "new Red terror" circulated last spring. There was no bloodshed. Some were sent out of the country, some to a definite district or city or town where there was slight chance of a profit-making career. Then heavier taxes were clapped on private profit so that now the Nepmen are complaining that they cannot make any money. Also the prices of staple commodities are fixed at a maximum. This is done by agreement between the executives of the cooperatives and the economic planning board concerned. Thus, for example, the maximum retail price of sugar is fixed at thirteen cents. All have to pay the same wholesale price to the state distributing agency. Anyone can sell at retail for less if he can. If the private trader can undersell the cooperatives he is welcome to do it, but it is a hard game for him to beat since his taxes are several times higher. It is not the plan to drive the private trader out of the market by these repressive measures. It is desired simply to maneuvre him into a minority position and then keep him there as a competitive spur to efficiency on the part of the cooperatives.

With the peasants the problem takes a different form. The incubus of the noble landowners being removed, the restoration of the market brought the possibility of the more intelligent, industrious, and thrifty peasants forming a rural, petty bourgeoisie, something after the French pattern. Against this the Communist papers started a campaign which would be accurately described from the capitalist point of view as the stirring up of rural class consciousness and class hate. At first every peasant who got two horses was to be treated as anti-social. But the absurdity of this soon became manifest and the present propaganda is directed against the peasant who seeks to use the labor of others for his profit. On the positive side there is a campaign of education in the villages designed to enlist the surplus energies of the young peasants in social service for local needs instead of letting them go to money making. The issue is almost entirely one of psychology, as at present there is no likelihood of much investment capital accumulating in agricultural pursuits. And the Communist strategists expect to dominate the psychology of the situation through their propaganda and organizing capacity. Fifty years is the time they have set for themselves in which to make the peasant population a conscious part of the Communist regime.

This hope cannot be realized, nor can the determination to keep the needed foreign investor in a subordinate position, unless the present state capitalism in Russia can prove itself economically more efficient than private capitalism, that is unless it can supply more social values to the people. Here is the core of the question. As the Communist leaders put it, "the revolutionary struggle is transferred from the military to the economic front." They recognize much more than do the political leaders of other nations that the question of the world revolution, with the subordinate issue of propaganda in other countries, is now secondary to the question of economic efficiency in Russia. They know now that the question of what can be done in other lands, as well as the question of whether they stand or fall in Russia, is finally to be determined by the capitalist test of whether they can deliver the goods, and that in the literal, economic sense.

For securing economic efficiency the Russian Communists rely upon three main measures—a coordinated plan, technical improvements in industry and agriculture, and propaganda to develop a psychological attitude. They are the first to organize what some of the foremost publicists of other nations have for some time been urging, but so far in vain—an economic general staff. The basic belief of communism that "production can be intelligently regulated in the interests of the people," has become a genuine attempt in the economic life of Russia and is the main reason behind the faith that state capitalism will develop into communism. Put in another way by one of their leading economists, the scheme is centralized direction with the largest possible amount of local initiative, and the direct participation of workers in the management of production through the unions. This is not merely a dream of the future. There is much history behind it. The short era of modern capitalism is practically the first time that the human community has attempted to carry forward its economic affairs in planless fashion, trusting that the chaotic strivings of individuals would somehow fall into a reasonable pattern.

The attempt at an intelligent coordination of economic activities around a chosen purpose is being carried forward through three bodies, graduated in scope and authority. Roughly speaking, one develops general strategy, the next plans tactics in a given situation, and the third administers them in relation particularly to labor. Thus, for example, the first decides what general measures must be adopted to lower industrial and raise agricultural prices in order that the situation of the peasant may be eased; the second is informed in the report of a concessionaire corporation that its production can next year be increased by so much, but after examining the market and the condition of other similar enterprises decides that only a portion of this increase is desirable; the third is told by another manufacturing corporation, partly Russian and partly foreign, that it can reduce overhead and lower prices next year by dismissing a specified number of workers but permits it to dismiss only that lesser number which the labor market can absorb, holding that unemployment is a greater evil than a cost of production slightly above the efficiency standard.

Those who regard all government regulation as evil and nationalization as the sum of all economic villainies should not be misled into judging the Russian situation too hastily in terms of the conditions with which they are familiar. The economic interests of Russia are not turned over to mere politicians, still less to politicians whose main principle is to get and to hold the perquisites and spoils of office; they are administered by economists, engineers, and trade unionists, working and planning together. Political considerations do at times dominate, but they come in from the international situation, and will until all mankind gets intelligence enough to understand that the only economic unit under machine production is the world. The Russian leaders understand just as well as their critics the dangers and evils of bureaucracy, inevitable in any attempt to coordinate the life of a nation. But they say: "Properly to administer human affairs today bureaucracy is unavoidable. The only possible course is to reduce its evils to a minimum." And to this end they are constantly inventing devices. The real test will come when revolutionary enthusiasm has abated and the stimulating hostility of the rest of the world has been modified.

The attempt to increase production and to lower its cost goes on in Russia exactly as it does in the intelligent sections of private capitalism. Improved machinery and improved methods are eagerly sought for. Industrial engineering has an even higher status than where it is an adjunct to money making. It has the advantage of a central purpose which invites the worker to realize his personality as a cooperating unit in a nation-wide plan. Hence so-called efficiency methods get a support from labor which they elsewhere have lacked save where a few far-seeing employers have made the wage-earners participants in the administration and proceeds of the process. In the attempt to make industry a scientific process the Russians have two advantages. They have no conflict with an inherited apprentice system, and no friction between workers and owners each seeking the maximum possible share of the surplus.

The broad issue of economic efficiency for a country like Russia is, as one of their experts puts it, "to restore the normal economic development and relationship between the owners of industry and the owners of agriculture"—that is, the workers and peasants. The objective then is to equate agricultural and industrial production. This is the problem that is baffling the United States. Its acute concrete form is what Trotzky graphically called "the scissors problem"—that is, the increasing divergence of agricultural and industrial prices, like the opening blades of a pair of scissors. When the peasant or farmer cannot buy city products, industry languishes; there is in turn a diminished demand for food products and the vicious circle of depression is complete. The trade crisis in Russia early in 1923 was of this sort. It was liquidated partially by reducing industrial overhead and cutting prices. The familiar problem of the enormous spread between producers' and retail prices was also tackled by eliminating some of the steps in the trading apparatus, especially in the cooperatives. It is the view of the policy makers that economic and political strategy must center for some time to come on the peasant, not merely to make him content with the government by getting him the goods that he wants at prices he can afford and keeping his taxes at a reasonable level, but to get him to improve his productivity so as to reconquer his position in the world market. Hence when President Rykoff tells the peasants they are worse off than before the war and exhorts them to increase their product, the newspaper critics of other nations are completely misled when they jubilantly acclaim this as evidence of the failure and fallacy of the Soviet scheme. It is on the contrary proof that its leaders are tackling their real job. The outside world does not yet understand and appreciate the realistic frankness of Soviet officials in dealing with internal conditions.

It is a curious fact that the Communists should lean so heavily upon exhortation and educational propaganda in their struggle for economic efficiency, since in their philosophy the psychological attitude is supposed to follow the economic condition. Yet in order to get time to work out their program, they must imbue the worker and peasant with a knowledge of the plan and a desire for the goal. Hence the multitudinous propaganda of exhibit, lecture, pamphlet, book, and the organization of youth to get enough of the people to accept the ideal and to wait in some deprivation in order to give it a chance to succeed. The whole scheme of education is designed to produce the psychology and practice of intelligent service in a community plan instead of the cultivation and gratification of self-interest.

That the Communists are succeeding in this matter is demonstrated by the fact that the industrial wage-earners are getting along with only about 75 per cent of pre-war wages while the cost of living is about 15 per cent higher. Nevertheless they are putting their backs into production and constitute the enthusiastic core of Communist strength. This is not simply because they have some additional advantages in low rent, cheap access to recreation and culture, and more direct participation in the management of production. It is also because they increasingly feel that they are participating in an attempt which seems to them tremendously worth while. The same process is beginning among the peasants.

Still another test of the extent to which the Communists are, as they would say, conquering the psychological situation, is the amount of corruption that develops in their machine. Their boast is of the ability to run government with a low-salary cost, and for this they depend upon the social incentive. No Communist may get a larger salary than 192 rubles, that is, about $96 a month. From time to time the papers, government organs all, in striking contrast to procedure elsewhere, publish the names of party members who, beguiled by the flesh-pots of Egypt, have been caught in corruption, and record the punishment given them. This is always much heavier than for a like offense committed by a non-Communist. The number is small compared to the opportunities, and it grows less.

The final evidence, however, of the gradual substitution of the psychology of social planning and service for the psychology of unregulated initiative, self-interest, and profit is in the attitude of youth. Since the war ended, and even since the Bolsheviks captured the state, a generation has passed from adolescence to adult life. It has not known the institutions or incentives of private capitalism. Its attitudes toward life have been determined, in so far as the student and industrial sections of it are concerned, by the Communist viewpoint embodied in education and propaganda. This is true also for such of the peasants as have been reached by the education of the Red Army and by the League of Communist Youth. In so far, then, as these sections of young Russia are concerned, and they are the vital sections which will take the lead, it is not too much to say that the balance of energy has been transferred from possessive to creative activities, from self-seeking to public service.

The final outcome is a question of economic fact. Is state capitalism solving the problem of production and distribution? Upon this question some light is thrown by the official chart prepared for the Supreme Council of National Economy. These are Bolshevist figures, of course, but assembled for the Communists' own guidance, and whatever they may do with others they do not deceive themselves at this point; they cannot afford to. Taking pre-war production in 1914 in both industry and agriculture for purposes of measurement as 100 per cent, this chart shows a sharp drop until 1918 when both touched the lowest point, agriculture at about 55 per cent and industry at about 15 per cent.

About the middle of 1918 the curves turned upward and proceeded steadily but less rapidly than they dropped, with industry moving a little faster than agriculture. By 1924 agriculture stood at about 85 per cent of pre-war production and industry at about 55 per cent. To the protagonist of private capitalism this is sufficient proof, at least for newspaper and platform purposes, of the failure of the Soviet regime. But the Soviet technician is not moved at all. He says: "We took hold in 1917 at almost the lowest point of production. We inherited all the disintegration of one of the most corrupt and inefficient administrations in history and all the inertia of a slow-moving people. We took hold of the disorganization caused by the war and the first revolution; we were then given several years of counter-revolution and civil war. As if that were not enough we next ran into a wide-spread famine. In two or three years we shall reach pre-war production." This willingness to move slowly and to wait is, of course, more Asiatic than European. It does not suit the tempo of the profit-making system, but as long as it suits Russia there is no return to private capitalism; the tendency of movement, slight though it may be, is in the other direction.

The Farmer Goes Into Business

By FRAZIER F. PETERS

TWO years ago, according to official reports, the average farmer's income over his living was ninety-seven dollars a year. In "living" clothing, books, automobiles, schooling, carfare, and movies were not included. Since this was an average figure and since our farmers number several millions you can readily imagine what the income of the lower half was and what it means to the nation as a whole. And yet with a problem of this size before them many writers glibly offer panaceas, among which the most popular are diversification, cooperative marketing, and improved credits.

I believe that no one of these can possibly cure the trouble; they are superficial and would only serve to stave off the evil day of reckoning. This is obviously true of the cooperative idea as it is practiced.

Within the last fifty years we have been creating an immense machine for producing and distributing commodities, which we proudly call business and even more proudly call "big business." The average business man takes great pride in his machine and sits back and marvels at its work, while some of us sit back and marvel that it works at all. His very ideals are perverted by his pride in this machine until we find him repeating such foolish statements as "Advertising is what makes the man in Maine eat Oregon apples."

He boasts of low production costs; one-tenth of a cent saving here and one-tenth there soon make millions, but he is not ashamed of ten or fifteen cents spent in selling or distributing a penny product providing someone else foots the bill. To make him really happy, in fact, you must show him that the price asked of the public is way above the production cost. He will cheerfully tell you, as one of the marvels of our business organization, that a certain safety razor was originally manufactured to sell for a dollar but was finally offered to the public for five and has been extremely successful.

This type of man will rage when miners or clothing workers want a 10 per cent raise, but he can see nothing wrong in a machine whose efficiency of distribution is demonstrated by such profits as those reaped by Asperin, which can be produced profitably for one dollar a pound and is retailed for fifteen; or baking powder, worth at the most twenty cents, which brings one dollar; or corn meal, worth two or three cents, for fifteen or twenty; or shaving cream, worth a cent and a half, for thirty-five.

And so this man beckons to the farmer to join in dividing the spoils by forming large units, advertising, and getting "top prices."

The farm "cooperatives," however, effect only one group or line of produce. For instance, we have various dairy cooperatives. They have been carrying on a national propaganda to increase the consumption of milk. One of them (thoroughly drugged with modern business methods) has figured that if it can make every man, woman, and child in New York drink one more spoonful of milk a day it will be able to . . . ! But around the corner we hear the potato man complaining that since the people started to drink more milk they have eaten fewer potatoes, and so he proceeds to organize a campaign.

And so it goes. Nothing is produced. Artists draw impressive pictures of a Louis XVI dining room with a butler passing chewing gum to a beautifully gowned assemblage of successful business men and their wives. Men who might be writing respectable stuff try to persuade you that it is desirable to be able to entertain your company in the cellar. And now the farmer puts these same forces to work to sell his goods. The orange, egg, peanut, raisin, and potato growers in various localities have their cooperatives and are posting the cars and magazines with their various trademarks and are asking inquisitive questions as to what you have eaten that day until gradually in certain lines unbranded goods are disappearing.

According to our business friend a great thing has been accomplished. At least a hundred valuable trademarks have been produced. Millions of people at an expense of millions of dollars have been hypnotized so that they cannot ask for anything without prefixing the mystic trade name. And this is what he offers as a solution of the farmer's troubles! And as proof of this he points to the examples we already have of cooperatives selling branded goods. Some of these have been extremely successful and have reaped tremendous profits for the organization and for the farmer members. But what have they done to the non-member farmers? How have they benefited the public? What have they produced?

The average citizen believes these cooperatives somehow bring the farmer closer to him or, as he puts it, "do away with the middle man." Such is not the case. They actually only take the place of the commission merchant and in effect are a commission house in which he holds the entire stock and they usually take just as large a commission.

Our business friend would explain that they have produced a "demand." A demand for what? A demand for your goods. A demand resulting from advertising your "selling points." A "selling point" is one of our friend's mysterious terms, which, when analyzed, means any unessential detail possessed by your goods and not by the others on which an interested party could talk for ever but which a disinterested purchaser would not trouble to question. Make the public demand white eggs even though brown be as good. Make them call for white yolks though yellow are more normal. Do anything to be different! You must have a selling point! If necessary paint the chicken houses black and advertise an offer of several thousands of dollars in prizes for the best letter telling why eggs from "black-housed chickens" are best.

The public decides it must have eggs from "black-housed chickens." Others are offered at a lower price in vain. The price of black-housed chickens is raised with great success, for our dear old public will have "what it wants when it wants it" and ordinary, normal, hen-laid, unbranded fresh eggs are now relegated to the undesirables as a food for the unemployed and inquiring poor, and unfortunately the producer follows them into obscurity.

The "public" pays the price. In its raring and tearing around town it can save another minute by asking for "Humpty Dumpty Eggs," and be reasonably sure that they come from black-housed chickens. Just what it does with those minutes saved I don't know, and I won't be as inquisitive as the visiting Chinaman, but I do know that the financial cost of all these minutes is rapidly becoming intolerable. And the modern "farmers' cooperative" is not going to help relieve it.

But enough of him, this man of business. His is the old game. He would set the farmers of California against those of Maine, and "the De'il come up wi' the hindmost." But though it may help the Californians, it will not help the farmers as a whole, for one has to lose, and the loser is done for. Business wars between various groups of farmers waged on just such insane grounds as wars waged between nations will bring the same results. The farmer and consumer will both end by losing.

The consumer loses because the only ideal actuating these "cooperatives" is increased profits for the farmer, and these are to be won, not by correcting the present atrocious system of distribution but merely by creating a preferential demand for each "cooperative's" particular product. And, though at present the cooperatives have only raised the price of their commodities a small percentage, we may look forward confidently, judging from our former experiences with monopolies actuated by the same ideals, to greater and greater increases as troublesome competition is gradually eliminated.

Of course we might assume for the sake of charity that having created their preferential demand, amounting eventually to a monopoly, they will then consider us farmers outside their restricted zones as well as the consumer. But I believe having followed modern business methods to that point it is more reasonable to expect them to continue when the goal is reached.

Their ideal is increased profits for their members and not increased profits by correcting the faults in our system of distribution. The "profit motive" prevails, and according to Warbasse it has nothing in common with true cooperation.

In the Driftway

A CHILD was recently brought into court as a witness against her stepmother. The child was covered with bruises; the stepmother had beaten her; the stepmother was being charged with improper guardianship. The judge dismissed the case and would not allow the child to testify because he held that parents had a perfect right to beat their children, that he himself had beaten one of his children for untruthfulness so that "he was unable to sit down," and as a consequence none of his children had ever been untruthful since. The Drifter observes in this little story much that should be of interest. In the first place, not so very long ago it would have been unheard of to question, and certainly to bring into a court of law, the right of a parent to chastise a child in any manner he saw fit. The Drifter remembers well a boy whose father beat him with a trunk strap, buckle end, and when the boy, proud and stubborn, refused to indicate in any way that the punishment was painful to him, the parent only beat him more for his bull-headedness. If the neighbors heard of this proceeding they did not bring the matter into court; they minded their own business, and considered that the father was only minding his.

* * * * *

THIS attitude of mind has changed so completely in some circles that the Drifter is well acquainted with children who have never felt the rod, the slipper, or even the parental slap on the wrist. He will not say whether or not he thinks the children have benefited thereby. Possibly natural cussedness was so deeply inbred in them that no amount of beating would have got rid of it. But with the attitude he finds himself in general sympathy. Considered in cold blood, there is something a little one-sided in a 180-pound father beating a 40- to 80-pound boy. A far better system would be for the parent to write down the occasions for chastisement in a convenient note-book and at a future date tackle his grown son in a fair fight over each one of them. The trouble with such a system, of course, is that after fifteen years, it would doubtless seem silly to engage in a boxing-match with Edward because at ten years of age he had stolen a banana off the side-board and neglected to inform his mother of the fact. The father would say that he is not, obviously, interested in the banana. No. Let Edward have all the bananas he wants, but let him come up like a little man and ask for them, instead of stealing them like any common thief. To which Edward would certainly make the equally obvious answer that he would not have been given the banana if he had asked for it like a little man, a fact which he had been previously careful to ascertain, that he wanted the banana terribly, and that anyway taking a banana off the side-board in your own house was not stealing, because it was a family banana and as such the property of any member of the household.

* * * * *

THE only refuge of the parent in such a case would be to resort to broad general principles of moral conduct. Not a banana, but Stealing, Lying, Disobedience, Deception. The banana would be forgotten; the fact that his son might grow up to be a Thief, a Burglar, a Murderer, a Confidence Man, would take its place, and Edward would be, quite properly, beaten in order to ward off the danger of such horrid consequences. The Freudians would probably say that Edward, sentenced later to jail for second-story work, suffered this fate because of the banana complex instilled in him by his parent at the age of ten. This would doubtless be an extreme case; but if Edward grew up to be a respectable citizen, it would be with little help from his father who had done his best to instil in him ideas of stealing and lying at an early age. Thus the judge, mentioned above, who felt confident that all his children had remained consistently truthful as a result of a beating administered to one, shows that his years on the bench have added little to his knowledge of the world. For the persons deterred from crime by punishment to others is small; and the judge's children, taught the necessity of prevarication by the fate of one of them, have possibly become adept in the art by now.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Hope for Wisconsin University

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Wisconsin progressives are jubilant over the election of Glenn Frank to the presidency of the University of Wisconsin. From being one of the most liberal of American universities, imbued with the progressive La Follette spirit, the institution has been, under the leadership of President Birge, on the whole, one of the bulwarks of conservatism. With a board of regents most of whom were appointed by Governor Philip, the great monopolistic interests have used the university, as they have used other colleges and universities, to discredit social, political, and economic reform of almost every kind.

The first step which has brought about a veritable revolution in the university was legislation providing for farmer-labor representation on the board of regents. Every member of the present board is an appointee of Governor Blaine, first elected as a progressive in 1920, and his appointments have been made in accordance with the law requiring farmer-labor representation. Under the control of a progressive legislature, a most liberal appropriation bill for university purposes has been passed, carrying out an extensive program for new buildings and for the better support of various departments.

The Wisconsin Legislature is largely made up of farmers and representatives of union labor. The assurance of a change in university affairs was the prime factor which secured the passage of an appropriation bill unprecedentedly large. Appropriations heretofore have been pared down partly because farmers and wage workers felt that the university was being used as an instrument against them. The farmers once even went so far as to pass a bill through the Assembly abolishing all appropriations for farm institutes conducted under the auspices of the agricultural department, of which Professor Russell, an intolerant reactionary, is dean. It was largely through the influence of Dean Russell that George F. Comings was ousted as a farm institute lecturer. This incident was largely the cause of Mr. Comings being selected as a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor, which office he held for two terms.

About a year ago a group of juniors, seniors, and post-graduates went through the university catalogue with me and checked the names of all professors and instructors who could fairly be classed as liberals. Of the thousand names on the list, fewer than 100 received a check mark. While no Wisconsin liberals believe that any teachers who are proficient should be promoted, demoted, or driven out of the university faculty on account of their attitude toward any reform movements, yet we do believe that in filling future vacancies there will be an attempt to obtain at least a decent proportion of representatives of present-day liberal thought.

And we are confident that voluntary student organizations which wish to hear such speakers as Lincoln Steffens, Scott Nearing, and Mrs. Kate Richards O'Hare will not in the future, as in the past, be refused a hearing in university halls.

I notice from a reading of Eastern papers that the Coolidge Republicans are saying that Wisconsin is slipping back from the notable progressive position it has had. They fail to appreciate that reactionary forces have lost the university. And in the present session of the legislature reactionaries met pronounced defeat by the passage of a bill which will largely increase income taxes and effect a corresponding reduction on the farms and homes of the people.

Madison, Wisconsin, May 29 CHESTER C. PLATT

A Word of Praise

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have taken note of the coming sixtieth celebration of the founding of The Nation and as I am off to Hawaii next week I want to send you a word of congratulation. I think that you are certainly to be felicitated upon the high standard that you have managed to retain. Despite your rather incomprehensible opposition to the League of Nations, which marks, after all, the most earnest endeavor yet made by erring humanity to accomplish something really worth while in civilization—despite that rather glaring lapse, I may say in all sincerity that we all continue to feel refreshed and invigorated by your weekly blast on the trumpet of real liberalism and by your effort to inject a spiritual note into the politics and economics of the day. Your last few numbers have been even better than usual and so I say, a long life to The Nation!

New York, June 10 EDWIN R. SELIGMAN

Britain's Budget

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The discussion in and out of Parliament that has been aroused by the Winston Churchill budget indicates that its brilliant presentation failed to draw attention from its deficiencies and inconsistencies. The return to the gold standard is taken on trust by the man in the street, who is content to leave the subject to the financial experts. Nor is it possible to stir up much feeling over a reduction of income tax, however partial the application may be. But it is not difficult to foresee that industry will feel the strain of an insurance and pension scheme that calls for additional sacrifices from workers, employers, and taxpayers at a time of trade depression, or that the total volume of trade must be reduced by the imposition of import taxes and excise duties.

The success of the Snowden budget of a year ago was due to the fact that it removed restrictions and permitted a freer exercise of individual initiative. Mr. Churchill's proposals will have a contrary effect. Amusingly enough, the claims of individualism were recognized by an avowed Socialist while they are now flouted by a life-long champion of free trade. The fact is, of course, that politicians everywhere are opportunists to whom hard and fast principles are obnoxious. They are almost all Socialists, if by socialism we mean the regulation of human relationships by a multitude of special laws expressing the wisdom of Authority as opposed to that of the individuals whose lives are thus regulated. Whatever the party name, Tory, Liberal, Labor, Republican, or Democratic, the politicians are alike in their endeavors to add to the paternalistic powers of government.

Mr. Churchill's offering to the protectionists includes an extension of imperial preference by an increased tariff on dried fruit, sugar, tobacco, and wine, the reenactment of the "McKenna duties" on motor cars, musical instruments, clocks and watches and cinema films, and new import taxes on hops and silk, both real and artificial. Aside from the makers of high-class pianos, who have suffered somewhat from German competition, the trades originally affected by the McKenna duties have prospered during the year of open competition, and the revival of these taxes can only be justified on grounds of political expediency.

Besides reducing the sum total of trade, taxes on imports demand an increase in administrative machinery to deal with a complicated set of facts, to determine, for instance, whether consignments of automobiles and their component parts are to be regarded as trade vehicles or pleasure cars, and to decide what materials are to be grouped under the heading artificial silk. More government officials will be drawn from productive pursuits to assist in tax-collecting, and the cost of living will increase as the free movement of commodities is checked.

Mr. Churchill said that his "twin supreme objectives" were security of the home of the wage-earner against exceptional misfortunes and the encouragement of enterprise through a relief of the burdens resting upon industry. The extension of working-class insurance aimed to fulfil the first requirement; the changes in the income tax are addressed to the second. In spite of the fact that the wage-earners have been reduced to such a degree of poverty that they can no longer support themselves properly even when they can find employment, the methods of our governments are still adhered to and are likely to be until the victims discover that the state has no other source of wealth than the pockets of the people. To relieve distress it places new burdens upon industry and multiplies the candidates for relief. In these circumstances official tears for the poor are bound to be of the crocodile variety. No one knows this better than Mr. Lloyd George, who remarked epigrammatically that his friend and ancient colleague was particularly interested "in making provision for the widows and orphans of protection who suffered from heavy bereavement in the election of 1923."

Budget makers have it in their power to cement international friendships and to improve the prosperity of the country by doing away with monopolies and placing the burdens of government upon those who enjoy the chief benefits of public expenditure; or by creating new privileges, they may raise up enemies abroad while adding to the distress of a working population denied access to the unused natural resources that surround them. Added to its other shortcomings, the budget of 1925 fails to reduce the swollen expenses of the state.

Mr. Francis W. Hirst calls attention to the enormous appropriations for armaments, rising £20,000,000 above the actual expenditures of three years ago; and he makes the profound retort to the navy enthusiasts that solvency is the first line of defense not only for the nation but for civilization as well.

There are striking parallels between conditions in England today and those that existed a hundred years ago, after the Napoleonic Wars and the wholesale enclosure of the commons. But, alas, there is no Cobbett to ride about the countryside and comment on the follies of Parliament. The observant traveler, passing through this green and pleasant land, will feel inclined to echo his words: "What a system it must be to make people wretched in a country like this!"

Grasmere, England, May 5 FRANK W. GARRISON

Hindenburg as President

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: That Hindenburg personally is not the man who would want to take sensational or revolutionary steps nobody contests. The apprehension generally felt is, however, that an increasing influence may be exerted by those parties and men that have the power to guide, counsel, and coerce the old President. Will they not force him to give satisfaction to his 14,700,000 supporters by preparing the war of revenge or by putting an end at least to that "fulfilment-policy" which the nationalists have so fervently combated ever since it was started?

Practically everybody, whatever may be his wishes for a far future, wants Germany now to recover, and nothing else. The election, therefore, was mainly fought on lines of inner politics. The two groups stand for two opposing programs of inner reconstruction. If Jarres had remained the candidate of the "parties of the right," the economic and social controversy, most acute in Germany at this time, would have made a clear issue.

He belongs to the German People's Party, which without exaggeration may be called the party of the plutocracy and of Germany's so-called heavy industry. Had he become Ebert's successor, the election would simply have given expression to the fact that capitalistic power has been triumphant over the power of labor in the German Republic. The similarity between the German election and conservative victories in other countries, fought out under the slogan of "good business," such as the world has recently witnessed, would then have been evident to everybody. That Hindenburg, the representative of the monarchist, agrarian, and middle-class German Nationalist Party, was put up in place of Jarres for the second decisive election is due to tactical and demagogical reasons. To get the majority, a more popular man than Jarres is proved necessary. But when it comes to govern and to decide upon the line of politics, the German People's Party is sure to remain the most powerful group. It has the men, it has the money, and it alone can secure the necessary foreign credits. The Nationalists will take their share in the profits of a plutocratic government. Protective tariffs on agricultural products have already been promised to them. Capitalistic conservatism has its own ideas on reconstruction all the world over. There is nothing particularly remarkable about the German conservative program as compared with that of other conservative parties, especially as far as social and economic matters are concerned.

The fact that surprises and gives the German election its special flavor is that the commander-in-chief of "His Majesty's armies" should have been chosen to preside over a highly plutocratic republic.

Berlin, May 5 A. WOLFERS

Wanted: A Bootlegger

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the recent issues of your paper I have noticed, with no surprise but some interest, the efforts of the fundamentalists to protect their errors by forbidding the teaching of science—evolution—in the schools and colleges. Of course they might as well forbid the tide to rise; but in the meantime——

Do you know a good, enterprising young evolutionist who wants to go into the business of bootlegging evolution into the colleges? There should be a real opportunity for some young spirit of progress in this; for, if he can succeed with the bootlegging of evolution one-tenth of 1 per cent as well as others have succeeded in bootlegging liquor into the schools and colleges, he will do well.

This suggestion is made in all seriousness. Bootlegging evolution should grow to be an interesting business; for forbid the young knowledge, and they will thirst for it as never before, just as has been the case with strong drink. If your young man needs capital for his enterprise, tell him I would like to be the first subscriber.

Montreal, Canada, May 28 Charles A. Mullen

Virginia's Freedom

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is worth noting, I think, that among the numerous Southern and some Western and Eastern States that are making official or unofficial war against evolution, there is one Southern State conspicuous by its absence: namely, Virginia. While Tennessee and Texas, in particular, are enacting their anti-evolution law without a single protest from the State universities of these States, can any one imagine that if a similar attempt was made in Virginia the University of Virginia would keep silent? Hardly! Thanks be to Thomas Jefferson, it would not.

Moreover, the possiblity of the Virginia Legislature ever enacting a law in any way affecting religion is absolutely nil; not that the funadmentalist powers are weaker in Virginia than in the rest of the some twenty-four States listed as fighting evolution, but simply that the tradition of Thomas Jefferson is stronger. Jefferson introduced the Bill for Religious Freedom in the Virginia Legislature; he is also, to quote his own phrase, "Father of the University of Virginia," and neither the Virginia Legislature nor the University of Virginia will ever permit such desecration of his spirit as is being perpetrated in some twenty to thirty other States.

At the University of Virginia the spirit of Jefferson is very real—and from President Alderman down to every last man you meet with it, and can almost talk to it. Jefferson's passionate devotion for freedom—especially religious or non-religious freedom—is as interwoven with the life of the university, and as typical of it, as religious repression is in other States.

Let North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, Florida, West Virginia, California, etc., start all the anti-evolution rumpus they see fit to, Virginia will stand fast; for well she knows that Thomas Jefferson still walks the streets of Charlottesville—yes, and Richmond!

Chicago, May 17 Hugh Russell Fraser

Peddling Discredited Stuff

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It was my first visit to Washington, D. C. I had spent a most delightful day enjoying the beauty of the city and its "genius loci," and then went to the Congressional Library. While admiring the collection of engravings there, I came across a series of etchings entitled "German Atrocities," showing, in the famous Raemakers style, those all too well-known scenes of killing babies, mutilating prisoners, etc. Thus that beautiful day was spoiled for me.

Returning to Pittsburgh I went to the Carnegie Library in my customary search for books. Here, as usual, I first had a look at the little table where "specially recommended books" are displayed. The very first book of the half-a-dozen I got hold of was a voluminous compilation of alleged war atrocities bearing the title "German Barbarities."

Pittsburgh, June 4 T. E.

Quality and Prices

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the issue of June 10 you make the following remark: "Higher prices for food and clothing can be, and have been, countered in part by reductions in amount and by changes in kind or quality."

It seems to me that, rather than offsetting the high prices, the changes you mention have had the effect of further increasing the actual (not the nominal) cost of food and clothing, etc. We all more or less realize that the actual increase in the cost of living is greater than indicated by the official percentages published (varying between 60 and 80); and the reason for this is the general reduction in quality.

You also bring out the fact that the increase in rents is higher than for other commodities, and that rents are inflexible. I think the same explanation applies here: on account of the decrease in the quality of materials and workmanship, the actual cost (to the landlord) is increased more than indicated by the official figures (which are based on quantity rather than on quality). This excess in actual cost is passed along to the tenants, who are making unfair comparisons between the increases in the prices of various commodities on a quantitative basis.

The idea that higher prices can be countered by changes in kind and quality is a fallacy, I think; in my personal experience the changes in kind and quality have made the situation worse than appears on the face.

Baltimore, June 15 R. Reimann

Contributors to This Issue

Edward [illegible] is [illegible] covering the Scopes trial independently.

Silas Bent has been associate editor of the Nation's [illegible] and [illegible] staff writer on the New York Globe.

[illegible] Mansfield Foreman [illegible] Social Service, is returning from Russia through India, China, and Japan.

Frazier F. Peters has a farm at Westport, Connecticut.

Edward Sapir is a member of the staff of the Victoria Memorial Museum in Ottawa.

[illegible] Wrong is professor of history at the University of Toronto.

Woodbridge Riley, professor of philosophy at Vassar College, has made a special study of American religious history.

Ernst Feise is professor of German at Ohio State University.

Emery Neff is a member of the English department at Columbia University, and author of "Carlyle and Mill."

Joseph T. Shipley is a contributing editor of the Guardian, a new literary monthly published in Philadelphia.

Alice Beal Parsons has resigned her position with the World Tomorrow to devote her time to writing.

Books and Plays

Lovers of Happiness

By EDWARD SAPIR

Though I have never seen her comb her hair
Nor caught her eyes deep-looking in my face,
At ending shall I have her in embrace,
This is my certainty and this I swear
When I hear her singing down the morning stair
And past my door; in passionate disgrace
I pray to her and whisper time and place
Of the first happiness and last despair.

Why are you waiting, lovers, by the shore?
Here is no nymph come singing from the floor.
And tell me, lovers, can you see her comb
Her hair? The weedy bottom is our home.
And can you dimly see two lovers lie?
We are entranced and looking eye to eye.

First Glance

"XLI POEMS," by E. E. Cummings (The Dial Press), continues in almost every phase the tradition which Mr. Cummings established for himself two years ago with "Tulips and Chimneys." No long poems are here, but there are Songs, Portraits, Chansons Innocentes, Sonnets, and, war-pieces; and always the same man is writing, with the same unquestionable power and the same unnecessary tricks. The tricks are unnecessary because without them the power would be quite as apparent as it is now, if not a little more so. Nothing could disguise the fact that the author of the following song is full of poetry:

cruelly, love walk the autumn long;
the last flower in whose hair, thy lips are cold with songs for which is first to wither, to pass?

shallowness of sunlight falls and, cruelly, across the grass
Comes the moon

love, walk the autumn love, for the last flower in the hair withers;
thy hair is acold with dreams,
love thou art frail.

Nothing, except a slightly more wayward typography—of the sort, for instance, that makes it impossible to care very much for what is being said on the first page of the volume, where we learn that the sky is colored with spry pinks shy lemons greens coo l choc olate

s.

Essentially Mr. Cummings is an educated poet. For all his surface radicalism, for all his insistence that his mind is "a big hunk of irrevocable nothing" which performs "squirms of chrome" and executes "strides of cobalt," for all his warning to the timid reader that he will "utter lilac shrieks and scarlet bellowings," he is saturated with Chaucer, Spenser, and Shakespeare—to name only three of the great poets to whom he obviously has gone to school. Why should he not disregard the timid reader, as they did in their different ways, and fill his pages still fuller of the interesting and beautiful work of which he is capable? He has a richly sensuous mind; his verse is distinguished by fluidity and weight; he is equipped to range lustily and long among the major passions. May not his future lie in the direction of his second sonnet, which is a hymn in the grand style—but his grand style—to love?

O Thou to whom the musical white spring offers her lily inextinguishable, taught by thy tremulous grace bravely to fling

Implacable death's mysteriously sable robe from her redolent shoulders, Thou from whose feet reincarnate song suddenly leaping flameflung, mounts, inimitably to lose herself where the wet stars softly are keeping their exquisite dreams—O Love! upon thy dim shrine of intangible commemoration, (from whose faint close as some grave languorous hymn pledged to illimitable dissipation unhurried clouds of incense fleetly roll)

i spill my bright incalculable soul.

MARK VAN DOREN

"Sam Slick"

Thomas Chandler Haliburton ("Sam Slick"). A Study in Provincial Toryism. By V. L. O. Chittick. Columbia University Press. $4.

THE historian who, like the author of this book, sets out to prove something is walking in a path of danger. All too easily will he fix his attention on what supports his opinion, and perhaps quite unconsciously ignore what does not. Thomas Chandler Haliburton, the author of the pungent and humorous philosophy of Sam Slick of Slickville, is said to have been described by Artemus Ward, a follower in the same school, as the "father of American humor." The insight and wit of Sam Slick have become proverbial. Mr. Chittick has gone to every conceivable source of information concerning the character of the creator and he has produced a book which for the thoroughness of its research and the excellence of its literary style deserves to rank high. It is, however, written for the avowed purpose of proving that Haliburton has been overpraised. Mercilessly the author draws up a long list of his defects. In politics he sometimes showed dishonesty and trickery, and his Toryism was so reactionary as to appear ludicrous even among Tories. He was a snob who in Nova Scotia kept up an absurd social exclusiveness and in England was a toady, greedy for honors. He had the effrontery to claim credit not his due. He spent "a lifetime of self-indulgence and convivial dissipation." In religion he yielded to bigotry. As a judge he was rather ignorant of law, and on the bench, misled by his sense of humor, he lacked dignity. In literature he was a plagiarist, and in his own work sometimes insincere, inconsistent, grandilo-quent, and morbidly emotional. In 1856 Haliburton removed to England and soon secured a seat in the House of Commons. There, as we should expect at his time of life, he won no distinction, but he was hardly the bore described here. The author, as a climax, doubts whether Artemus Ward ever said that Haliburton was the father of American humor, and he is so anxious to prove Haliburton a failure that, while he mentions one of his sons who gained no distinction, he does not mention another who became a British peer.

Though this ungrateful task has been carried out with great ability and thoroughness, one is tempted to ask whether the author has really lowered Haliburton's fame. Similar defects might be found in many persons of high renown. Readers of Sam Slick will inquire less as to the personality of his creator than as to the interest of his work. No doubt it is uneven. Probably Haliburton should never have written "The Attaché," which is a tedious book with its fundamental error in literary tact of promoting a Yankee peddler to a diplomatic post in London. The political writings of a colonial Tory, looking out on a narrow world, have now lost all value. Sam Slick is Haliburton's enduring creation. Let those who doubt the vitality of the book correct this impression by reading it again. Like Shakespeare, Haliburton used existing material, and like Shakespeare he gave it the vivifying touch. We may be grateful to Mr. Chittick for tracking Haliburton's ideas to their sources, but this book would not have been less enduring had it been without the itching desire to paint a portrait unlike the older ones. Haliburton's best work shows that he had acute insight and penetrating wit. He had also a rich variety created either by his own genius or by an eager pursuit of his materials.

The real value of this "Life" is not in its redrawing of Haliburton but in its account of the setting of Haliburton's life. The Nova Scotia where he lived was and is still a new New England. Only rarely did Haliburton visit the United States, yet he found qualities in the people about him which made him a real interpreter of Yankee character. Haliburton is not less but more creative because he could portray a Connecticut peddler and yet himself be a high Tory, trying in his mode of life to copy the style of the English country gentleman, scorning democracy, and pursuing rather snobbish friendships with persons of rank. This book furnishes illuminating glimpses of the outlook of the Loyalists from whom Haliburton was descended. There was strife between them and settlers from New England who had gone to Nova Scotia before the Revolution to occupy the lands of the departed Acadians. The better educated of the Loyalists formed an exclusive aristocracy. Gentility was their watchword and admission to the select circles of the little towns of Windsor and Annapolis was not easy. Haliburton was educated at King's College, Windsor, an exaggerated copy of what was to be found at Oxford. All matriculants had to sign the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, and they were forbidden to attend not only "the Romish mass" but also the "meeting-houses"—not, be it observed, the "churches" of Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, or of "any other dissenters from the Church of England." This was not only aristocratic but heroic amid a population prevailingly non-Anglican. Clearly the Loyalists had the courage of their Tory convictions, but these so confined the influence of the college, the oldest post-revolutionary college of the British Empire, that today it has sunk to insignificance. For a long time, however, it trained the greater part of the Anglican clergy and the higher officials of Nova Scotia. The Loyalists were able to monopolize nearly all the public offices, which they accepted as more than due to their sacrifices. This spirit of dependence made some of them indolent and unenterprising. Nova Scotia had many "slackers," farmers too lazy even to manure their fields, traders who would not pay to secure tribute for their energy. Haliburton the Tory was not afraid to render his country the service of saying these things with biting wit, and perhaps one of the unconscious reasons of the present author's attack is his resentment as a Nova Scotian at the contempt for the colony which Haliburton promoted.

Mr. Chittick's book, in spite of its bias, will probably never be surpassed in the thoroughness of its method. A chapter is given to each of Haliburton's works. Two chapters, The Gen-u-ine Yankee and The Father of American Humor, have involved wide reading of authors others than Haliburton, and they throw doubt both on the accuracy of his picture of the Yankee and on the originality of his humor. Mr. Chittick's numerous split infinitives are readily forgiven, but it is not so easy to forgive "dependable" and "dependability," or, in a professor of literature, the statement that one publication "likely antedated" another. The final summing-up against Haliburton covers two pages without a full stop. Even then we are left in doubt as to whether the overpraise of Haliburton was really so mischievous as to justify a corrective so ponderous.

GEORGE M. WRONG

Religious Psychology and History

The New Psychology and the Preacher. By H. C. Miller. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

Religious Experience of John Humphrey Noyes, Founder of the Oneida Community. By G. W. Noyes. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The History of Religion in the United States. By H. K. Rowe. The Macmillan Company. $2.

MR. MILLER starts with the dubious statement that "in every one of us there are two distinct egos. The first is the ego we wish to believe we are, and is called the Ideal Ego; the second is the ego we really are, and is called the Real Ego." This is poor philosophy, hardly held since the days of Fichte and then with dubious success. As for the author's theology, it harks back to the analogy-loving souls of the age of symbolism. So when the double interpretation of Scripture is put in terms of Freud the result is grotesque. The legend of Lot's wife being turned into a pillar of salt is said to teach us that her "retrospective orientation resulted in crystallization."

With this equipment the writer takes up such tremendous topics as the Unconscious Motive and Its Place in Life, Determinism and Free Will, the Evolution of Religion and the Religion of Evolution; and adds that the challenge of the new psychology cannot be ignored. The reader will hardly accept the challenge, for the way psychoanalysis is used is fantastic beyond measure. Mr. Miller is evidently not satisfied with the more or less current coinage of Oedipus complex, Narcissus complex, and the like—phrases which have at least the advantage of classical reference. This Scotch medical man prefers local references. So in explaining the analogies of human relationships he propounds the "Peter Pan motif." But worse is yet to come. The "Dear Brutus motif" signifies protection and rationalization, with the lesson that nobility [illegible] in fantasy (if it does not flourish in reality).

We wish that some competent psychoanalyst could apply his principles to "The Religious Experience of John Humphrey Noyes." The early life of the notorious founder of the Oneida Community is here presented in a strangely objective way by an editor who is evidently one of the family. In the bald presentation of repellent facts the book gives much the same impression as was given by the astonishing book of Daniel Drew, the old Erie Railroad financier, who invented the famous phrase about "watering stock." In the Noyes documents there is no attempt to hide family skeletons. The youthful religionist suffered from morbid fears of his sinfulness, but in his reaction from the Calvinistic doctrine of total depravity he went to the other extreme—belief in perfectionism or absolute sinlessness. This ultimately became a convenient excuse for those who like Noyes were actually described as subject to the libido corporis. Having, then, declared himself saved from sin, the perfectionist soon found his "old conscience gone." But in spite of his conviction of having attained "full redemption of soul and body," he soon suffered from loss of appetite and loss of sleep, and feared he would die by "immediate dissolution." He was also afflicted with universal doubt, was plagued with the delusion that he was the Devil, and took to ardent spirits, with the result that his own sister described him as certainly deranged and the public called him "Crazy John Noyes."

Noyes and his followers now declared themselves "free from law." They claimed a kind of moral moratorium and sought to institute a "reconstructed society" free from ordinary restraints. This "Bible communism," as in the case of the Mormons, ended in sex scandals, and, as in the case of the Anabaptists and Doukhobors, the "insufficient clothing dream" became a reality. The polite name for all this is antinomianism, and this, as the editor explains, took different forms according to the temperamental susceptibility of its subjects. In those inclined to sensuality it assumed the form of lasciviousness, and what Noyes himself says under this specific heading is most curious. He refers to the goings-on among a "group of handsome and brilliant young women" at Brimfield, and speaks of the revival of "bundling," that ancient custom being a cause of which the scarlet letter was an effect. Noyes at first did not indulge in this "gospel liberty." But later, in the Oneida Community, the "demonstration of the spirit over the flesh" was expounded by him in an exceedingly rare pamphlet, a treatise of such a character that the editor, if he ever completes his projected second volume, will not be able to pass it through the mails. The pamphlet expounds "complex marriage"—which was simply the Oneida Community leader's claim for the jus primae noctis.

In marked contrast to this study of a narrow, morbid, and unhealthy religious fanatic, Mr. Rowe's "History" is written with much spirit and contains some fine generalizations. The first chapter is especially dramatic. It presents as the two motives of our religious history the conflicting factors of authority and dissent. Under the former comes Puritanism, which was not so much an institution as an attitude. As an instrument of government it proved a failure both in England and America. As a moral censorship it was too stern and provoked an unwholesome reaction. As an interpretation of religion it was too narrowly theological, and too out of sympathy with an abounding life.

This principle of "overhead authority" had as its counterpart the principle of dissent. This in turn explains the three phases of emancipation, namely, the splitting off of the various sects, the substitution of formal worship by the emotional evangelicalism of Wesley and Whitefield, and the emancipation from the traditional views of a Protestant orthodoxy. These conflicting motifs of what might be called consent and dissent run through the whole drama of the American mind. The former explains the conservatism of the prosperous cla[illegible]: Puritanism was especially the religion of the people who were making money by trade and whose children were to become capitalists. Dissent, on the other hand, involves a certain economic loss to the country. Duplication of work by the denominations runs through our entire history, and until the rise of the Federal Council of Churches no successful attempt was made to pool the conflicting interests. Here, it might be remarked, the Protestant churches learned too late the lesson of big business. Forced by an analogous cutthroat competition, they saw that trusts bring efficiency. But the Federal Council was only a paper trust, an affair of card catalogues and expensive secretaries. Further, denominationalism, says Mr. Rowe, resembles nationalism; and he might have added that the reluctance to accept overhead authority hampered a league of churches just as it hampers a League of Nations.

Meanwhile, one church has come to the fore because of its unity and solidarity. The author points out that the church of Rome suffers from certain drawbacks, that its genius is European not American, that it has had its internal bickerings because Irish-Americans, German-Americans, and Italian-Americans breathed the new air of freedom. But Mr. Rowe does not sufficiently stress the principle of authority and unquestioning obedience which has overcome "Americanism" in partibus infidelium. The Ku Klux Klan has had a sort of animal instinct against this form of foreign control, and, like the old Know Nothing Party and the American Protective Association, it can appeal to the principles of Yankee independence. But the Klan in turn suffers from a false historical perspective. Conventional opinions as to the virtues of our ancestors have magnified with time and warped the judgment of those brought up on goody-goody schoolbooks. Even Mr. Rowe is unconsciously affected with this blind spot. He makes too little of the effects of early freethinking. He points to the skeptical influences of France and of such a patriot as Thomas Paine upon "even some of the statesmen of the country," but he fails to show how profound those influences were. Franklin was privately a polytheist; Jefferson inveighed against "the pious young monks of Harvard and Yale"; and even the Father of his Country was suspected of deism and, like the first gentleman of the land that he was, declined to give any intimation of his religious beliefs.

Another dubious generalization of Mr. Rowe's is that war is never productive of spiritual fervor. This hardly jibes with the fact that the World War has given a new lease of life to the churches, if one is to believe the American church statistics since 1918 and if one remembers the parallel growth of clericalism in France and Italy. There is also the outburst of fundamentalism—a topic not mentioned here by name, though it is suggested by some remarks on the conflict of science and theology. This theme might have been expanded with profit, for it is a curious fact that where Puritanism flourished science languished, as appears from the contrast between the Boston of runaway Franklin and the Virginia of anti-clerical Jefferson. But such faults of omission are of slight importance compared with the great mass of well-digested material furnished by this interesting volume.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

From the German Past

Die Kulturwerte der deutschen Literatur in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung. Band II: Von der Reformation bis zur Aufklärung. Von Kuno Francke. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung.

THIS book bears the stamp of the spiritual sufferings and consolations of a man and a scholar. It is no mere accident that from Professor Francke's pen comes simultaneously a booklet of verse testifying to his larger life during the last decade:

[illegible]
Thrown into deep abyss of common fate:
[illegible]
[illegible]

Thus speaks a man who for more than thirty years has interpreted the higher spiritual achievements of Germany to the youth of America, who with loving care has collected in the Germanic Museum at Cambridge the treasures of German art, who has steeped himself in the cultures of these two peoples, ever alive to the question, What may and must they mean to each other? During the war, when he was attacked on both sides, the work of a lifetime seemed on the point of crumbling. The ensuing economic enslavement of his native land, with whose best achievements he had identified himself as a mystic with his God, filled him with despair. But out of all this senseless chaos and misery his high and valiant idealism bade him seek to extract meaning. For an analogy he returned to the German past, and from his researches there the second volume of the "'Kulturwerte" was born.

Two figures tower at the beginning and end of the book: Erasmus and Luther. They are separated by almost three centuries of suffering and humiliation in a nation which is overwhelmed through economic collapse, harassed and impoverished by religious wars. But in spite of such distressing conditions "Lessing's consciousness of the moral responsibility of the individual is, considered historically, the result of the whole movement of German culture, which, ushered in by Luther, had even during the collapse of political institutions, during stagnation and social decline, gained a new impulse and found a higher goal in the self-determination and self-elevation of the individual."

To prove his thesis Professor Francke drives new shafts into the barren lode of these literary strata, and he finds in them hidden veins of undaunted manliness, of sturdy virtue, of genuine "Volksbewusstsein," and of productive idealism, with the result that he can interestingly revaluate such figures as Sebastian Franck, Johann Rist, Haller, and others. Two ideas are at work in the best men of the time: the belief in human reason as a regulative force of life, and a mystic vision of this universe wherein there is so much apparent chaos and suffering. The happier period when Germany's leaders were to become the teachers of a nation and of the world is to be the subject of Professor Francke's third volume. It is hoped that this task may be completed in sunny and peaceful years.

ERNST FEISE

The Importance of Being Earnest

Carlyle Till Marriage (1795-1826). By David Alec Wilson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $6.

Carlyle to the "French Revolution" (1826-1837). By David Alec Wilson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $6.

THE time is propitious for a fair portrait of the most representative of the Victorians. We are far enough away to be just, and close enough to be sympathetic. A rare union of justice and sympathy distinguishes Mr. Wilson's biography. A Scotchman grown almost to manhood in Carlyle's lifetime, and acquainted with a host of his friends and kinsfolk, Mr. Wilson presents the theological and political prejudices from which Carlyle revolted with an understanding that will become increasingly difficult as we withdraw from the atmosphere of his age. He is in sympathy with the pacifism, the collectivism, and the pantheism of the youthful Carlyle, and with his ethics even to their basis in outworn conceptions of "conscience" and "laws of Nature," yet is sufficiently detached to be fair to John Stuart Mill and others who opposed his favorite doctrines, and sufficiently of the present moment to use psychoanalytical methods of interpretation. It is only to be regretted that he has accepted the conventional judgment of Bentham, and has not treated the economic situation and doctrines of the time with enough thoroughness and understanding. Unfortunately, Mr. Wilson has not been so happy in his selection and arrangement of materials. His sentences are often clumsy, and the short, discreet chapters prevent a flow of narrative. Almost a third of the eight hundred and fifty pages is given over to matters of little significance, while colorful passages are omitted lest they "pain the pious." Of new materials, the most interesting are letters from Francis Jeffrey and Gustave d'Eichthal, the Saint-Simonian, which throw important light on the genesis of "Sartor Resartus." Mr. Wilson's work, which will extend to five volumes, will nevertheless supersede the prejudiced and inaccurate Froude. It may also remain indefinitely the standard life, for it is doubtful if many important facts have escaped the diligence of Mr. Wilson's thirty years' research. Henceforth scholars will find much less profit in seeking new biographical data than in interpreting those we have in the light of Carlyle's times, whose history, as Mr. Lytton Strachey has remarked, will never be written because we know too much about it.

The two volumes which have been published take us through the storm and stress of Carlyle's apprenticeship to his fame at forty-two. They reveal a much more human figure than the prophet of the hero-worshipers or the morose prig of the iconoclasts; a naive and dreadfully earnest rustic, whose tactlessness and too apparent consciousness of superior talents impede advance in the great world. He feels, but conquers, the temptation to advance toward a rich pulpit after he has ceased to believe Christianity. His "conversion," so dramatically described in "Sartor Resartus," comes but gradually with relief from poverty, ill-health, and the pains of courtship. For Jane Welsh, a clever village coquette, holds him dangling until she despairs of richer suitors, and keeps him properly grateful during their married life by allusions to the good matches she has sacrificed for him. He yearns for leisure to write a masterpiece; then discovers, when he has the leisure, that he has nothing to say. Obliged to be a journalist, he finds the necessity of courting editors and sparing the public unpalatable truths too great a price to pay for a comfortable livelihood. But his path is smoothed by a wise patron, Jeffrey, editor of the Edinburgh Review, who teaches him tolerance and urbanity; and his angularities are softened by his own puritanic zeal for self-correction. This self-corrective zeal leads him to overpraise humility, renunciation (the famous Entsagen), silence, and lack of self-consciousness, the virtues he finds hardest to practice. In an era when most men of intelligence know that church and state rest on illusions, but find it comfortable to "humbug the people because they like it," his blunt sincerity becomes mistaken for originality. Though Jeffrey is shocked by his exposure of the intellectual nakedness of fashionable poets like Tom Moore and Felicia Hemans, and of the waste and injustice of the sacred system of private property and free competition, persistence in this course of puncturing shams makes Carlyle the most influential man of letters of his age.

As such he will be perennially interesting to the historian, but now that his social gospel has been refined upon by subtler minds and his prophetic jargon become wearisome, the general reader will find the more lasting qualities of his work in its Brobdingnagian humor, vivid historical re-creations, purple patches of inimitable stylistic beauty, and marvelous pen portraits. Especially the pen portraits, which are unexcelled in the language. Witness one of the less known, that of the poet-banker Samuel Rogers: "a half-frozen sardonic Whig-Gentleman: no hair at all, but one of the whitest bare scalps, blue eyes, shrewd, sad and cruel; toothless horse-shoe mouth drawn up to the very nose: slow-croaking, sarcastic insight, perfect breeding"; which reveals the ancien régime in a lightning flash. We will continue to read Carlyle, not as philosophy to instruct, but as poetry to animate.

EMERY NEFF

Cave of the Winds

James Joyce—His First Forty Years. By Herbert S. Gorman. B. W. Huebsch. $2.

IT is time that controversy over "Ulysses" ended and criticism began. From the cohorts of Shane Leslie, who angrily condemned yet grudgingly allowed credit, or of Arnold Bennett, who mingled the extremes of praise and blame, and from the rival camp of T. S. Eliot, hailing the new prophet, shouts and answering volleys reascended. Unfortunately, despite his first sentence—"It should be explained immediately that this book is more expositional than critical"—Mr. Gorman stands distinctly with the adulators. "It is difficult to look back across this day without amazement at the marvelous ingenuity and assiduous realism of the author. . . . Rabelais is pale beside it and is due to grow much paler before the drunken evening has played its course. The 'Satyricon' is the work of a child (an obscene child) placed beside it."

One may wonder to what extent a similar glorification extends to the earlier writings of Joyce. It seems safe to say, as of the Shakespeare of Lucrece and of Adonis, that the early Joyce will be remembered because of his later accomplishment. "A Portrait of the Artist" marks the discovery, "Ulysses" the first exploration, of the new world of the twentieth-century novel. Mr. Gorman shows the ties between the new continent and the old; he traces the growth of the novel from the loose form of Samuel Richardson through Thackeray to the more disciplined form of the French, from which spring the experiments of Dorothy Richardson and Proust and the "novel-epic" of Joyce. Curiously, Mr. Gorman calls Joyce a realist; this must be because he mistakes for a "new art form beyond the novel" what is in reality a new method within the quite inclusive novel-form. Mr. Gorman has stated the new intention: "the almost impossible task of coordinating the unconscious, of noting the reactions of the essential mind to the entire cosmos"; and since this is but the definition of "psychosis," we may venture to call the new method "psychosism." Joyce's journey with a human soul through the actual incidents of that Dublin day follows the method of psychosism.

In Mr. Gorman's desire to praise he twice falsely accuses his author. He calls a passage difficult, "but a sharp reader will note a slight hint of Mr. Kernan's activities." What reader so dull that he will not notice the separately paragraphed sentence: "Mr. Kernan, pleased with the order he had booked, walked boldly along James's Street?" The "difficulties" of Joyce are also exaggerations. Again, Mr. Gorman tells us on two occasions that Joyce has given a complete picture of Dublin; then he reverses himself and criticizes the novelist because the picture is really but a partial one. For the interior monologue Joyce has already indicated his French source. In the use of parody he has not troubled to match manner and mood; in pure word delight he breathes the dust of Gertrude Stein; in fore-echoing (fragments chosen from a chapter and placed in free-verse arrangement at its head) he has not achieved a mosaic or a thematic treatment such as an operatic prelude sustains; his use of what Mr. Gorman calls the "examination paper" device is delightfully suggestive. Indeed, one of the chief glories of the book is that, far from being a brilliant tour de force, a tremendous pose at the end of a blind alley, it opens many widening roads on any of which novelists may journey through fertile land. To those who have not read "Ulysses" Mr. Gorman will bring the desire; to those who have he offers the stimulation of frequent dissent.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

The Saint and Love

The Golden Door. By Evelyn Scott. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

MAN'S craving for suffering, though a very little of it goes a long way in actual practice, is only less deep-seated and primal than his craving for love. Hence the persistence in the world of the sacrificial elements of religion, and of that morbid overdevelopment of the enjoyment of suffering which is probably the distinguishing characteristic of the saint, and which so complicates the saint's experience of love. The universality of this craving for suffering makes it possible, and inevitable at one time or another, for every race to produce its Dostoevsky. And so one should dismiss in advance the criticism certain to be made that in this story of a modern saint Evelyn Scott is fallaciously trying to engraft Russian torture and terror and mysticism on to our wholesome Anglo-Saxon stock.

Yet, though her book appears to be a minutely exact story of three individuals' reactions to a situation interesting in itself and having the salable quality of being produced by the most up-to-the-minute modern stimuli and ideas—so realistically embodied that many New Yorkers will flatter themselves, falsely, that they know the hero; though it appears to be as minutely accurate a portrayal of certain of the soul's shadows as a Whistler etching is a minutely accurate portrayal of certain London waterside shadows; undeniably it produces mental colic in the reader. Are we then too finicky for truth? Or is the rendering, brilliant and suggestive as it is, less accurate than it intends to be?

Possibly certain characteristics of Mrs. Scott's style will give a clue. "The cedars, swaying in the dead afternoon light, were like dark green fires above her head. The grass blades, in moist thin flames beneath them, pierced the loose black earth." Admitting, if we can, both figures as expressing the reactions of an excited, unhappy imagination, we still find equally distorted metaphors occurring to all the other characters, and in impersonal narration. "With a roar of darkness the night rushed down from the sky." Not a tropic night, but a rainy evening in Massachusetts, when the coming of darkness would presumably be cloaked by clouds or fog. "The rustle of surf," a sound probably familiar to every reader, is compared to "a noise like boiling paper," a sound which probably not half-a-dozen readers have ever heard. "Paul was as if stabbed by her voice, which fell toward him as from a ray of starlight." "The black greasy engine, in its volcanic direction, bore down upon the diminutive people waiting on the vibrating platform. The booming sides of the engine seemed inflated. The iron breathed. The smoke, thinned with light for an instant, poured above it turgidly. When the smoke appeared, as if miraculously, above the stack, it seemed mixed with milk."

Here, as the mental furniture often of the same person, are commonplace literary exaggerations, alternating curiously with distorted images and the final precise description of the smoke. There is little connection between this and the style of Blake, that "literalist of the imagination," from whom, significantly, Mrs. Scott has quoted on the title page. Blake translates what he has seen and the reader has not seen into a recognizable image; Evelyn Scott creates unrecognizable images. This perverse manner is more than matched by the distortion of intellect involved in viewing the pains and ecstasies of youthful love through the medium of disillusioned sophistication, it being one thing to introduce a middle-aged cynic, in the manner of dramatists from Shakespeare down, as a commentator on youth's ardors, and quite another thing to deny the validity of the lovers' emotions by giving them to us only as they filter through the cynic's mind.

It is the more to be regretted that Mrs. Scott's very considerable talent should thus have run amuck, because she has rested the chief claim of her book on the value of its observations and on the vigor with which she has expressed them. There is in it, just as there is in any chance encounter between two individuals, in any adventure of any soul, enough material to keep many artists busy many lifetimes. But apparently she has not turned her attention to that primary concern of the artist which marks him off from the innumerable observers of human conduct, the invention of a form through which to embody his emotion or his observation, his ecstasy or his despair.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Books in Brief

The Lives and Works of the Uneducated Poets. By Robert Southey. Edited by J. S. Childers. Oxford University Press. $1.20.

This new volume in the exquisite "Oxford Miscellany" preserves the essay which Southey wrote in 1831 as a preface to the poems of John Jones, a butler who had appealed to him as poet laureate for assistance in publication.

The Common Reader. By Virginia Woolf. Harcourt, Brace and Company.

Mrs. Woolf here collects her brilliant and fluent essays on Chaucer, the Pastons, Jane Austen, Montaigne, Addison, Defoe, George Eliot, and others. It is the criticism of a woman, and it is valuable criticism.

The Laxdæla Saga. Translated from the Icelandic, with an introduction by Thorstein Veblen. B. W. Huebsch, Inc. $2.50.

An economist presents one of the finest of the sagas for what it is worth as a document in social history.

Edmund Spenser. An Essay on Renaissance Poetry. By W. L. Renwick. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.75.

Criticism of Spenser has latterly been dull beyond endurance. Mr. Renwick breaks the spell with a learned but unpedantic discourse upon the ideas and the art—conceived in their simplest terms—of this most serious great poet.

Luis de Leon. A Study of the Spanish Renaissance. By Aubrey F. G. Bell. Oxford University Press. $10.

For its learning and its understanding this volume must remain the authoritative account in English of the great mystic, poet, and professor of Salamanca.

A Fool i' the Forest: A Phantasmagoria. By Richard Aldington. The Dial Press.

The Pot of Earth. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

Two philosophical poems which are more interesting for the tendency they reflect than for their actual accomplishment. Mr. Aldington's effort is rendered practically negligible through the fact that "The Waste Land" preceded it and was better; Mr. MacLeish, writing with greater passion, produces an impressive hymn on love and birth and death.

Sung to Shahryar. Poems from The Book of the Thousand and One Nights. By E. Powys Mathers. Albert and Charles Boni. $1.75.

A welcome selection, the work of an experienced translator of Oriental verse.

Drama

Two Revues

I HAVE always felt that the typical American musical comedy or revue was damned by its refinement and only partially redeemed by the lavish expenditure of effort and money. When you have extracted from this type of entertainment the rowdiness of the burlesque show and the impudence of the café chantant you have nothing left except color, movement, and flesh—excellent things in themselves but cloying before the end of an evening. And the result, however lavish the production, is always a little insipid. Our satire is too timid to count, and without suggesting that the American managers follow the French tradition which makes the President of the Republic the hero of every risqué story, one often wishes that they were not so respectful as to earn for themselves that double-edged compliment which Chamfort paid one of his contemporaries when he remarked: "His satires show the goodness of his heart."

It is for this reason that I welcome with particular delight the Theater Guild's "Garrick Gaieties" (Garrick Theater) and the "Grand Street Follies" (Neighborhood Playhouse). Not since Mr. Cohan abandoned his revues have we had such successful attempts to base a superior entertainment upon wit rather than money; and both show a highly commendable effort to put teeth into satire. Mr. Bryan has been so long a butt that the scene in the "Garrick Gaieties" where he comes to the jungle to prosecute, in behalf of the monkeys, one of their number who has offended simian delicacy by the theory that they are all related to the human species is not particularly daring; but the scene in the same review where Mr. Coolidge, just returned at 11:10 from a very late party, discusses public affairs with his wife is as intimately and disrespectfully personal as a revue should be. To my mind, the youth, gaiety, and impudence of the entertainments under discussion more than make up for their relative deficiency in smoothness, splendor, and expenditure.

In both, the burlesques of the season's dramatic successes are pointed and amusing. At the Garrick, Alfred Lunt, Lynn Fontanne, Richard Bennett, and Pauline Lord are ludicrously caricatured; at the Neighborhood, a play variously called "Lust Under the Locusts" and "They Knew What they Wanted Under the Elms" shows the Firebrand arriving in the nick of time to substitute at the rendezvous which various famous characters have made with Cleopatra, Amy, Carla (Lenore Ulrich), and Abbie at the four-room road-house under the elms; but perhaps the most amusing of all is the skit "What Price Morning Glories" in the same revue, which presents a version of the Anderson-Stallings play as revised by John Golden and passed by the play jury. Charmaine, keeper of a soft drink bar, is revealed watering the morning glories and beseeching them to bloom before the arrival of the soldiers upon whom they have so refining an effect. Captain Flag and the sergeant, both painfully honorable suitors, arrive and under the influence of repeated nut sundaes unloose their flowery vocabularies. "Chrysanthemum, but it's hot," says the Captain; "Go to Heliotrope," replies the sergeant; and gradually every flower the garden wears betrays a sound startlingly suggestive of some violent expletive until the sergeant, forgetting himself completely, hurls at his superior officer the final insult: "You son of a bachelor's button, you." Still, American soldiers never completely forget themselves, and so, after settling their rivalry for the hand of Charmaine by counting out an eeny, meeny, miny, moe, they depart joyously for another week of the delightful and refining sport of war. Special mention should also be made of the dancing of June Cochrane in the "Gaieties" and of the work of that extraordinary mimic, Albert Carroll, who presents in the "Follies" a whole gallery of imitations ranging all the way from Toto, the clown, to Pavlova dancing "The Swan."

"Kosher Kitty Kelly" (Times Square Theater) is a comedy with songs which is everything the title suggests. Mrs. Al Smith calls it "ten times funnier than 'Abie's Irish Rose'."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

Every evening except Monday 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE 466 GRAND ST.
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

A Civilized Picture of Uncivil People
BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK
Intelligently Directed by James Cruze
CRITERION 2:30 8:30

International Relations Section

The French War in Morocco

THE war in Morocco continues; exaggerated rumors report large French losses, and all reports agree that the struggle between the French and Abdel Krim, leader of the Riffians, who last year decisively defeated the Spaniards, is likely to be long and arduous. Throughout France the Communists are conducting an aggressive campaign against the war; some Socialists support them, but the parliamentary party has been unable to make up its mind what to do. Some have abstained from voting. Painlevé, who entered office as a Left premier, has been receiving votes of confidence in which the Right unanimously supported him, while his own Left was divided. A new parliamentary line-up has seemed possible.

The first general debates upon Moroccan policy occurred in the French Chamber on May 27, 28, and 29. Extracts from the reports of these debates in the Paris Temps will reveal the position of the Government, the outspoken opposition of the Communists, and the hesitation of the Socialists. A letter written by the cabinet chief of Marshal Lyautey, French governor-general of Morocco, to the marshal's nephew in Paris, also throws light upon the situation. This letter, written on May 25, 1925, came somehow into the hands of M. Doriot, a Communist deputy, and was read by him in the Chamber on June 9. In it the officer tells how he arranges that the proper kind of dispatches appear in the Paris press, admits that Marshal Lyautev seized a moment when Abdel Krim was busy with the Spanish to advance his lines, and suggests a prospect of eternal war:

THE LETTER

My dear friend: I have just received your interesting letters of the 19th and 22nd. First, let it be well understood that similar letters coming from you to me are always infinitely precious and that it is not necessary for you to excuse yourself for writing to me. You understand that for the "Parisian front" I try to unite my means of action and in the interest of conerence and efficiency to get them to work together. And you, the nephew, so well placed by your position and by your contacts, are, I assure you, one of the master-pieces in my action. It is thus that I have always considered you—today more than ever.

This understood, do not forget that you have, at Paris, excellent sources of information both for details and for synthesis—Nacivet and Séguy on the one hand, Colonel Vincent on the other.

From the beginning of hostilities, I have made it a principle to hold all the documents at your disposition. For the last fifteen or twenty days, I have been addressing to some of our agents a certain number of joint letters which I believe very explicit and complete, in which I reply in advance to the questions that you have put to me. Vincent knows everything. His remarkable article in the Illustration of May 16 proves that to the hilt. I know very well that all of them have their faults. But I am obliged to do the best I can; after all, they have their qualities.

And this is my excuse for not having written to you, for I sincerely believed that all I had written to Séguy and to Nacivet was given you, and that you saw them almost daily. Inasmuch as their role now makes them the source of all information, establish an intimate liaison with them and get them to show you my papers.

As to the journalists, a good handful of whom are now at Fez, I believe that they are well oriented and that their dispatches will be of a nature to dissipate certain mistakes and rumors.

I reply to your questions:

Criticism of the surprise, which falls into three sections: (a) We were not informed; (b) We made a mistake in establishing a chain of small posts which were quickly encircled and which we had to disengage; (c) We made a mistake in moving in May, 1924, north of the Werga.

Reply: The marshal was so well informed and had looked ahead so well that as early as January, 1924 (see his reports to the Government) he had perceived: (a) That Abdel Krim in view of the Spanish bankruptcy (evacuation and entente) would attack; (b) That his attack would be sudden, sharp (lesson of events in the Spanish zone); (c) That he would attack by means of propaganda and terror among the subject tribes.

That is why, in May, 1924, when Abdel Krim, too occupied with the Spanish, was unable to reply, he sought to form, to the north of Fez, the vital point and probable aim of the invasion, a strategic front better than that offered us by the south bank of the Werga. Since May, 1924, that front has been reinforced, fortified, and connected with the rear by a system of roads, bridges, and railroads. . . .

As to the political principle—as you say, have a little patience, hang it! The whole question is one of knowing what the adversary will do inasmuch as we are unable to go to him.

Either he will negotiate. But what will that be worth for the future?

Or he will continue to attack us, at one time at one point, and another time at another. That means perpetual war;

Or we will be enabled to enter his country, in agreement with the other Powers—and that is a very great affair.

Do not ask the marshal to do like Primo de Rivera, announce what he intends to do, which cost him dearly as you know. . . .

One thing is sure: The marshal is completely, effectively, and materially in accord with the Government, and the Government is doing all that should be done. To sustain him is the duty of all good Frenchmen who do not forget that what is at stake is the future of Morocco, that is to say, our Mediterranean future; and Algeria and Tunis as well.

As to personalities: With Herriot and Boncour the liaison is assured. Blum [the Socialist leader], as you say, is in touch with Berthelot [a high Foreign Office official], and that liaison can only become stronger. I shall say no more today.

An article in the Dépêche de Toulouse would be excellent. You have the materials for it in this letter and in Vincent's article (Illustration of May 16) and in a confidential hour with Séguy or Vincent. Take care of Romier, Bainville, and Simond [editors of Paris papers] with this material. Let these gentlemen set an example for the rabble. This is no time for chatter; it is a time to be silent and hold firm. Their effort should be to take the Riffian question out of the domain of politics in order to make it a national question.

Keep me in touch with events. In all affection,

VATIN-PERIGNON

On May 27 Pierre Renaudel defined the Socialist position:

M. RENAUDEL. We ought to know whether the occupation of the Werga in 1924 was in accordance with the instructions of the Government then in office, and inquire whether the responsible party foresaw the consequences of his act. . . . My friends and I are not defeatists; we do not ask that Morocco be evacuated; but we do not want a war for prestige, in which the best of the country will go down. We want the truth about Morocco. . . .

On what conditions should peace be sought? The Temps recently said that it could be sought only in the Riff. . . . For the Socialists the most significant point is the interpretation of our "security." They want security. They would not permit the soldiers who have been surrounded down there, or the tribes which have remained loyal to us, to reproach France with having abandoned them. (Applause.) But the military forces find it easy to postpone the moment of peace in order to seek more and more guaranties; and the time for negotiations may pass. Just as we should be careful to avoid the possibility of war so we should be bold to seize the possibilities of peace. (Applause at the Extreme Left.) The Socialists want to hear the Government say that France feels herself so strong that she does not fear to offer peace to a petty tribal chief, even if he has won a little victory. (Applause at the Extreme Left.) . . . The tribes of Morocco should come to see in France not a conquering nation but a people which comes to them with the assurance of better living conditions. . . .

The Communist Position

Two Communist deputies, Doriot and Berthon, then pitched into Marshal Lyautey. They accused the Government of having negotiated with Abdel Krim when he was fighting the Spaniards, and of having let opportunities for friendly negotiations slip. These charges the Government denied in behalf of Marshal Lyautey. M. Doriot charged Lyautey with starving the Riffians by occupying the Werga valley, "their granary." He charged also that capitalist interests were involved; then enlarged his attack, provoking the wrath of M. Herriot, the presiding officer, and of the rest of the Chamber:

M. Doriot. All Islam is with Abdel Krim. In seeking to strengthen your prestige in a tiny corner of Morocco you have revealed your true position as oppressor of twenty million Moslems. (Protests at the Right, Center, and Left.)

The Presiding Officer [M. Herriot]. The Chamber cannot tolerate this language. To show oneself always anti-French is no evidence of internationalism. (Lively applause on many benches. Interruptions on the Communist Left.) While I stand here France shall not be insulted.

M. Doriot. Tomorrow the Moslems of the entire world will know that the war against the Riff is France's merciless war against all the colonial peoples. (Laughter and protests on many benches.) Some day, thanks to the example of the Riff, they will rise against France!

Numerous Voices on the Right. Out with him! (Exclamations from the Communist benches. Uproar.)

M. Thomson. The attitude of the natives of North Africa during the war is the best answer to M. Doriot's abominable words. (Hearty applause.)

The Presiding Officer. When our soldiers are fighting for the rights of France (applause) upon the soil of Mor[illegible] a country confided to us by international treaties (applause), we cannot let words be spoken which, in the countries praised by the speaker, would be most bitterly punished. (Applause.) The Chamber will meet these provocations with calm. There are insults which deserve no reply but contempt. (Lively applause on many benches. Interruptions from the Extreme Left.)

Various Voices. Censor him!

M. Doriot. The colonial soldiers who fought for France during the war fought for a cause which w[illegible] . . . The soldiers now fighting in Morocco feel themselves closer to the natives whom they are fighting than to the men who are sending them to butchery. (Applause upon the Communist benches. Lively interruptions.)

The Presiding Officer. I call you to order. You have no right to speak for the soldiers.

M. Doriot. I will read you a letter from one of the soldiers down there. [The Temps does not print the text of this letter] . . . Tomorrow these soldiers, learning that the workers and peasants are for immediate peace and that the French Government refuses to take the least step toward it, will cease to feel themselves bound to you. They will look for ways to stop the war. They will remember the marines of the Black Sea [who mutinied in 1919, when asked to attack the soviets].

The Presiding Officer. I have listened to the speaker carefully, seeking to reconcile the freedom of the tribune with the interests of the country. Hitherto, while M. Doriot had expressed violent opinions, they were only opinions. I merely protested against them. For the first time M. Doriot has, in covered but hardly equivocal terms, incited those of our soldiers who would follow his counsel to betray their duty. It is no longer a question of freedom of the tribune. When down there, out of sight, brave fellows—workers, yes! and peasants, yes!—are doing their duty in the name of France, it is our duty to support them, to do whatever is needed to protect them from such abominable words. (Lively applause on all benches. Exclamations at the Extreme Left.) The appeal to action demands action. (Renewed applause.) I therefore invite M. Doriot to withdraw his words, or to explain them if they are not as I understood them; otherwise I shall with the consent of the Chamber apply the censorship.

M. Doriot. My meaning was sufficiently clear. I said that tomorrow when they learn on the front that there are at home workers who, like themselves, want peace with the Riffians, that peace can be made, and that the Government refuses to make it, they will look for ways to end the war; they will remember that in other circumstances the marines of the Black Sea refused to fire upon the revolutionary workers of Russia, that the soldiers of the Ruhr fraternized with the Germans. . . .

M. Francois. It is not true. (Uproar.)

The Presiding Officer. An Assembly which is about to judge must remain calm.

M. Doriot. . . . that the soldiers of the Ruhr fraternized with the German workers; that the Spanish soldiers were not afraid to talk with the Riffians; and they will stretch out their hands in brotherhood to those whom you call enemies, and will force peace upon you. That is my conviction. (Applause at the Extreme Left. Protests from various benches. Uproar.)

The censorship was thereupon applied to M. Doriot, whose friends protested so vigorously that the session was suspended. When it was resumed on May 28 M. Maginot, Minister of War in the Poincaré Government, accepted responsibility for the instructions given Marshal Lyautey in May, 1924, at his request, to advance his troops [illegible] territory on the north back of the Werga [illegible] dominated by the Riffians. The Prime Minister, M. Painlevé, then rose to defend the policy of the Government. He insisted that after the advance the French were still within their treaty frontiers, and that they were combating what was, strictly speaking, a war of defense.

M. Painleve. . . . Between the Werga and Fez [the capital of Morocco] there is no natural obstacle; there is only the force of [illegible] . . . And if [illegible] at the consequences of such a solution. I will beg them to examine with me the consequences of abdication. That would mean not merely to abandon Fez; it would mean the abandonment of all Morocco, of all Algeria, of all trans-Mediterranean France, of all the Africa which has been plowed and furrowed by the daring of French civilization. If there are men here ready to subscribe to such a desertion, so much the worse for them. (Lively applause on the Left, Center, and Right. Interruptions on the Extreme Left.)

An article by Harry F. Ward
Law and Order in Japan will appear in an early issue of
The Nation

France's Treaties in Eastern Europe

THE peace of Europe depends upon Central Europe; in many ways the French Eastern treaties are more significant than the Security Pact which is being negotiated in Western Europe at present. France has unequivocally declared her intention to support her Eastern allies; she has also declared that the Security Pact must be "supplementary" to the Covenant and in the event of war she could still base her actions on Article X of the Covenant, which would take precedence over later agreements. Few except students of foreign affairs are familiar with the texts of these important Eastern treaties. The Treaty of Alliance and Friendship between France and Czecho-Slovakia was printed in The Nation of February 27, 1924. The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian states:

> It appears to be conclusively proved that there is no military convention between France and Czecho-Slovakia, in spite of misinformed rumors which have made the allegation. But the Czecho-Slovak army is largely trained by a French military mission.

The full text of the Polish Treaty is reprinted from the Manchester Guardian of June 6 and is as follows:

FRANCO-POLISH POLITICAL AGREEMENT

The Polish Government and the French Government, equally disposed, by maintaining the treaties which have been signed in common or which shall in the future be recognized by the one or by the other, to safeguard the state of peace in Europe, the security and the defense of their territory as well as of their mutual interests both political and economic, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. In order to coordinate their pacific efforts, the two governments undertake to concert with each other about all questions of foreign policy which interest the two states, and which bear upon the settlement of international relations, in the spirit of the treaties and in conformity with the Covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 2. Economic improvement being the primary condition of the reestablishment of the international order and of European peace, the two governments will concert together in this regard with a view to joint action and mutual support. They will work for the development of their economic relations, and will conclude special agreements and a commercial convention to that end.

ARTICLE 3. If, contrary to the anticipations and to the sincerely pacific intentions of the two contracting parties, those parties or one of them found themselves attacked without provocation on their part, the two governments would concert with each other with a view to the defense of their territory and the safeguarding of their legitimate interests, within the limits laid down in the preamble.

ARTICLE 4. The two governments undertake to consult each other before concluding new agreements which affect their policy in Central or in Eastern Europe.

ARTICLE 5. The present agreement will not enter into force until the commercial agreement now being negotiated shall have been signed.

A. BRIAND.
E. SAPIEHA.

Paris, February 19, 1921

A MILITARY CONVENTION?

The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian concludes:

> It is commonly understood that Article 3 above has been supplemented by a military convention. The Poles, whose interests and inclinations have not been on the side of concealment, have advertised its existence, but the French have never admitted it, and the text of it is secret. There is, however, reason enough for assuming both that it exists and that it provides for the operation of a French military mission in Poland and for the provision of credits for equipment and arms. A French military mission, in fact, operates in Poland, and Marshal Foch has ceremonially visited the Polish General Staff in Warsaw.

Child Labor in China

BEHIND the present disturbances in China lie the working conditions created by the process of industrialization and inspired by modern capitalism. Excerpts from the report of the Municipal Council of the International Settlement in Shanghai, referred to below, were printed in the International Relations Section of The Nation for May 27, 1925. The Manchester Guardian commented editorially on June 16 as follows:

China is passing through the first phases of the industrial revolution. One of her ablest representatives said at Paris during the Peace Conference that this was the most critical and anxious aspect of China's future. Could China, with great and rapid industrialization in prospect, escape the dreadful shadows through which England groped into some kind of civilized life a century ago? Industrial development in China has been disastrously quick. In the seven years from 1915 the number of spindles rose from one to two millions. The conditions in these mills are very similar to the conditions in the Lancashire mills in the early days of the industrial revolution, and the conditions in the mines and steelworks are worse than those in the mills. Men work twenty hours underground in the mines of Shantung. Small boys work in the glassworks from six in the morning to eleven at night. Children work in the mills the same hours as adults. Nightwork is common, and everybody works seven days in the week.

The National Christian Council of China started an agitation three years ago for the introduction of the international labor standards contained in the Washington Convention of 1919. They held meetings, distributed literature, and tried to influence Chinese employers and the Chinese Government. They had some success in their larger aims, for the Government at Peking promulgated provisional factory regulations in 1923. They had still greater success in Shanghai, where they persuaded the Municipal Council to set up a child labor commission and to adopt its recommendations. Unfortunately these recommendations required the ratification by a taxpayers' meeting, and when the meeting was summoned last April there was not a quorum.

It is obvious that in the present state of China, where the enforcement of factory law, or any law, is exceedingly difficult, a foreign settlement like that at Shanghai, controlling its own district, had a splendid opportunity of introducing reform and setting a great example. When that community represents nations that have enjoyed and abused great privileges the obligation to make some return is particularly pressing. The taxpayers of Shanghai threw away a great opportunity. That opportunity will recur, and we cannot believe that it will be thrown away again. And when the Powers begin to cooperate with China instead of competing in exploiting her, they owe it to themselves as well as to her that they should make it easy for the Chinese Government to reform industrial conditions throughout China. The action of the powers will be a test of their good faith, for they will show whether their desire to forward these reforms is stronger than the powerful interests that seek to keep them back.

Further light on industrial conditions in China was thrown by questions and answers in the House of Commons, reported in the Manchester Guardian of the same date:

In reply to Mr. Looker (Conservative—Essex) Mr. Samuel [Parliamentary Secretary of the Overseas Trade Department] said that according to a report published last July by the Municipal Council of the International Settlement at Shanghai, the number of British textile mills is fourteen. No municipal regulations are in force governing the age at which young persons may be employed, but steps have been taken by the managers of the British mills to give effect to the recommendation of the Child Labor Commission, appointed by the Municipal Council, that the employment of children under the age of ten years should be prohibited. . . .

Mr. WILL THORNE (Labor—Plaistow) asked whether the cause of all the trouble was not the beastly low wages and the employment of children of eight years and under.

Mr. SAMUEL. No, sir; the British Government has done all it can with regard to labor within the international settlement. We have nothing to do with conditions outside of it.

Mr. JACK JONES (Labor—Silvertown). Then why do we send battleships?

Sir W. DAVISON (Conservative—Kensington). Is it not a fact that, however poor the wages, they are better in the foreign settlements than elsewhere in China, and has not Zinoviev taken credit for starting this trouble?

Mr. LANSBURY (Labor—Bow) asked whether there was any evidence of an attack by the Chinese in the police station with any arms whatever. Is it not a fact, he asked, that the people were shot in the back and could not, therefore, have been storming the police station when shot?

Mr. SAMUEL. I do not agree they were shot in the back. He added that the crowd was large and murderous and tried to rush the police station, which was full of arms. If the action which was taken had not been taken there would have been greater bloodshed.

Mr. LANSBURY asked whether the Government were prepared to organize a battalion of shareholders to do their own dirty work. (Labor cheers.) . . .

Mr. TOM JOHNSTON (Labor—Dundee), referring to the statement that the British Government had done all they could to improve conditions in the Shanghai mills, asked what steps had been taken to enforce the conclusion come to by the Shanghai Municipal Missions Report, and why a majority could not be got to ratify the proposals of that report.

Mr. SAMUEL replied that the British community and the British Consul General had sympathetically tried all they could to initiate a by-law to be enacted by the Shanghai municipal authorities in the direction suggested by the honorable member. The British Government at home had supported that policy, and two ladies connected with welfare work had been members of the mission to deal with child labor and long hours. A regulation was introduced by the Shanghai municipal authorities, but owing to there being no quorum it could not be passed. That was early in April. It was put down again for this month for discussion, and but for this unfortunate disturbance would doubtless have been dealt with.

Mr. LOOKER asked if it was not a fact that the British cotton mills of Shanghai had a regulation forbidding the employment of boys under ten and girls under twelve years of age.

Mr. SAMUEL replied that that was so, and that the British had only eight out of the 36 mills.

Captain WEDGWOOD BENN (Liberal—Leith). Is it not the fact that quite young children are employed seven days a week merely to earn their keep?

Mr. SAMUEL. In China, I am sorry to say, labor conditions are deplorable.

Captain WEDGWOOD BENN. Is it necessary to go further to discover the cause of the trouble?

Sir W. DAVISON. Is it not the fact that however deplorable the conditions they are better in foreign settlements than in the mills in China, and that these questions are merely being used as a pretext?

Mr. SAMUEL thought there could be no doubt that conditions are better in the foreign settlements.

Mr. LAWSON suggested that the real bolshevists are the people who are responsible for these conditions.

"During the year 1921, in Great Britain, of persons over 30 years of age, one out of every seven died of cancer."

CANCER AND THE PUBLIC

By CHARLES P. CHILDE is a full discussion of what is known as to the causes and the cure of cancer and of how the public could help prevent it. $4.25

A book to keep at hand to lend or give to any worried friend is

THE CONQUEST OF CANCER

By H. W. S. WRIGHT. It is one of those stimulating "Today and Tomorrow" volumes described as "Immensely valuable and infinitely readable." $1.00

It is shown that 75% of cancer cases are curable, with a mortality of 5%.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Avenue, New York

Some copies of Arthur Warner's pamphlet are still to be had. Order promptly before the supply is exhausted. Price 10 cents.

LA FOLLETTE'S RECORD

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York

See our classified section

YOUR SUMMER PROBLEM

Should you not find what you want there—

If you have a camp, hotel, summer home, boarding house,

If you are seeking such accommodations,

If you want a summer job, or if you are looking for Camp counsellors, musicians, etc.

If you have an apartment to rent for the summer, or want an apartment

We recommend placing an advertisement in the classified section of The Nation, as the best means of bringing the right person and the right place together. Rates on request. Address, Dept. Y. S. P. The Nation.

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation.

MT. AIRY (near Croton-on-Hudson) is a community for artists and radicals within commuting distance of New York. It is high, dry and heavily wooded with many beautiful views of the Hudson and easy access to a service of 100 trains daily. Adjoining the village of Croton with shops and stores, it will have a social and communal life all its own. 1-4 acre of land $250 to $400. Cash or terms. (30% sold). Address Harry Kelly, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Chelsea 0592

Evolution, Social and Organic

A seventh edition of this most useful work by Arthur M. Lewis has just been printed. It exposes many of the fallacious arguments levied against the Darwinian theory. It expounds the historic process of social evolution, showing the real causes of human institutions. It explains the points of departure between these two great fields of evolutionary thought as well as their points of contact. An eye-opening book. Cloth, 60c postpaid.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 341 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

SUMMER PLACES

CAMP TAMIMENT, FOREST PARK, PA.

MAKE YOUR VACATION RESERVATIONS EARLY

Special Program—Fourth of July Week-End

Friday Evening—Masque Ball
Saturday Afternoon—Aquatic Carnival
Saturday Evening—
(a) Play by Clement Wood
(b) "The Nightingale and the Rose," by Oscar Wilde

Sports—Fifteen tennis courts, horseback riding, swimming, boating, canoeing, etc.

Lecture courses—9:30 A. M., one hour
Beginning July [illegible] "The Economics of Prejudice," August Claessens
Beginning July [illegible] "Social Effects of Changing Sex Standards," Isabel Kendig

Write for Booklet

New York Office, 7 East 15th Street Phone, Stuyvesant 9364.

"INDEED! Because it is neither I nor you, nor what is connected and what is not, but;—

"— that the nightmare of this planet must be broken;

"— it is that you, too, with your very foothold in time, are one of those who caused me my memories;—

"— you, too, with your overgrown needs, indulgences and delusions, with the servile flattery of your professions to things existing, for your comforts in return, with the very mode of your lives and ideas in spite of your ultra progressive professions are part of the mental and social deadweight on this earth, part of that arm, which holds this planet in its stranglehold;— . . ."

Extract from ten page booklet entitled: "A Letter." Price 25 cents. If it is difficult for you to spend that much, mail to me a copy of this ad in handwriting and I will send the booklet (as long as I have any) free of charge.

J. SIGMOND
318 W. 116th St. New York City.

"THE MARXIST"

A periodical interpreting Marxism and Universal History in the light of dialectics. All great thinkers, including Marx, were dialecticians and only through dialectics can the teachings of Marx and Universal History be understood. 50 cents

Published by WORKERS' EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE
P. O. Box 24, Station E, Brooklyn, N. Y.

German Books a Specialty
W. BEYER, Inc. Books and Art
Now at 259 5th Avenue
Bet. 28th and 29th Streets. New York

"A corner of old Russia in New York" —
THE RUSSIAN INN
36 West 27th St., 'phone Fitzroy 6567
LUNCHEON TEA DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

HOFFMANN SCHOOL
for Individual Development
886 Fort Washington Avenue, New York City
DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL
Rebecca Hoffmann, Director
Dr. Nathan Peyser, Educational Director
Children 4-10 years Bus Service

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS
Prices and easy terms of transportation

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

YOUR SUMMER PROBLEMS

THE LLOYD, BELLPORT, L. I
On Great South Bay. Open May 28.
Cool, Comfortable, Charming.
Regular guests and week-end parties.

THE CALEDONIA, quiet, homelike, apartment hotel; rooms cool and pleasant. Two rooms and bath, $20 weekly. 28 West 26th Street. Tel. Watkins 8950

DUX-TELL HOUSE — SEA GATE.
Beach 48th Street and Surf Avenue.
Rooms [illegible] Terms [illegible] per day.
A la carte service. Phone for information.
Coney Island 0266.

WOULD rent furnished, for a year, duplex apartment in St. Johns Colony. Charmingly furnished, 6 or 7 rooms, 2 baths, awnings for all front windows. Large porch 23 x 12 feet, furnished with awning, wicker furniture, couch hammock, rug, flower boxes, etc., overlooking attractive garden with trees and fountain. Phone Watkins 6197.

FOR RENT: July, seashore cottage, six rooms, bath, two hours from New York, private association. Address Apt. 43, 98 Morningside Ave. Tel. Morningside 0790.

HOOD RIVER ORCHARD
FOR SALE [illegible] home of SKOOKUM apples. Fifty acres in full [illegible] Oregon.

POSITION WANTED

YOUNG [illegible] The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED [illegible] initiative, be accurate stenographer, not over 28. [illegible] The Nation.

SPEAKERS: WE ASSIST IN PREPARING special articles, papers, speeches, debates. Expert scholarly service. AUTHOR'S RESEARCH BUREAU, 500 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City

SUMMER PLACES

YOU'LL GET THE UTMOST FROM YOUR VACATION AT CAMP MILAN
at RHINEBECK, N. Y.

The vacation spot of happiness for adults, in the beautiful Berkshires. Swimming, tennis, boating, horseback riding, excellent food, fine quarters, courteous management. Weekly rates, $32.50. Week-ends, $6.00 per day.

Send for Illustrated Booklet.

CAMP MILAN. Rhinebeck, N. Y.
Telephone Clinton Corners 21-F-12.

An Adult Camp in the
ADIRONDACK PARADISE
5 miles from Lake George.
Equipped with every known acility for comfort and sports.
Reservations limited to 100.
Rates $27.50 per week
Modern cabins in [illegible] cabin.
Round Trip New York-Lake George, $12.28
For booklet address camp or phone [illegible]
LENA BARISH REBECCA B. NUDELL

CAMP GREATER UTOPIA
Lackawaxen, Pa.
A VACATION GROUND for GROWN-UPS
[illegible] $25 [illegible]
WM. FELDMAN [illegible] WILL DURANT
Managing Director Associate Director

DELAWARE CLIFF LODGE
Flatbrookville, N. J.
ATTRACTIVE CAMP FOR ADULTS
Rates $25 per week
Fare, $7.37 round trip, N. Y. to Bushkill, Pa.
Write for Booklet and Reservations.
ANITA REISHER, Lodge Manager

TROUT LAKE CAMP and HOTEL FOR ADULTS
[illegible] from Lake George. [illegible]
in the Adirondacks between Lake George and Bolton Landing, N. Y.
Our place is 50 feet from the lake with all modern improvements and sport.
Good home cooking. Rates $25 per week
Mrs. F. Weingarten, Manager. For reservations write to Trout Lake Camp, Diamond Point, N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 15, 1925 No. 3132

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 83

EDITORIALS:

Coal: Business as Usual 85

Saving Genesis? 87

Gloucester Eats a Calf 88

TENNESSEE: WHERE COWARDS RULE. By Joseph Wood [illegible] 89

CLOTHES. By Steven T. Byington 90

UNCLE SAM'S SWEATSHOP. By Raymond Clapper 91

BRITAIN'S LABOR WOMEN. By Crystal Eastman 92

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 94

CORRESPONDENCE 95

BOOKS:

Your Portrait. By Leon Herald 96

Society and Scientific Method. By Rexford Guy Tugwell 96

Abraham Walkowitz. By Glen Mullen 97

The Ethics of Naturalization. By Charles A. Bennett 97

The Liberal Jew. By Johan J. Smertenko 98

Musical Brevities. By Pitts Sanborn 99

Books in Brief 99

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

The Serbo-Croat Dispute. By Hamilton Fish Armstrong 101

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

DEFENSE DAY (which would better be called Offense Day because of its insistence upon armies and armament as a means of obtaining national security) fell even flatter this year than last. The War Department was disappointed last autumn because even its own enumerators were able to report only 17,000,000 persons as taking any part in the mobilization program. What must its grief be in having to announce that this year the number was 8,000,000—not half that of a year ago? We do not share that grief. We should rejoice to see Defense Day sunk without trace, and at present progress it soon will be. Last year there was widespread and justifiable objection to picking out a working day and devoting it to mobilization. This year the attempt to graft Defense Day to the Fourth of July provoked less opposition, but that—as events proved—was because it was so easy to ignore the War Department's program. And ignore it the public did. If they had not read about it in the daily press, which always place "patriotism" before news value in treating such events, most people would have been unaware of any attempt at Defense Day. Virtually the only persons who went through any of the official rigmarole were those who had to because of their connection with various military or "patriotic" organizations. Other Americans mercifully put behind them thoughts of armies and their senseless human sacrifice to celebrate the day with the usual picnics and outdoor sports, firecrackers and skyrockets, unmindful of and unresponsive to the war mongers' wishes to have them [illegible] up as cannon-fodder.

WE ARE GLAD to note, also, that the organizers of Defense Day received markedly little encouragement from President Coolidge in his anniversary address under the "Washington Elm" at Cambridge, Massachusetts. It will be recalled that the War Department originally planned to kidnap Decoration Day for its mobilization but the President put his foot down on the scheme. This indicated clearly enough the President's disbelief in the peaceful character of Defense Day, and Washington gossip at the time had it that Mr. Coolidge was lukewarm toward the entire demonstration. His address in Cambridge more than bore this out. It contained not a word of approval for the advocates of "preparedness." On the contrary, the President expressed a wide and complete distrust of force in international relations when he said:

> I want to see America assume a leadership among the nations in the reliance upon the good faith of mankind. I do not see how civilization can expect permanent progress on any other theory. . . .
>
> The world has tried war with force and has utterly failed. The only hope of success lies in peace with justice.

THE GAUNT OLD WRECK of the "Washington Elm" tumbled down two years ago, and its dead branches were promptly and profitably carved into curios. Now Samuel F. Batchelder appears, in the Cambridge Tribune, insisting that the old tree on Cambridge Common had no right to be a patriotic shrine for half a century. Mr. Coolidge's speech was good but the occasion was poor. A stone tablet erected by the City of Cambridge in 1864 states that "Under this tree Washington first took command of the American Army, July 3, 1775," and countless schoolbooks have since pictured the stern general on horseback under the elm watching uniformed troops parade past. Mr. Batchelder ruthlessly points out that Washington had to order his ragged officers to wear ribbons to distinguish themselves from their equally ragged privates; he proudly doubts whether the Father of his country would have sought the shade, "like a schoolgirl preserving her complexion"; he recalls that the New Englanders used to march single file like the Indians in fighting when they had learned their tactics; he notes the utter absence of any contemporary record of a parade or ceremonial transfer of arms; he digs up the fact that Washington had already taken over the command and drawn up orders before the day on which the historic ceremony is supposed to have occurred. Finally, pointing most unhistorically, he imagines that Washington may possibly have passed the elm when entering Cambridge and have first shaken hands with his predecessor—afoot—under its shade. Otherwise he consigns the story to the limbo where dwell the cherry-tree and the childhood ax, the dollar that was never hurled across the Potomac, and the famous twenty-two foot jump apocryphally credited to young Gibson.

IN WASHINGTON [illegible] national conference [illegible] the abolition of [illegible] and other humiliating conditions imposed by the West upon China. In Shanghai American marines are barracked in the university building from which the striking students have been expelled. More than half the warships that frown upon Shanghai are said to be American. Perhaps Mr. Kellogg's right hand and his left hand are not on speaking terms, but we hope that he will find a way to make one obey the other. The Shanghai policy is probably that which pleases most of the scared local business men; it may be the policy of a nervous consul, irritated by the defection of his household servants. But the Washington policy is plainly the policy of long-range statesmanship, and fortunately the larger business interests are aware of that. Thus far the British Foreign Office appears to be utterly blind. The reports indicate that it thinks the time "not ripe," that China must "reform" first, that apologies are required, and so on ad infinitum. Meanwhile the policy of provocation continues. The Hongkong police have orders to deport all unemployed Chinese—which comes close to enforcing industrial slavery; and the imported Sikh police still point their guns at the inflamed Chinese. Until the Western powers consent to abandon their special privileges and unequal treaty rights they will only store up dynamite to blast themselves.

FOUR MORE "FRIENDLY" TRIBES have turned against the French in Morocco. Yet France has money and reserves of ammunition and man-power with which Abd-el-Krim cannot compete, and these may, especially if she can win Anglo-Spanish support for an effective blockade, win her the ultimate victory. For the present she is alone; Spain, defeated by Abd-el-Krim, naturally has no desire to see France do better; and England has always been profoundly jealous of anything which might set a strong Power in control of the African shore opposite Gibraltar. But already the Nationalist effervescence has led to rioting in the international zone at Tangier; and ultimately, of course, the interests of all the colonial Powers are one. Abd-el-Krim won inspiration from the Turkish successes, and in turn he gives inspiration to Nationalists in Egypt, India, and even far-off China. For France the empire is at stake. If Abd-el-Krim succeeds in asserting Berber independence in the mountains north of Fez no part of Morocco will be safe. The Arab tribes now "loyal" will seek to return to their ancient isolation. Even Algeria will be suspect, and the desert route that was to knit trans-Mediterranean France together will become a forgotten dream. Why should the Algerians and Senegalese, whom France is using today to fight Moroccans, continue loyal to a European Power? And why should French boys (there is talk already of calling new classes to the colors) die in the desert fighting the desert's own sons?

BELGIUM, after seventy-three days of groping, has finally found a Government which is able to command a parliamentary majority. The new Government marks a break from party traditions of forty years' standing. The elections of April 5 gave Belgium 78 Catholic, 78 Socialist, and 23 Liberal members of Parliament, but all the parties were tired of coalitions. The King asked the Socialist leader, M. Vandervelde, to form a coalition Cabinet; he could not win support from the other parties. Then the King called on M. de Brocqueville, the Conservative; then on M. Max, the Liberal. M. Van de Vyvere next took a hand, trying to form a minority Conservative Cabinet—Parliament voted it down. Finally the King turned to M. Poullet, leader of the Catholic Radicals, and the new alignment began to form. Catholics and Socialists have joined hands. The Conservative Catholics have refused to support such an alliance with their ancient enemy, but the left wing of the party, composed chiefly of ardent Flemings, insisted on working with M. Vandervelde. M. Vandervelde, who becomes Foreign Minister, was an opponent of the Ruhr adventure but supported the French alliance, so no great change in foreign policy seems likely.

THE BOASTS OF ECONOMY of President Coolidge and the Republican Administration in Washington received a knockout blow from Governor Smith of New York at the conference of State governors in Poland Springs, Maine. In answer to a speech by H. M. Lord, Director of the Budget, who made large claims of retrenchment and economy, Governor Smith pointed out that whereas the federal government had collected $652,000,000 in taxes and customs in 1914 it had taken $3,339,000,000 in 1924, an increase of 398 per cent. In the same period, Governor Smith said, the taxes of New York State had increased only 190 per cent. Federal taxes in 1924 were $2,382,000,000 less than in the peak year of 1920, he continued, but this represented nothing more than the reduction of the government from a war basis to a peace footing. Furthermore, appropriations for the Executive Department (the President and Vice-President), which were $222,000 in the last year of the Wilson Administration, were increased to $426,000 in 1924 under the frugal Calvin Coolidge! Governor Smith might have made his criticism even stronger by reminding his hearers that the cost of living dropped 20 per cent between June, 1920, and December, 1924 (the government's own figures), and to this extent the lower federal expenditures as between those years represented a nominal rather than a real saving.

MR. DOHENY naturally felt dissatisfied when one United States court ruled against his Elk Hills oil leases and another ruled in favor of Harry Sinclair's hold on Teapot Dome. So he cast about for means of setting public opinion straight; and shortly the New York Times "received information" that Mr. Doheny might consent to make a statement in advance of court action. It sent a reporter to the Pacific Coast, and there the reporter spent glorious days with Mr. Doheny and his attorneys. The Times was in a generous mood. The great paper which thought the Washington disclosures unimportant gave thirteen full-length columns to Mr. Doheny's thoughts and meditations. One learned that Mr. Doheny had developed the Elk Hills field out of pure patriotism. Gone was the thought, which he once let slip on the witness-stand, that he might make $100,000,000 out of the lease; and utterly missing from the story—at his lawyers' behest—was the little black satchel in which he sent $100,000 to his old pal, Albert Fall. The entire Cabinet, he said, had sanctioned the leases—as to that either Mr. Doheny is in error or Messrs. Hughes and Coolidge fibbed. Naval officers begged him to get out the oil and save America. War threatened, and we were in a parlous state. As the World promptly noted, the Washington-conference treaties were signed before the leases, and the brashest naval officer could no longer breathe fire. The whole story is simply tosh—the most interesting thing about it is the enthusiasm of the Times to give Mr. Doheny thirteen columns of free advertising. If its passion for oil news has not been exhausted we should like to see it get the stories of the three big oil men who were abroad "on business" when the Government wanted their testimony in the Sinclair Teapot-Dome case.

WITH FEW EXCEPTIONS conservative organizations in the United States have avoided taking a position on the question of birth control. The League of Women Voters and even the National Woman's Party have steadily refused to accept the question as a legitimate part of their programs. The National Federation of Women's Clubs did pass a favorable resolution some years ago—somewhat to its own surprise, we suspect—but neither it nor any of its State branches has, so far as we know, made a serious study of the problem or backed any active effort to free birth-control information from the clutches of the obscenity laws. It is interesting, then, to find the question discussed with openness and given a measure of guarded approval in a recent pamphlet, "Marriage and Parenthood," issued by a group of members of the Society of Friends in England. With many a word of caution and much doubt of the general value of artificial methods, this group assents to the necessity of limiting the birth of children by other means than total abstinence from sex relations. The Bishop of Birmingham has openly indorsed birth control; recent labor congresses have given their support, and a cautious, limited approval has come from the National Council of Public Morals. Even conservative opinion is aroused in a country where overcrowding and underemployment are pressing political issues.

ANOTHER BOOK is being proceeded against. When Maxwell Bodenheim's novel, "Replenishing Jessica," comes up for trial this month in New York, the publisher, Mr. Liveright, will maintain that the author is distinguished and that the work itself is not only "of literary significance" but "highly moral." May his arguments win; but it would be refreshing to see a book defended in court on the mere ground that it was a book. Milton would have done no more—imagine him lugging literary standards before a grand jury! Nor would John Stuart Mill have supposed that the opinion of a few random persons on a particular day could decide the moral worth of a piece of writing. The chief moral question involved is whether law may murder literature—good or bad; and the current answer seems to be that the law may take it if a jury thinks it bad.

THE SELECTION of Professor Allen Johnson of Yale to edit the "Dictionary of American Biography" is among the best that could have been made. Professor Johnson, himself a biographer of Stephen A. Douglas, has been Larned Professor of American History at Yale since 1910, and he is best known, perhaps, through his editorship of the Yale series of fifty monographs called "Chronicles of America." He did all that an editor can do to make a series brilliant; furthermore, he acquired a first-hand knowledge of specialists over the country which will be invaluable in the new enterprise. He takes up his duties in Washington next February at [illegible] when he will be best equipped with both the experience and the energy necessary for the ten years of labor supposed now by the Committee of Management to be sufficient for the "Dictionary." It is hoped that the scholars of America will be quick to place their services at his disposal.

OF THE MILLIONS who read the Hearst newspapers we should like to know how many found in the New York Evening Journal the other day an editorial on reading. The title was What Is Man's Duty? and the tone was earnest in the way that most exhorters of the populace to improve itself are earnest. It is man's duty, said the Journal, to feed his mind—to read for at least half an hour each day and to think about what is read. Cross-word puzzles will not do; only good books will equip one for the inevitable query: "How much will you amount to mentally twenty years from now?" All this was crude if true. But there followed a list of books which no crude writer had chosen: "Macbeth," "Hamlet," "King Lear," "The Tempest," James's "Psychology," Montaigne's "Essays," Buckle's "History of Civilization," Guizot's "Civilization in France," Montesquieu's "Spirit of the Laws," Wells's "Outline of History," and any three good simple volumes on astronomy, geology, and evolution. It is agreeable to guess what a whole nation of Hearst readers, if it existed and took all the advice given it, would do to Mr. Bryan.

Oh how I love humanity,
With love so pure and pringlish;
And how I hate the horrid French
Who never will be English.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN ENGLISHMEN AND FRENCHMEN will continue to excite poetry and polemics as long as the two nations are neighbors. An example of these differences of method and motive has been pointed out by a correspondent of the London Nation. In carrying out the death penalty the English acquaint the prisoner with the time of his execution beforehand, awake him early on the last morning, and serve him a breakfast of ham and eggs. The argument is that several days of "fearful certitude is allotted so that the doomed man may make his peace with his Maker." To the Frenchman this is "unimaginative and unfeeling harshness of mentality." The French give the condemned man hope until half an hour before the end, and during that half hour he is offered a priest, rum, and a cigarette. The Anglo-Saxon does his best to improve man. This worries the Frenchman mainly at all; he wishes rather to make life more agreeable.

JUDGE PICTURES a bit of water covered with colliding craft, bordered with tiers of bathers, and fringed with cottages, pavilions, and a triple row of parked motors. The title of the picture is "Present condition of the little lake that you discovered four years ago, when it was almost unknown." Every summer week-end sees executives in golf-suits hastening away from their offices at lunch on Friday, and proletarians departing at daybreak on Sunday, sandwiches wrapped in bathing-suit, in search of solitude and coolness. But solitude, when it is shared with a million or so, ceases to be solitude. Country which in the winter is deer-haunted wilderness becomes in summer a lunch-strewn park. At best the holiday ends with a slow return in a long line of motor-cars. A writer in the New York World offers an inspired solution, combining seclusion with rest and relief from the heat of the city. His method is to spend the week-end in his bath-room, immersed in a tub of cold water, reading a book.

Coal: Business as Usual

COAL is the core of contemporary civilization. And a pretty rotten core it is. No going industry is without its peculiar lesions, fevers, blisters, and biles. Coal has them all, with locomotor ataxia thrown in. Whether this be due to the ancient hold of laissez faire on the grandpapa of all machinery we must leave to the professors of economic history. As Mr. Lesher of the Coal Age puts it, the bituminous industry is as unorganized as the retail-grocery business. It bows to no trust, it bows to no state; proudly it stands, bathed in the winds of free competition—about as efficient, about as serviceable, as a number-one earthquake.

And why should it not? There are three mines opened for every two the country needs. There are three miners digging (from time to time) where two would suffice. When demand is brisk the "snow-bird mines" begin to open; and when demand expires we have that many more mines—each, be it observed, with its complement of miners, shafts, tipples, pumps—all, save the miners, bearing their full complement of interest, insurance, depreciation, repairs, and overhead burden. The Central Pennsylvania fields, according to Floyd Parsons of the Gas Age Record, have five hundred separate and distinct operations producing 60,000,000 tons a year, when "in the interest of efficiency not over ten or fifteen companies should be operating in large units." Soft-coal mines are equipped to dig 18,000,000 tons a week, while all the railroads can move, with every coal-car loaded, is 12,000,000 tons. For thirty years the men who dig in mines have averaged 93 working days idle in a 300-day year. In a year of business depression like 1893 or 1921 they are out of the pits for 140 days.

And so, over-built, over-manned, over-burdened, and utterly uncoordinated, this crazy relic of competitive economics staggers from one debacle to the next, amid the yells and the curses of miners, operators, and consuming public alike. The present crisis was expected; it was as inevitable as the tides of the ocean. You cannot have your cake and eat it too. You cannot get an industry all set to dig 800,000,000 tons of coal when only 500,000,000 are needed, and suppose that anything but recurring crises will be the order of the day. Coal inflates and flops with the business cycle, but in addition it goes on the loose according to a private time-table of its own.

While overdevelopment is the principal distemper the carcass is rife with certain other grave disorders—an appalling accident rate, bad underground management, batteries of stone-age beehive coke ovens, failure to utilize by-products, unlimited cross-hauling—"coal cars moving in and out of Chicago like dice in a gambling game as the spot market dictates," failure to develop power at the pit mouth, skimming the cream from the best beds and thus rendering hundreds of millions of tons forever unreclaimable.

For the miners, the order of the day is chronic unemployment, evil conditions underground, with the chance of wholesale entombment always immediately ahead. For the operators business as usual includes uncertain markets, narrow margins, high operating costs, and a staggering burden of overhead expenses. These circumstances do not militate to improve the temper of either of the parties. As a result they have achieved a mastery of mutual vituperation which would bring even a captain of marines to the salute.

How the union has ever held together at all with this vast excess of men over jobs is a mystery. Non-unionism cannot fail to be a perpetual and impending menace. After all, a man must eat, and a hungry baby makes no distinction between the pay roll of a union or a non-union operator. Probably nine-tenths of the energy of the United Mine Workers has gone into trying to hold the ranks of an industry which by every known psychological and engineering law is incapable of closed ranks.

And there we are. But there, if we wish, we do not always have to be. The problem of coordinating coal, vast as it is, is not a problem beyond human capacity. The Fuel Administration in the war came near to solving it within two years. It is a matter of correlating production with consumers' requirements. The Fuel Administration determined requirements for every section of the country and then proceeded to dig coal—from the nearest mine—to meet these requirements. It provided an assured market for the selected mines, kept the miners steadily at work, eliminated the untold cross-hauling. Soft coal, until the problem of storage is solved, can never be made an industry without some seasonal variation; but organized intelligence has already pointed the way to the elimination of an enormous amount of the usual hysterical procedure. The thing has been done. Nor does this necessarily call for federal control. A trust might do it—oil after it reaches the pipe line is infinitely better behaved than coal. An operators' association might do it. The miners might force its adoption, and contribute to its administration through some plan of joint control.

Back in 1922 John Brophy of the union's district No. 2 laid the foundation for such a plan. He started to educate miners in the technology and economics of their industry. Through a pamphlet series he broadcasted the staggering wastes, the monumental absurdities, of the present structure. But he was a voice crying in the wilderness. Those grim-jawed men who had the keeping of 600,000 miners in hand preferred the American tradition. They were upstanding, two-fisted fighters. They could call an operator more lurid names in one convention speech than were ever before dreamed of. They could discomfort "scabs" with an unprecedented artistry. And, when times were slack, they could start a row among themselves. As for an operator considering his mine as an integral part of the industry upon which modern civilization is built—instead of as a gold mine—the notion is almost unthinkable.

We doubt if the physical layout of bituminous coal is such as to make it readily susceptible to holding-company finance. A coal trust in the sense that anthracite is trustified—probably to the advantage of all concerned—is remote. We doubt if the cranial capacity of the average operator will permit of intelligent control through an operators' association. Which leaves the miners as probably the prime movers if anything is to be done. But to date the virile leadership of the miners has preferred brawn to brains, and we can confidently expect recurrent locomotor ataxia until John Brophy's blazed trail becomes a broad highway.

Saving Genesis?

JOHN SCOPES'S sister has lost her job. The board of education of Paducah, Kentucky, will not let her continue to teach mathematics—because she refuses to affirm disbelief in evolution.

Within the last century the Scotch church barred from its ranks members who used fanning-mills for winnowing their grain. The leaders of the church held that the practice was contrary to the text "The wind bloweth where it listeth." Three-quarters of a century ago, when doctors first began the merciful use of anesthetics in obstetrical cases, churchmen arose, text in hand, to insist that the pains of childbirth must not be mitigated. To use chloroform, some of the parsons held, was to avoid the primeval curse on woman. Dr. Simpson won his battle for chloroform in Scotland only when he recalled Genesis II, 21. "That," said he, "is the record of the first surgical operation ever performed, and that text proves that the Maker of the universe, before he took the rib from Adam's side for the creation of Eve, caused a deep sleep to fall on Adam."

For centuries the church—when church and state worked hand in hand—thundered against any man who dared think or say that the earth was round. The bishop of Ceuta and the theologians of Salamanca overwhelmed Columbus with quotations from the Psalms, from St. Paul and St. Augustine. When Copernicus made his great discovery of the revolution of the earth about the sun, Martin Luther and Melanchthon vied with the Catholic dignitaries in abusing the "upstart astrologer." Did not Ecclesiastes say that "the earth standeth fast forever"? When Galileo's rude telescope revealed the moons of Jupiter, confirming Copernicus's observations, he was told that his pretended discovery "vitiated the whole Christian plan of salvation." One learned priest argued that if there were other planets they must be inhabited, since God made nothing in vain; but those inhabitants could not be descended from Adam; therefore they and their planets could not exist. Poor Galileo, after publishing his letters on the sun spots, was ordered to "abandon entirely the opinion that the sun is the center of the universe, and that the earth moves, and to abstain from sustaining, teaching, or defending that opinion in any manner whatever, orally or by writing"—an order worthy of the Tennessee Legislature which passed the anti-evolution bill three hundred and nine years later. Galileo was forced to make the declaration:

> I, Galileo, being a prisoner and on my knees, and before your eminences, having before my eyes the Holy Gospels which I touch with my hands, abjure, detest, and curse error and the heresy of the movement of the earth.

But the earth has continued spinning on its axis despite all the instructions of the ecclesiastics; and, while it turned its face diurnally to and from the sun, science, too, has gone marching on. Today no legislature would prohibit teaching contrary to the first chapter of Ecclesiastes, although Tennessee still seeks by legislation to preserve the first chapter of Genesis. The lesson of the centuries is plain to all the world if not to Tennessee and the school board of Paducah, Kentucky. Churchmen have hampered but never halted the progress of scientific truth; and wherever pious men have sought to protect their puny interpretations of the universe by legislation and proscription they have hurt only their churches and their creeds.

Gloucester Fats a Calf

AROUND a sheltering bay in that great promontory of granite northeast of Boston known as Cape Ann lies the ancient fishing town of Gloucester, the G. H. Q. of the salt-cod industry of America. Along its wharves are row upon row of racks upon which cod—split, cleaned, and salted—lie whitening and curing. Made fast to the piers or tugging at anchor in the harbor are the staunch and saucy schooners which pursue the cod into the tumultuous Atlantic, riding out the fiercest of storms on Georges, Quereau, or the Grand Banks—except when one of them is hove down with all hands, or sliced in two in a fog by the carving-knife prow of an onrushing liner, as happened recently when the Tuscania hit the Rex, sending fifteen of her crew of twenty-four to the bottom.

Gloucester lives off the dangerous trade of the deep-sea fisherman and it does not take life lightly. It is as sober and austere as the granite of the cape all about it. Hence we were not a little surprised to read an article with a Gloucester date line in the Boston Globe, beginning:

> See the conquering bootlegger comes!
> Sound the timbrel; beat the drums!

It seems that four of Gloucester's young men were last year convicted of rum-running and sent to Atlanta penitentiary for a spell. When they were let out and started for home the other day, circulars were scattered about the old town, signed "Gloucester's Committee on Absent Sons," announcing that the wandering boys would be welcomed at the railway station with a brass band, and calling upon the citizenry in general to turn out and make the occasion memorable. At first the announcement was regarded as a joke; but when it was learned that a former employer of one of the young men had obtained a permit for a parade, the pillars of the town—pillars of stone, you may believe—took alarm. The Municipal Council was hastily convened, but the City Solicitor advised that there was no law by which the parade could be prevented. And granite Gloucester is law-abiding—even when it hurts. Then a delegation from the Chamber of Commerce appealed to the State Police to send a detachment to prevent the demonstration, but the head of that organization declined to burn his fingers. Thereupon moral suasion was attempted. A committee pleaded with the man with the permit; he finally agreed to call off the parade but held that the band would appear. The bandsmen were asked not to turn out, but they stood by their agreement. So the welcome took place, although it was probably less imposing than one might gather from the Boston Globe. With its usual enterprise The Nation has obtained an account (which will not be syndicated) from its own special, exclusive correspondent on the spot. Our own special, exclusive correspondent writes:

> There were at least three hundred people at the station to meet the boys, but fully two hundred and seventy-five of them were curiosity seekers like me, my wife, and our cook.
>
> Gloucester is so dry at present that a man with snake bite might as well jump off the dock and finish the job.
>
> The returned runners, popular lads, including a former policeman and the brother of a famous ball player, apparently were whisked away from the station without a chance to respond to the greeting. In the confusion Milt Butler, the well-known and popular trombonist, suffered a painful injury when a Ford ran over his left foot.

Tennessee: Where Cowards Rule

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Dayton, Tennessee, July 5

EVEN those who do not happen, like the present writer, to have been born and bred in Tennessee should not find it difficult to forgive Dayton. A tiny town set in the midst of fruitful strawberry fields, it had never heard of any Darwin except the one who keeps the local dry-goods store until Mr. Bryan enlightened it, and to this day it is ignorant of that famous meeting of the British Association when Huxley and Wilberforce threshed out the question which has now arisen, some sixty years later, to puzzle it. Its faith is no narrower than that of every other community equally remote; its temper is better than was the temper of Oxford half a century ago; and if some of its inhabitants turn to the law to protect their children against the teaching of a dangerous theory, it is with a simplicity of mind which has no conception of the questions of academic freedom involved.

Dayton, moreover, once the law was passed, was ready and anxious to deal as best it could with all the questions, legal and scientific, involved. While the president of the State University sat in his office praying that he might be allowed to violate the law in peace; while he was quietly issuing (as several members of his faculty have assured me he was) unofficial instructions to his teaching staff that they should make no changes in their instruction; and while he was, at the same time, seeking to retain the friendship of both sides and accepting the congratulations of various fundamentalist bodies for his stand against evolution, Dayton was arranging to settle in simple honesty what the representatives of science, education, and enlightenment were anxious only to dodge.

And so when I sit at the little table in Robinson's drug-store where the argument began and discuss with the county superintendent of schools his attitude as one of the prosecution, I feel that the shame of Tennessee is not in Dayton. There is no State of the Union, no country of the world, which does not have communities as simple-minded as this one, and if Tennessee has become the laughing-stock of the world it is not because she has her villages which are intellectually a half century behind the centers of world thought but rather because among her sons who know better there is scarcely one who has the courage to stand up for what he thinks and knows instead of flying quickly to cover lest he might have to sacrifice to his convictions some political advantage or some material gain.

At Dayton no one is afraid to tell me what he thinks. But when I go to Knoxville, seat of the State University and one of the three largest cities in Tennessee, I enter a different world. One of the most important members of the university board of trustees takes me aside to whisper in my ear; the president of that institution, telling me I am a good fellow, takes me confidentially by the arm; the editor of one of the leading newspapers, distinguished by the safe piety of its editorials upon the subject, closes the door of his office; and the remarks of all might be summarized in what were the actual words of one: "Of course it's a damn-fool law—but I won't be quoted." These and other Knoxvillians are defensive and indignant; they resent in various terms the publicity they have attracted and they protest against being judged by the laws their legislature passes; but these Knoxvillians will not admit that, fundamentally, they are to blame. In Tennessee bigotry is militant and sincere; intelligence is timid and hypocritical, and in that fact lies the explanation of the sorry role which she is playing in contemporary history. Dayton's only crime is the naive belief that a law may be intended to be enforced.

Not even those who voted for the bill wanted it to pass. As a member of the legislature told me, he thought he might as well win the favor of a few fundamentalist constituents by saying "aye" because he felt sure the Senate would reject so preposterous a measure; the Senate, following the same admirable political logic, decided to put the burden upon the Governor, who, as the last responsible party, would hardly dare write himself down an ass; but the Governor, so it is said, remarked only: "They've got their nerve to pass the buck to me when they know I want to be United States Senator" before he signed the bill. And strangest of all, even the politicians make no particular effort to conceal their dishonesty because they feel that while the fundamentalist will be satisfied with any obedience however venal, the rest of the population will acquiesce in any amount of political corruption and cowardice. Thus the Governor, who had accompanied his signature with a letter stating, in effect, that no one expected that the law would be enforced, became an earnest supporter of the bill when the letters from the Epworth League and the Baptist Young People's Association began to arrive; and Senator Graves, who has distinguished himself by the firmness of his utterances in favor of the same bill, amazed me by giving me permission to quote him as saying that though he very much regretted that the bill had been passed I would have understood why he voted for it had I been in the Chamber to hear the cheers and jeers of the fanatics who had caused it to be introduced. "I am no politician," he added cryptically, "but if I were one I should have had to vote for that bill whether I wanted to or not."

Meanwhile the law is accepted by the people of the State in a manner worthy of the legislators whom it elected to represent it. The average business man is puzzled by the furor created in the outside world; he cannot understand why anyone should care whether evolution is taught in the schools or not when obviously neither business nor industry is affected by questions so highly abstract. The president of the university, who ought to know better, can think of no plan more courageous than weakly to disobey the law when necessary, while pretending to the legislature that he approves of its acts or, more accurately, gives it to understand that he will not embarrass it by publicly stating his opinion of the law which both he and it know to be asinine. Concerned above all else with his precious appropriations, it never occurs to him to ask whether his chief duty might not possibly be something other than wangling money from a cowardly legislature. He does not realize that this first duty might be to prove himself worthy to spend the educational funds he is so eager to get, to show some sign of that zeal for truth and that intellectual honesty which it is, presumably, the function of education to inculcate, and he is anxious only to defend himself to everybody. No real scientist, he assures me, ever offended anybody, only pseudo-scientists do that; and when I mention the name of Huxley, who once met the question which is disturbing him, he cuts me off before I can bring in the names of Galileo and the rest.

As for the faculty which serves under this unhappy president, it is by no means comfortable. Not every member follows willingly its leader and, as one confessed to me, some are a little concerned over what their colleagues in more honest universities think of them, but seven professors were recently summarily dismissed, and so the others are drawn into the vicious circle of fear which includes nearly every public or semi-public man in the State. The legislator is afraid of some fundamentalist hid in the mountains; the president is afraid of the legislature; the faculty is afraid of the president; and the newspaper editor who "leads public opinion" is afraid of someone who is afraid of someone who is afraid of someone else. Nobody knows how strong the party which honestly desires the anti-evolution bill really is, and as long as the present circle is not broken nobody ever will. Here and there one can find a man who honestly believes as some (but by no means all) of the inhabitants of Dayton believe, but nine times out of ten when one thinks one has one's hand upon an honest bigot he turns out to be holding his opinion chiefly in deference to somebody else, and thus the party grows. Every time one man turns fundamentalist out of fear of a second, a third turns fundamentalist out of fear of him.

Tennessee has no idea how this vicious circle may be broken. From her experience with prohibition she has learned that it is much easier to violate a law than it is to oppose it, and she was proposing quietly to apply this useful lesson to the anti-evolution law when along came Dayton to disturb her contented anarchy and to make her a national spectacle, bewildered and indignant, face to face with the laws which she had allowed to be written upon the statute-books.

To mere lawlessness Tennessee had become completely reconciled. When, for example, her highly moral legislature came as a committee of the whole to pay an official visit to the university just after the anti-evolution bill was passed, and when that committee behaved in a generally disgraceful fashion, Tennessee was not particularly disturbed. Though a group of faculty ladies who accompanied them on a sight-seeing trip to the mountains were, as one of them told me, embarrassed by the multiplicity of flasks which were urged upon them, and though, as I have the sworn statement of an eyewitness to assure me, another legislator, reeling about the country club, expressed his intention to vote against the appropriation because "they told me the trip wouldn't cost me a cent and the first day I got here I lost seventy-five dollars shooting craps," these matters were not considered worth even mention by any of the three newspapers, in spite of the fact that the conduct of the legislators was common knowledge. Such is the inevitable result of hypocritical lawlessness, and Tennessee has learned how to swallow it. Now, however, the affair of Dayton has arisen to remind the inhabitants that they may be called upon either to obey the thousand and one moral laws which the legislature is ready to enact or to break the vicious circle which makes them possible; and these inhabitants do not know how to escape the dilemma.

Tennessee does not want to do the first of these things. Tennessee, because she lacks courage, does not know how to do the second. Tennessee is very unhappy.

Clothes

By STEVEN T. BYINGTON

WHEN Katharine B. Davis was Commissioner of Correction of New York she said something in a public address in favor of less regulation. A man in the audience put the traditionally unanswerable question: "Would you allow a man to run in the street naked?" Miss Davis replied that for her part she could see nothing objectionable in anybody's showing a nice clean skin. The questioner was silenced; I presume he was breathless.

This was a sign of the times. Both she and he could surely remember the day when the foremost civilized nations agreed that covering the skin of most of the body and disguising the principal contours of the person for at least one sex were absolutely essential to morality, that the sight of that skin or those contours put irresistible tendency to stir sexual impulses in a person of the opposite sex, and hence that their exhibition was a tort against the beholder, into whose mind it forced such feelings as he was unwilling to harbor, or ought to be unwilling. The more sophisticated, indeed, while they held most strictly to this code for the ordinary business of life, maintained an exception in the case of costumes which were worn not for work but when one's only occupation was to be gazed at, as on the stage or in the evening dress of high society; but the absurdity of this special exception was always obvious to the great majority of the nation. Finally, it was held to be clear that the wearing of more or less clothing by almost all nations was the evidence of an unerring instinct divinely implanted in man.

In these later days the science of comparative morality has been teaching us that the wearing of clothing not needed for comfort, and particularly the special attention to covering certain parts of the body, is due not to an instinct of modesty or to a wish to hold sexual impulses in check, but is, on the contrary, originally a method for stimulating those impulses and for calling attention to those parts.

At the same time the increasing facility of travel and the evidence of the motion picture have made more widely familiar the fact that the sight of bare skin, even to the utmost, is not sexually provocative when you are used to it. The case of missionaries is especially worth notice. In countries to which clothing is new it is more or less the flag of Christianity, and when any missionary comes in sight of a village and sees a clothed crowd he is bound to rejoice at this evidence that the place has accepted Christianity; this cannot but tend strongly to bias him in favor of clothing. Nevertheless in our day we have such broad-minded missionaries as Thomas Chalmers, recognized as the foremost hero and wisest counselor of missions to the Pacific islands in recent times, who formally reported that in his opinion it was not advisable to tell converts to wear clothing above the waist-line; and Ashe, who in his "Two Kings of Uganda," after telling how he bought from a Kavirondo woman the one superlatively scanty garment which she had on, adds (obviously because somebody in England had taken him to task for it) that this was no immodesty, since total nudity for women is ordinary in Kavirondo and there were several women standing by who were wearing nothing.

Meanwhile our own practice, if it has not gone so far, is tending in the same direction. The increasing demand for outdoor recreation insists on more and more opportunity for unimpeded movements. Medical science is proclaiming that sunlight on the skin—sunlight which has not passed through glass, is the latest specification—is a most valuable tonic to the whole system, especially that it is the foremost preventive and cure of tuberculosis and rickets. Even fashion's see-saw tends to become an intermittent forward movement when there are so many who eagerly take advantage of every change in one direction and doggedly resist every change in the other. No wonder, in the presence of all this, that conservative moralists are now fighting for the retention of garments that conservative moralists have in the past always wanted to abolish—I mean corsets.

Is the change for good or evil? If for good, has it gone far enough?

On the score of health, medical science replies with substantial unanimity that although a person accustomed to clothing should not leave it off too suddenly, yet the disuse of clothing when it is not required for physical protection is altogether good, and the further it is carried the better. There are those who cry out that fair-skinned persons can have too much light; but their arguments do not get a detailed sifting (which they badly need) because the general experience of the hygienic benefit of a tanned skin is felt to close the question. And which way comfort inclines on a hot day is as obvious as which way economy inclines. Neither can there be any doubt as to the interests of beauty. If Solomon in all his glory was less beautiful than a stalk of lilies, it was because the lilies showed the beauty God had given them, while Solomon covered his up.

So health, comfort, economy, beauty give an unimpeachable verdict in favor of a release from clothing. The one point of serious dispute is the moral issue. On this, too, we may take it as settled that partial or complete nudity is no moral injury to people who are used to it. The assertion made in the "Britannica" and in many works of first-class standing, that naked peoples are as a rule more moral than clothed peoples, may have been made on inadequate foundations; but it is at least interesting to see how many different races are cited as evidence of it. At least the facts show that such immorality as exists in any naked nation must be due to causes which are common to the clothed and the naked; no one can make out that it is caused even partly by nudity.

And the alleged instinct of mankind does not exist, at least as regards the view that nudity is an outrage on public morality. Primitive peoples who have a feeling for clothing always take the view that it is not a matter of morality but of self-respect, that exposure of the person is an injury not to the spectators but to the person exposed; hence public exposure of the person is made an element of the punishment of certain crimes, or of the disgracing of a captured enemy. So, for example, the ancient Hebrews (Bible), the ancient Germans (Tacitus), even the church law of medieval Europe (duas vxores capienti, vel duos viros, de iure ciuili poena capitis imponitur. de iure can. vxori debent incidi vestes anteriores, & posteriores). Clothing can be dispensed with when religion, mourning, or other causes justify a disregard of the forms of self-respect; for instance, there is no basis for the allegation that "naked" in the twentieth chapter of Isaiah means "in a tunic." Commentaries that say it has that meaning cite Gesenius's "Thesaurus" as their authority, and Gesenius cites Deyling's "Observations" as his authority, and Deyling's reasons are not worth a row of pins. Compare also the story of what Queen Michal thought of King David's religious dance.

The earliest instance I know of the modern view, that exposure of the person is an outrage on the public, is a story which Dio Cassius tells of the Emperor Augustus. Livia was out in the evening for some reason or other, and met some young men, probably tipsy, sporting naked in the street. This was not customary at Rome, and Augustus wanted to punish them; but Livia felt that to punish them would be an indignity to her self-respect, for, said she, to a chaste woman it was no more than so many statues. Livia, with the conservatism proper to her sex, represents the ancient and world-wide point of view; Augustus, the innovating statesman, the modern European idea.

Yet we need not doubt that a change in custom, like all changes in human life, must involve evils during the change. I am told that the Centennial Exposition of 1876 had a disastrous moral effect on a good many young people who had never seen nude statuary in their country towns; the statues at the Exposition stirred wicked thoughts and feelings which bore fruit in their lives at home. Today there cannot be much of the United States in which the people are unfamiliar with the nude in respectable art; and who would wish to go back to conditions in which such a sight would have such effects?

Here we touch the nub of the question. When the laws of propriety forbid as salacious any exposure beyond a certain line, an accidental glimpse of more than the accepted limit will have the effect of a salacious sight because custom labels it as such. Thus to man's natural temptations to sin we add a new and sometimes powerful artificial temptation.

If the case is not so bad as it sounds, if exposure does not produce such a salacious effect, then by the same token changing our custom is not so terrible as it sounds. Have you, conservative friend, been noticeably stirred to vicious feelings by the recent greater freedom in clothing, or are you shocked because you expect somebody else to have feelings worse than yours? Or are you afraid that those who diminish their covering are aiming to attract mates? But you have always argued that propriety was the way to attract a mate, you have said "If you don't dress modestly nobody will want to marry you." What has really happened is that the young people of today refuse to let the thought of catching a mate dominate all departments of their life, and they insist on the right to dress for health and comfort and let mating take its chances.

There is instruction in a youthful letter of the poet Coleridge. In 1794, on a walking trip in the southern part of Great Britain, he wrote to a college friend from a place which he describes as a fashionable watering-place of the region:

> Walking on the sea sands I was surprised to see a number of fine women bathing promiscuously with men and boys perfectly naked. Doubtless the citadels of their chastity are so impregnably strong, that they need not the ornamental bulwarks of modesty; but, seriously speaking, where sexual distinctions are least observed, men and women live together in the greatest purity. Concealment sets the imagination a-working, and as it were cantharidizes our desires.

This twenty-two-year-old was not accustomed to such sights, knew what sort of feelings they were expected to arouse in him, but found that in fact the sight presented itself as a curiosity, not as a provocation.

I conclude that we should defend the liberty that has been gained, and desire more liberty if attainable. What can an individual do about it?

First, look with an air of tolerant unconcern at all manifestations of the new spirit. Do not stare, or comment even in praise, nor yet make any effort to avoid looking at them. Attention is the worst thing in the world for innovations of this sort. A quarter of a century ago, when bicycling was the fashion, there was a promising move to introduce knickers as a sport costume for women; for the "bloomers" of that date were knickers in cut. The movement was killed mainly by the attention of those who liked the idea but could not keep their tongues off it. In our time knickers have come in under the shelter of more startling innovations.

Second, when the enemy will not let the innovation go unnoticed, defend it ruthlessly. Don't let the advocates of clothing talk as if they were acknowledged to be the more modest party; remind them that when one person finds exposure shameful because it suggests sexual ideas, and another finds it harmless because it has no evil suggestion, this proves that the first one's mind is fuller of sex than the second one's. If Christopher Ward attacks Sherwood Anderson by pointing out that determination to expose the person is a symptom of a type of insanity, for which see books on insanity, reply that repugnance to the sight of nudity is a symptom of a type of sexual perversion, for which see books on that subject, and that sexual perverts have a notorious proneness to propagate their perversion to such immature minds as come under their influence.

Third, when you are deciding whether to dress according to the demands of bodily comfort or according to the demands of immediate social comfort, count as one strong motive the good that you can do to others by setting an example of unconformity. Nothing but setting examples reforms custom. There is no probability that if you are too extreme you will hurt your own cause. It is truer that by being extreme you help to secure the success of those who would be counted extremists if your extremeness did not make them seem comparatively moderate; remember those knickers.

Fourth, aggressively demand that the clothing of babies shall be just what is best for their health regardless of convention, and that children of kindergarten age shall have the same liberty of costume in the less crowded city street that they have on the more crowded bathing-beach. If the doctor says the baby will be safer against rickets by having the sunshine all over his skin, then, in city or suburb or country, let him get the sunshine all over.

Fifth, remember that the common law permits not only all exposure that public opinion will at all permit (except possibly for babies) but very much more. See law-books.

Uncle Sam's Sweatshop

By RAYMOND CLAPPER

LET'S look, for a moment, at the other side of this economy business. Everyone, to be sure, wants the government operated economically. The cost of the federal government is $2,000,000,000 a year below what it was in 21 and this is justly regarded as a remarkable achievement in pubic finance. But as Mr. Coolidge said in his address to the business organization of the government on June 22, "We are fast reaching the time when we can not look forward to appreciable reduction in the legitimate cost of government," and the question now raised is, How far shall we go with the economy program? Does the country want economy at any price?

Most persons rebel at the horrors of the sweatshop. They prefer to pay slightly more for a garment they know to have been made by decently paid and decently treated labor, and not wrung from the midnight toil of an undernourished child. Would the same persons begrudge a few cents more on their taxes every year in order that those who performed the labor of the government might be decently paid? It is hard to believe that the country wants its government to be converted into a wholesale sweatshop.

If this suggestion provokes the picture of idling government clerks wasting time with their feet propped on the desks, living a leisurely life of ease in the beautiful city of Washington, let me offer in evidence a letter which came recently to the editor of the Washington Daily News:

> Dear Mr. Editor of the News:
>
> I am one of the unfortunates who were locked out in 1920. I am seventy-seven years of age and served Uncle Sam for forty-four years. My salary was $1,200. I was never able to save a cent.
>
> I get sixty dollars a month.* I have a daughter to care for. We have two rooms. I pay $25 a month, and have no heat. I have to buy coal—half a ton a month for $7. I had to give up my insurance.
>
> I have not bought a suit of clothes since my retirement and never expect to buy one. For our Christmas dinner we had sandwiches and coffee, three times that day.
>
> I would like to get a position [illegible] at $30 a month

* This is retirement pay granted out of a fund created by deductions from salaries.

in Washington or any other place in the U. S. It is a crime the way we are treated.

It was just a year ago that President Coolidge vetoed a bill to increase the pay of postal employees. Their average salaries were about $1,750 a year. Mr. Coolidge vetoed the increase because, he said, the average pay of all government clerks within the corresponding range was $1,554 a year and it was obvious that the postal clerks already were paid more than the average prevailing in other departments.

"Government extravagance must stop," he said sternly in this veto message. "The people of the nation are paying all that it is possible for them to pay. . . . I do not see how I can approve the large increase in expenditures of this kind, except on the plea of urgent necessity." This bill provided for a total increase amounting to $68,000,000 a year; later the increase was granted after Congress raised postal rates to absorb most of it.

Now let's see how the economy program was applied on another occasion, just last March. The Senate—or more accurately some dozen or fifteen Senators—had returned to the Capitol one night after dinner to dispose of routine legislation that had accumulated toward the end of the short session. The session lasted just thirty-two minutes and this is what happened:

After the District of Columbia appropriation bill had been rushed through practically without debate, the legislative appropriation bill was brought up and passed, section by section, with practically no debate. After about twenty minutes of this routine performance, an amendment was sent to the desk providing that the pay of the Vice-President, the Speaker of the House, and members of the Cabinet should be raised from $12,000 a year to $15,000, and that the pay of Senators and Representatives should be increased from $7,500 a year to $10,000. This amendment was read hurriedly and agreed to unanimously without a word of debate or a record vote, though it involved an increase of almost $1,500,000 a year to the government pay roll.

Then Senator Edge of New Jersey offered an amendment and this debate followed:

> Mr. Edge. Mr. President, the amendment refers to a laborer in the document room who has been in the employ of the Senate for twenty-odd years and is receiving the munificent salary of $1,010 a year. This amendment simply places him in the class above in which case he would receive a salary of $1,140 a year, an increase of $130. I think after twenty years' service in the document room a man is entitled to have his class advanced to the extent of $130 a year.
>
> Mr. Warren. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator is willing to withdraw his amendment?
>
> Mr. Edge. If I have the same assurance from the chairman that he will press it in the ordinary way, I will not insist on it.
>
> Mr. Warren. All I can assure the Senator is that we certainly will take it up with the House committee and give it serious consideration.

The amendment was rejected. There being no other amendments, the bill was passed without objection and the Senate adjourned. As everyone knows, the pay increase went through for the Senators and Congressmen and the Cabinet officials; but the old messenger still is waiting for his.

In vetoing the postal-pay increase Mr. Coolidge criticized the employees for the activity of their labor organization which had been working to get the bill through Congress. But not yet has one word been raised in criticism of those Congressmen and Senators who voted themselves raises, the increases alone being more than the average yearly salary of the government workers.

The question is, Where should the pressure for economy be heaviest, on the low-paid government employee who at best has little hope of promotion to a real living wage, or on the areas where greater slashes might be made, without noticeably injuring the efficiency of the government? There is the Tariff Commission. It spent many months investigating the cost of sugar production here and abroad so that the President might be guided in considering whether to reduce the tariff on Cuban importations. And after the report was in, and the President had thought it over for nearly a year he decided that the data were so untrustworthy that he could not accept the recommendation! Is a bureau like that of any use? It costs the government perhaps $700,000 a year. What about the various "lame-duck" boards and commissions, the international boundary commissions made up of Senators and Congressmen who, being no longer appreciated by their constituents, were called back by presidential appointment into the service of their country to the extent of drawing $7,500 to $10,000 a year and making annual fishing trips through the Great Lakes? Whenever there is a real boundary question affecting the Canadian or Mexican lines the State Department puts its international-law experts on the work, not the retired politicians on the commissions.

Private business enterprises which have been most successful over long periods are invariably those which pay their labor well and treat it well. Economies are sought at vital spots and not through sweatshop methods. In putting the government on a more business-like basis, why should this principle be overlooked?

Britain's Labor Women

By CRYSTAL EASTMAN

EIGHTEEN years ago Mary MacArthur, Margaret MacDonald, and Mary Middleton called the first Conference of Labor Women. There was no franchise for women in England then, and little prospect of any. This year a thousand delegates and visitors packed Birmingham Town Hall. Presiding over them was Ellen Wilkinson, M. P., witty and red-haired, ex-Communist, and now the only woman sitting for the British Labor Party at Westminster.

Forty of the delegates represented the Women's Cooperative Guild, the Independent Labor Party, and the Fabian Society; seventy-five represented trade unions. Seven hundred and thirty-one represented women's sections of the Labor Party from all over England, Scotland, and Wales. Nearly all were working-class housewives whose absence from home meant that friendly neighbors had to volunteer care for husband and child. The husbands of these women were Welsh miners, shipbuilders from Tyneside, shop assistants, railway conductors, cotton-mill workers, seamen, carpenters. Never have I seen a conference of American women where the same forces were gathered together. England is small. Third-class railway fares are cheaper than fares for the same distances in America. Even with the low wages and unemployment now prevalent, it had been possible to achieve a representative convention.

I walked to the platform and looked at the earnest tired faces of these women. Their plain, often shabby clothes, and their sallow complexions were evidences of the poverty that is the common lot of the English working class. Poor food and strain had done their best to remove the beauty from the faces before me; but the beauty of courage was still there.

As the meeting opened, messages of greeting were read from Sweden, Finland, and Russia. A small but significant feature to record. These women are opening their own channels of communication with the Continent, and they have begun to learn much from the determined and educated feminist groups in Scandinavia and Russia. Not only domestic problems, of food, housing, old age, and maternity, are now recognized on the agendas of women's conferences, but foreign affairs are boldly discussed. Not long ago foreign affairs were considered the preserve of highly placed men.

The uses of the convention are three. It is the occasion for direct representatives of working-class women to formulate their own program, so that with some sort of united front they can make themselves felt in the Labor Party Congress that follows later in the year. At the conference the women leaders from National Labor Party headquarters meet the delegates who must in turn educate the women in the villages and factory towns. Second, the conference is the debating ground extraordinary for the home women, workmen's wives whose money income is derived from their husbands' wages, and the working women in stores and factories. Considering how often in the past women workers have been used, if not as strike-breakers, at least as the undercutters of wages, this meeting of two groups of women has been needed to make clear to the wives of men trade unionists that for their own sakes and their husband's sakes the principle of equal pay for equal work must prevail, if the standards within an industry are not to be lowered. The cleavage between the home women and the women trade unionists is steadily growing less. Finally, the conference offers a forum for definite feminist propaganda, the furtherance of the women's franchise bill, the formulations of demands for more women candidates for Parliament, and the discussion of such subjects as birth control and other feminist issues.

Ellen Wilkinson opened the convention with a denunciation of the Churchill tax on artificial silk. "Every bit of color and gaiety is to be taken from the life of the working woman. Her hard-earned little fineries are to be taxed by nearly ten millions for the benefit of the richest people in the country." Ellen Wilkinson knows that to clerk and shopgirl neat appearance is a necessity if she is not to lose her job. She went from the Churchill tax to an analysis of the proposals for widows' pensions and compared the eighteen shillings a week proposed for a workman's widow with two children with the army private's widow's forty shillings. Dr. Marion Phillips, the energetic Australian who is chief woman officer of the Labor Party, reported 1,450 women's sections with a total membership of 200,000; and an increase in Labor women holding municipal, county, and district-council offices in the past year. This was salve to those delegates who feel keenly the loss of Dorothy Jewson, Margaret Bondfield, and Susan Lawrence in Parliament; and who have resented the ready alibi of certain of the men who lay the blame for the Baldwin victory on the women voters. Women voters, indeed. This conference chided Ramsay MacDonald for neglecting to make the women's franchise bill admitting the younger women a party issue.

The birth-control resolution which was carried read:

> This conference is of the opinion that it should be permissible for doctors employed in any medical service for which public funds are provided to give information on birth control to married people who desire it.

It is not illegal in England to distribute information in regard to contraceptives. The issue was whether the public health centers should do carefully and scientifically what so many women manage to do as best they can. Two years ago the subject was very timidly discussed. Last year Dora Russell and Freda Laski put through a resolution asking that the health centers give out such information, but the Roman Catholic Minister of Health in the Labor Government would not move. This year no two women "put through" the resolution. The whole floor was for it, with a few bitter exceptions who regard contraceptives as a frustration of God and the moral order. However, "I am a Catholic," said a stout motherly woman, climbing on her chair as is the custom for speakers from the floor, "and I want to say that the Catholics better be honest. They are practicing birth control if they've got the information." To two firm young socialists who rose to explain that birth control was an economic issue that would not survive the social revolution an earnest woman replied firmly: "Even in the cooperative commonwealth I think a woman will want to choose her time and say how many."

Another resolution which was passed unanimously called on the Labor Party "to deal stringently with any representative of the Labor Party who does not support sex equality, economically, educationally, and politically." The demand set forth in Ellen Wilkinson's opening speech that the Labor Party propose women candidates in a reasonable number of parliamentary seats was echoed in the resolution which demanded that "the women's sections immediately levy themselves a small weekly sum as a political fund for the express purpose of running working-women candidates for Parliament." There is a suspicion that certain of the men who direct Labor party affairs are willing to have women candidates but not in the sure districts, and that there is not the same zest in the men's efforts to raise campaign funds for the women that there is among the women to support the men.

Among the other resolutions passed were demands for a National Wheat Board to solve the problem of cheap bread, a demand for a trained nurse in every secondary and primary school, a demand for the passage of the women's franchise bill admitting the younger women to the polls. Various resolutions calling for an international conference of labor women; for enforcement of the Wheatley housing act, for family migration, and for study of the labor market in the colonies were all on the agenda.

These Englishwomen speak well, briefly, and with much caustic force. The various English dialects give a certain rich savor to the debate for an American observer. Noteworthy as contrasted with American meetings I have attended is the hard-mindedness and attentiveness of these women. The rank-and-file delegates, scrambling on their chairs to speak, match the platform in thoughtfulness and directness. The impression is of women who are going to fight to get their full share of power within the Labor Party. They intend that the men shall be helpmates in their feminist projects.

In the Driftway

THE debate on the censorship of literature has been reopened, all unwittingly, by the chief exponent of a censorship measure, none other than Justice Ford himself. To be sure, His Honor said nothing about literature; he rather expressed himself on the subject of cocktails and "these wild young people." But the principle remains the same. The Justice had noted that his daughter, following accepted mode, apparently even in official families, served cocktails to her guests and drank them herself, all the while remaining a respectable and decent member of society and a thoroughly nice young woman. Without going into the question of whether or not this is the same daughter who was so shocked by a reading of Mr. D. H. Lawrence's "Women in Love" that she brought the offending book to her father and started the censorship controversy, one can still remark that Justice Ford concludes that his daughter will not become a hopeless drunkard because of a few cocktails. Being of a generally sober disposition, she is not rendered helpless and morally unstable even by synthetic gin. This the Justice observes, all the while abstaining from cocktails himself because he does not like them.

* * * * *

THE Drifter contends that this completely ruins Mr. Ford as a champion of censorship. Every argument that he uses in favor of the sound reputation of his daughter applies with equal weight to those responsible members of society who wish to be allowed to choose their own literature. The Judge would find himself surrounded, if he took the trouble to inquire, with persons who have read or will read or are reading books which would be banned by the proposed censorship law, and who are as respectable and law-abiding citizens as the Judge's daughter herself. Quite aside from the question of Shakespeare and the Bible, those time-honored examples that are always quoted whenever censorship is discussed, the Drifter knows honest men and women who have read Aretinus and remained honest, who have pored over Mr. D. H. Lawrence and are still faithful to their wives or husbands, who know Boccaccio and do not sell their votes, who have even become acquainted with Mr. James Joyce's "Ulysses" and still keep out of jail.

* * * * *

THE final aspect of the situation becomes clear when one recalls that Mr. Ford not only dislikes cocktails, but that he makes a wry face when he sees them. And therefore, the Drifter supposes, no one compels him to drink them against his will. By the same token, no one compels him to read books which offend him. If he should reply that what he considers improper books are offered for public sale and for the ruination of public morals, one has only to point to the member of the judge's family who read "Women in Love," or enough of it to see what it was like, and who was not corrupted. Even as the officials of the vice society have read hundreds of improper books and looked at dozens of indecent post cards and have remained as pure as when they began, so, it seems safe to assume, would the ordinary citizen. Or perhaps it would be better to pass a censorship law and then wink at any violation of it by persons of sound mind, on the ground that they could take their questionable literature or leave it alone.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Purging of Christianity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The present religious struggle between fundamentalists and modernists, which seems to be the last stand of superstition and ignorance within the Christian church, appears to me as a purging, purifying process. The Christianity of today is undergoing a change hardly less important than that of the Reformation. We are getting back nearer to the essence of Christ's teaching when we eliminate literal adherence to those beliefs which run counter to scientific observation and knowledge.

The religion of the future will dispense with the earthly miracles as tests of orthodoxy. Christianity does not need them. They hurt Christianity by driving away from it many an honest and sincerely religious person who, because he cannot believe that Jonah emerged alive from a lengthy sojourn in a whale, or that Christ literally changed water into wine, or that God parted the waters of the Red Sea, or that Christ was born of a virgin, or that the body of the Christian rises from the grave finds himself persona non grata within the Christian church and accordingly leaves it. None of the miracles of the Christian tradition are so marvelous, as important to human life and conduct, as the known immensity of space, the speed of a radio wave through the ether, or the birth and growth of a human child. The real miracles are the human mind and its discoveries about the laws which govern this universe. The religion of the future will content itself with these miracles and will seek the supernatural not on this planet or any other but beyond the veil of death.

Modern science does not necessarily breed irreverence. Rather it is calculated to make man humble in the realization of the intelligence and order of the universe. It points convincingly to a mighty God—worthy of worship. In future generations the Christian will probably regard the present contentions of the fundamentalists with the same amused incredulity as that with which today we regard the speculations of medieval scholasticism as to how many angels could stand on the point of a needle.

Christianity will have been purged and purified when it seeks the truth about God and Christ through the channels of honest study rather than through the channels of superstition. It is more helpful to think that Christ was the son of two human parents, and that He, being like us, yet conquered the temptations of life and lived in perfect accord with the spirit of God. That He had an earthly father does not mean that He had no heavenly father or that He was any the less the Son of God.

It is not necessary for the Christian to believe in the resurrection of the body. It is just as difficult in fact to envisage a heaven in which these earthly bodies could be at home as to envisage the survival of our souls apart from our bodies.

All religions which are worthy of the name share the belief in "a spirit of things." Primitive animism, developed pantheism or monotheism hold this belief in a spirit life independent of matter. The Chinese nightly offer a portion of rice and a libation of tea or wine to the wandering shades of their ancestors, and when the "essence" has been consumed the priests from the nearby temple carry away the residue. Even highly civilized people feel a sense of fear when they pass a haunted house or graveyard at night. This feeling should strengthen the faith of those who, accepting the scientific fact that the body perishes, yet cling to a hope or belief that a spiritual life does survive death.

When modern science demonstrated as false or inaccurate certain myths which had been accepted as essentials of belief, the first consequence was that those who spoke authoritatively for the church were unable to adjust themselves to the new liscoveries by the simple expedient of analyzing these myths nd declaring them (as they are in fact) to be unessential dditions to the teachings of Christ, and those who accepted the cientific discoveries were forced out of the church or compelled o keep silent as to their views. Now, tardily, as the leadership f the church is passing into the hands of younger men and vomen who have been exposed to the new teachings of modern cience, the church is adapting itself to the new order and upon xamining the result finds that all which was of value still emains. Christ's own words ring as freshly and clearly as ver, and the church having gotten safely through with its eriod of introspection can again turn its energies into chan-els of new usefulness.

New York, June 16 A New York Lawyer

Artists, Take Notice

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: All artists who read at all read The Nation. So I hould like to appeal, through your columns, to all the land-cape painters of America to carry their rubbish away with hem, and not leave rags impregnated with paint or tubes of aint behind them in fields and pastures, where they are likely o do damage to live stock. Actual harm has resulted to cattle n this neighborhood from carelessness of this kind, and rural America is acquiring a grudge against the careless artist, not nlike that which it already has against the careless tourist nd picnicker.

Amenia, New York, June 2 Amy E. Spingarn

A Memorial to Walt Whitman

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As a member of the committee of the Authors' Club, which is undertaking to collect funds to raise a suitable me-morial to Walt Whitman in New York, may I appeal through your columns to all persons who would like to subscribe to his effort to commemorate the greatest poet who has ever com-memorated this city. Checks may be sent to the treasurer of he committee, William F. Dix, 34 Nassau Street, New York City.

West Cornwall, Conn., June 25 Carl Van Doren

America's Debt to Hyam Solomon

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A blot has been resting upon the American nation since 1776. It has shown ingratitude by ignoring the services of one of the greatest patriots of the revolutionary period, who financed and backed the government in freedom's cause, the great Polish Jew Hyam Solomon of New York and Philadelphia, banker and patriot of the first order.

The history of Hyam Solomon can be traced in every encyclopedia, but not a schoolbook in the United States has even mentioned him, not a poem has been written in his honor (except by John Fiske in his "History of the Hebrews in Amer-ica," and in President Madison's correspondence to Edmund Randolph, and in the Congressional Record of Washington).

In 1917 and 1918 I asked President Wilson to direct the War Department to name one of the military camps the Hyam Solomon Camp. Adjutant General Reilly wrote me that Presi-dent Wilson requested him to communicate with me on the mat-ter, and that it had the hearty support of both President Wilson and the War Department. But the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House defeated the plan.

Hyam Solomon died at the age of forty-five in Philadelphia, leaving a widow and two small children in great poverty; all his papers and the government's obligation to him were lost in those troublesome days of the revolutionary period and by the English who conquered Washington city in 1814. The United States has never recognized the services of this great historical figure, nor done justice to the memory of this unselfish and most sacrificing man for the American cause.

Senator Wadsworth, in correspondence between 1911 and 1915, promised me that he would gladly bring a bill in the United States Senate to put aside part of the interest on the loan of $660,000 in 1776, amounting today to over $180,000,000, to found and erect a university in Washington and name it the Hyam Solomon National University.

I call upon the entire American nation, the President and the Cabinet, every governor in the United States and every member of the Senate and House of Representatives to help in this move, especially the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Sena-tors of Pennsylvania, and the Congressmen of Pennsylvania, and the Mayor of Philadelphia, to do their duty to a historical figure of their city. I trust that every intellectual person in the United States, every scholar, every diplomat, will indorse this move to give Hyam Solomon the honor he deserves from the American nation.

New York, June 20 Louis Friedman

The Other Side of Los Angeles

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your Los Angeles readers who, like us, read The Nation truculently in public and wonder who else reads it out here may be interested in knowing that there is one little group outside of Radicals, Inc., who definitely eschew the banal, the pretty-pretty tidiness of Los Angeles and the smugness of the Golden Plated West.

You have guessed it—the Little Theater Group. Some years ago the Potboilers were known to the public solely through frowzy handbills documented as "Bohemian" by their typo-graphical horrors and cheap green paper. They met in the Mexican quarter and in Chinatown, and later on in an old fire-house. The neighborhood was redolent of tortillas, tamales, and stray tabbies.

A pallid attempt at a Village, some of us said, and never came again. But without any organization, with no money, they produced, first, "Beyond the Horizon," then "Six Characters in Search of an Author." Every newspaper in town hailed them. Then, to the credit of Hollywood, the movie contingent joined in the cheers. Mitchell Lewis volunteered for "The Hairy Ape" and gave a fine performance; and stayed to help scene-shift when the director's back gave out. Then "The Failures" was produced. Not so discouraging for Los Angeles now, is it? The newspapers give us columns of free publicity. In fact when the Potboilers had to move from the firehouse, which was a fire-trap as well, we hissed gleefully at each other: "Big theaters jealous! Jealous—s-s!!"

Now, in a messy little basement, they are rehearsing "The Life of Man." No one receives a cent of pay. Settings, cos-tumes, publicity, acting, all are given freely. And there is no organization! No membership, no dues—clubs at last, our individualistic friends! Sigurd Russell, a high-school teacher, is the producer, with a genius for getting things done. Ole M. Ness is the director, who doesn't wear puttees or golf pants. He writes poetry and sells pianos during the day time, and never once has he fallen for the "sure-fire" or the banal in choos-ing his plays. He has genius, real genius, and a gift for making vital what might be merely literary. And he is modest and tactful. So we know the movies won't steal him.

The Andreyev play opens on May 4, hags, screams, tragedy, and all. There is news that MacLoon will put on "What Price Glory" here. "The Beggar on Horseback" plays at the Ma-jestic now, and life in the Great Side-doors regains its savor. Now if only Upton Sinclair won't start in reading the Constitution or something out loud!

Los Angeles, April 23 Isabel L. Mayers

Your Portrait

By LEON HERALD

Like the day in space
Your portrait
Is framed within my vision
And hangs upon
The dust-proof wall
Of my soul.

(At the vanishing of day
Heaven becomes all eyes
Searching her lover, the Earth.)

Not to render my vision an empty night
I cling to your image as though
My thoughts of you were the flesh
In which you abide willingly.

Society and Scientific Method

Conservatism, Radicalism, and Scientific Method. By Albert Benedict Wolfe. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

MR. WOLFE is above all a shrewd observer of the contemporary scene; so that when he writes of human attitudes toward the events of that scene one can be certain that he is informed concerning the facts, that he respects them, and that he is willing to listen to their faintest dictates. This may not at once seem important. Usually the psychological equipment of social commentators comes in for criticism first and the range of information upon which that equipment is used last, if indeed at all. But there is no possible justification for this neglect. The full use of the shrewdness—and by this is meant penetration to the significant events—of our social psychologists is the most important virtue we can demand of them at present. For there are no psychological laws; there is no generally accepted body of scientific truth from which to argue and within which to find a classifying niche for each happening of common life. We are beginning to see that the raw materials for psychologic generalization occur within the provinces of the observers in the various fields of social science. Especially the data of economics are also the data of social psychology. Economic behavior is psychology.

Of course there have been and still are numerous persons conceiving themselves to be gifted with knowledge concerning laws of psychology which catch up into the broad scope of their generalizations the behavior of people everywhere. And sometimes, as for example in the case of Mr. McDougall, they have sounded plausible. But so far as the enlightenment of the springs of behavior goes, or for that matter the better guidance of social activity, they have attained slight results. And this was partly, at least, because they had no equipment of insight. Fruitfulness in this field of activity seems to depend upon a beginning in shrewdness and a subsequent development by rigid adherence to mechanistic sequence and expectation and upon the method that is sometimes called behavioristic. Other kinds of effort develop loosely symmetrical structures of logic that fail utterly to fit the facts unless the facts are subjected to a bath of mysticism which so transfigures them that they become the very ones needed to fit the logical structure. What this leads to may be anything—it certainly cannot be the useful and relevant generalization which assists in human guidance.

Of course what is involved in all this is a very old quarrel between the adherents of the purposive and those of the mechanistic explanation of events. Doubtless Mr. Wolfe errs in believing himself more completely mechanistic than he is. But when Mr. McDougall undertakes to lecture him at length (as he did in a recent issue of the American Economic Review) for his formal adherence to the mechanistic explanation he shows himself to be involved in the deeper confusion. He forgets the usefulness of either or both forms of explanation. Edwin Ray Gutherie has suggested that both categories be more or less deflated and attention concentrated on the idea that neither is valuable except that it assists in the prediction of developing phenomena and the attainment therefore of some control over the future. As has been suggested already, however, there is a certain danger in the purposive that must not be overlooked: that of congealed preconceptions which distort facts and so hinder thinking. Essentially, Mr. Wolfe is right in wanting to ally himself formally with the mechanists. But it is difficult to see that it affects his work one way or the other.

One thing that interests him is the genesis of our attitudes. And he is willing to make certain classifications at the very start for the sake of definition; but he would be the first to admit human behavior to be so very various as to make any classification something less than permanent and rigid. It can be said that there are conservatives and that there are radicals; also it can be said that there are certain recognizably different groups among them. On this basis one can look about at the behavior of groups and can see that the consequences of adherence to an emotionally determined attitude are usually bad—and this whether or not the emotions have been rationalized subsequently. These general bad effects lead to the wish that a more seriously rational basis for attitudinizing might be found. Here the social psychologist comes fairly up against his main problem: the discovery of ways and means toward what Santayana called the life of reason.

The process of working out a better planning of the enterprise of life involves the analysis of situations in which individuals of our time have to function. It involves the analysis of characteristic modes of behavior in characteristic situations and the careful working out of some criteria as tentative guides to action. This last is the science of ethics. Thus we may learn to behave so that our behavior may become progress. But it requires a kind of guidance by rational programs that is possible only to the best minded.

Unfortunately no one who is alive to the realities of existence carries a very certain faith in the spread of ethical—in this sense—behavior. Certain departments of our lives may be brought to a budgetary standard; it seems to most thinkers hardly likely that all departments may. But when we turn a little aside from this rigid viewpoint and center attention on the fundamental fact that we do act and that we many times act with a pre-view, we begin to see possibilities of the analysis of action and of the further analysis of what it is that gives content to various pre-views. Perhaps—who knows—we may be able to change that content!

Pre-views are largely determined by attitudes, and attitudes tend to evaluate forms of action so differently that there is a constantly recurring sequence of social conflict. The social psychologist tears his thinking away from the direct attempt to persuade men to a wholly rational basis of action and tries to get him to see the social degeneracy involved in the grinding friction of these conflicts. Is it possible to compromise them, he asks. And here, wonderfully, it seems possible to Mr. Wolfe that we may find ourselves attaining the higher goal in the struggle for the lower one. For a conflict of interests, he feels, can be resolved only by "opponents coming to agreement on some common ethical ground—that is, by such redefinition of their interests and modification of their attitudes as will lead them to judge the facts of the situation by some higher standard of ethical valuation. . . . Briefly, and excluding from consideration at this point the problem of deciding between ends . . . they are not to be settled by brute force, dogmatic appeal to authority and precedent; or trickery, emotional frumpery, and chicane; but by the arbitrament of fact. . . . The moral function of the scientific method is to rationalize interest conflicts." And so, by compromise, we actually move ahead.

This belief that something may come of so finely tempered a tool as this we have forged in scientific method rests very largely upon the feeling that it is our only dependence in a civilization whose very mechanical refinements have made it, as a whole, mysterious to the normal mind. Its elaborated correlative structures have been spun into too intricate a web. The eye of the mind loses its grasp in following out the stresses of existence and comes to rest finally in utter defeat. In this extremity nothing remains but the emotions. Intelligence requires assistance to master the machinery of our industrial life and to prevent the wrecking of delicate relationships by the desperate application of crude emotional controls. And organized intelligence possesses the scientific method. This is the key, then, to progress? Well, that is perhaps too much to say, particularly when one examines the exact meaning of "scientific method," including as it does the necessity for the rigorous selection and analysis of data, for the establishment of tentative uniformities, and for the experimental control of developing phenomena. It does not look so much like a key when it is examined in this fashion. It looks more like a potential mental discipline for normal minds, by which, however, society may possibly raise itself by its bootstraps.

How to achieve this discipline? Mr. Wolfe says by education. By, in fact, plowing it in to the very soil of the educative process. "The attitudinal reform requisite to the efficiency and safety of the Great Society can come only through education. . . . Always, wherever we start, we come back to education. . . . When history placed industrialism and political democracy in one side of the scales, it called for ethical democracy, objective sympathy, social knowledge, and the scientific spirit in the other. It is the function of teachers, wherever they may be working, to put them there."

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL

Abraham Walkowitz

One Hundred Drawings. By Abraham Walkowitz. B. W. Huebsch, Inc. $10.

DURING the past ten years, most notably in Independent Society Exhibitions, in one-man shows, and in illustrated books, we have become familiar with the work of young artists in the experimental stage of their careers under the influence of Cézanne, Picasso, Matisse, and others. And these imitative or derivative experiments, despite their value to the striving young creator, are of no particular interest to the art-loving spectator. As a rule, one artist smitten by the structural principles and mannerisms of Cézanne is no more interesting than any other artist so obsessed. We are treated to the same type of composition, the same distorted perspective, the same modulation of tones to enforce the illusion of volume. And so it is with all other such imitative documents. We can see no great significance in them. When an artist [illegible] has left an enduring impression upon his generation only then are we willing to examine patiently every casual fragment of his work that remains. We are willing to study his sources merely because he is Keats or Rembrandt or Turner. On the lower levels of artistic creation, and in the work of men who have but recently "arrived," we are not so scrupulous or so interested. We put on trial first their ultimate selves, their honest artistic convictions about life.

The present volume undeniably contains work that represents a genuine personal vision, but it contains too much that does not. One is wearied by the profusion of drawings revealing Mr. Walkowitz posturing first in one borrowed manner, then in another. Like Carl Sandburg, he is inclined to attach an unwarranted significance to every scrawl he happens to have set down. But, like Carl Sandburg too, let it not be forgotten, he has a unique idiom. One feels this most in his decorative panels, in the monotypes and in certain studies of the figure. In the panels, which deal chiefly with idyllic subject matter, there is a lyrical tenderness, a naive grace in the drawing of the figures and in their decorative ordering. They are lovely in their quiet rhythm and in their fresh, unaffected, primitive quality. To pass from this static pastoral mood to the fiery energy of the monotypes is a startling transition. It is like leaping from a still woodland pool into a maelstrom. The intricate play of form in such monotypes as The Bathers and Human Rhythm is conceived in a spirit of passionate intensity admirably controlled by a coolly functioning aesthetic judgment. And the medium itself seems peculiarly sympathetic to Mr. Walkowitz's tactile impressions. Its fluid response to what he wants to say is almost complete. In the precarious art of the monotype, a demon of the incalculable is constantly intruding either to mar the artist's intent or to delight him with some lovely accident. Mr. Walkowitz appears to have this demon on his side most of the time, and to succeed in keeping him nimbly engaged in the service of beauty. In his drawings of the nude Mr. Walkowitz is uneven. He always achieves weight, and feels the big generalities of form. Many of his action studies are perversely crude and tend to overstatement, although the fine Isadora Duncan series cannot be thus indicted. He is at his best in really sensitive studies such as Baby, The Bather, A Study, and Elevation. Mr. Walkowitz's book is formidably prefaced with four critical introductions by Henry McBride, John Weichsel, Charles Vildrac, and Willard Huntington Wright, all adulatory and none of any great value as criticism. Mr. McBride's essay is the most readable.

GLEN MULLIN

The Ethics of Naturalism

Ethics—Origin and Development. By Prince Kropotkin. Translated by Louis Friedland and Joseph R. Piroshnikoff. The Dial Press. $4.

PRINCE KROPOTKIN had planned a work on ethics in two volumes, the first dealing with the origin and development of morality, the second with moral ideals. At the time of his death the first volume, which now appears in translation, was practically completed. The second was never written.

For Kropotkin morality means essentially altruism, the sacrifice of personal happiness in the interests of social solidarity. His problem is this: "Why does man so often renounce that which would unquestionably give him pleasure? Why does he suffer all kinds of privations in order not to violate his moral ideal?" His position may roughly be described as naturalism. The term is ambiguous, for it may mean either opposition to supernaturalism or opposition to humanism. In the first sense it is the attempt to find the origin and justification of morality in human nature and not in the Will of God or the Universal Reason or any similar mysterious source. In the second sense it is the attempt to obliterate the distinction between man's human and animal natures and to explain morality in terms of non-moral factors.

Kropotkin founds morality upon the nature of man, but the peculiar interest of his position is that although he exhibits morality as a purely natural fact he escapes the familiar charge of "explaining away." For he undertakes to prove that morality is natural by showing that nature is moral. Following out the ideas already made familiar by his "Mutual Aid," he asserts that the animal kingdom is not red in tooth and claw but that, on the contrary, "Mutual Aid is the predominant fact of nature." In animal societies, he says (although his conclusions go far beyond what the evidence warrants), you have the individual identifying itself with the group, you have sympathy, you have self-sacrifice. We find here "an indication of the natural origin not only of the rudiments of ethics but also of the higher ethical feelings." Even "the very ideas of bad and good, and man's abstractions concerning 'the supreme good,' have been borrowed from Nature. They are reflections in the mind of man of what he saw in animal life and in the course of his social life." He explains duty in the same way. Elaborating Darwin's account in "The Descent of Man," he contends that mutual aid, being necessary for the preservation, the welfare, and the progressive development of the species, has become the strongest and most permanent force in human nature. When some anti-social or ephemeral impulse opposes this force the resulting friction is what we know as conscience.

Nine of the thirteen chapters are concerned with tracing the development of ethical theory from primitive times up to the evolutionary ethics of the nineteenth century, always, of course, from the point of view of naturalism. Thus the Greek philosophers are said to have been right in declaring that morality was natural to man and depended neither on revelation nor on the fear of punishment; but their eudaemonism failed to explain why man finds satisfaction in acting morally. The importance of the French thinkers of the eighteenth century is that they "helped to bring society to a realization of the fact that morality can be completely liberated from the sanction of religion." The merit of Kant is that his search for a "new, purely scientific ethics" helped to "prepare the way for the evolutionary ethics of our time." In view of this last statement it is not surprising that Herbert Spencer gets a chapter to himself, as does Guyau. (Incidentally, Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle get twelve pages between them.)

Two criticisms may be offered. The first concerns the value of the work as a history of ethics. In principle there is no objection to the writing of a history of philosophy by a man who [illegible] position of his own to defend; in fact, the method has distinct value. But it also has its dangers, chief among which are false perspective (treating systems as approximations to or aberrations from the truth, i. e., the author's truth) and the doing of actual violence to the thought of the writers considered. Kropotkin avoids neither danger. Of the first I have given some examples above. Here is an example of the second. Referring to Plato's doctrine of love, he says: "His Eros was also what we now call sociality, mutual sympathy, the feeling which . . . permeates the whole world of living creatures." Kropotkin would have done better to use his historical material as illustrative [illegible] actually the value it has in his mind.

The second criticism has to do with his own theory. In his eagerness to show that morality is natural he overlooks the [illegible] pointed out in his [illegible]. Briefly it is this: How can any fact of the [illegible], e. g., animal solidarity, sympathy, self-sacrifice, tell man how he ought to behave? Altruism may be a strong "permanent instinct," but this fact only explains why man does [illegible] it cannot tell him why he ought to obey it, nor, if he disobey, can it tell him why he should feel remorse. Duty remains as mysterious [illegible]. And it is just this element of mystery that all "supernaturalistic" theories recognize.

CHARLES A. BENNETT

The Liberal Jew

A New Approach to the Problems of Judaism. By Mordecai Kaplan. New York: The Society for the Advancement of Judaism. Seventy-five cents.

Survival or Extinction: Social Aspects of the Jewish Question. By Elisha M. Friedman. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

Liberalizing Liberal Judaism. By James Waterman Wise. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

AT last the Jew has paid himself the high compliment of criticism. By turning on his own problems the analytical faculties which he exerts on all other questions he has testified to a faith in his power of self-improvement and to a pride in the task of self-determination. Hitherto it has been the habit of the Jewish people to plead with God and to appeal to the Gentiles for alleviation of the wretched conditions which they were obliged to endure; it has been their belief that they could ease their lot by sounding pitiful lamentations to the Almighty and by serving a humiliating tribute to the oppressor. But now the Jews are realizing that their salvation rests neither on the bounty of God nor on the mercy of the Gentile; they are learning at last that none but themselves can and will solve the Jewish question and relieve the misery of Israel.

The publication of these volumes testifies to this new attitude and evinces the different course. The books form a threefold inquiry into Jewish life during the period of Exile—into the development and direction of the Jewish outlook, into the strength and survival of Jewish national traits, and into the value and variation of Jewish religion. And they all urge the readjustment of Jewish life into more normal and, therefore, more logical and more honorable channels.

The first, Rabbi Kaplan's volume of essays, is the most eloquent as it is the most profound approach to these problems of readjustment. Mr. Kaplan conceives Judaism not as a religious philosophy but as a religious civilization. "It is a cultural and spiritual complex of language, literature, history, customs, and social institutions organized about a conception of God which has the most far-reaching social and spiritual implications for human life of all times. . . . Judaism is the spirit of a nation and not the cult of a denomination." And hence his measure of the Jewishness, religious or national, of any individual is the extent to which the individual identifies himself with the organism of the Jewish people. In this theory the solution of the Jewish problem centers on the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish state. For a Jewish nation will serve to unify the distinctive forces which underlie every vital Jewish contribution to civilization and it will revitalize within every Jew, no matter where he has his being, the peculiar powers and attributes of his people.

Mr. Friedman is in complete accord with these views. His work is a consideration of the numerous social aspects of Jewish life which force the Jew, on pain of extinction, to accept these concepts; and his proofs are many and various. Mr. Friedman shows the futility of the promiscuous and perverted solutions which the desperate and disorganized Jews have sought for their troubles; he studies the social forces to which the Jewish people is subject and finds that they relentlessly lead to extinction. He, too, points to Palestine as the only means of a national survival and the only justification of a distinct Jewish people. Incidentally he indicates that the contributions of the Jews during exile have been incomparably inferior to their earlier achievements, since by dispersion "they have lost the power to contribute as a people to the harmony of world [illegible]ure."

The authors are agreed that the most enervating influence in Jewish life has been the Reform Movement, which cast off the ancient garb of orthodox religion and thereby destroyed the distinguishing and cohesive characteristics of the Jewish mode of life. It raised to the dignity of a religious doctrine the process of assimilation to the Gentile world and thus undermined the foundations of its own existence. Mr. Wise concerns himself primarily with this movement and considers the other questions of Jewish life incidentally. As an ordained minister in the Reform [illegible] and a disciple of its greatest figures in England and America, he is able to investigate intimately and sympathetically but none the less truly its achievements and failings. He credits it with "the enfranchisement of the spirit from those customs and traditions of Rabbinic or Orthodox Judaism which had ceased to have meaning and purpose"; for he, like his teachers, is under the influence of nineteenth-century liberalism, which ignored the aesthetic value of ancient ritual and saw in it only the bonds of dogma. But he justly inscribes on the debit side the equally dogmatic, false, and noxious doctrine of a Jewish mission which was substituted by the leaders of "Liberal Judaism" to distinguish the resulting creed from the other forms of Unitarianism. Mr. Wise, in common with Mr. Friedman and Mr. Kaplan, attacks the fallacy of this "Mission of Israel." And the reviewer, who has been characterized as a prime and blaspheming opponent of this dogma, finds the indictment both sacred and satisfactory.

Though all of the authors have discussed the Jewish problem with the intimacy that presupposes a concern with and a knowledge of the subject, only Rabbi Wise writes his criticism from within. He addresses a limited audience even in Jewish circles. The other works may be safely recommended to the Gentile reader who is interested in the Jewish question and in the first rational Jewish efforts to solve it since Herzl's "Judenstaat."

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Musical Brevities

Crotchets. A Few Short Musical Notes. By Percy A. Scholes. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

MR. SCHOLES gives his "Crotchets" a modest subtitle. The fact is, within a compass of less than three hundred pages he offers the reader fifty-four thoughtful little essays on matters of music whose brevity is pleasantly charged with its proverbial association. The range of these papers is wide. The first one asks the pertinent question: "What does the audience hear?" Mr. Scholes does not mean this or that new or bewildering composition; he asks what an assemblage of supposed listeners really hears when it is seated in the presence of, say, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. "I am prompted to ask this question," he explains, "by one or two recent disasters. At a Three Choirs Festival the Franck symphony was played. . . . The conclusion of the first movement was taken by the cleric in charge for the conclusion of the whole piece, whereupon he pronounced the Benediction and discharged the congregation." Really, little as he may suspect it, Mr. Scholes is pleading here for the friendly guidance of a thoroughly trained and benevolent claque! Thus unwary clerics will avoid disaster, concert audiences will not bury with ill-timed applause the upward-rushing scales in the final measure of Chopin's A minor etude, and the crowd at the opera house will await in silence the coda of the "Pagliacci" prologue.

In one of the papers collectively entitled Kreisleriana Mr. Scholes pleads, as every frequent attendant at concerts feels like doing, for a widening of the violinists' repertory. He wonders whether Fritz Kreisler, with his enormous prestige and his hold over audiences, would not be just the man to accomplish something in that direction. "Why always the Chaconne?" continues Mr. Scholes. "Bach wrote six suites and partitas, comprising over two dozen movements. The Chaconne is merely one of these movements. Recently Kreisler played it on a Wednesday, Czaplinski on the following Monday, and Losowsky on the previous Wednesday. . . . Kreisler has not lately played us any Beethoven sonatas, but if he does so I should hope to find him deliberately neglecting the overplayed Kreutzer, and giving us instead, perhaps, one of the three in Op. 30—preferably the great C minor." In a footnote Mr. Scholes informs us that shortly after these words were written Mr. Kreisler announced a program which included Tartini's hackneyed "Devil's Trill" and Beethoven's "Kreutzer"!

The papers on Handel and Bach seem to have been written before the recent Handel revival, which in Germany within the last two or three years has made a number of the long-neglected Handel operas festival affairs. Mr. Scholes does protest against the present English underrating of Handel's natural enough reaction from an excessive earlier adulation—but he is a lukewarm, apologetic, and rather unappreciative champion. Wanda Landowska would expel him from the lists in a jiffy. What Mr. Scholes does tackle with particular spirit and efficiency is the difficult array of contemporary problems.

Anybody who shivers at the very thought of polytonality and atonality will find illumination and comfort in the papers on those subjects. Color and Sound, apropos the "Color Symphony" of Arthur Bliss, reaches this common-sense, if not exhaustive, conclusion: "The fact is, I think, that music can arouse emotions and that colors can do the same, and that what connection there is between music and color is not physical and direct, but subjective and via emotion. . . . A trumpet fanfare suggests joy; red to me suggests joy; hence a trumpet fanfare to me suggests red. That is my idea of the matter!"

The late Alexander Scriabin is no longer such an immediately urgent issue as he used to be, but he is still important enough to make the five Notes on Scriabin a singularly satisfactory summary of a once troubling composer whom we are now glad to appraise and classify, and so in a sense be rid of. Stravinsky, of course, still has the center of the stage. As regards this very ponderable Russian, Mr. Scholes in his three "Views," while by no means unsympathetic toward his composer, has relishing and wholesome fun with the pretensions and pomposities of stampeded commentators.

PITTS SANBORN

Books in Brief

London Life in the XVIIIth Century. By M. Dorothy George. Alfred A. Knopf.

China and Europe. Intellectual and Artistic Contacts in the Eighteenth Century. By Adolf Reichwein. Alfred A. Knopf.

Two volumes in the ambitious "History of Civilization" from which ten titles have thus far appeared in America. In view of the limits of the series—two hundred volumes—these monographs seem perilously specialized, and indeed it appears that the original project as conceived in France is to be somewhat distorted through its English handling. In itself Mrs. George's study of London's improvement over an important century is excellent; and the slighter German work on Chinese thought and art in Europe is suggestive if by no means complete.

THEATER

Every evening except Monday, 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Lawrence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE

A Civilized Picture of Uncivil People
BEGGAR ON HORSEBACK
Intelligently Directed by James Cruze
CRITERION

Conversations on Contemporary Drama. By Clayton Hamilton. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A series of lectures delivered in the Y. M. C. A. Building of Columbia University by a speaker who regrets the death of intelligent dramatic criticism in America but thinks Pinero great and Shaw tedious. Owing partially perhaps to the fact that lectures are likely to be a little thin, the book contains surprisingly few ideas (even wrong ones) per hundred pages.

Obedience. By Michael Sadleir. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

Mr. Sadleir, whose first novel, "Privilege," stamped him as a writer worth watching, has turned his back on the fevers of the contemporary scene to lay a curious finger on the pulse of the last century. In the England of more than half a century ago he discovers the germs of that feminine revolt against authority of family and station which has since done so much to disturb the tranquillity of the social world. Most of the symptoms are discernible in the headstrong young lady who is his heroine. The author has endowed her with much spirit and color, but he has surrounded her with lay figures, so that the novel as a whole is lacking in vitality.

Anecdotes of the Late Samuel Johnson, LL.D. By Hesther Lynch Piozzi. Edited by S. C. Roberts. Cambridge University Press. 7/6.

A welcome reprint of "Pozzy's" contribution to the great Johnson legend.

Walt Whitman. A Study and a Selection. By Gerald Bullett. J. B. Lippincott Company.

As sumptuously printed as it is critically conceived.

We Visit Old Inns. By Mary Harrod Northend. Small, Maynard and Company. $3.

A richly illustrated tour of certain New England taverns.

Vondel. By A. J. Barnouw. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

The first satisfactory account in English of a great Dutch poet.

The Natural History of Selborne. By Gilbert White. With notes by Richard Kearton and 85 photographs. Robert M. McBride and Company. $6.

Excellently printed on wide pages, bound in buckram, and illustrated with many photographs taken in Selborne itself, this must remain for some time to come the most desirable edition of a perennially precious book.

Egypt. By E. A. Wallis Budge. Henry Holt and Company. $1.

A distinguished addition to the Home University Library, which is one of the most valuable of contemporary series.

Farmington. By Clarence Darrow. Boni and Liveright. $2.

This autobiography of a memorable youth here finds its third publisher.

The Portrait of Zélide. By Geoffrey Scott. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

A brilliant account in full of the shadowy Madame de Charrière, whom Boswell once loved as Isabella de Zuylen.

Dorothy Wordsworth: The Grasmere Years. By E. V. Morley. Hodder and Stoughton, London. 6/.

A study of the Wordsworth group through the glasses of Dorothy's diaries.

The Best Plays of 1923-1924. By Burns Mantle. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.50.

The fifth of Mr. Mantle's invaluable annual volumes. It contains a complete statistical summary of the theatrical year, the cast and synopsis of every play produced, and various other facts arranged for ready reference as well as the condensed versions of ten representative plays which give the volume its name.

In the Land of Youth. By James Stephens. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

In comparison with the heroes of Welsh and Irish mythology, the legendary figures invented by the Teutonic imagination seem to be quiet men leading uneventful lives. Mr. Stephens plunges into the boundless extravagance characteristic of the legends of his country and produces a tale which achieves a wild beauty and a distinctive flavor. The impudent humor of some of his books is, however, noticeably less abundant here.

The Northern Muse. An Anthology of Scots Vernacular Poetry. Arranged by John Buchan. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

A copious selection, ranging from Barbour to Stevenson, and leavened with intelligent comment.

Poems for Youth. An American Anthology. Compiled by William Rose Benét. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

By no means a merely juvenile volume. Running from Halleck and Bryant to Hilda Conkling, it gives an excellent survey of the more spirited and lucid examples of American verse.

"During the year 1921, in Great Britain, of persons over 30 years of age, one out of every seven died of cancer."

CANCER AND THE PUBLIC

By CHARLES P. CHILDE is a full discussion of what is known as to the causes and the cure of cancer and of how the public could help prevent it. $4.25

A book to keep at hand to lend or give to any worried friend is

THE CONQUEST OF CANCER

By H. W. S. WRIGHT. It is one of those stimulating "Today and Tomorrow" volumes described as "Immensely valuable and infinitely readable." $1.00

It is shown that 75% of cancer cases are curable, with a mortality of 5%.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Avenue, New York

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

MT. AIRY (near Creston-on-Hudson) is a community for artists and writers within commuting distance of New York. It is high, dry and healthy and is surrounded with many beautiful views of the Hudson and has various forms of outdoor sports. Although the cottages at Mt. Airy are not completed, it will take a small deposit on [illegible] and [illegible] to $100. Call at [illegible] Mt. Airy Assn., 9 East 40th Street, New York City. Circulars.

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

6 Tablets 15c
12 Tablets 25c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO. - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

International Relations Section

The Serbo-Croat Dispute

By HAMILTON FISH ARMSTRONG

THE Jugoslav political situation reached an important turning-point on March 27 with the formal declaration of policy in the Skupshtina at Belgrade by Paul Radich, nephew of Stephen Radich, leader of the Croat Peasant Party. The more important passages of this historic statement are printed below.

It will be remembered that in July, 1923, Stephen Radich, fearing arrest on account of his propaganda for a separate Croat republic and his attacks on the Karageorgevich dynasty and the alleged militarism of Belgrade, left Jugoslavia. A few months later, after futile appeals for support in London and Paris, Radich went to Moscow. There he became a member of the Peasant International, of which the president is Smyrnov, Soviet Commissar of Agriculture. Further, he began arrangements for the affiliation of the Croat Peasant Party with the Peasant International, an action which won the approval of the deputies belonging to the Croat Peasant Party when they met at Zagreb on August 3, 1924. This further incensed the Belgrade Government, who were already only too prone to believe evil of Radich because of his record as a supporter of the Hapsburgs during the war, his relations with the Macedo-Bulgar revolutionists, and the trouble he was giving them by stirring up the Croat peasantry. The belief that Radich had definitely thrown in his lot with Moscow gained support by his series of intemperate speeches last summer during the time when the unfortunate Serb opposition leader, Davidovich, was engaged in precarious negotiations for the formation of a coalition cabinet in which Radich himself should participate. Particular wrath was aroused by a statement by Radich (at Zagreb on October 23, 1924) in which he said:

> I went to Moscow as the representative of the Croat people and the whole world has recognized me as such. If a militarist government should be formed, as desired at Belgrade, we shall succeed with the aid of Europe in obtaining complete independence. The Soviet Government has promised me, through the medium of Chicherin, that it will help us if we are threatened. In such a case we should oppose the rule of Belgrade with all our strength.

This was followed by the admission by Dr. Matchek, a Radich leader and vice-president of the Skupshtina, that he had been visiting Vienna for the purpose of consulting officials at the Soviet legation there.

On January 1, 1925, the Government issued a decree dissolving the Croat Peasant Party, citing as authority an anti-Communist law entitled the Law for the Protection of Public Security and Order, passed in 1922 by the Pachich majority in Parliament with the support of the Serb Democrats and other opposition groups. A few days later Radich was put in jail, along with Dr. Matchek and four other of his associates, and remained there during the campaign preceding the election of February 8. At this election the Radich forces maintained their parliamentary representation practically intact (losing only two seats, 70 members) while the combined forces of Pressley Bradley were increased by 31 (from 131 to 162).

When the Skupshtina met on March 7 Radich was still in jail. The question facing the Pachich Government was whether the governmental majority should vote to validate the mandates of the Radich deputies or should declare their election illegal by virtue of the Law for the Protection of Public Security and Order, which outlaws communists. The question facing Radich was whether he should make plain his intention of utilizing constitutional means to achieve his ends or whether he should persist in his policy of republicanism and Croat separatism and should proceed to invoke the aid of the Soviet Government in promoting a revolution. The immediate danger was that the more intransigent associates of Pachich would make it seem useless for Radich to offer any compromise, and that they would expel all the Radich deputies and proceed to hold new elections with the avowed purpose of forcing the election of their creatures. Fortunately, moderate counsels prevailed. It was indicated to Radich's representatives that a repudiation of Moscow would be met half way by Pachich.

On March 27 Paul Radich made his formal statement of policy on behalf of his uncle and in the name of the Croat Peasant Party. As will be seen below, it represents a volte-face on many important points. As a result, Parliament voted approval of the mandates of the Radich deputies who had been elected for the first time (i. e., who had not been members of the Skupshtina while their party was negotiating with Moscow); the mandates of Radich and his four associates awaiting trial on specific charges of treason were definitely annulled; and the mandates of the balance were left for examination by a commission of inquiry, which on June 22 voted to seat the entire last named group of deputies.

The trial of Radich has not yet taken place, but it seems more than possible that it is being delayed in order to see whether a compromise cannot be worked out, by which Radich himself, or his representatives, will enter a coalition cabinet and assume a share of the responsibility for putting into operation the reforms which the Croats have been demanding. Even if this does not at once occur, it can fairly be said that the Serbo-Croat dispute has entered a new phase.

Speech of Paul Radich

It is necessary to recall what we Croats were under the old Austro-Hungarian monarchy. We were [illegible] subservient. We had continually to fight for our own laws, our customs, our language, and autonomy, but we were never deeply slaves. For one thousand years our Croatian juridic system has been maintained. Then we aimed at independence; now we aim at equality with our brothers in this same independence which has been gained. Belgrade of today does not stand to us in the same relation as Vienna of yesterday. Here we feel ourselves in our own house. . . .

Our republicanism does not force us to demand any particular form of government. We want the substance rather than the shadow. The opposition bloc took form at a moment when we realized that the idea of a national accord was understood in Serbia. . . . However, at this moment the constitution of Vidovdan rules. We recognize this fact as we recognize the dynasty of Karageorgevich. (Applause.) We simply desire that our system evolve little by little along normal ways toward certain adjustments of differences due to the existence of the Croat and Slovene minorities. Our ethnic unity is incontestable, but our past history with its consequences has created three national consciences with three different names for the three divisions of our people. We are forced by natural circumstances to join our forces. We must so work that out of this material unity a spiritual one will be evolved which will make us solid and substantial on the basis of our present state. . . .

Nothing is eternal in this world and nothing is perfect. We must have a constitution, and no one will affirm that the constitution of Vidovdan is an eternal and lasting one, and not subject to change. Reference has been made to our long abstention from participation in the government. Gentlemen, if it took two years to get us into this predicament it will surely take time to get us out of it and to a proper understanding. We are beginning to be understood in Serbia. We earnestly desire a fraternal accord.

Passing to the subject of communism, Mr. Radich said it seemed to him that there had been much misunderstanding with regard to the bitter fight made by the Radich Party in its first years against communism, which at that time was a serious danger.

It must be remembered that at that time the authorities practically put no restraint on communist propaganda, which continued to strike with violence on our political activity. . . . We have always had a fight on two fronts—on the one hand, against the centralist forces; on the other, against the extremists. . . .

Concerning our relations with the Peasant International, Mr. Maximovich has read innumerable documents which I will not analyze judicially because I am not a lawyer, but which I will simply comment on from the point of view of common sense. This mass of evidence consists almost exclusively of letters addressed to Mr. Stephen Radich and to our party, but there is practically nothing from us. People can write to us whatever they wish, but that they do so does not involve our approval or consent. Two capital factors must be accentuated. The first one is that we did not designate an official representative to the Peasant International, as we had been invited to do. The second is that our Central Committee has made no definite decision as to the adhesion to the Peasant International. When our Central Committee can meet it will take the necessary steps to establish positively that we have no relations with the Peasant International.

We recognize integrally the situation created by the constitution of Vidovdan, with the dynasty of the Karageorgevich. (Applause.) . . . We recognize that any modifications in the existing condition of things must be made by a revision of the constitution, effected in fraternal accord by Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. We have never fought against the state as such or against its interest. The resistance of the population to certain conditions to which I shall make allusion has been unjustly qualified as being anti-state. The conditions which existed on the eve, during, and after the elections can only create discord and ultimately be fatal to our state. As earnest believers in the future we will contribute all in our power to insure the collaboration of the Croat population in honest good faith for the consolidation of the state—a collaboration which can only be realized on a basis of absolute equality. If this consolidation cannot come after we enter into Parliament, and after we have adhered without reserve to the program read by Mr. Davidovitch, the central policy of the Croat people will be forced to change and we shall be powerless to help it; we shall lose direction of the political situation.

As our political organization has existed for twenty years, we have experience, power, and moral authority sufficient to guarantee the internal consent of our fatherland to any accord which will demonstrate respect for the law and for the will of the people. We do not fear that we shall be reproached with having surrendered. Bad faith may perhaps be charged against us by such journals as the Balkan, but during the last electoral campaign we showed under the most difficult conditions that we will not be broken and that we cannot be made to flinch. More than that, we are willing that it be said that we have given way, because if we do so it is a concession to our own Serbian brothers and for the good of our common future. (Applause.) . . .

With regard to the Peasant International of Moscow, all information coming from foreign sources, English, American, and French, can only confirm our point of view, which is that it has nothing in common with the Comintern, that is to say, with the Communist International. Still less is it an organization belonging to the latter. Independently of this fact, and of the fact that the Croat Peasant Party has not yet adhered definitely to the Peasant International, I declare now that we have taken no engagement and that we have no relations with this Peasant International, and our Central Committee will officially establish this fact at its first meeting. On August 3, 1924, our parliamentary group took up the report of its president, in which he stated that the Croat Peasant Party should join the Peasant International on the condition that it would maintain integrally its own program and tactics. He stressed the fact that he only saw in this the establishment of relations between the Russian people and the Croat people, and that this Peasant International is nothing more than the continuation of the Peasant Pan-Russian Federation founded in 1899 and which in 1904 had thirty million members. The acceptance of this motion to join was simply the expression of the confidence of the group in its president, on whom it absolutely relied.

According to our program the obligation to defend the country ceases only with death. For that reason we consider a good army a national necessity. We do, however, desire to attain in a constitutional manner a reduction of military service and a diminution in the number of military organizations. We believe that military service should include the execution of useful public works, with a view to relieving the people of unnecessary expense.

After making this declaration Mr. Radich invited his hearers to take their choice between "a policy of strike" and "a policy of accord."

Contributors to This Issue

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, The Nation's dramatic critic, has lived most of his life in Knoxville, Tennessee. He is in Dayton for the Scopes trial.

CRYSTAL EASTMAN, writer on feminist subjects and formerly editor of the Liberator, is living in London.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON, of Ginn and Company, was formerly pastor of an orthodox church near Plymouth, Vermont.

LEON HARALD (SERIMIAN) is a young Armenian, a former student at the University of Wisconsin.

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL is assistant professor of economics at Columbia University and editor of several volumes on economic subjects.

CLEN MCLEAN is an artist and writer, author of "The Adventures of a Soldier Tramp."

CHARLES A. BENNETT wrote "At a Venture," a book of philosophical essays.

JULIAN A. SCHERMAN is directing the publishing house of Alfred A. Knopf in Mr. Knopf's absence.

PITTS SANBORN is a New York music critic.

HAMILTON FISH ARMSTRONG is managing editor of Foreign Affairs.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 22, 1925 No. 3133

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 103
EDITORIALS:
What Are We Doing in China? 105
Preserved Fish 106
Houses Without Profiteering 107
THE MEANING OF SHANGHAI. By Harry F. Ward 108
TENNESSEE'S DILEMMA. By Joseph Wood Krutch 110
WHAT LIES BEYOND DAYTON. By Rollin Lynde Hartt 111
OUT WHERE BUREAUCRACY BEGINS. By Harvey Fergusson 112
MAKING CRIMINALS OUT OF SOLDIERS. By Fred L. Holmes 114
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 115
CORRESPONDENCE 116
BOOKS:
Wedlock. By Ward Moore 117
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 119
An Autobiographical Libel. By Benjamin Stolberg 119
Reparations. By R. R. Kuczynski 120
Indicting a Section. By Walter L. Fleming 121
The Case for Self-Sacrifice. By Agnes Repplier 121
Mr. Hardy. By Frances Dublin 122
How to Be Happy. By D. W. Prall 123
Books in Brief 124
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
China and the Washington Conference 125
The Chinese Student Revolt 127
Foreign Protests 128

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

TENNESSEE'S EXAMPLE spreads. A New York professor suggests that other universities boycott Tennessee's. Why, he asks with a semblance of reason, should honest institutions of learning accept the credentials of young men who come from schools in a State which confesses itself hostile to the unrestricted pursuit of truth? Tennessee graduates, he thinks, will be only half-educated. We suspect that the professor is about 100 per cent wrong. If the Tennessee monkey law stands, Tennessee college graduates for the next few years are likely to know more about evolution than college boys and girls in any other State in the Union. There is a charm to bootlegged produce, even when it is mere knowledge. Tennessee cannot regulate the United States mails, and while such books are barred Tennessee youths will work overtime to buy them. The publishers report a boom for books on science, even in the mountains of Tennessee, and the longer the ban endures the more thirst for knowledge will it rouse in Tennessee. There is, of course, a larger issue at stake. The New York professor is on the verge of making his own science a compulsory religion; he sounds perilously like a fundamentalist who would not receive students who did not accept the literal interpretation of Genesis. If the Tennessee boys and girls can pass their college-entrance examinations in algebra and English the universities in other sections need not inquire into the laws of their State.

BALLYHOO AND BRAVERY march arm in arm in Dayton. One wishes that the metropolitan reporters could find some local farmer-philosopher, some Will Rogers, who could tell them intelligibly what Dayton really thinks of it all. The young writers from the big cities are so cosmopolitan in their outlook, so whole-heartedly with Scopes and against Bryan, that they give us scant interpretation of the local mind. They laugh at the rustics; they do not understand them. Yet they are not all weather-beaten cynics, these hardened reporters; when the news reached the reporters' room that the young Methodist pastor had been forced out of his church for daring to invite a liberal to preach for him, the reporters—who knew that Howard Byrd supported his wife and three children on $800 a year—reached down into their city trousers pockets and took up a substantial collection. Then they went off to their typewriters and sentimentalized over the carpenter-preacher of Dayton. As a matter of fact, Mr. Byrd will probably find a better pulpit as a result of his act; but he did not know that when he made his choice. Judge Godsey, the local defense attorney who backed out at the last moment, was made of softer steel. One would like to read an interview with Judge Godsey on Howard Byrd's act. And one would like to have a psychologist with a reporter's pen explain the power of Bryan over these hill-folk.

THE ANTHRACITE OPERATORS and the representatives of the miners seem to have dug in for a pleasant summer at Atlantic City. Housed in equally stupendous style at safely distant hotels, they can issue statements and hold occasional conferences as long as the swimming is good and the patience of the newspaper reporters holds out. Both sides are sparring for position; neither side hopes to convince or terrify the other. The operators are concerned to prove to the public that acceptance of the miners' demands will mean a higher price for anthracite coal next winter. The union officials point to extravagant differences between the cost of mining a ton of coal and the price paid for it, in an effort to prove that a 10 per cent wage increase could be absorbed without passing a cent of it on to the public. The operators have no real hope of reducing wages—an honest, whole-hearted walkout would meet any such attempt. The union probably has no idea that it can raise them. But both sides hold out for the moment when an alarmed public will force them to a compromise that might as well be made tomorrow. A serious strike is not expected. By the almost equally expensive expedient of a summer at Atlantic City this particular labor struggle will be settled after the manner of diplomats and politicians.

EDGAR BERNARD BRUSSARD of Utah, a protege of Senator Reed Smoot, is President Coolidge's selection to succeed William S. Culbertson on the United States Tariff Commission. He is a Mormon, and may be expected to manifest a sympathetic interest in the fortunes of the Utah-Idaho [beet] Sugar Company, which earned 21.9 per cent last year on its common stock and 104 per cent on its preferred. The Utah-Idaho company is owned by the Mormon church, and Reed Smoot is a large stockholder. Dr. Brussard is no stranger to the tariff offices in Washington. He was "planted" there as the sugar investigation neared its close, and Chairman Marvin with Commissioner Burgess sought to have him supersede Dr. Joshua Bernhardt, chief statistician in charge of sugar figures. This maneuver was blocked by Vice-Chairman Culbertson (whom Mr. Coolidge has now shunted to Rumania), Commissioner Lewis (whom Mr. Coolidge has now supplanted), and Commissioner Costigan, who survives. The President knows just where his new appointee will stand on extortionate tariff schedules. Congress should know. It is fair to expect that Congress will inquire into Dr. Brussard's record before the Senate confirms the appointment.

WHEN A MAN within the ranks suggests changes it is more difficult for other members of his profession to dismiss the proposals as conceived in ignorance. Hence we hope what Frederick E. Crane of the New York Court of Appeals said recently in regard to juries will receive wide discussion and lead eventually to the much-needed reform that he suggests. Speaking before the Otsego County Bar Association, Judge Crane remarked that apparently we had "become indifferent to shootings and killings"; in New York City murders were increasing and convictions for murder decreasing. This he attributed in part to the fact that the most intelligent members of the community sought exemption from jury service and that the law granted blanket exemptions to certain classes like clergymen, newspapermen, lawyers, and teachers. There is no sound reason for the blanket exemption from jury service of men in any given kind of work and, as Judge Crane says, when it comes to a vacation the reasons alleged for not doing jury duty disappear. A judge should have the power, as he has, to exempt any individual for a sufficiently urgent reason, but there should be no other escape. Nor should right-minded citizens want one.

ANOTHER JURIST, Robert W. Winston, formerly judge of the Superior Court of North Carolina, writes in Scribner's Magazine for June on the illegality and injustice of the American bench in dealing with contempt of court, a matter to which The Nation has lately been calling attention. Judge Winston confines his criticism to what is called "constructive contempt"—that is, contempt committed not in the presence of the court but outside, in the form, say, of a public speech or a newspaper editorial taking issue with the judge. Justice Holmes of the federal Supreme Court has said that our courts are a hundred years behind the times—that no English judge would imprison a person for "constructive contempt" without a legal trial. The federal courts have entered into many sophistries in order to declare laws unconstitutional because they denied the "due process of law" guaranteed by the Constitution, but what could be more glaringly violative of "due process of law" than for a judge to [illegible] to statute but what he calls "inherent right," to dispense with grand and petit jury and railroad a man to jail on the findings of his own spleen and prejudice? Judge Winston thinks the recent decision of the Supreme Court on the Clayton act will about do away with prosecution for "constructive contempt." We are less hopeful. The decision will lessen the evil of injunctions in labor disputes, but it does not cover all of "constructive contempt"—nor affect it at all outside of the federal courts.

AS WE WRITE our glance falls on a special dispatch to the New York Times which illustrates in a typical way the tyranny of American courts in dealing with this judge-created offense of "constructive contempt."

> LAKEWOOD, N. J., July 8.—A charge of contempt of court against former State Senator Harry P. Hagaman, postmaster and editor of the Lakewood Citizen, a weekly newspaper, and his son, C. L. Hagaman, assistant editor, was dismissed by Judge Henry G. Newman in the Court of Common Pleas at Toms River today after the elder Hagaman had apologized to the court.
>
> The writ was issued by Judge Newman yesterday following the appearance of an article in the Citizen in which the judge was severely criticized for his action in extending leniency to Frank Falkenberg of Point Pleasant, who was convicted of violating the Volstead act.

We do not know what the editor wrote about the judge in question and we do not care. We do know that, whatever the criticism, the judge was entitled to no relief other than what any other individual would have had if criticized—that is, through the indictment of the editor under the laws of libel or slander and a legal trial before a jury. The idea that criticism of a judge impedes the process of justice—which is the stock defense of summary punishment for contempt—is a palpable absurdity. Only the ignorant or tyrannical judge needs such protection—and obviously he should not have it.

BERLIN'S STOCK EXCHANGE struck the other day in protest against the Government's plans for revaluation of the old government bonds. These bonds became virtually worthless in paper marks, and speculators who purchased them at their bottom prices would make enormous profits if the Government recognized their holdings as on a par with those bought when the mark stood at or near par. The revaluation program provides a 5 per cent value for bonds bought before 1920; 2½ per cent for those bought later. Socialists claim that it is a fraud to pay anything for this latter class. But the stock exchange disagreed, and thought to assert its power by striking. If the Government surrenders it will be pusillanimous indeed. But whether it does or not the incident, following the appeal of the bankrupt Stinnes brothers to the banks, is a striking indication of the return of the banks to power in Germany.

BEFORE THE WAR the great banks dominated Germany both politically and industrially. During the war and in the after-war inflation period the great industrialists lorded it, even over the big Berlin banks. There was no power in all Germany to equal Hugo Stinnes. He dictated legislation; he determined foreign policy; he told the banks what to do. That was in a period of scarcity of raw materials and of depreciating currency. Stinnes owned the basic commodities—coal and iron. He built up an enormous "vertical trust"—controlling all the processes from mining to the finished products, including [illegible] to carry his goods and newspapers to help dictate policies. Like Henry Ford in America he was independent of the bankers, but even Ford never wielded such power in this country as Stinnes on the Rhine. He looked out beyond the frontiers, and rapidly invested his depreciating marks in new enterprises. Whatever he touched seemed to turn to gold. Then, just as the Dawes Plan went [illegible] and the mark was stabilized, the old man died. [illegible] to avoid impressing the need for concentration and retrenchment. His sons did not. They went on expanding, investing millions in film and automobile factories. But a new era had come. Raw materials were a glut on the market. Stinnes's sons could not dictate prices; they could not control their expenditures. In June they appealed to the Reichsbank for help, and the truth leaked out; they were $50,000,000 short. A syndicate of big banks was formed to help them out. One brother was dropped from the firm; the other was retained, to prune the vast business. The banks assumed control—Germany is back to normalcy.

UNDER THE TUTELAGE of her Minister of Justice, South Africa is making race discrimination a part of her legal system. This is the same Minister of Justice who asserted some time ago that punishment should be determined by the position and race of the offender; he now demands that the color of a man's skin should debar him forever from economic advancement. The so-called Color-Bar Bill provides that in the Transvaal and Orange Free State "certificates of competency shall not be granted to natives or Asiatics," while rules shall "generally apportion work as between natives and Asiatics and other persons respectively in respect of mines, works, or machinery." The Cape Times has protested that the bill is in opposition to the liberal traditions of South African jurisprudence and furthermore is in direct contradiction to a decision of the Transvaal Supreme Court in November, 1923, which stated:

> The regulation which provided that in the Transvaal and Orange Free State only white men could become persons competent to be in charge of machinery, boilers, and engines was ultra vires of the governing act of parliament, the Mines and Works Act of 1911.

This pernicious bill was defeated in the South African Senate after passing its third reading in the House. Undoubtedly it will be introduced again next year, as it is part of a definite segregation program. White labor in South Africa is committed to it, and the Nationalists have followed Tielman Roos in supporting it. Liberals who had been disappointed in General Smuts's recent record in South Africa are glad to find him vigorously combating a measure which the whole world would regret.

LIBRARIANS ARE CONFRONTED with a tremendous problem in making available to readers the vast new flood of information that is gushing from the daily, weekly, and monthly press. It is true, as John Cotton Dana, of the Newark (New Jersey) Public Library, said at the convention of the American Library Association in Seattle, that this flood is the real educational agency of the age, and whether it be for good or for evil should be recognized as such. The old idea of a library, thinks Mr. Dana, was culture—the new idea is information. Yet when librarians get together

> They do not discuss the newspaper as a social influence, and, of course, do not discuss the thousands of other daily, weekly, and monthly journals which supplement the daily's instruction work. They are clinging by that tiny rivulet of modern print that bound books supply, and ignore meanwhile the vast and growing and increasingly potent flood that pours forth in all that other print of the daily press and its associates. . . .
>
> Consider the Scopes trial in Tennessee. By the press presentation of that trial and of matters connected therewith our newspapers will teach the "man in the street"—meaning here a full majority of our 115,000,000—more about evolution than he has learned concerning it in the whole seventy years since Darwin wrote his "Descent of Man."

The greatest unsolved problem of the modern library is to make available the information appearing in the periodical press, together with that issued in pamphlet or documentary form from official and unofficial sources. There is not a library in the country which has yet developed a technique adequate to the task.

THE RECENT ARREST in Berlin of one Druzhelovsky, who dealt extensively in news forgeries setting forth horrendous Soviet plots, will perhaps stay for a time the stream of picturesque Russian yarns that has flowed intermittently into the American press from the German capital. Druzhelovsky, it appears, kept on hand a generous private stock of stationery of both the Third International and the Soviet Government, which he filled out according to the caprices of a fertile imagination, tempered by the law of supply and demand. Among the fabrications found in his files, according to the Berliner Tageblatt, was a document on stationery of the Third International giving instructions for blowing up the Sofia cathedral, and another tending to implicate Soviet officials in the railway disaster in the Danzig corridor—in which several employees of the Soviet Government were killed or injured! Among his synthetic news stories was a variant of the nationalization of women, to the effect that the Soviet Government had established a system of three-year trial marriages. Another front-page fabrication told of 750,000 children starving in southern Russia, including 200,000 in Odessa. The fact that the total population of Odessa is only 300,000 apparently did not give pause to any of the news editors who accepted his inventions. When Druzhelovsky was arrested he was attempting to sell to Americans in the diplomatic service, for a trifle of $150, a concoction on stationery of the Third International setting forth a delightful bolshevik plot against peace and order in the United States. The price is interesting. Apparently the cost of documentary Red horrors for the diversion of the countrymen of Barnum and Bryan has fallen since the palmy days of the Sisson documents.

OFFICIAL AMBASSADORS do not always serve the cause of international good-will and are sometimes debarred by their position from expressing good-will when they have it. The Philippine Islands as a dependency can receive no ambassadors or ministers plenipotentiary. The United States is represented—or misrepresented—there in the person of Leonard Wood. Fortunately there are other groups with the enthusiasm and energy to send their own representatives. The American branch of the Fellowship of Reconciliation has sent its "Ambassador of Friendship," Reverend Clarence A. Neff, a native of Ohio, who is teaching in Foochow, China. The fellowship, realizing that the continued retention of the Philippine Islands as a virtual colony by the United States must foster suspicion and hostility upon the part of the Filipinos, has sought thus to express the latent good-will of Americans and to assure the Filipinos that there are in this country men and women who want them to have not only political freedom but that larger freedom which comes from a liberated life. Thus, while Bryan battles for literalism in the hills of Tennessee, another group of Christians expresses its religion in action.

What Are We Doing in China?

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE and Secretary Kellogg have turned their faces forward, but they seem to be a little afraid of the light. Their demand that the Powers carry out the program of relief for China which Secretary Hughes and his associates elaborated with such infinite pains at the Washington Conference three and a half years ago is in a splendid American tradition. But why all the mystery and secrecy? Why the hesitation? Let them recall the burst of applause with which the world greeted Mr. Hughes's public statement at the opening of that conference; and the doubt and pessimism which followed when the conference was submerged in secret committees.

The prestige of America in the East, sorely tried in recent years, is at stake. We have a long tradition of effective friendship for China, and on the whole we maintained the spirit of that tradition at the Washington Conference. That conference fell short of its goal, but it did propose real aid to China. The Great Powers would not give up their cumbersome control over China's customs tariff; but they did agree to raise the duties which she is permitted to levy. That would have given her sore-tried central Government a new support and prestige. The conference over, the Powers shilly-shallied. The treaties have only just been ratified. The tariff remains unchanged. The Powers agreed, too, to study the situation in China, with a view to taking steps toward the removal of extraterritoriality. They have done nothing about it. They made a fine-sounding statement of principles, but they have continued the policy of business as usual. China is today almost where she was when the Washington Conference was convened. Shantung has been evacuated, but the Japanese are still in Manchuria. China's coastline is dotted with foreign leaseholds and settlements, policed by foreign troops; foreign gunboats, including American, range far up the Yangtze River; foreigners claim extraterritorial rights and refuse to accept Chinese jurisdiction; the foreign Powers still dictate to China a tariff rate which keeps her central Government weak—and yet demand that her Government protect their citizens wherever they may go and whatever they may do.

In this miserable situation British troops fired on demonstrating students at Shanghai, and fired again, shooting the students in the back, killing eleven. On details the testimony differs; the details do not matter. The British refused an impartial committee of investigation. China was swept with nationalist, anti-foreign feeling. What business had the foreigners there with their police in a Chinese city? And as the feeling grew it included America. The students were protesting against Japanese mistreatment of Chinese strikers; British troops shot them down; but American marines were sent to clear the students out of their school buildings, and American gunboats appeared to police the port.

China has reason to be uncertain of America today. Americans themselves do not know what their Government is doing. Our papers have not reported, as Dr. Ward tells us in his article in this issue of The Nation, that American warships predominate at Shanghai, or that American marines—more or less under British command—are quartered in buildings from which the students have been ousted. Nor are Americans sure what their Government is saying in its negotiations with other Powers.

The press announced, obviously inspired by the State Department, that we were inviting the Powers to meet to discuss the abolition of extraterritoriality. The British press growled royally, and the British Foreign Office intimated that China must apologize, must protect foreigners, must do this and that before any relief would be given it. And now our State Department inspires new statements. It has not issued invitations for a conference—only "instituted inquiries." Now, apparently, it wishes us to believe that it has persuaded England to accept an impartial inquiry; but what about the meetings agreed upon at Washington? We publish in this week's International Relations Section the more immediately significant of the Washington treaties and resolutions; the reader can judge how far they go. They call for prompt customs relief—which has not yet been given, and the inspired dispatches suggest that the revision cannot begin for several months to come. They call for a conference to consider the status of extraterritoriality—and on that modest step, apparently, our Government is not insisting.

Soviet Russia renounced her special privileges in China five years ago—and accordingly won a prestige in China which no other Power can equal until it adopts an equally generous policy. German and Austrian citizens lost their special rights by act of the Allies. Their citizens have continued business in China, accepting Chinese jurisdiction and competing as equals. Americans can do the same. It would go a long way to restore American prestige in the Orient if our Government would announce its intention to forego all special privileges for its citizens, and recall the marines now serving special privilege in Shanghai.

Preserved Fish

THERE are two ways to preserve fish. One is to preserve them dead through the aid of salt or in a tin can. The other is to preserve them alive by restricting their catch and stopping the pollution of their feeding-grounds.

Deep-water fish, like cod, herring, and mackerel, which live out in international waters beyond our rum rows, are still fairly plentiful, but those of our coasts and our interstate rivers—including many of the most delicious sorts—are close to extinction. As Secretary Hoover says:

> The sturgeon fisheries of the Great Lakes have declined 98 per cent in forty years. They are almost gone on our coasts. . . . Seventy-five years ago 22,000,000 shad were taken in the Potomac River alone. Today 800 fishermen operating 500 nets take with difficulty 600,000 fish per annum in this river, the best of the remaining rivers for shad. We now supply "Potomac shad" to the market by hauling them 3,000 miles from California on ice. . . . Crabs, lobsters, oysters, and clams are on the same road to destruction. As late as 1915 our crab fisheries in the Chesapeake and Delaware waters yielded over 50,000,000 pounds. They yield less than one-half of that today. The oyster fisheries of the Chesapeake have decreased by 50 per cent in as short a period as twenty years. Our lobster catch is less than one-third that of thirty years ago.

The story of the shad is typical of our treatment of coastal fish. It is like the apple which New York City residents pay farmers on the Pacific Coast to grow for them (plus an enormous bill for freight and advertising designed to convince them of its superiority) when equally good fruit can be raised just outside the metropolitan limits. In an address in Washington last spring Mr. Hoover said:

> Thirty years ago the annual take of shad in the States from Georgia to New York was over 50,000,000 pounds per annum. Being an obliging fish, they did their best for economical fishing by coming up to the fisherman's net regularly every year, and they sold for a few cents each.
>
> But from overfishing the catch has steadily decreased, until during the past few years it has averaged less than 13,000,000 pounds per annum. This is a decrease of 75 per cent. They sell for about $1.75 per fish. At one time 25,000 people found profitable employment catching them. They have now ceased to be an industry in many places altogether. . . .
>
> Now here comes the sardonic humor. The Federal Bureau of Fisheries transplants young shad into California, where there was never a shad before. Under the careful protection of the California Fish Commission, they thrived until this year California will ship about 2,000,000 pounds on ice 3,000 miles into the Atlantic seaboard States, where they are solemnly sold as the great and rare delicacy of the Atlantic waters.

Within recent years the American people have come to realize the extent of the destruction of their forests and the vast economic loss implied; they have taken some promising steps both to preserve existing trees and to start new ones. The destruction of our coastal and inland fisheries also represents a great economic waste, but unfortunately little can be done through action by any one State alone. Two things, chiefly, are called for. One is restriction of fishing. The other is a campaign against pollution of water. Both call for combined federal and State action, for fish are no respecters of State boundaries.

Unlike trees, fish grow quickly and it is easy to restock any depleted waters provided one first insures conditions which make it possible for the new-born specimens to live. The greatest hindrance to this is water pollution. For a good many years our larger rivers have been growing less and less livable places for fish on account of sewage and factory waste. Recently our coastal waters, too, have been made almost uninhabitable for marine life on account of oil. Oil has, in fact, become the greatest menace to fish. The increase of oil-burning and oil-carrying vessels, with their noxious discharges, has raised a most difficult question. Not only fish but the users of our bathing beaches are complaining, while the spread of the motor boat is endangering even our most secluded inland lakes. Congress recently passed a law forbidding the dumping of oil residuum by vessels within the three-mile limit, but it is only a beginning toward purification and it is not certain so far that the enforcement of the act has led to substantial improvement. There is need for further federal action against water pollution, backed by stringent interstate regulations.

Mr. Hoover rightly points out that the powers of the federal government in connection with the preservation of the fish of our coasts are slight; nor does he wish to see them enlarged. He bases his hope on interstate agreements ratified by Congress, and is endeavoring to bring these into existence. We wish him all success in this excellent and practical work—and our friends the fish join with us.

Houses Without Profiteering

HOUSES can be built in the city of New York, even at present prices for land, labor, and material, to rent for $9 monthly a room and still give a fair return on the capital invested. This has been demonstrated by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company in the face of the assertion by speculative builders that it is impossible to supply new construction for less than two or three times the rent asked by the insurance company.

The experiment of the Metropolitan was undertaken at the suggestion of the Lockwood committee as an effort toward relieving the shortage of housing at moderate rentals in New York City. The company says in describing its experiment that after obtaining bids that made it fairly certain that 8 per cent could be made on the investment it began the building of fifty-four apartments in the borough of Queens.

> The buildings were all completed in May, 1924, and all were rented faster than they could be completed. The space provided homes for 2,125 families, and many thousands of families who desired to rent could not be accommodated.
>
> The company is now able to report the financial result of the operation of the properties for one year, viz.: from July 1, 1924, to June 30, 1925. The total cost to the company of land and buildings, including builders' costs and fees, architects' fees, taxes during construction, in fact, every expenditure of money made by the company, was $7,363,168.84.
>
> The rent collected for the twelve months from July 1, 1924, to June 30, 1925, was $1,040,196.06.
>
> The expense of operation for the twelve months, including every expenditure made for and on the property, was $359,014.64.

This left a net profit for the twelve months of $681,181.42, a return on the investment of 9¼ per cent, or 1¼ per cent more than the company had decided would be satisfactory when it was planning the experiment. The Metropolitan has the advantage of the special tax-exemption law of the State, and will thus benefit until the expiration of the act in 1931, but the report says that even without this it would still have earned a net profit of 7¾ per cent. Real-estate firms usually allow something to cover vacancies in apartments and losses on collections of rent. The Metropolitan made no such allowance, believing the desirability of its houses was so great that it could practically ignore losses from such sources. Experience has amply demonstrated the soundness of this estimate, as losses on those counts amounted to only $406.54 for the first year's operation by the insurance company.

Baths are included in the apartments of the Metropolitan, but are not charged for as rooms in the rentals. Heat, hot water, and janitor service are also supplied.

All in all, the experiment seems to knock the props from under the assertions of speculative builders and real-estate men that housing cannot be furnished in New York City for less than $20 to $30 a room. Obviously commercial building is suffering from wasteful methods or extortionate profits—probably both—but there is little hope of a reform of its methods in consequence of the demonstration of the Metropolitan. What is to be hoped for is that cooperative societies and other non-profit organizations will see in the experiment a reason for new and more extensive activities.

The Meaning of Shanghai

By HARRY F. WARD

Shanghai, June 17

THE Shanghai shootings which have aroused all China were typical of the governmental technique of force and the stupidity of officialdom. Underneath, however, they had a more terrible significance—in the race difference between the governing body and the governed. The severity of the action, and its defense, root alike in the feeling of race superiority, in the fear of what may happen if the other race gets out of hand, and in the twin fear of loss of prestige and moral self-support if the ruling race admits any wrongdoing. Such incidents destroy the comfortable illusion that foreign control in China rests only upon benefits conferred. The brutal fact that the main foundation is force stands out stark and clear.

The disturbances in Shanghai were the final result of a series of strikes in Japanese cotton mills, in the course of which a Chinese worker was killed by a Japanese foreman. Students held a mass meeting in Chinese territory to protest against the brutal treatment of workers. After the meeting a few came into the International Settlement carrying banners and were arrested. They were held incomunicado for a week; they were not given sufficient food or bedding or allowed to see their friends. On May 30 they were remanded for another week, not being able to provide bail. Groups of students came unarmed to the main business street of the Settlement on Saturday afternoon, May 30, when it was crowded with people on a half-holiday, to make speeches of protest. Attempting to drive back the crowd, British Sikh policemen fired 44 shots, killing 11 students and workers.

In India Amritsar dramatized the worse aspects of British control and drove the Nationalist movement into the consciousness of the common people. In like manner, Shanghai will do in China in a few months what would have taken years of nationalist agitation. It is a commonplace that the great need of China is national unity. Here government is still personal and provincial, and political life is a bewildering mess of factionalisms with a maze of intrigues not altogether understood even by those engaged in them. The one common element was supplied by Sun Yat-sen shortly before his death, when with his genius for propaganda he coined the phrase "unequal treaties," referring to those agreements in which China concedes to other nations privileges never granted between equals. His last will and testament urged their abrogation as the immediate task of all who loved China. He believed that this was the essential prerequisite to the development of stable government. This phrase crystallizes the sense of injustice and inferiority and releases the hope for equality of status essential to development. It furnishes a focal point for all factions and for all religions. They may differ vitally as to how it is to be done, but practically all Chinese who know what it means will tell you vigorously that the unequal treaties must go. Now comes a dramatic incident to teach the coolies and the farmers what concessions and extraterritoriality and the mixed courts mean, or at least to show them why they must be changed.

This agitation against the "unequal treaties" and the fuel supplied for it by the attitude of the local authorities and their governments toward the Shanghai incident creates just the incentive for that patriotism which lovers of China, native and foreign, have been calling for. Whether it will become a constructive force for internal affairs or a mere emotional spree to escape from the bewildering task of developing sound self-government depends mostly upon the attitude of foreign powers. They are not confronting an ignorant, superstitious anti-foreign movement as in other days. The intellectuals and the authorities are doing their best to prevent any such development, and so far with success. The present movement is not against foreigners but against foreign injustice. It is rational, based on concrete, historic facts. It can be dealt with only on that ground.

Henceforth the student movement of China is a force to be reckoned with in international as well as in national affairs. Naturally the intrusion of students into political and industrial affairs is resented by most foreigners and some older Chinese. When young Yang Yu-hwa tried to tell the mixed court at Shanghai why he had made speeches in protest against the killing of a Chinese workman Assessor Jacobs, the American member, lectured him severely, saying: "Here is a group of young students going out making speeches on industrial problems which have been puzzling the best minds of the world for 700 or 800 years. Has it ever occurred to you to invite the older Chinese who have had more experience than yourselves rather than try and settle it in the way you have started?" Yang answered: "I know that it is a hard question, but we must go out and awaken our countrymen," and Jacobs replied: "I would like to leave these thoughts with each of you students that you should consult with the Chinese Chamber of Commerce and with men of more mature years in the future."

The student uprising means that the absolute control of ignorant, cheap labor by industrialists, foreign and native, is ended sooner than it would have been by the unaided development of labor organization. Hence it is not surprising that the local authorities took advantage of the occasion to raid and close three Chinese universities, regarded as centers of "bolshevik" propaganda. American marines were billeted in each of these educational institutions, and the China Press reported with horror that search of the buildings "yielded a considerable quantity of bolshevik and strike propaganda, including circulars supporting the strike and making special appeals to employees of public-utilities works, pennants with drawings of bleeding hearts, and tracts from the writings of Marx and Darwin [illegible]."

It is the most ignorant folly to dismiss this student activity as vicious pranks of schoolboys who ought to be thrashed and kept in their place, which is the prevailing attitude of the foreign community. Student strikes have several times played an important part in Chinese affairs; a few years ago the students secured the resignation of three cabinet officers whom they accused of selling their country to Japan. Now this ancient technique, reinforced by Western education, is bringing into action the New China, much of which was created in mission schools and colleges and is not understood at all by modern industrialists or old-school diplomats.

Before May 30 the Student Union in Shanghai, as elsewhere, existed in only a few institutions and was the creation of the radicals. Its members were mostly members of the Kuomintang (Sun Yat-sen) Party, which is seeking to capture the colleges and schools. (This party has a Communist left wing, but its practical program for China is pale pink. Its methods of propaganda and organization are quite obviously borrowed from Russia to a considerable extent, particularly its technique of trying to unite students, workers, and soldiers.) Today every college and school in Shanghai is in the union. Shortly after the strike began the officers were changed and a more responsible element came into control. The constructive section of student life is now organized, active, conscious of national needs, and getting in touch with industrial workers.

There is among the students a large emotional element, which is the easy victim of seductive catchwords it does not understand. In their initial propaganda the students have played with the fires of ignorant race prejudice, as have our "America for Americans" crowd and our Nordic-cult professors, all of them thereby endangering the peace of the world in their ignorance. But the student leaders here saw their error, manfully acknowledged it, and set out to allay the passions they had aroused.

It is clear that the underlying difficulty is the attitude of a certain section of the white people. The only use they have for Chinese is to make money out of them, and while they are doing it they curse them with contempt, and cuff and kick them when they dare. One of their spokesmen offers the opinion that there are slave races in the world and that the Chinese is one of them, and unfortunately this attitude is too liberally represented in the English-speaking press out here. The day after the shooting in Shanghai the Chinese press was restrained in its editorial comment. Then came some editorials in the English press taking the position that the superior race could do no wrong, laying all the blame on the Chinese with strong language, and at once the attitude of the Chinese press changed. The official position of the local authorities has reflected this assumption of the infallibility and impeccability of the superior white race and has wounded and alienated the best of the Chinese leaders. In time of trouble it is the "keep-the-beggars-in-their-place" crowd who become vociferous and get into action. The more intelligent and human of the foreign community are cowed by the demand for solidarity and the fear of a serious native outbreak.

When this group exerts itself and seeks an adjustment it creates another psychological barrier. The Anglo-Saxon in his really righteous moods and moments is moved by the majesty of law and order. The Chinese cannot understand this impersonal attitude nor this worship of what is to him an abstraction. His desire is for equity more than for law. His ethics lead him to a give-and-take method in each particular situation to meet the human necessities. This difficulty can be surmounted by those who really seek to understand one another and have a common regard for justice and freedom, provided the atmosphere be not contaminated by the assumption of race superiority and the desire to maintain what is erroneously regarded as race prestige. But can the white man possibly stay in the East on the basis of special privilege due to a superior race?

Many Chinese and some Americans are asking what is to be the effect of the Shanghai affair upon our historic friendship. They wonder why we should have the preponderance of the naval forces on the spot and why our marines should be stationed where they will most attract public attention. The municipal council responsible for this incident is composed of six British, two Americans, and one Japanese. An American is chairman and your Chinese house servant is sure this is no accident, for China is concentrating against the British with all the memories of a long series of aggressions. Japan, whose industrialists were the initial occasion of the outbreak, slips quietly into the background and plays for the future. Russia is presented free of charge with the equivalent of tons of propaganda. Americans demand justice in the shape of an impartial investigation with adequate Chinese representation. American missionary eyewitnesses to the shooting testify that in their opinion it was unnecessary, and excited Britons write to the papers, Why are the Americans letting us down? Other Britons beg their compatriots to maintain a sporting attitude, assuring them that we always do our part, and typical 100 percenters join the chorus by uttering typical vituperations against their fellow-citizens who have dared to suggest that the white man could possibly have done wrong, including a lady who asks, Could an American have found a better, more efficient answer for the mob? Meanwhile do our people at home know whether we are being used to safeguard British interests in the Yangtze Valley or whether we are intelligently cooperating with British policy, and if so why? If there is a joint policy, the question is whether it involves an attempt to hold on to the special privileges gained in the "unequal treaties" which carry to China the stigma of inferiority.

Before he left Peking ex-Minister Schurman hinted that the time had come gradually to relinquish the special privileges obtained in the "unequal treaties." The Soviet Ambassador retorted that the only way to handle the matter was to give them up wholesale as Russia had done. The dominant voices of the American commercial and financial community in Shanghai replied to Mr. Schurman as though he were the ally of Mr. Karakhan. Yet the only third choice is the resort to force. This is an unthinkable policy for the United States. If it were blundered into it could not possibly succeed.

It is time for Americans in China and out of China to recognize that the "unequal treaties" have to go. The only question is the manner and the time. To say first stable government, or first abrogation, is for both sides an equal fallacy. The two hang together and can only proceed coordinately. This joint result can be accomplished by an announcement of intention to relinquish and the arrangement of a method to determine procedure. To delay is to imperil the possibility of a constructive solution. An international inquiry into the shootings in Shanghai and the measures necessary to prevent recurrence is the immediate step. The next opportunity is the autumn conference on customs which could be broadened to cover the larger issue of the "unequal treaties."

Tennessee's Dilemma

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Dayton, July 12

THOSE who say that nothing of importance can be decided at Dayton have, at first glance, reason on their side. Even in Rhea County tadpoles will still lose their tails whatever may happen to Mr. Scopes, and, it is to be hoped, the human organism will continue in a similarly unperturbed fashion its evolution toward whatever state Nature has in mind for it. It is now perfectly evident that the question of the constitutionality of the Tennessee law, the only tangible legal issue involved, will not be the chief one discussed, and it might thus appear that the whole discussion threatens to become diffusely inconclusive.

No sooner had Clarence Darrow begun his cross-examination of prospective jurors than it became clear that he proposed to prove that the teaching of the defendant was not irreconcilable with a sufficiently liberal interpretation of the Bible, and hence was not a violation of the law, which specifically forbids only those theories which deny the account in Genesis. The theoretical position of the Bible as final authority upon scientific questions will thus not be questioned, and the right of the State legislature to control the teaching of professors will be left similarly unchallenged.

But the real problem raised is not legal but sociological. No verdict of the jury and no injunction of the Supreme Court can change the fact that the trial is a symptom of the vast gulf which lies between two halves of our population, and that the real question to be settled is the question of how this gulf may be bridged. In the centers of population men have gone on assuming certain bodies of knowledge and certain points of view without realizing that they were living in a different world from that inhabited by a considerable portion of their fellow-citizens, and they have been unconscious of the danger which threatened them at the inevitable moment when the two worlds should come in conflict. In Tennessee the moment has arrived and a single battle will no more settle it than the World War settled the questions from which it arose.

Of the reality of the danger there can be no question. The zeal of the fundamentalists has been enormously quickened by an anticipatory taste of triumph, and they will push any victory they may gain to the fullest possible extent. Already one State legislator has announced his intention of "putting teeth" in the present law by making the penalty for its violation a prison sentence instead of a fine, and various extensions of the principle of State interference with teaching may be confidently predicted. Members of the D. A. R. will, sooner or later, seek to forbid in the schools any historical facts which tend to reflect upon the character or motives of Revolutionary heroes; conservative economists and sociologists will certainly follow their lead; and, unless the movement is definitely checked, the next twenty-five years will see the State schools and universities so shackled with legislation as to make them utterly worthless as institutions for education. The control of learning will pass into the hands of the uneducated, and youth will leave the schools more ignorant than when it entered them.

Doubtless Tennessee is in a condition not much worse than that of the majority of the States in the Union. Her folly consists chiefly in the fact that she has allowed the situation to get out of hand by her cowardly refusal to deal with it as it arose. Neither she nor any other State has been able adequately to educate her citizens—and for that fact she is not to blame, since the task is beyond her financial or other strength. But when people cannot be educated they must be led, and it is in leadership that Tennessee has failed.

Left undisturbed, the rural population would have bothered itself very little over the teachings of the school or the college, since it has that respect for learning natural to all uneducated communities. A few years ago, however, it became evident that it would not be thus undisturbed, for various propagandists of the Bryan school came among it to declaim against what one of the agitators now in Dayton picturesquely calls "Hell in the high schools." Dayton was made aware of a question at issue, it looked for leaders, and it found them on one side alone. Fundamentalists were eager and zealous; educators were at best timid and non-committal, at worst hypocritically evasive. Under the circumstances, Dayton cannot be blamed if she chose to follow those who knew what they stood for.

Even at that very late moment when the anti-evolution bill was introduced into the legislature a little courage might have saved the day. Had the president of the State University gone with his faculty to Nashville, had the editors of the daily papers said what they thought, and had, in general, the enlightened members of the community shown one-half the decision manifest by the other side they might very well have won. Instead they lay low. They declined the challenge; they refused to make any effort to lead; they left their opponents in undisputed possession of the field. Dayton was reasonable to conclude, as undoubtedly it has concluded, that nine-tenths of Tennessee, the only world it knows, is with it and Bryan. It does not even know that the university which it respects is against it, and it is following a sound instinct. It is right to have no great confidence in scientists and educators who ask for nothing except its money. If the time ever comes when they show a disposition to tell what they believe it may possibly listen to them.

In the courtroom at Dayton and in the newspaper reports of the proceedings there Tennessee will be reminded of the situation into which she has drifted, and the ultimate result of the trial will depend upon whether or not she heeds the reminder. Neither John R. Neal, the only native prominently represented upon the defense, nor Messrs. Darrow, Hays, and Malone, his associates, can do much for her if she will do nothing for herself. They may win their case or they may lose it, but an ignorant population, almost wholly without leaders, will remain.

[Other articles by Mr. Krutch will follow, analyzing the background of this amazing trial in his native State.]

What Lies Beyond Dayton

By ROLLIN LYNDE HARTT

THE Fundamentalist Party, engaged just now at Dayton in defending an ancient Chaldean creation myth which was copied into the first chapter of Genesis twenty-three hundred years ago, is by far the most interesting factor in American politics.

It does not call itself a party or believe itself to be one. It is not commonly recognized as such. Its leaders neither hold nor seek public office, and it took a rare humorist to picture Mr. Bryan as hoping to be elected to the Presidency on the Fundamentalist ticket. Nominally and to outward appearance, the Fundamentalist Party is a religious organization and that alone. In effect, however, it is much more. Without troubling to name candidates for office, it aims to control the men who are already in office by coercing legislatures and ultimately Congress and thus securing what all political parties strive to secure—namely, laws embodying its own convictions. According to Mr. Bryan the Fundamentalist Party will not be satisfied with writing a defense of the twenty-three-hundred-year-old Chaldean creation myth into the criminal code of State after State; it must be written into the federal Constitution itself.

Journalists laugh. But they are the same journalists who laughed when these same people, not satisfied with capturing State after State for prohibition, began to talk of an Eighteenth Amendment.

But evolution is only superficially the issue at Dayton. At bottom, the issue is a vastly older and vastly more important question—the question as to whether the separation of church and state shall be maintained. To be sure, there is no mention of this at Dayton. The fundamentalists are not saying, even among themselves: "There should be a Protestant state church in America," nor are they saying, even among themselves: "Theocracy is the ideal system of government." No more are they saying, even among themselves: "Fundamentalism attempts to establish a protectorate over the United States of America. Just as a Khedive is retained in Egypt, or a Sultan in Morocco, or a Maharajah in India, so the present rulers will be retained in America; only, the Fundamentalist Party will rule those rulers." No such monstrous ambitions are consciously entertained by fundamentalists, but the significance of fundamentalism lies, not in what it is consciously but in what it is unconsciously. Unconsciously, it puts the church above the state.

That it should fail to recognize that it is doing so is not remarkable. Less than a third of its clergymen have ever attended any college. Many of them are graduates of such establishments as the Moody Bible Institute, "entrance requirement a common-school education or its equivalent." The majority received their training in seminaries which Dr. Robert Lincoln Kelley, special investigator for the Institute of Social and Religious Research, describes as "scarcely qualifying as educational institutions." Great numbers of them preach "the literal, bodily, visible, imminent return of Jesus Christ to this earth as king." That, for example, is the belief of Mr. Bryan's distinguished colleague, the Rev. J. Frank Norris, who has repeatedly appeared before State legislatures in defense of "monkey bills." It is likewise the belief of the Rev. W. A. (Billy) Sunday, who, next to Mr. Bryan, is probably the fundamentalist swaying the greatest number of American minds.

Among the fundamentalist rank and file, profundity of intellect is not too prevalent, nor is the understanding of politics in the larger sense of the word. From that rank and file comes the membership of the Ku Klux Klan. But an understanding of politics in the narrow sense of the word is not lacking by any means. Under Mr. Bryan's shrewd guidance the movement thrives, and the fundamentalists have learned much by experience. As the Prohibition Party, seeking to put their leaders into office, they failed. As the Anti-Saloon League, coercing the men already in office, they succeeded. The lesson is not forgotten, and the technique acquired in learning it remains an invaluable asset. Just as the Anti-Saloon League bullied legislative bodies by claiming "an overwhelming majority of the American people," so the fundamentalists claim that only a handful of atheists want "Darwinism" taught in our public schools.

Politicians are not fooled into imagining that Mr. Bryan is backed by "an overwhelming majority of the American people. All told, the fundamentalists number hardly more than twenty-five million. Something like 70 per cent of them are women, and women have not extensively availed themselves of their right to vote. But politicians know that on one issue appearing to involve a defense of Christianity, so called, against atheism, so called, the threat to "get out the woman vote" may well be taken seriously.

Under a republic such as the framers of the Constitution supposed that they were founding, twenty-five million fundamentalists would not be a particularly grave menace. Representatives, chosen for their wisdom and good conscience, were to legislate in accordance with their wisdom and good conscience, ignoring "the mob." But, though the capital is still at Washington, remote from great centers of population, and though an electoral college still goes through the ancient ceremony of choosing the President, lest "mob" influence should prevail, we long ago abandoned the republican form of government. The mob rules. Of this or that obnoxious bill, a Congressman or Senator will say frankly: "I don't believe in any such measure, but I shall vote for it because I learn that my constituents desire me to." For this he is not only unrebuked, he is applauded.

No one foresaw that America would change from a republic to a democracy. Today, it seems ridiculous to hint that America may in course of time change from a democracy to a theocracy. But only a short while ago it would have seemed as ridiculous to predict that a former Secretary of State, holding honorary degrees from several institutions of learning, would one day be defending a twenty-three-hundred-year-old Chaldean creation myth, and, in so doing, advocate the principles of theocratic despotism.

Nothing about America is more curious than its choice of fears. With the utmost ease any impostor can convince America that Jews are about to control us, though there are hardly three million Jews in the entire country. It is a simple matter, likewise, to convince America that the Catholic church hopes sometime to control us, though Catholics believe in the separation of church and state, and though we have in all only 18,000,000 Catholics in the country. Yet, despite the fundamentalists' much greater numerical strength, despite their success in forcing Congress and the legislatures to adopt national prohibition, despite their already more or less successful demand for the religious control of public education, and despite what is now going on at Dayton, it is with difficulty that any American can awaken in himself a very lively fear when he inquires where all this is going to end. We clearly perceive and resent the apparently isolated onslaughts of fundamentalism upon our liberties, but do not recognize as clearly or as resentfully its underlying policy. We combat it, not in its essential character, but in its manifestation. We have an Association Against the Prohibition Amendment to fight fundamentalism's control in matters of personal habit. We have a Science League in America to fight its "monkey bills." But we have as yet failed to combat its underlying policy by founding a League to Maintain the Separation of Church and State.

Through methods purely educational, such a league might do quite a little toward Christianizing the fundamentalists. Gently, and with suitably adroit diplomacy, it could remind them that Jesus of Nazareth, to whose precepts and example they now attach but slight importance, never prosecuted his fellow-men for seeking enjoyments different from his own, and never sought to obtain from the Roman government the power to do so. He conceived of religion as a persuasive, not as a coercive, force. He believed in the separation of church and state.

Out Where Bureaucracy Begins

By HARVEY FERGUSSON

TRADITIONALLY the West is the home of individualism and self-reliance, fostered by the frontier. Actually, a large part of the West today lives under a modified form of socialism. It is more dependent upon government agencies and more completely dominated by them than any other part of the United States. Wherever you go in the great open spaces you meet a government bureau. These bureaus not only rule large parts of the West but they also nourish it. And they nourish it with money drawn by federal taxation from the East.

The conflict between the States which pay more in federal taxes than they get in federal appropriations and those that get more in appropriations than they pay in taxes has been abundantly expounded. This, undoubtedly, is the new alignment in American political life. The gist of it is contained in the statement that New York gets less than 1 per cent as much from the federal government as it pays in taxes, while Nevada gets more than 200 per cent. These are the extremes. But most of the Western States and some of the Southern States are making money out of Washington in the same way that Nevada does, while the rest of the States are losing money to Washington in the same way that New York does.

I do not propose to say anything further on the statistical and theoretical aspects of this matter. I want merely to record a few observations made in the State of New Mexico which seem to me to throw new light on it.

In the first place, it should be noted that the State government of New Mexico is perhaps the most impotent and ridiculous product of the democratic theory now visible. Until the past few years New Mexico has been dominated by a political machine which is probably the oldest in America. It was functioning there before New Mexico became a part of the United States. It was founded upon complete control of the peon class of Mexicans by the landowning aristocracy and by the church. The peons were in effect owned by the landholders, to whom they were always and deeply in debt. The landholders were dominated by the church. When New Mexico became a part of the United States there were some superficial changes, but no fundamental ones. The power of the church declined and a good deal of the land passed into the hands of the Yankees, but most of the native people remained serfs in effect. They formed the strength of the Republican machine, which controlled their votes as completely as the Negro vote is controlled in some other States. Republican bosses vote the sheep-herders in droves, and it is a long-standing joke in New Mexico to say that when there are not enough sheep-herders to turn the election they also vote the sheep.

The result of this condition is a State government almost incredibly corrupt and inefficient. Peculation in office has long been the usual thing. Nepotism has there reached its finest flower. One native political boss was found to have placed twenty-one members of his ancient and numerous family on the State pay roll.

This government barely succeeds in discharging the minimal administrative functions.

In the past few years the power of the Republican machine has been challenged by a typical reform politician from another State, named Carl Magee. He has built up an opposition machine depending for its strength on the immigrants from Texas and Missouri who have poured into the eastern half of the State to take up homesteads. This new Democratic machine has now elected a governor, but it still has to capture the legislature and to demonstrate that it is capable of working a real improvement.

The next important fact is that a large part of the area of New Mexico, like that of most other States in the Rocky Mountain region, is comprised within national forests. This fact is important because the Forest Service was one of the first considerable intrusions of the federal bureaucratic government into the West. It was at first resented and opposed, but has gradually become both an accepted and a necessary thing. It has accustomed the people of the Rocky Mountain region to deal with and to depend upon the federal government.

The Easterner is apt to think of the Forest Service as engaged solely in the protection of standing timber. As a matter of fact, it not only guards the timber but also sells it and strictly supervises the cutting of it. It also controls the grazing of live stock within forest areas. These areas comprise the chief summer range for the whole region. They are divided into parts for cattle and other parts for sheep. All the ranchmen hold permits from the federal government, for which they pay so much per head of stock. The number of animals they may put on the range, where they may put them—their entire business, in fact—is under federal control. Moreover, homesteads on national forests may be taken up along valleys where there is no timber and these holdings are administered by the Forest Service. Again, the Forest Service officers are instructed to assist local officers, and they do this by usurping whole functions of local government. Nearly all enforcement of the game laws on national forests, for example, is done by the forest rangers, and it is done with commendable vigilance. Campers are closely watched by the rangers, compelled to put out their fires and generally to obey all laws and regulations. The Forest Service also does most of the constructive work on the national forests. It builds roads and trails, conserves water supply, and sets up telephone lines. The real ruler within a national forest is the Forest Supervisor. His power is felt by everyone within it, and the power of the State government, if it can be said to have any, is felt scarcely at all.

The power and beneficence of the Forest Service extend more and more beyond the boundaries of the forests. For example, the town of Albuquerque, New Mexico's chief center of business, is ten miles from a range of mountains called the Sandia, which is a part of the Manzano national forest. The Sandia is a bold and beautiful ridge rising five thousand feet above the surrounding country. The Forest Service has built at great expense a road which runs over the top of this mountain, from one end to the other, affording the motorist striking views and easy access to a delightful summer playground. Connecting with other roads from the town, it makes a "scenic drive" in a circle, which is widely advertised by the town as an attraction for tourists and health-seekers. Thus the whole town is indirectly benefited. What is more, shrewd citizens have purchased bits of land along this road, which were privately owned before the land became national forest. They are selling these as sites for summer homes at a profit, and are planning a resort hotel. Thus the Forest Service puts money into the pockets of Albuquerqueans and their love for it grows rapidly and inevitably.

The Forest Service is by no means the only government bureau to which the citizens of this community look for help which they can get nowhere else. The town is located in the Rio Grande valley. The valley is extremely flat and the river constantly fills its bed with silt in such a way that the river is in some places higher than other land in the valley. As a result this town, in one of the driest regions on earth, is threatened with destruction by flood. Some twenty years ago it came near being wiped out. This fact is given no publicity but it causes the citizens a great deal of concern. Moreover, the rising water-table within the valley is impairing its value for agriculture, as it rots away the roots of plants in low places and causes the valley to be less than half cultivated.

This condition, which is steadily growing worse, can be corrected only by throwing a dam across the river some miles above the town and so impounding the flood waters. The town will then be safe, the valley can be drained, and a steady supply of water for irrigation can be insured. The State government is incapable of doing this work alone and private enterprise is not likely ever to undertake it. The one hope of getting it done lies in the federal Reclamation Service, and the people of Albuquerque are keenly aware of this fact. Bills have been introduced in Congress providing for the necessary help. None has so far passed, but one appropriation has been made by which federal aid will be extended in draining the valley provided the local landowners form an association. The astute Yankee landowners are now busily trying to persuade the apathetic Mexicans of the necessity for this association. The government, in all probability, will do the whole job in course of time.

Besides the national forests a large part of the area of New Mexico is under some measure of federal control by reason of being public domain. This land is subject to entry by citizens under the homestead laws, but a large part of it is too arid for any use except as range for cattle and sheep. Being open to all it is constantly overgrazed. When the rains are good it will support several times as much stock as it will in dry years. Hence, during every drought cattle and sheep die by thousands and the withering range is so close-bitten and trampled that it is permanently injured. Obviously, what is needed is some form of organized control over the use of this range, such as the Forest Service provides on the national forests. Here, again, the federal government is the only hope. Several bills have been introduced in Congress providing for a scientific study of such range lands and a federal administration of them. One of these measures will probably pass. The federal rangers and supervisors will then become the real power in the deserts and hills as they already are in the mountains.

I went out on the range with a large sheep-owner last summer, and after he had explained this situation to me he began to talk about the problem of protecting his herds from wild animals. This, it appeared, had been solved for him by the United States government.

"A government hunter went over my range this spring and spread poison," he said. "I do not think I lost a single lamb to the coyotes. He must have gotten all of them." He went on to say that often 2 or 3 per cent of the lamb crop was taken by coyotes, while losses of 10 per cent were not unknown. The government hunter to whom he referred was an employee of the United States Biological Survey, which is now engaged in all of the Western States in the extermination of predatory animals. It employs hundreds of expert trappers and markets annually a large collection of furs.

This work is an especially good example of the way in which bureaucratic government grows in the West. The Bureau of the Biological Survey, a part of the Department of Agriculture, was created to make a study of the American fauna and to prepare treatises thereon. Under any rational interpretation of the constitution it could not be more than an investigative organization. But in the West life is still a struggle with the wild animals to an extent little realized in the East. Recently the Chamber of Commerce of Deming, New Mexico, called a meeting to discuss the jack-rabbit problem. A plague of jack-rabbits was devouring the crops and literally threatening the town with bankruptcy. Prairie dogs make farming difficult in large areas by tunneling the ground and eating the roots of the crops. Not only coyotes but wolves, mountain lions, and bears are a serious menace to the live-stock industry. Even wild geese and sage-hens have in parts of the West put man on the defensive in recent years.

The Biological Survey saw here an opportunity for a radical extension of its powers. By act of Congress it grew at a bound from a mere agency of scientific investigation to one actively engaged in altering the balance of nature. Certainly, poisoning coyotes is no part of the function of federal government as conceived by the founding fathers. But the coyotes must be poisoned and the Biological Survey seems to be the only agency in New Mexico sufficiently superior to the coyote in brains and persistence to cope with him. The State struggled futilely with the problem for years by offering bounties for coyote scalps. Scalps were abundantly faked and bounties often went unpaid, while the coyotes sat on their haunches and grinned. The Biological Survey has really reduced the coyotes to a harmless remnant in many parts of the State.

The Elephant Butte Dam, built by the Reclamation Service in the southern part of the State, has created in the desert a lake forty-five miles long. It has also created a town and a rich farming section. The farmers of this region, both as landowners and as water users, deal with the federal government.

Taking into account national forests, national monuments, Indian reservations, and reclamation projects, a large part of New Mexico is now under the direct supervision of Washington bureaus. By reason of its work in building roads, exterminating predatory animals, and aiding agriculture, its money and authority are felt in almost all other parts. And the process is now only barely begun.

Moreover—and this is the point which seems often to be overlooked—both its money and its authority are grievously needed. Irrigation, drainage, flood control, administration of the range, and better roads are not things New Mexico can long do without. They are necessary to the progress and even to the survival of whole communities. And here, as in all other relationships, dependence has grown by what it feeds on.

The Southwest is perhaps the part of the United States where constructive effort is most needed and where local agencies are least capable of making it. This creates a glorious opportunity for the Washington bureaucracy, hungry for power and fundamentally responsible to no one. It is not surprising that the representatives sent to Washington by New Mexico and other Western States are no more than dairymaids to milk the treasury cow into the bureaucratic bucket. And the cow already has its head in the well-filled troughs of the Eastern and Northern States.

A comparison between New Mexico and a State like New York is hardly necessary. New York is dependent upon Washington for little except protection in case of war. It regards the federal government, with its prohibition law and its high taxes, as a nuisance—in fact, as an enemy. Theoretically, New Mexico and New York live under local governments of the same kind and bear the same relation to the federal government. Practically, a divergence of vital interest has arisen between them comparable to that which existed between New York and Virginia in 1860.

Making Criminals Out of Soldiers

By FRED L. HOLMES

WAR'S toll did not end with the signing of the armistice, the promulgation of the terms of peace, and the arrangement of cash indemnities. It reached back into the communities to which the soldiers had returned. It turned men recently hailed as heroes into common criminals. Out of its atmosphere came a wave of crime among ex-service men directly traceable to their military experience. Strong men came back with few changes in their characters. Weaker men were broken in moral fiber under the experiences of war.

A scientific demonstration of these ugly facts has been made possible by a study of prison records in Wisconsin.

In the years of post-war wrangling over the payment of a bonus, the individual soldier was generally forgotten; and during those days of neglect something happened. About three years after the armistice the people of Wisconsin awoke to a distressing discovery! The penal institutions were being filled with men who had been in the service, and who were appearing in increasing numbers on the records of applications for executive clemency. Pardon day is a monthly event at the executive office at Madison. Persons who have fulfilled the requirements of the law, by filing certain documents and making the necessary official publication, can appear before the Governor and present evidence why an individual should be released from penal servitude. Lawyers are not needed to present the application. Each case is later subjected to a thorough investigation independently of the evidence offered at the hearing. A decision is then reached on the basis of all the facts.

There was one pardon day in Wisconsin that will not soon be forgotten. Upward of forty cases had been heard by Governor Blaine. It was late when the last plea was presented; it was the case of a soldier.

"The pleas of the soldier boys were ringing in my ears," said the Governor afterward. "I paused for a while to ascertain how many times clemency had been asked in that single day for soldiers. I counted about a dozen cases. As I thought over the evidence presented in the individual cases, I saw that something had occurred in this country. Soldiers had been sent to jails, reformatories, and prisons for seizing food, for engaging in moonshine trade in order to make a living, and for taking property. They were there for many offenses which the war had tolerated. The economic fact of hunger was often present. Neglect was evident in nearly every case. Right then I determined upon a full investigation."

Some days later Dr. W. F. Lorenz, director of the Wisconsin Psychiatric Laboratory, a major during the war, and Dr. W. S. Middleton, a member of the clinical staff of the University of Wisconsin and an overseas veteran, were appointed to make an investigation of all cases of soldiers in prison. It was to be a scientific study to discover what had caused the crime wave among soldiers. The inquiry was started in December, 1922.

The report, made early in 1923, contained some disturbing facts. About one-fourth of the convicts at the penitentiary and reformatory were soldiers. In all, the investigators examined 225 cases, of which 91 were at the reformatory and 134 at the prison. Many additional cases have since been presented and studied, and in the last two years the problems presented in these cases have been handled by the Governor and the board of control in a way that merits commendation. There are now less than forty soldiers in Wisconsin prisons and they are there because of no influences traceable to the war.

Two facts stood out in the investigation:

1. The crime was traceable to military life in 20 per cent of the cases.

2. At the State prison 62 per cent of the ex-service men and at the reformatory 40 per cent were "mentally abnormal." These men did not belong in prison. They should have been placed in institutions for care and treatment.

The report says:

> At both the State prison and reformatory over 40 per cent of the ex-service men have physical diseases that need medical attention. The criminal offenses of the 225 were concerned with property or money in over 70 per cent of the cases.
>
> The offense committed was regarded as trivial in 60 per cent of the ex-service men at the State prison and in 68 per cent of those at the reformatory.
>
> The physical disabilities among these ex-service men were in 49 instances traceable to military service, in our opinion.

Touching on the subject of the causes of crime against property, the report concludes:

> Different opinions may be held as to the possible influence of military experience and training upon subsequent criminality. We especially feel the need of illustrating the cases that we regard as being influenced in this way. Beforehand, we wish to stress a certain disregard of property rights that we personally observed in the military service, especially overseas. Clothing and equipment was a government issue. It was assigned to an individual but was not regarded by the soldier as individual property. To help himself whenever in need was common practice, particularly overseas, and with active divisions large amounts of property became so-called "salvage dumps."
>
> For a soldier to help himself to necessary equipment from such salvage piles was generally sanctioned. The property right of organizations to equipment was commonly disregarded. A shortage made up by stealing from a nearby organization was done and not infrequently with the knowledge of commanding officers. Property became still more a matter of mere taking as the troops engaged in battle. The influence of such an experience commonly practiced and occasionally sanctioned by those in authority was not conducive to respecting property rights at home. A normal mind, of course, is expected to adjust itself to the widely different situations of war and peace, but the relatively immature mind might easily be influenced by such practices as the young soldier lacking in good character because of the absence of home influences during childhood, or the memories of such, might be looked upon as receiving a pernicious moral twist by such experiences. Nothing in war is uplifting, at least not for the humbler participants. Those who actually got into battle and witnessed or took part in the dreadfulness of war may later in civil life have committed some overt act which by comparison with compulsory military duty seemed inconsequential.

These statements are made by soldiers. Both men who conducted the investigations were in overseas service. No sooner was this report filed than Governor Blaine became active. He appointed an attorney to prepare all legal papers. With protests from political enemies that he was debasing the "pardoning power" vested in the executive branch of the government, he released on conditional pardons all those soldiers who had been sentenced for trivial offenses.

Following are three typical soldier cases taken from the records with the Governor's reasons for pardon:

1. Convicted before municipal court of Milwaukee, September, 1919, for operating an automobile without owner's consent and sentenced to Wisconsin State Reformatory for four years. Reason for pardon:

> He served throughout the war in the 32nd Division and after his return to this country he and a sailor took a Buick car from the streets of Milwaukee. His mother is blind and entirely dependent upon him. The sentence is excessive and greater good may be done this young man by a conditional pardon, requiring him to support his mother.

2. Convicted before the circuit court of Crawford County, November, 1921, of the crime of violating the State prohibition law and sentenced to three months in county jail. Reason for pardon:

> He was sentenced on a plea of guilty to the county jail of Crawford County for a period of three months on a charge of violating the prohibition law. He was a volunteer in the late war, served with Company D, 23rd Infantry, in the Toul Sector in France, and on September 12, 1918, lost his right arm and sustained severe injuries to his right leg, from which he is now suffering, and in all probability he is unable to perform manual labor. The term of sentence was reasonable, but this man ought to have vocational training in order to save himself and wife and children from future failure. He has a wife and one child and only recently lost his baby.
>
> Paraphrasing what Abraham Lincoln said when he was condemned for granting pardons, I want to say that when I can pluck a thistle and plant a flower when I think a flower will grow, I am going to do it.

3. Convicted before municipal court of Eau Claire, March, 1922, of vagrancy and sentenced to county jail for 90 days. Reason for pardon:

> He served in the 32nd Division about 22 months—13 months in France and [illegible]. He is about 25 years of age. His conduct while in the county jail is good and his pardon is recommended by the district attorney. This boy was stopping at the Y. M. C. A., and begging for food from the dog wagon, and because he was unable to pay for lodging at the Y. M. C. A., and begging, he was charged with vagrancy. He has served 30 days and under the circumstances this is sufficient punishment.

Those who were feeble-minded or abnormal were promptly transferred to institutions for their proper care. Those suffering from shell shock were transferred to the Memorial Hospital, the first State institution of its kind, for care and treatment.

The investigation of this crime among soldiers has resulted in general benefits. It definitely ascertained that war has a damaging influence that leads to after-war criminality by persons not criminally inclined, in all likelihood, under peace-time circumstances. It disclosed the evils that follow the neglect of the individual through failure to restore him to a remunerative civilian occupation. It pointed out that science and the medical laboratory must become a part of court procedure, if just punishments based on reformation and not "hate" are to be meted out. Moreover, a State plan has been put into effect to ascertain the mental status of all persons committed to Wisconsin prisons. Transfers to hospitals are becoming frequent. Recognition is taken of an age-old fact, that disease leads to crime—a condition often remedied when the source of poisoning has been removed.

In the Driftway

THERE is a veracious tale to the effect that the Chinese Ambassador, having settled down to a test of endurance at a London banquet, was asked by a neighbor if they had after-dinner speeches in China. "Oh, no," he replied; "China has been civilized a long time. We abolished after-dinner speaking a thousand years ago." The good man spoke well, but probably without effect. The Drifter's observations, conducted at long range, convince him that the vice grows instead of fading away. Yet it would seem on the surface to be a reform easily accomplished. The speakers are seldom listened to, and few of them ever desire to be among those present. They are, however, in the grip of custom. That custom requires the appointment of a speakers' committee, and the committee requires speakers in order to make good. Exerting pressure, social or financial, as the case may be, speakers are secured and infinite suffering results.

* * * * *

THE remedy would appear to lie in making use of that most modern vehicle of voice—the radio. With a central plant operating from some specially established station, which might be properly designated as BORE, and riding on long wave-lengths, it might be possible to establish a system of service that would do away with the speakers' table, the chairman, and any necessity for stopping conversation. It would be well to route the dinners, giving an evening to each variety. Monday could accommodate Rotarians, Tuesday church men's clubs, and so on, until the six nights were filled. It would not be necessary to provide radio activity for Sunday. This day the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman swamps the skies.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is moved to the suggestion by the receipt of an interesting circular from a Pennsylvania factory for the manufacture and sale of After-Dinner and Other Speeches. Before receiving this, he had no idea of the magnitude of the industry. The management announces that it sold 3,000,000 speeches in 1924, and confidentially expects to double the output in 1925. The thought is appalling. We hear much of free speech, but the company claims to have sold these productions at prices ranging from 2½ cents to $40 each. Blocks of five can be had for $2, of ten for $3, and twenty for $5. As to their quality: "The Data is Accurate, the English, Clear, Forceful, and Oratorical." What more could be wanted? If a set speech is not desired choice may be had of 300 "snappy" stories, as many "toasts" for all occasions, plus 100 ideas for entertainment committees. Twenty-five short prayers can also be had for 50 cents, to relieve any one embarrassed by the call to "ask a blessing." The longest-felt want filled is "100 ways to introduce a speaker." In an extended experience the Drifter has rarely met with more than one way—the stupidest that could possibly be found. Some one hath said: "From our traducers and our introducers, Good Lord, deliver us"—a most proper prayer. The experienced announcers of the radio organization would do away with this agony, and if static interfere with what follows no one will care. Since the introduction of the hip-flask into social events, auditors become indifferent to entertainment much earlier than formerly.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Einstein's Relativity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Professor Russell's articles upon "The A B C of Relativity" should not go unanswered. Because of their title, they are leading so many to be ashamed of not being able to understand a thing so simple as to deserve the name of "A B C" that the fact that they are incomprehensible because they are sheer nonsense should be published.

Dr. Einstein's theory, as also Mr. Russell's exposition of it, is based solely upon the Michelson-Morley experiment, determining the velocity of light when the earth is moving in one direction or the other. This experiment, performed forty years ago, proved, as Mr. Russell states, that "Relatively to an observer on the earth, the velocity of light is the same in all directions." And that is all it does prove.

This fact, for forty years, has been a stickler to physicists, because it reveals the ether as acting differently, in its transmission of energy, from either air or water, in their transmission of radiated sound. This is a serious difficulty. But it is not one-tenth so great a "difficulty" as are all the mental inconsistencies which Dr. Einstein has created in order to explain away this one basic one, inseparable from the Michelson proof.

For instance, Mr. Russell does not hesitate at committing himself to statements such as these:

"Another way of stating the same thing is that the velocity of light is the same relatively to every observer, however he may be moving."

"There is only one way of explaining such facts, and that is to assume that watches and clocks are affected by motion"—by which, he adds, he does not mean that the mechanism of the timepiece is upset, but that time itself is affected by motion.

Again: "Nothing can travel faster than light."

Now, these are statements which are in no wise warranted by the Michelson experiment, nor by any accurate use of one's reasoning powers. They are fair samples of the sort of intellectual recklessness which has vitiated every explanation of Einstein's relativity which has yet come to my attention.

A definite physical fact, such as this basic difference of the ether from air or water, in its energetic action, is not "explained" by the addition to the mystery of any wholesale "assumption," such as that time is altered by motion. That assumption merely increases the difficulty and mystery. Nor is that "the only way" to explain it, as Mr. Russell says. The way to explain it is to leave it alone, as has been done with every other discovery of science, until additional data, coming from unexpected sources, make it comprehensible.

Again, to assume that "nothing can travel faster than light" is another gratuitous and unwarranted idea. How do we know that? Just because we have never yet happened to observe anything traveling faster than light is certainly a mighty unscientific basis for the arbitrary introduction of a wholesale assumption to the effect that nothing in the universe does so. To assume, even, that there must be something somewhere which travels faster than light would be a far more innocent assumption than to assume that motion affects time.

Finally, the Michelson-Morley experiment formed no such epoch-making innovation, in its demand for some explanation of relativity, as Dr. Einstein's theory assumes. For many a fact of science had voiced that same demand long before Michelson was born.

The unquestioned fact of centrifugal force, for instance, which was exactly defined by Newton just two centuries before the Michelson experiment was undertaken, has never yet been explained, for it demands a whole cosmic philosophy of relativity to explain it. And behind it, corroborating its insistent interrogation-point, comes a vast array of other indubitable facts in chemistry, thermodynamics, electrics, and social energetics. That is to say, Newton proved mathematically, and our whole science of astronomy has been built corroboratingly upon, the fact that the force mutually attracting two bodies is definable as a certain function of their mass and distance (true gravitation) minus a certain function of their motion across the radius connecting their two centers (true centrifugal force). That is to say, if the earth only whirled fast enough, the centrifugal force embodied in each body upon its surface, tending to lift it vertically, would equal—or might easily exceed—its earth-gravitation drawing it downwardly. Thereupon all the bodies upon the earth's surface would fly off into space, upon hyperbolic orbits, a form of orbit which is common in the heavens.

As a matter of fact, the motion of the earth's surface happens to be so slow that the centrifugal force, in this case, is not noticeable—well less than 1 per cent. But a certain patient and skilful Russian professor succeeded in demonstrating its presence by actual measurement. By setting up delicate instruments upon the deck of a Black Sea steamer, he was able to measure the difference in the weight of objects, according to whether the ship were sailing east or west.

That is to say, the speed of the earth's surface being roughly 1,000 miles per hour eastwardly, when the ship sailed east, at the rate of 10 miles per hour, say, the speed of each object on her deck was 1,010 miles an hour across the radius of gravitation. When the ship sailed west, on the other hand, its speed would be 990 miles an hour across that radius. The very slight difference in weight due to this difference in lateral speed the Russian was able to measure.

He proved, of course, nothing except his own skill; for the formulae for computing these differences have been accepted as proved, beyond question, for generations. The incident is merely another among many of those remarkable fulfilled prophecies, whereby a fact is proved by computation first, and then corroborated by observation long afterward. These are the prophecies which identify science as a true revelation.

But the Russian's feat furnishes meat for thought. For, let us ask, how fast must the ship sail westwardly in order to bring the weight of each object on its deck to its maximum?

One thousand miles an hour, you will answer.

But relatively to what point or line are we to measure that velocity?

From an earth-radius fixed sidereally, is the natural reply—that is, fixed relatively to the "fixed" stars.

But there are no fixed stars. Each star is moving with a velocity comparable with, or even much greater than, that of our own sun—some fifteen miles per second. Some of the velocities of these "fixed" stars exceed three hundred miles per second—over one million miles per hour. That's a lovely thing, surely enough, to offer us as a fixed base of reference for exact thought and mathematical computation!

So, what this centuries-old familiar fact of centrifugal force really proves is that the weight of each one of us, upon our feet, is actually determined by something mathematically definable in terms of something fixed in abstract geometric space—not in the matter pervading the remote heavens, for this radius is no function of mass, but in purely intangible geometric space. In short, this intangible, invisible something of all interstellar geometric space constitutes the fixed basis for all the force-development of the universe. Through this indefinable basis for all force every portion of solid matter in the universe is moving freely, without resistance, yet guided and propelled by vast forces defined by its relativity to this intangible base!

Like the transmission of gravitational force aross space, independently of time, this vast fact has long remained a poser, so far as its explanation in terms of anything terrestrial is concerned. It stands there, the great basic fact of universal relativity, as it has stood, since long, long before the birth of either Michelson or Einstein.

In short, every fact of natural science proclaims to us that all the forces, attributes, and powers of the universe are situate, not within these tangible centers of mass—commonly called "matter"—which we can touch and see. This, man's instinctive way of looking at things, science proves to be wholly in error. Instead, all these forces, attributes, powers, and energies exist and act solely between the tangible, visible, ponderable mass-portions of the earth.

This is the true cosmic principle of relativity: That all of the forces, attributes, energies, and powers of the world lie "embodied" (if you will pardon the bull) not in the bodies of the universe but in sheer, abstract relationships between those mass-portions—between mass-portions no one of which ever possesses force, attribute, power, or energy in itself alone.

This is the true "A B C of relativity."

The fact itself was discovered when Kepler published his Three Laws of Motion, in 1609, and when Newton published his Three Laws of Force, in 1680. Specific recognition of it, as a cosmic principle, may be found in the author's "Energy," published in 1909, if not elsewhere.

No one had to await the Michelson experiment of forty years ago to furnish meat for talk about relativity. Nor may any one discuss relativity in terms of the Michelson experiment without reference to all this myriad of other scientific facts which display the basic importance of a true science of relativity. Every natural science, from the oldest of them all—astromechanics—down to the newest and most incomplete of them all—social energetics—is crying, and has long been crying, for an exact, competent science of relativity.

But this much needed science of true relativity is not to be attained by any such careless mental gymnastics, balanced perilously upon a single fact as to light-transmission, such as Dr. Einstein and his supporters have brought to the support of his theory.

First of all must come a candid facing of the stubborn fact that not one of our energetic sciences can be stated consistently with itself, let alone with all the others, without an accurate philosophy of relativity—not at all Dr. Einstein's relativity, which befuddles, but a true, clear, easily comprehensible relativity, which explains. Our present method of teaching these sciences, as if based upon something which is absolute because it is tangible and each science independently of all the others—is grossly misleading. Especially is this true of the science of social energetics, where we are now most deplorably at sea.

But this defect, so widespread in our teaching of natural science, once admitted, the problem would soon be solved. That is why the writer feels that such articles as Mr. Russell's, which befog the entire issue by the most careless and reckless reasoning—yet couched in terms so awful that each person admits promptly his inability to cope with it—demand frank negation. In plain English the Einstein theory of relativity is arrant nonsense—as bodiless a chimera as ever got a great nation on the run, merely because the said great nation lacks that rarest of all ethical powers: intellectual courage.

Physical courage is almost universal. Moral courage is common. But intellectual courage, the thing most needed in this day of unprecedented intricacy, is almost totally lacking.

New York, June 13 SYDNEY A. REEVE

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: "There is no difference between the two statements: 'The earth rotates once a day' and 'The heavens revolve around the earth once a day.' The two mean exactly the same thing."—Bertrand Russell, in The Nation, June 3, 1925.

Is this true? Possibly in some esoteric, mystical, or Pickwickian sense. But to those of us who have not yet been initiated into the awful mysteries of warped space and warped mathematics—and it is presumably for such that Mr. Russell has condescended to write—the above dictum is pure nonsense.

For, does not every schoolboy know that there are stars in the Milky Way at least 3,000 light years distant from us? Now, if it is true to say that these bodies revolve around our globe once every twenty-four hours, it must be equally true to say that they travel some 18,749 light years in that time, or at the rate of 6,843,385 times the velocity of light. Now, according to the highest authority on Einsteinism, Professor Einstein himself, the greatest of all velocities is that of light. Consequently, if old-fashioned logic still holds, nothing could travel six million times faster. Q. E. D.

But assuming the existence of these impossible velocities, there is still the question of centrifugal force. Imagine, if you can, the tangential momentum produced by such velocities at such distances. Of course, if they existed, the universe would long since have been torn to pieces.

Naturally, Mr. Russell does not for a moment believe in the existence of these tremendous orbits, with each of the millions or billions of the heavenly bodies moving in them completing a revolution in exactly, or almost exactly, twenty-four hours, and why he talks as if he did I cannot imagine. But he does, I take it, really and truly believe there is no such thing as absolute motion. Now, the undersigned is convinced that all motion is both absolute and relative, and challenges Mr. Russell to explain how centrifugal force is possible if all motion is merely relative. There is nothing relative about centrifugal force. Its three elements or factors, viz., rate of curvature of orbit, angular velocity, and mass, of the moving object, are absolutely independent, in any one case, of any other body, its position, mass, or motions, and hence of all other bodies.

It seems to me the relativity theory is completely upset by the fact of centrifugal force. Until that is disposed of, I think I shall stick to my Copernicus and continue to believe that our earth really rotates about its axis.

London, England C. L. E.

The McIntosh Chair of Banking

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am happy to inform you that your comment in the issue of July 8 upon the founding of a chair of banking and finance in Western Reserve University by Henry P. McIntosh is based upon incorrect information.

The information was that McIntosh had stipulated it should be taught that "even-handed justice holds invested capital sacred and honorably and righteously entitled to a fair return based upon amount and risk involved."

As a reporter for the Cleveland Plain Dealer I attended the commencement exercises at which the McIntosh gift was announced by President Robert E. Vinson. Dr. Vinson made no mention of any stipulation. Subsequently the publicity secretary of the university handed me a prepared announcement containing the stipulation.

The morning after my story appeared I was called to the office of the university secretary and informed that since the publicity secretary's announcement was prepared conditions of the endowment had been changed. I was shown a copy of the contract between Dr. Vinson and McIntosh in which the stipulation appeared only as "the hope" of McIntosh and the university that it always would be possible to teach that "even-handed justice holds invested capital sacred," etc.

I learned the gift had been made eight months ago and that announcement of it had been withheld, pending, as I inferred, the outcome of Dr. Vinson's effort to have the terms modified.

Cleveland, June 6 Fred Charles

The Garment Workers' Dispute

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: May I have an opportunity to comment in your columns on a statement just issued to the press by Morris Sigman, president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, in which he declares his intention to rid our union of Communists?

This announcement comes in the midst of a trial, by the New York Joint Board, of the executive committees of the three largest locals of our organization, 2, 9, and 22. These members were suspended on June 11 by the Joint Board, charged with violating the union's constitution in having had Communist speakers at their May Day meetings; and against Local 22 is lodged the additional charge of lending money to a workers' camp. We asked for an impartial, disinterested trial committee to hear the evidence and determine our guilt, and we suggested Eugene V. Debs, Norman Thomas, Roger N. Baldwin, Frank P. Walsh, and Scott Nearing. But this plea was refused, and we are being judged by a committee of those who preferred the charges against us.

In the English papers the cry of communism is loudly raised, for it gains public sympathy and serves to excuse the use of thugs in taking forcible possession of the headquarters of Locals 2 and 9 and the beating and arresting of workers who are our sympathizers. In our union organ, Justice, and in the Jewish press read by a majority of our workers, the Joint Board officials state that this is not a question of communism or any other "ism"; that a worker has a right to belong to any party he pleases; that this whole fight is one for control of our union.

We members of the suspended executive committees have for three years been fighting the Joint Board and the whole political machine which controls our union. Only a small percentage of us are Workers Party members, as President Sigman well knows. But it is we who have consistently opposed raises in dues and the levying of illegal taxes.

We have been demanding an accounting for $2,000,000 expended by the Joint Board. We have protested against the calling of fake strikes and unnecessary stoppages. We have accused the officers of using our money to line the pockets of their henchmen instead of using it to gain better conditions for the workers. Because of our system of representation, which so far we have been powerless to change, our three locals, which have 60 per cent of the members in New York City, have less than 25 per cent voice in the government of the Joint Board. Every one of the thirteen locals in the city has five delegates, whether its membership is fictitious (as in the case of buttonhole makers, which is now an obsolete craft) or consists of 12,000 members, as do both Locals 2 and 22.

On the principle that taxation without representation (or without justification or explanation) is tyranny, these three locals refused a few months ago to pay a levy of $2.50 a member. Secretary Baroff at the last meeting of the General Executive Board stated that "steps must be taken" to force us to obey their rulings; and these "steps" have been the suspension of our executive committees and the secret trial now going on. The cry of "communism" is pure camouflage to hide the real issues. The political machine of the Joint Board and the International fears we have the mass of the workers behind us in our fight against them—and they are right. The rank and file are at last awakening.

New York, June 30 Louis Hyman,
Chairman of the Joint Action Committee, Locals 2, 9, and 22, International Ladies' Garment Workers Union

Books

Wedlock

By WARD MOORE

Oh, Sorrow slipped into my bed
Some short time ago,
And now I'm wedded strong to her
As tears are wed to woe.

Oh, Sorrow makes a goodly wife
Who warms my bed for me;
She does not nag, nor shrew, nor scold
Nor wish that she were free.

And every night I lie with her
(Her skin is soft as lace).
But sometimes in the dreadful dawn
The mask slips from her face.

And I am wedded fast to her
And she is kind to me,
So Sorrow is my own true wife
And never shall I be free.

First Glance

IT would be absurd to pass upon the accuracy of Jean Jacques Brousson's reporting in "Anatole France Himself: A Boswellian Record" (Lippincott: $5). For there would be the assumption that one knew what kind of man Anatole France was—and therefore could decide how closely his secretary for eight years had come to comprehending him. It is certainly possible, however, to say that M. Brousson himself has produced an interesting book. He shows the Master getting out of bed and choosing which of his hundreds of caps he shall wear this morning; scolding Josephine or being scolded by her; hating to go to work but being driven to it; fretting with his secretary over a lost note to "Joan of Arc"; puddling among his papers; walking out to a book-stall; bantering old ladies and young men; flattering all of his callers with equal unscrupulousness and skill; pausing to indulge in a reminiscence or an epigram; and always, always talking. The stream of talk as M. Brousson directs it is a beautiful, leaping thing. And some of M. Brousson's paraphrases have a genius of their own. It is the secretary who says: "Modesty is only found in the badly made." It is Mr. Brousson, after all, who tells the incomparable story of the Nevers dish. If one tires of anything in the account it is of the adulation—which was perhaps inevitable. The word "Master" is capitalized once too often; references to the hero's fame become superfluous before so very long; and his basking in that fame even though he smile a little cynically as he purrs, cannot always be contemplated with the pleasure which M. Brousson finds in it.

The net result of the book is to render Anatole France in something like a unique image. To that extent it convinces, since its subject, being great, was of course unique. Two other modern writers distinguished for their wit have recently been disclosed with something approaching the intimacy of M. Brousson's pages. And how hopelessly they differ! Mark Twain's "Autobiography," dictated from bed or from the front porch, is quite as miscellaneous and quick as this. But it is sentimental, or it is raw, or it is more than sufficiently strong in its passages of denunciation. Anatole France, with his weaker artistic constitution but his infinitely subtler education, finishes off Chateaubriand, Napoleon, or the Academy with just the proper degree of exaggeration. His rage is perfectly translated; one knows that he passed to his grave daintily, with no blood anywhere upon him—and one knows that the American still growls beneath the ground. Or take Archibald Henderson's "Table-Talk of G. B. S." It, too, is a miscellany; it, too, is alive in every line. But Shaw is serious. Imagine him deciding that he had passed his life "twisting dynamite into curl-papers." Imagine him refusing to doubt a saint's legend because it was beautiful. Imagine him tolerating bores in order to laugh at them and finally loving them because laughter is lovable. Imagine him admitting with joy that "Ideas pass; but rhetoric is eternal." Imagine him thinking it worth while to say with a haggard face: "I have never been happy for one day, not for a single hour." If M. Brousson has done nothing else he has demonstrated once and for all that another Anatole France is impossible—and even undesirable. For Anatole France combined lust and irony and laughter as no one else needs to combine them. His distinction is that any more of him would have been—will be—too much.

MARK VAN DOREN

An Autobiographical Libel

Seventy Years of Life and Labor. By Samuel Gompers. E. P. Dutton and Company. 2 volumes. $10.

FOR the good of his own memory it would have been far better if Samuel Gompers had never written these twelve hundred pages. His life touched almost every phase of American society significantly during a significant half century. But he spent his rich experience generously; he was too busy to gather a residue of pensiveness, to save a bit of irony for his old age, to indulge now and then in the small luxury of reminiscence. He lived too eagerly and he labored so strenuously that he had no chance to develop a real philosophy either of life or of labor. He had time for no more than shrewdness, whose increment in the course of a double generation endowed him with autocracy over all powers which in the rough and tumble of his life passed for wisdom. He was simple in mind, elemental in his passions, incorruptible, extraordinarily human, and selflessly cunning. But there is one thing he never was. He never was civilized. The very virtues which made him such an excellent chieftain during the frontier period of American labor were not of the kind which, in old age, ripen into the serenity of opinion, but rather into the bigotry of opinionatedness. He fought a good battle, which convinced him that he fought wisely. It never occurred to him that he fought so effectively because he was blind to defeat, because he had a naive astigmatism to everything but his own self-righteousness, mainly because he was admirably adjusted to the savageries of American capital and the primitiveness of American labor during his era. In the twilight of his life and his epoch his social astigmatism blinded him almost completely. It was then that his Mephisto whispered to him: Let's write an autobiography! He did not even bother to mock old Sam between the lines. He censored the first volume so pitilessly that only here and there the idealism of young Gompers managed to break through. And the second volume the devil wrote all by himself.

On January 13, 1874, when Gompers was twenty-four, he witnessed the "Tompkins Square outrage," when the unemployed of New York City were clubbed and dispersed for protesting against an intolerable industrial famine. "His blood surged in indignation at the brutality of the police." But the surge quickly ebbed. "As the fundamentals [sic] came to me, they became guideposts for my understanding of the labor movement for years to come." The "fundamentals" pointed the danger of all "entangling alliances" with "intellectuals" and "radicals" who, he erroneously believed, had provoked the demonstration; they pointed to strictly separatist craft unionism, seeking more money, less work, and better jobs. For forty years history seemed to prove his revelation inspired. His long and brilliant struggle for trade unionism founded American labor. But his correlative struggle against the "intellectuals" and the "radicals" deprived our labor movement of intellectual content and bereft it of an indigenous radical development with which to face the changing world. The hierarchy of "union-card" holders, who perform intellectual labor for which they have not the slightest training, is steadily weakening our labor movement in its struggle with the increasing expertness of capital. It edits a half-illiterate, dull, uninformed, and unread trade-union press, whose main function is to defend the intrenched officialdom of labor. This has been the "anti-intellectualist" policy of Gompersism for a long half-century, and it is still true of the broad masses of our English-speaking unions. Half of the autobiography is moved by Gompers's hatred of the "intellectuals" lest they pervert "our movement." And he knew so little about international labor that he never realized that no labor movement anywhere has ever outgrown its infancy without the "intellectuals."

His anti-"radical" mania, which long preceded Bolshevism, so withered American labor that today ours is the only important labor movement without a natural left wing, and this accounts for its crippled flight. Gompers's bigotry against "intellectualism" and "radicalism"—words which he used synonymously—robbed American labor of the spirit of constructive self-criticism and revision.

Gompers's strength lay in his pugnacity, in his capacity for giving and taking punishment; and especially in the intuitive cleverness of the tactics and counter-tactics with which he built the American Federation of Labor. But about his real virtuosity he is most discreet. He mentions coyly the way he maneuvered, decades ago, his friend Strasser into the presidency of the New York Cigarmakers' Local, leaving the reader under the impression that this about covered the extent of his political machinations. Yet he did not need to be ashamed of the way he played the great game of labor. It never was dirty. It never was sinister. It was the essence of his genius. But the Gompers of the later National Civic Federation, who dictated these reminiscences, was too conventional to be proud of the real Gompers, especially of the earlier days.

In the first volume the militant Gompers does break through. In the second volume we get only the militarist Gompers: the Gompers of "Capitol Hill," of the right wing of the National Civic Federation, of the American Legion. The war unbalanced him. From 1915 to 1922 he never spoke but he shrieked. "In August [1915] there occurred the first big strike of munition workers in Bridgeport, Connecticut. . . . I knew that the Germans had found some labor representatives who were not honest [sic] and loyal [sic]. . . ." He broke the strike.

In August, 1918, Gompers made his pathetic journey to Europe. By that time European labor, in all its wings, had begun to tire of the slaughter for undifferentiable ideals. Gompers's reaction reached a pathological pitch; his ego swelled to fantastic proportions. He bamboozled himself into believing that for the time being he had assumed the leadership of European labor and that he was directing it into Clemenceau channels. He attended the Inter-Allied Labor Conference in Westminster. "When on the third day it was time for me to assume leadership . . . I did so with precision and force. That our work was effective was evident when . . . Arthur Henderson went to John Frey and begged him to intercede with me not to make his humiliation too great." Poor old Gompers! Henderson did speak to Frey, but only because he wanted to save Gompers from his own humiliating claptrap. Labor leaders all over Europe were beginning to laugh at the old man. They did not know the history of American labor, and they marveled that a man of Gompers's naive limitations could be its leader. For the rest of the trip Gompers dined with royalty, generals, and war ministers, and told the continental labor leaders in their own meetings "tersely" that they were "traitors."

After the war, circumstances forced him once more to return to the old struggles against injunctions and open-shop drives. But the mischief of his misunderstanding of the war could not be so easily undone. Within a few short years the A. F. of L. lost more than 1,000,000 members. Still, the fates permitted him to die as a labor leader, in harness, and not as a catspaw for jingoism.

This libelous autobiography is not a fair guide to his seventy years of life and labor. Gompers was full of faults. But in spite of them he did more to lift a considerable portion of the American people to a higher standard and plane of living than the whole social-reform movement, though it swarmed with "finer" characters than he. He had that one most precious quality which they so sadly lacked: he was willing to hit hard and to take the same punishment. He was the most incorruptible figure of his long generation, not merely in the cheap sense that he was unpurchasable (which, after all, is not very much of a virtue) but in that rarest sense that he did not mind the enmity even of those whose good-will he craved, if their enmity was unavoidable by his convictions. He often bargained, but he never trimmed.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

Reparations

The Reparation Plan. An Interpretation of the Reports of the Expert Committees Appointed by the Reparation Commission, November 30, 1923. By H. G. Moulton, with the Aid of the Council and Staff of the Institute of Economics. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $2.50.

UNTIL 1923 it was the general belief that there could not be a genuine settlement of the reparation problem as long as the Allies demanded payment in gold or in exchanges: practically all difficulties might be overcome if Germany were allowed to pay her reparation debt by deliveries in kind and by sending skilled workers into the devastated regions. Mr. Moulton, director of the Washington Institute of Economics, deserves great credit for having destroyed this fallacy in his well-known book, "Germany's Capacity to Pay." He succeeded, indeed, in convincing the world that the method of reparation payment was unessential and that all reparation payments (in cash, deliveries in kind, manual labor) are impossible as long as Germany has not a corresponding excess of paid exports over imports. This idea has also been unconditionally adopted by the expert committees and constitutes the basis of their proposals and of the London Agreement.

Every student of the reparation problem, therefore, looked forward with the greatest interest to Mr. Moulton's analysis and criticism of the experts' reports. These expectations have in no way been deceived. Mr. Moulton presents with crystal clearness the fundamental ideas of the experts' proposals and thereby of the London Agreement. He emphasizes the progress involved in the so-called Dawes Plan, he recognizes the transfer committee as the most important as well as the most ingenious part of the whole scheme, and he fully approves of the new bank and of the foreign loan suggested; but he mercilessly exposes the weak points in the arguments and conclusions of the experts. Their analysis of the German budget, he shows, is confused and sometimes contradictory. Their discussion of the capacity of the railroads and industries to furnish funds for reparation purposes is even less adequate. The various sources of revenue suggested by the committee are occasionally antagonistic, each source having been considered separately without much reference to the effect upon alternative sources of revenue. Mr. Moulton thinks that the committee's real contribution lies in its emphasis upon the necessity (1) of recognizing the interrelation of the currency, the budget, and the international balance of payments; (2) of establishing sound financial and economic conditions in Germany; and (3) of administering the plan as an indivisible unit.

There still remain unsettled some aspects of the reparation problem which, according to Mr. Moulton, must be promptly adjusted if the valuable work of the Expert Committees shall not have been in vain: the total sum to be paid by Germany should be fixed and a date should be stated for terminating the operation of the plan; the value of the amount thus far paid by Germany should be determined (by another committee of experts); the inter-Allied debt problem should be conceived in different terms from heretofore, and definitely settled.

"The Reparation Plan" contains passages which neither Americans nor Frenchmen nor Germans will enjoy. But is it not a good proof of its impartiality that this book not only attracted intense attention in America, but was immediately translated into German and into French?

R. R. KUCZYNSKI

Indicting a Section

The Southern Oligarchy. An Appeal in Behalf of the Silent Masses of Our Country Against the Despotic Rule of the Few. By William H. Skaggs. The Devin-Adair Company. $5.

MR. SKAGGS brings a terrific indictment against his native South. It is ruled by an unenlightened oligarchy; the people are partisan and prejudiced and easily scared by the bugbear of Negro domination; the voters seldom vote; illiteracy makes the people victims of designing demagogues; the South is the land of lynch law, the Ku Klux Klan, and the chain-gang, of hookworm, child labor, and political corruption; it has the most appalling record of crime in the world and "may be called the nursery of crimes in America"; it is economically backward and financially dependent and has a less creditable debt-paying record than Haiti; it even failed in its duty during the World War—in short, it is a menace to the nation.

Now, who is responsible? The oligarchy, or, in other words, the Democratic Party of the South, which because of the failure of reconstruction has been "able to perpetuate its power by misleading the people and appealing to sectional prejudice and racial animosities." For the past forty years it has misruled the South, and at times, notably during the Wilson Administration, it has controlled the nation. And "during the Wilson Administration this provincial oligarchy was a greater menace to democratic institutions than the slave oligarchy was under the Buchanan Administration."

Though much of the book is sensible [illegible] able, notably the discussions of the dormant ballot, the fee system, the chain-gang, and education, and the comparison of wealth and tax-paying in [illegible] Northern States. Yet every discussion is colored by the author's desire to ascribe social and economic shortcomings to political causes for which the Democrats are responsible. Then, too, he relies too much upon quotations of opinion from other writers and from newspapers which he has not assimilated into a coherent account. In places we have only a scrap-book collection of testimony for the prosecution, with the charge not clearly stated. Though Mr. Skaggs may know of serious defects in Southern life and character, he has not shown them up clearly enough. He is not strong in history, economics, or politics, and is therefore a poor interpreter of conditions which he sees but does not fully understand. He is too anxious to tar and feather the Democratic lawyer-politicians. For example, they were guilty of the "gross and stupendous frauds of the Wilson Administration"; the scalawags were the "antecedents of the leading spoilsmen under the Wilson regime"; the greater the hookworm infection the larger the Democratic vote, and so on.

The author was evidently a part of that about which he writes. His book reflects, it would seem, the state of mind of one whose political views trace back from the Republicanism of today through the "Jeffersonian Democracy" and the Populism of the nineties to the conservative democracy of the eighties, perhaps even to Whig connections. If Mr. Skaggs had written of his own experiences and observations the result must have been more interesting and valuable. In the role of an interpreter he is not successful.

WALTER L. FLEMING

The Case for Self-Sacrifice

The Rector of Wyck. By May Sinclair. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IT is impossible to indulge in self-sacrifice without great loss to one's integrity. Such has been the contention in May Sinclair's fiction from the beginning. This book is a departure. John Crawford and his wife, Matty, live a life of Christian self-sacrifice, and they achieve a far greater nobility of character, one feels, than they could have achieved in any other way.

Matty as a young girl hates clergymen. She desires the intellectual life which her sister Susan lives with her clever husband, Philip Atwater. But Matty falls in love with John when he is playing tennis; so she does not know until afterward that he is a man with a high waistcoat and a little round hat. But she marries him and bears the burdens in his parish of Wyck for thirty-one years. And the people love her.

They have two children, Millicent, the daughter, and Derek, the son. Millicent becomes a relentless saver of souls and goes to practice in St. Ursula's Settlement near Limehouse. She has little real human sympathy. She loves the reflection of herself in the mirror of Limehouse. When her father is ill she cannot leave her work in London to come down to Wyck. But when her mother dies she is on deck to pick up garments for the poor. As a matter of course she takes the vicuna shawl that, because of its association with Matty, the rector loves. Millicent is petulant when her father rescues the shawl. With such sentimental weakness she has no sympathy. But her father buys the shawl for £2 and Millicent is appeased.

Derek is weaker. He remains in Wyck and sacrifices himself to his parents. To escape the boredom he takes to drink. On a visit home Millicent discovers his [illegible] making a farmer of him. The new occupation is on the way to making a man of Derek when August, 1914, intervenes; the young man returns from Australia, where he has been raising sheep, and the war, with his death, in 1915, makes him a hero.

John Crawford, the clergyman, represents the other side of the coin which we saw in "The Cure of Souls," where the Canon Chamberlain was so clearly portrayed with all the vices which the Rector of Wyck has not and with none of the virtues which he has. At the end of the book John Crawford is bent in the service of Christ. He is tempted to think unkindly of Millicent's selfishness, but he remembers that she is a noble young woman, who is doing more good in the world than he is because she goes out to save the prostitutes of Limehouse.

As in "The Cure of Souls" we had Miss Lambert in love with the rector, so here we have Miss Minchin, about forty, in love with John Crawford. Everybody knows it, especially Matty. The rector himself knows it, faces it, and diverts the malice of frustrated love into channels less human and more Christian. Under the mild rebuke of the rector Miss Minchin does pretty well. If she fails, as when she takes young Derek home of evenings and feeds him sloe gin, it is not that she wants to fail in her love for the rector; but there is the direct appeal of the boy himself, and she in this obsessional way is attacking her natural enemy, the rector's wife.

"The Rector of Wyck" is in the spare tradition of "Harriet Frean" and "Anne Severn and the Fieldings." Some readers may deplore Miss Sinclair's economy; but her economy is a result of the perfecting of her art. For, in few words, and with dialogue, she can put the breath of life into her people. A more elaborate analysis was doubtless needed when Miss Sinclair tried to tell us about Rannie in "The Combined Maze." But we see as deeply into the youth Derek's life in this book as we do into Rannie's life; Derek's maladjustments are made clear in a few short dramatic episodes. Miss Sinclair seems to be growing more and more in the direction of the drama.

ANGUS BURRELL.

Mr. Hardy

Life of Thomas Hardy. By Ernest Brennecke, Jr. Greenberg, Publisher, Inc. $5.

Thomas Hardy's Universe. By Ernest Brennecke, Jr. Small, Maynard and Company. $3.

Life and Art. By Thomas Hardy. Edited by Ernest Brennecke, Jr. Greenberg, Publisher, Inc. $3.50.

FROM these three volumes, two of which deal with the work and the life of Thomas Hardy and one of which is a collection of his papers appearing for the first time in book form, the reader expects a fairly rounded presentation. Particularly in the "Life" would one look for the significant facts and determining influences of Hardy's career. But the volume is disappointingly thin on this score. Ostensibly a biography, it is in reality a companion volume to Mr. Brennecke's earlier book, "Thomas Hardy's Universe," and for the most part it merely fills in the facts surrounding the publication of Hardy's writings. True, a portion of the book yields specific biographical notes, but these are too meager or conceived too fantastically to afford any searching interpretation of the man. Also, the proportions are somewhat mishandled. Mr. Brennecke's attempt to suggest Hardy's spiritual background by an excursus into the geology and prehistory of a certain bit of English soil strikes one as far-fetched. As a suggestion it might have proved illuminating; as an exposition of the temperament of Hardy in terms of a physical background it proves inadequate and tiresome.

In his effort to disengage the underlying philosophic thought which gives form and coherence to Mr. Hardy's universe, Mr. Brennecke seems to err on the side of too great explicitness. Had he observed the caution Mr. Hardy himself suggests for interpreting the doctrines of the cosmic intelligences, as being "but tentative, and advanced with little eye to a systematized philosophy," his presentation might have come nearer to the view he seeks to define. Hardy is first and foremost an artist, and Shakespeare-like rather singular in that a well-defined sense of life informs the entire body of his work, yet to expect the same rounded perfection in him which one may look for in the work of a philosopher is to miss his flavor. Doubtless this makes clear certain disproportions in emphasis in Mr. Brennecke's presentation; though "Thomas Hardy's Universe" as a whole does give a lucid statement of a very important aspect of the novelist's work.

Mr. Brennecke has it that a close connection subsists between Hardy's view of things and Schopenhauer's, and he proceeds to trace the similarity, particularly as it is exemplified in "The Dynasts," the work which voices Hardy's maturest approach. Perhaps at this point, where Mr. Brennecke's concern is to show the kinship of the poet to the philosopher, the rather detailed consideration of Schopenhauer is not amiss. But the constant harking back to him at every new phase becomes somewhat wearisome and not a little irrelevant. A more serious objection is that it breaks the continuity. Mr. Brennecke's theme is Hardy's universe, not a comparison with Schopenhauer. Once the relation between the two men is made clear, it becomes supererogatory to preface each heading with a review of Schopenhauer in a similar category. A poet is a poet to the last, and one cannot and one does not expect consistency.

John Middleton Murry's summary statement of Hardy's development, as "passing from rebellion to acceptance," seems to seize its essence better than Mr. Brennecke's painstaking analysis does. In his preoccupation with terminology the latter has missed the subtler thread, which is to confuse the groundwork with the drift of it all. Unquestionably acceptance does somehow emerge, despite reiterated questionings and rebellions and outbursts against the harshness inherent in all life. The strains of a more buoyant outlook but gain an added richness in a symphony where the harsh is so often sounded. Mr. Brennecke's emphasis is so largely on an unconscious purpose that he fails to give sufficient weight to certain compensatory aspects. Not that the former is subordinate; but though in bulk a particular aspect may not loom so large, it may, by very contrast, be granted as great a significance in the total estimate of a man's work. An entering wedge in Hardy's generally deterministic attitude makes for a kindlier order of things. An insistence on the more somber aspect still fails to give the inwardness of the trend. There is a truth which goes deeper than mere factual adherence, and this Mr. Brennecke has somehow missed.

A phrase from the essays, notes, and letters may be more illuminating than the most careful analysis. The trenchant expression of these papers strengthens what one had come to view as the spirit of Thomas Hardy. That mixture in him of clear-eyed vision and tenderness, together with a turn for the humorous which can soften the harshest observable fact, is as apparent in his briefest letter as in his novels and poems. The poem "Epitaph" or the letter on recognition of authors by the state suggests a whole philosophy—by some called "pessimism," though "meliorism" accords more with its drift.

FRANCES DUBLIN

How to Be Happy

How to Be Free and Happy. By Bertrand Russell. The Rand School of Social Science. 75 cents.

THOSE who espouse philosophical idealism have long argued its exclusive theoretical adequacy to the great issues, revealed in its exalted if tenuous ideas of Life, Mind, and God. These champions of faith have fought realism and naturalism very much, after all, on Fichte's ground that such doctrines are a sign of moral worthlessness or of debased or lost ideals. Mr. Russell has been felt by them to be first of all perverse, and this feeling has inspired a sort of veiled warning against his pragmatic logic and his teachings in general.

Mr. Russell here answers his critics. Speaking to a youthful audience under so-called radical auspices, he may be excused for his apparent forgetfulness of the needs of civilization whose portentously gray, devouring industrialism he has frequently remarked. His lecture is a brief homily from the well-worn New Testament text on the value of idleness, most effectively preached by this superhumanly active genius of thought whose single early book on Leibniz would, in many a scholarly career, shine as a crowning glory. The lecture no doubt stirred and warmed his young hearers. For his older and more timid readers among hostile philosophers it may have another sort of significance, a sad one perhaps, since it furnishes the single damning negative instance which would suffice to refute their universal proposition that only philosophical idealists can quite truly have ideals. It exhibits an uncompromising devotee of scientific method cherishing ideals of the Christian gospels, unconventional personal attachments, indiscreet and open love of fellow-men, and no prudent thought for the morrow, and actually preaching these hopelessly impractical precepts to the youth of the land.

But one cannot answer these critics, after all; for they may now take Bertrand Russell as one more example to show that any philosopher, however radical he may be at the start, will in the end, if he is genuinely concerned with thought and with the conduct of men's lives, turn idealist. Doubtless the lecture does remind us how incorrigibly idealistic any radical of long standing must be, but we should be loath to see Mr. Russell's hard-fought battle for clear and honest thinking, no matter whether it involve pluralism or naturalism or atomism or materialism or socialism or radicalism or no ism at all—we should be loath to see this unfettered thinking appropriated by his critics as a phase of idealism itself. Perhaps we need not fear, however; for not even Christian orthodoxy has been able to digest the hardy ideals of the founder it claims, and Mr. Russell, being really a thinker, will no doubt remain a disconcerting rebel until the day when it is discovered that he has become an established philosophical tradition.

D. W. Prall

Books in Brief

The Best Stories of Sarah Orne Jewett. Selected and Arranged with a Preface by Willa Cather. Houghton Mifflin Company. 2 vols. $4.

Miss Cather's selection of "The Country of the Pointed Firs" and eleven shorter stories should—along with her preface—do much to rehabilitate this modest mistress of New England narrative.

Poems of Thirty Years. By Gordon Bottomley. London: Constable and Company. 21 shillings.

Uniform with Mr. Bottomley's two volumes of poetic dramas, this volume preserves the poet's choice of all the verse which he has published, and entitles him to the claim of being one of the most admirable, if not one of the most exciting, of contemporary English poets.

H. G. Wells. By Ivor Brown. Henry Holt and Company. $1. Bernard Shaw. By Edward Shanks. Henry Holt and Company. $1.

Rather feeble additions to the interesting Brandt series called "Writers of the Day."

The Nineteenth of April, 1775. By Harold Murdock. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

A most agreeable monograph, dealing, apparently, with all the ascertainable facts concerning the first battle of the American Revolution.

Martial. The Twelve Books of Epigrams. Translated by J. A. Pott and F. A. Wright. $5. Choderlos de Laclos. Dangerous Acquaintances. Translated by Richard Aldington. La Mare de Maupassant. Pen Pictures in Miniature. Translated by H. Ashton. $3. Sir Thomas More. The Utopia. Translated by Ralph Robinson. Francis Lord Bacon. The New Atlantis. The whole edited by H. Goitein. $3. Buddhist Birth-Stories. Translated by T. W. Rhys Davids. $3. E. P. Dutton and Company.

Five new volumes in the infinitely varied series of Broadway Translations.

Fish and Actors. By Graham Sutton. Brentano's. $2.

The business of carrying dramatic entertainment to the people has evolved beyond the barnstorming era in most corners of the earth, but not in rural Ireland. There a childlike public, unspoiled by movies or by little theaters subsidized by the socially aspiring, awaits the coming of troupes whose repertories are as diverse as their finances are wabbly. Mr. Sutton has set down the history of their hardships and misadventures in a series of amusing stories, in which types have been closely observed and sympathetically interpreted. He evidently knows the "fit-up" actor, as he is called, offstage and on, and his pen has caught him at many angles.

Early Tudor Composers. By William H. Grattan Flood. Oxford University Press. $1.20.

Brief lives of thirty-two English composers between 1485 and 1555—the great period which is now at last receiving the attention it merits from scholars in music.

Figures of the Passion of Our Lord. By Gabriel Miró. Translated from the Spanish Figuras de la Passión del Señor, by C. J. Hogarth. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Miró occupies in Spanish literature a position somewhere between Azorín and Valle Inclán; which is as much as to say that he is a decadent Spaniard (the term is almost self-contradictory) with a flair for the nostalgic grayness of pictorial beauty, softly colored by the half-tones of dying day. His Figures, beautifully translated by Mr. Hogarth, are not characteristic of his work. They are a strange mixture of a remarkable erudition and a decadent aestheticism, whence emerges the picture of a Jesus very different from the Christ of the Christian legend, or the Son of God of the theologians. Miró succeeds quite well in reconstructing—for all the extraneous trappings of mood and color with which he loads his prose—the personality of that Essene prophet, contemporary of Herod and Pontius Pilatus, who possessed the faith of a mystic, the candor of a child, and the love of a man who could suffer intensely the pains of those among whom he moved. Printed in Caslon Old Face, and exquisitely bound, the book itself is a work of art to be treasured independently of its contents.

The Story of Illinois. By Theodore Calvin Pease. Chicago: A. C. McClurg. $2.50.

Of all the States Illinois is best supplied with a competent history. The five-volume "Centennial History" of a few years back was written by competent scholars and illustrates the value of State history as a part of the national story. The second volume of that work was written by Mr. Pease. His new book is a model of organization under such chapter titles as The French Regime, The Days of the Briton, The Struggle for the Northwest, and Economic and Social Readjustment. The displacement of the French settlers, the defeat of the British ambitions, and the triumph of the persistent American frontier policy constitute a dramatic and impressive narrative. No less interesting is the story of political, social, and economic advance since the admission of the State in 1818. Mr. Pease concludes with a succinct account of agriculture, good roads, foreign elements in the population, educational institutions, libraries, and Illinois poets. The book is more readable than the usual compilation work of its kind.

THEATER

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
466 GRAND ST.
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

China and the Washington Conference

IN the present disturbances in China reference is constantly made to the so-called "Ten Points" presented in behalf of China at the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments in 1921, and to the agreements subsequently adopted by the Powers. The "Ten Points," presented by Mr. V. K. Wellington Koo at the first session of the Committee on Pacific and Far Eastern Questions on November 16, 1921, were as follows:

THE TEN POINTS

The Chinese Government proposes for the consideration of and adoption by the conference the following general principles to be applied in the determination of the questions relating to China:

1. (a) The Powers engage to respect and observe the territorial integrity and political and administrative independence of the Chinese Republic.

(b) China upon her part is prepared to give an undertaking not to alienate or lease any portion of her territory or littoral to any Power.

2. China, being in full accord with the principle of the so-called open door or equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations having treaty relations with China, is prepared to accept and apply it in all parts of the Chinese Republic without exception.

3. With a view to strengthening mutual confidence and maintaining peace in the Pacific and Far East, the Powers agree not to conclude between themselves any treaty or agreement directly affecting China or the general peace in these regions without previously notifying China and giving to her an opportunity to participate.

4. All special rights, privileges, immunities, or commitments, whatever their character or contractual basis, claimed by any of the Powers in or relating to China, are to be declared, and all such or future claims not so made known are to be deemed null and void. The rights, privileges, immunities and commitments, now known or to be declared, are to be examined with a view to determining their scope and validity and, if valid, to harmonizing them with one another and with the principles declared by this conference.

5. Immediately or as soon as circumstances will permit, existing limitations upon China's political, jurisdictional, and administrative freedom of action are to be removed.

6. Reasonable, definite terms of duration are to be attached to China's present commitments which are without time limits.

7. In the interpretation of instruments granting special rights or privileges, the well-established principle of construction that such grants shall be strictly construed in favor of the grantors is to be observed.

8. China's rights as a neutral are to be fully respected in future wars to which she is not a party.

9. Provision is to be made for the peaceful settlement of international disputes in the Pacific and the Far East.

10. Provision is to be made for future conferences to be held from time to time for the discussion of international questions relative to the Pacific and the Far East, as a basis for the determination of common policies of the signatory Powers in relation thereto.

Two days later Mr. Koo, in explaining the Chinese request for tariff autonomy (regarded as part of the fifth "point"), gave a summary of Chinese tariff history, reported as follows in the official minutes of the conference:

CHINA'S TARIFF HISTORY

Prior to the year 1842 China had enjoyed the full right of fixing her customs duties. But in that year [following the so-called Opium War] and in the subsequent years she had made treaties with Great Britain, France, and the United States in which, for the first time, a limitation was imposed on this full right. The rule of 5 per cent ad valorem was thereby established, and later a schedule was fixed upon the basis of the current prices then prevailing. In the years preceding 1858 prices began to drop, and the 5 per cent customs duty collected appeared consequently to be in excess of the 5 per cent prescribed. A revision was therefore asked for by the Treaty Powers and was effected in 1858. From that time until 1902, however, as prices mounted and the Chinese Government had been receiving less than the 5 per cent rate, no request was made on the part of the Treaty Powers for a revision. If the Chinese Government did not at that time press for a revision, it was only because the needs of the Government were then comparatively few and the revenues collected, small as they were, were not inadequate to meet the requirements.

It was only in 1902, as a result of the Boxer uprising, that another revision was made with a view to raising sufficient revenue to meet the newly imposed obligations arising out of the Protocol of 1901. In that tariff, however, the rates were calculated on the basis of the average prices of 1897-1899, the then prevailing prices not being taken into account. But the revenue collected according to this increased tariff was hardly sufficient to meet the obligations of the indemnity. In 1912 another attempt was made to revise the tariff in order to bring it more in accord with actual prices. It proved to be a failure, as the unanimous consent of some sixteen or seventeen Powers was not obtained. It was only after six years of protracted negotiation that another revision was effected in 1918. The purpose of this revision was to increase the rate to an effective 5 per cent, but the resulting tariff, which was now in force, yielded only 3½ per cent in comparison with the prices of commodities actually prevailing.

Mr. Koo asked on behalf of the Chinese Delegation for the recovery by China of the right to tariff autonomy. He said that, in the first place, the existing regime in China constituted an infringement of the Chinese sovereign right to fix the tariff rate at her own discretion—a right enjoyed by the states throughout the world.

Again, it deprived China of her power to make reciprocity arrangements with the Powers and ran counter to the principle of equality and mutuality. While foreign goods imported into China had to pay only 5 per cent as import tax, goods of Chinese origin imported into foreign countries had to pay customs duties of maximum rate. For instance, Chinese tea imported into the United Kingdom had to pay 1 shilling per pound, which meant 25 per cent, as the price there was about 4 shillings per pound; Chinese tobacco on importation into Japan had to pay 350 per cent; raw silk into Japan, 30 per cent; and manufactured silk into the United States, 35 to 60 per cent. Such a regime constituted a serious impediment to the Chinese export trade and to China's economic development.

Moreover, a uniform rate for all kinds of commodities, without latitude to differentiate rates between luxuries and necessaries, had obvious disadvantages. For example, it was evident that machinery and similar merchandise so much needed by China ought to pay a low rate, while, on the other hand, luxuries, such as cigars and cigarettes, should be more heavily taxed, as much for mitigating or preventing the injurious effects on the morals and social habits of the people from the use of these luxuries as for raising more revenue. The Chinese tariff was therefore not a scientific one, as it failed to take into consideration the economic and social, as well as the fiscal, needs of the Chinese people.

Continuing, Mr. Koo said that the present tariff caused a serious loss of revenue to the Chinese exchequer. Customs duties formed one of the most important sources of revenue of a country. Great Britain, for example, received 12 per cent out of her total revenue; France, 15 per cent; United States, 35 per cent. [This was the pre-war figure. It is less today.] The Chinese customs revenue, on the other hand, played, for nearly one hundred years, a comparatively insignificant part in the national revenue. Besides, a large part of China's customs revenue was pledged to meet various foreign loans secured thereon, and this fact again reduced the amount available for the needs of the Government.

Furthermore, under the existing customs regime it was exceedingly difficult to revise the tariff, even for the modest purpose of raising it to an effective 5 per cent. The revision of 1902 was the first revision in forty-four years, and the resulting tariff yielded only 2½ per cent in comparison with the market value of the imports, i. e., 2½ per cent less than what could have been collected if the tariff schedule had been revised to date. The revision of 1918, as was pointed out, was effected only after six years of negotiation, and being based on the average prices of 1912-1916, the new tariff of 1918 was yielding only 3½ per cent. But even an effective 5 per cent import tariff, which would probably produce an additional revenue of nearly 15,000,000 taels, might, however, still prove inadequate to meet the manifold needs of the Chinese Government, such as those for education, road building, sanitation, and public welfare.

In view of the foregoing reasons, Mr. Koo asked the Powers to agree to the restoration to China of her tariff autonomy.

The discussions of the Chinese question consumed far more of the time of the Washington Conference than did the provisions regarding limitation of armament; in the end two treaties and several resolutions, calling for subsequent action, were adopted. These the French Chamber has just belatedly ratified, but no action has been taken in the intervening three years and a half.

The first treaty adopted is a statement of principles.

The Nine-Power Treaty of Principles

The United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands and Portugal:

Desiring to adopt a policy designed to stabilize conditions in the Far East, to safeguard the rights and interests of China, and to promote intercourse between China and the other Powers upon the basis of equality of opportunity; . . . have agreed as follows:

Article I. The contracting Powers, other than China, agree:

1. To respect the sovereignty, the independence, and the territorial and administrative integrity of China;

2. To provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government;

3. To use their influence for the purpose of effectually establishing and maintaining the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China;

4. To refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly states, and from countenancing action inimical to the security of such states.

Art. II. The contracting Powers agree not to enter into any treaty, agreement, arrangement, or understanding, either with one another, or, individually or collectively, with any Power or Powers, which would infringe or impair the principles stated in Article I.

Art. III. With a view to applying more effectually the principles of the open door or equality of opportunity in China for the trade and industry of all nations, the contracting Powers, other than China, agree that they will not seek, nor support their respective nationals in seeking—

(a) any arrangement which might purport to establish in favor of their interests any general superiority of rights with respect to commercial or economic development in any designated region of China;

(b) any such monopoly or preference as would deprive the nationals of any other Power of the right of undertaking any legitimate trade or industry in China, or of participating with the Chinese Government, or with any local authority, in any category of public enterprise, or which by reason of its scope, duration, or geographical extent is calculated to frustrate the practical application of the principle of equal opportunity.

It is understood that the foregoing stipulations of this article are not to be so construed as to prohibit the acquisition of such properties or rights as may be necessary to the conduct of a particular commercial, industrial, or financial undertaking or to the encouragement of invention and research.

China undertakes to be guided by the principles stated in the foregoing stipulations of this article in dealing with applications for economic rights and privileges from governments and nationals of all foreign countries, whether parties to the present treaty or not.

Art. IV. The contracting Powers agree not to support any agreements by their respective nationals with each other designed to create spheres of influence or to provide for the enjoyment of mutually exclusive opportunities in designated parts of Chinese territory.

Art. V. China agrees that, throughout the whole of the railways in China, she will not exercise or permit unfair discrimination of any kind. In particular there shall be no discrimination whatever, direct or indirect, in respect of charges or of facilities on the ground of the nationality of passengers or the countries from which or to which they are proceeding, or the origin or ownership of goods or the country from which or to which they are consigned, or the nationality or ownership of the ship or other means of conveying such passengers or goods before or after their transport on the Chinese railways.

The contracting Powers, other than China, assume a corresponding obligation in respect of any of the aforesaid railways over which they or their nationals are in a position to exercise any control in virtue of any concession, special agreement or otherwise.

Art. VI. The contracting Powers, other than China, agree fully to respect China's rights as a neutral in time of war to which China is not a party; and China declares that when she is a neutral she will observe the obligations of neutrality.

Art. VII. The contracting Powers agree that, whenever a situation arises which in the opinion of any one of them involves the application of the stipulations of the present treaty, and renders desirable discussion of such application, there shall be full and frank communication between the contracting Powers concerned.

Art. VIII. Powers not signatory to the present treaty, which have governments recognized by the signatory Powers and which have treaty relations with China, shall be invited to adhere to the present treaty. To this end the Government of the United States will make the necessary communications to non-signatory Powers and will inform the contracting Powers of the replies received. Adherence by any Power shall become effective on receipt of notice thereof by the Government of the United States.

Art. IX. The present treaty shall be ratified by the contracting Powers in accordance with their respective constitutional methods and shall take effect on the date of the deposit of all the ratifications, which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible. The Government of the United States will transmit to the other contracting Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications. . . .

The second treaty dealt with the question of China's tariff, as follows:

THE NINE-POWER CUSTOMS TREATY

The United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I. The representatives of the contracting Powers having adopted, on the fourth day of February, 1922, in the City of Washington, a resolution, which is appended as an annex to this article, with respect to the revision of Chinese customs duties, for the purpose of making such duties equivalent to an effective 5 per centum ad valorem, in accordance with existing treaties concluded by China with other nations, the contracting Powers hereby confirm the said resolution and undertake to accept the tariff rates fixed as a result of such revision. The said tariff rates shall become effective as soon as possible but not earlier than two months after publication thereof.

Annex: With a view to providing additional revenue to meet the needs of the Chinese Government, the Powers represented at this Conference, namely, the United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal, agree:

That the customs schedule of duties on imports into China adopted by the Tariff Revision Commission at Shanghai on December 19, 1918, shall forthwith be revised so that the rates of duty shall be equivalent to 5 per cent effective, as provided for in the several commercial treaties to which China is a party.

A Revision Commission shall meet at Shanghai, at the earliest practicable date, to effect this revision forthwith and on the general lines of the last revision.

This commission shall be composed of representatives of the Powers above named and of representatives of any additional Powers having governments at present recognized by the Powers represented at this conference and who have treaties with China providing for a tariff on imports and exports not to exceed 5 per cent ad valorem and who desire to participate therein.

The revision shall proceed as rapidly as possible with a view to its completion within four months from the date of the adoption of this resolution by the conference on the Limitation of Armament and Pacific and Far Eastern Questions.

The revised tariff shall become effective as soon as possible, but not earlier than two months after its publication by the Revision Commission.

The Government of the United States, as convener of the present conference, is requested forthwith to communicate the terms of this resolution to the governments of Powers not represented at this conference, but who participated in the revision of 1918, aforesaid.

ART. II. Immediate steps shall be taken, through a special conference, to prepare the way for the speedy abolition of likin and for the fulfilment of the other conditions laid down in Article VIII of the Treaty of September 5, 1902, between Great Britain and China; in Articles IV and V of the Treaty of October 8, 1903, between the United States and China, and in Article I of the Supplementary Treaty of October 8, 1903, between Japan and China, with a view to levying the surtaxes provided for in those articles.

The special conference shall be composed of representatives of the signatory Powers, and of such other Powers as may desire to participate and may adhere to the present treaty, in accordance with the provisions of Article VIII, in sufficient time to allow their representatives to take part. It shall meet in China within three months after the coming into force of the present treaty, on a day and at a place to be designated by the Chinese Government.

ART. III. The special conference provided for in Article II shall consider the interim provisions to be applied prior to the abolition of likin and the fulfilment of the other conditions laid down in the articles of the treaties mentioned in Article II; and it shall authorize the levying of a surtax on dutiable imports as from such date, for such purposes, and subject to such conditions as it may determine.

The surtax shall be at a uniform rate of 2½ per centum ad valorem, provided, that in case of certain articles of luxury which, in the opinion of the special conference, can bear a greater increase without unduly impeding trade, the total surtax may be increased but may not exceed 5 per centum ad valorem.

ART. IV. Following the immediate revision of the customs schedule of duties on imports into China mentioned in Article I, there shall be a further revision thereof to take effect at the expiration of four years following the completion of the aforesaid immediate revision, in order to insure that the customs duties shall correspond to the ad valorem rates fixed by the special conference provided for in Article II.

Following this further revision there shall be, for the same purpose, periodical revisions of the customs schedule of duties on imports into China every seven years, in lieu of the decennial revision authorized by existing treaties with China.

In order to prevent delay, any revision made in pursuance of this article shall be effected in accordance with rules to be prescribed by the special conference provided for in Article II.

ART. V. In all matters relating to customs duties there shall be effective equality of treatment and of opportunity for all the contracting Powers.

ART. VI. The principle of uniformity in the rates of customs duties levied at all the land and maritime frontiers of China is hereby recognized. The special conference provided for in Article II shall make arrangements to give practical effect to this principle; and it is authorized to make equitable adjustments in those cases in which a customs privilege to be abolished was granted in return for some local economic advantage.

In the meantime, any increase in the rates of customs duties resulting from tariff revision, or any surtax hereafter imposed in pursuance of the present treaty, shall be levied at a uniform rate ad valorem at all land and maritime frontiers of China.

ART. VII. The charge for transit passes shall be at the rate of 2½ per centum ad valorem until the arrangements provided for by Article II come into force.

ART. VIII. Powers not signatory to the present treaty whose governments are at present recognized by the signatory Powers, and whose present treaties with China provide for a tariff on imports and exports not to exceed 5 per centum ad valorem, shall be invited to adhere to the present treaty.

The Government of the United States undertakes to make the necessary communications for this purpose and to inform the governments of the contracting Powers of the replies received. Adherence by any Power shall become effective on receipt of notice thereof by the Government of the United States.

ART. IX. The provisions of the present treaty shall override all stipulations of treaties between China and the respective contracting Powers which are inconsistent therewith, other than stipulations according most favored nation treatment.

ART. X. The present treaty shall be ratified by the contracting Powers in accordance with their respective constitutional methods and shall take effect on the date of the deposit of all the ratifications which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible. The Government of the United States will transmit to the other contracting Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications.

Resolutions were adopted to create a Board of Reference for Far Eastern Questions, looking to withdrawal of foreign armed forces in China, regarding radio stations, and railway matters. The most important resolutions in the present situation are that urging China to reduce her military forces and that dealing with the question of extraterritoriality.

THE EXTRATERRITORIALITY RESOLUTION

The representatives of the Powers hereinafter named, participating in the discussion of Pacific and Far Eastern questions in the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, to wit, the United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Portugal:

Having taken note of the fact that in the treaty between Great Britain and China dated September 5, 1902, in the treaty between the United States of America and China dated October 8, 1903, and in the treaty between Japan and China dated October 8, 1903, these several Powers have agreed to give every assistance toward the attainment by the Chinese Government of its expressed desire to reform its judicial system and to bring it into accord with that of Western nations, and have declared that they are also "prepared to relinquish extraterritorial rights when satisfied that the state of the Chinese laws, the arrangements for their administration, and other considerations warrant" them in so doing;

Being sympathetically disposed toward furthering in this regard the aspiration to which the Chinese Delegation gave expression on November 16, 1921, to the effect that "immediately or as soon as circumstances will permit, existing limitations upon China's political, jurisdictional and administrative freedom of action are to be removed";

Considering that any determination in regard to such action as might be appropriate to this end must depend upon the ascertainment and appreciation of complicated states of fact in regard to the laws and the judicial system and the methods of judicial administration of China, which this conference is not in a position to determine;

Have resolved

That the governments of the Powers above named shall establish a commission (to which each of such governments shall appoint one member) to inquire into the present practice of extraterritorial jurisdiction in China, and into the laws and the judicial system and the methods of judicial administration of China, with a view to reporting to the governments of the several Powers above named their findings of fact in regard to these matters, and their recommendations as to such means as they may find suitable to improve the existing conditions of the administration of justice in China, and to assist and further the efforts of the Chinese Government to effect such legislation and judicial reforms as would warrant the several Powers in relinquishing, either progressively or otherwise, their respective rights of extraterritoriality;

That the commission herein contemplated shall be constituted within three months after the adjournment of the conference in accordance with detailed arrangements to be hereafter agreed upon by the governments of the Powers above named, and shall be instructed to submit its report and recommendations within one year after the first meeting of the commission;

That each of the Powers above named shall be deemed free to accept or to reject all or any portion of the recommendations of the commission herein contemplated, but that in no case shall any of the said Powers make its acceptance of all or any portion of such recommendations either directly or indirectly dependent on the granting by China of any special concession, favor, benefit, or immunity, whether political or economic.

ADDITIONAL RESOLUTION

That the non-signatory Powers, having by treaty extraterritorial rights in China, may accede to the Resolution affecting extraterritoriality and the administration of justice in China by depositing within three months after the adjournment of the conference a written notice of accession with the Government of the United States for communication by it to each of the signatory Powers.

The Chinese Student Revolt

WHETHER the killing of unarmed Chinese students by the Shanghai foreign police was justified or not can best be judged by the testimony of witnesses and the widespread protests of foreign and Chinese groups. We reprint below a series of documents which give official and unofficial viewpoints. The following protest sent by the Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs to the senior Minister of the Powers is reprinted from the China Press of June 6:

A GOVERNMENT PROTEST

Concerning the bloody affair in Shanghai I had the honor to address Your Excellency on June 1 a note in which I begged you to give urgent and necessary instructions to the Consular authorities in Shanghai immediately to free the persons arrested and to act in concert with the Special Commissioner of Foreign Affairs there to hinder eventual return of similar cases.

Contrary to my expectation new reports of an inauspicious character continue to reach me according to which the police of the International Settlement on June 1 again fired on people, killing three and wounding eighteen, while the persons arrested have not all been freed. Other reports state that most of the victims were shot in the back without any agents of the police having been killed or wounded, which proves that the shooting was quite unjustified.

The violent attitude of the authorities of the International Concession has excited discontent among the general public which has created very grave consequences, notably declaration of strikes by merchants and workers in Shanghai.

From respect of the elementary principles of humanity, as the authorities of the International Concession are entirely responsible, I am forced to address again to Your Excellency the most energetic protests. Moreover, I beg Your Excellency to communicate without delay the most urgent instructions to the Consular authorities in Shanghai to order cessation immediately of the practice of firing in order to avoid further effusion of blood.

Translations of handbills distributed in Wuchang have been sent to The Nation by Harry F. Ward. The Chinese Kuomintang Party is the Nationalist Party founded by Sun Yat-sen; it has branches in other parts of the world wherever Chinese live. Circulars similar to the one printed below were distributed by the Student Union of Wuhan Center and the League of Communist Youth.

A WUCHANG CIRCULAR

A Circular to Inform All Our Fellow-Citizens About the Matter of Shanghai Foreigners of Different Nations Shooting and Capturing Freely Chinese Students and Laborers.

Urgent! Disaster is at hand!

Foreigners of different nations have joined together to encroach upon us and to massacre us! Students in Shanghai went to the International Concession to lecture because the Japanese ruthlessly killed a Chinese laborer and because the British and French people tried to enforce the cruel press law and the cruel increased wharf-duty. The foreigners refused to reason and fired at the students and killed 9 of them, wounded over 40, and captured 46. After that they called the foreign marines in order to demonstrate their power. Fellow-citizens, how ruthless, cruel, and barbarous an action this was! They are treating us Chinese worse than slaves, cattle, or insects. This is a heart-breaking affair!

The whole port of Shanghai is now on strike. All the shops have closed, all the laborers have stopped work, and all the schools have suspended classes in order to resist this barbarous action of the foreigners. Fellow-citizens in different professions, how do you feel about it? The foreigners of different nations have joined to oppress us Chinese. Is it possible for us to sit down and look at it indifferently? You must not say, that this is a matter in Shanghai, far remote from us. Shanghai is only the first to suffer. If we do not arise quickly and resist, the disaster will come to us and perhaps in a way more cruel than in Shanghai. Fellow-citizens in different professions, quickly arise!

Merchants, strike in the markets.
Laborers, strike in the factories.
Students, strike in the schools.
Resist the foreigners in unison.
Boycott the foreign goods.
Blockade the concessions.
Sever all relationship (with the foreigners).
Those who are serving the foreigners must stop work at once and sever relations with them.
Compel the foreigners to recognize all the demands of the citizens of Shanghai.
Take back the foreign concessions and the custom house and abolish the consular court and all the unequal treaties.
Oppose foreigners establishing factories in China.
Organize the crowd and call a Citizens' Assembly.
Arm the people of the nation and overthrow all imperialism.
Long live the citizens of China who are being oppressed.
Long live the Chinese race.

THE CHINESE KUOMINTANG PARTY,
Headquarters of the Second Section of the City of Wuchang, Hupeh Province

June 2

Foreign Protests

Many foreign groups issued protests against the Shanghai killing of Chinese students. Among these were the faculty of Yenching College, Peking, the Christian Schools in Peking, Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., and the American Board of Peking. We reprint the protest of the Y. M. C. A., issued on June 4, which with the others appeared in a special supplement of the Peking Leader:

THE Y. M. C. A. PROTEST

As Chinese and foreign members of the secretarial staff of the Peking Y. M. C. A., an organization which includes in its aims the promotion of international good-will and understanding, we desire to express our deep concern and regret over recent events in Shanghai in which a number of students were killed and others wounded by police of the International Settlement. As far as our knowledge goes this is the first time in the history of foreign and Chinese relations where unarmed Chinese students have been [illegible] foreign orders. From information not available, we see little evidence for concluding that the circumstances were such as to justify such extreme measures. While not necessarily approving of all the specific steps which the students are taking we do find ourselves in sympathy with their fundamental purpose to focus public attention on this question. We believe that if a wrong has been done every effort should be made to see that it is righted in so far as is now possible.

The first important step would seem to be to have a thorough investigation made of the whole affair. It would seem appropriate that such an investigation be carried out by a commission composed of persons who would inspire public confidence, jointly appointed by the Chinese Government and the foreign nations involved. We hope that early action may be taken to create such a commission, which shall have full power to carry on its work and make public its findings, together with recommendations for settlement.

Moreover, we would raise the question whether the time is not at hand when careful consideration should be given to the causes for the growing tension which we believe we sense in Chinese and foreign relations at the present time. We are the more concerned about the happening in Shanghai, as we believe it to be but an outward expression of a serious underlying condition of unrest and distrust. While we have no desire to make hasty proposals for the betterment of the existing situation, our interest in Christian brotherhood and international good-will prompts us to inquire whether certain treaties conferring special privileges upon foreigners and which are a constant source of embarrassment and humiliation to the Chinese people do not stand in need of revision in view of the march of events in China as well as in view of an emerging world conscience which is demanding that justice and fair play be substituted for the use of force in international affairs.

Statements made at the trial throw light upon the contention that the students were attacking; most of them, it appears, were shot in the back. The following excerpts are taken from the China Press [Shanghai] of June 11:

THE TRIAL

Evidence was taken during the morning from Chief Inspector Reeves and Sub-Inspector Everson.

Mr. A. Covey, a Shanghai lawyer, was called to give an eyewitness account of the shooting. He stated that he had not seen any acts of violence on the part of the students. He declared that the acts of the crowd were not typical of a mob.

Dr. W. S. New, in charge of Chinese Red Cross hospitals, declared he had examined six of the victims, and that four of them had been shot in the back.

In answer to questions of Dr. Mei, Inspector Everson said the attack on the police station could have been dispersed with a rear or flank attack from the police up to about 3:30 p. m., but after that force by arms was the only thing that would have quelled the riot. He stated that it had never occurred to him to get out the hose, but it would have been impossible when the attack came, as there was insufficient time.

The inspector further commented that if the crowd had been allowed to get among the carbines of the firing squad the police would have been at their mercy.

Magistrate Kwan at this point asked whether it would not have been possible to fire at the legs of the crowd. The inspector answered that this was against all orders. "I have instructions not to fire except as a last resort, but when firing, to shoot to kill."

He explained that it was against instructions to fire over the heads of the crowd, as this endangers the lives of innocent persons. The same applies to firing at their legs, as the bullets are apt to ricochet.

Mr. Sidney R. Anderson, assistant pastor of the Moore Memorial, gave his version of the affair from 2:40 p. m., when he went to the Wing On store and saw police arrest two students.

He said there was no resistance on the part of the 200 students.

[illegible] were doing nothing but blocking the traffic.

[illegible] violence.

[illegible] traffic just before the shots were fired, the whole mass was [illegible]

[illegible] minute until the whole street was cleared.

Questioned as to whether he thought the state of mind of the crowd was such as to take the station by force, the missionary said:

I certainly would have thought not. I saw no violence on the part of the students and would say that the police were absolutely unjustified in firing. I think that the crowd could have been scattered easily had a fire hose been applied.

During the whole time that I was among the mob I never heard the expression "Down with the foreigners," nor did I see any weapons among the crowd. I think that the students went to the station purely out of sympathy for their fellow-students.

Mr. Arthur Covey told of going down Nanking Road just as the shots were fired. He said that he never saw a weapon among the crowd and that the temper of the whole gathering was not one of mob violence. He said that as a whole they seemed cheerful and appeared to be watching the students.

Questioned by Dr. Mei he stated that he had seen a number of fighting mobs in action, but never had seen one that acted as quietly as did the one on Nanking Road on May 30.

Dr. W. S. New stated that following the incident four men had been admitted to the Tientsin Road Red Cross Hospital. Two of these, he said, had been shot in the back and he was unable to say whether or not the other two had been shot in the back, as they had only slight skin wounds.

Two others were admitted to the hospital June 1 and in both cases the bullets had entered from the back, he declared.

In expressing his sentiments regarding the affair, Dr. John W. Cline, former head of Soochow University, said: "I was not expecting to see the police fire, was shocked when they did fire, and have been sorry about it ever since."

He said that he was at the entrance to Louza police station when the volleys were fired, but for a moment could not believe that the police had not fired blank shells until the crowd melted away and he found himself in the midst of the dead and wounded.

He said he had not seen any actual acts of violence on the part of either the police or students previously to the shooting, but had concluded from their actions that they were not having a picnic.

There were no weapons used by the students, he said, and he had heard no cries of "Kill the foreigners". . . .

Contributors to This Issue

HARRY F. WARD, of Union Theological Seminary and the Methodist Federation for Social Service, has been lecturing in China for several months.

ROLLIN LYNDE HARTT, author of a study of Jesus called "The Man Himself," recently made an extended tour for the World's Work in which he visited the strongholds of fundamentalism.

HARVEY FERGUSSON was born in New Mexico. He was for some years a newspaperman in Washington, D. C., and has written three novels.

FRED L. HOLMES is managing editor of La Follette's Magazine.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, The Nation's dramatic critic, is a native of Knoxville, Tennessee.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG has recently returned from Illinois where he lectured on labor conditions to the United Mine Workers.

R. R. KUCZYNSKI has written many books on economic and statistical subjects and is now director of the German-French Economic Correspondence organization.

WALTER L. FLEMING is professor of history at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee.

FRANCES DUNCAN has made a study of Thomas Hardy.

ANGEL FLORES is a lecturer in English at Columbia University.

D. W. PRALL is a member of the philosophy department at the University of California.

J. Russell Smith's

NORTH AMERICA

Its People, Resources Development and Prospects as an Agricultural Industrial and Commercial Area

By the Professor of Economic Geography, Columbia University

"Without any exact parallel in economic literature — an attractive presentation of the facts such as will ensure for it the interest of both business men and general readers." —Boston Transcript.

410 Illustrations; 849 Pages; Price $6.00

John Palmer Gavit's

COLLEGE

"So well has he done his work that there is not a parent, not an undergraduate, not an alumnus, not a member of a college Faculty, not a college president in the United States, who will not find Mr. Gavit's book worth his time." —N. Y. Times. $2.00

Harcourt, Brace & Co., New York

NEW BOOKS
OF UNUSUAL BIOGRAPHICAL INTEREST

Sir HORACE SMITH-DORRIEN'S Memories of Forty-eight Years' Service.

Includes the story of his command in France. $5.00.

A PRIME MINISTER AND HIS SON.

Correspondence of the 3rd Earl of Bute, including his private letters from America during the War of Independence. $5.00

S. BARING-GOULD'S Further Reminiscences.

Including the story of Cabs, Jehu's Tool and Cabmen's Shelters, and "Draft Reminiscences." $5.00.

Dr. OSSENDOWSKI'S From President to Prison.

Further personal experiences in the Russian Revolution, as told to Dr. Ossendowski by Kerensky, Boris Savinkoff, and other leaders. $2.50.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Ave., N. Y.

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN

By WILFRID SCOTT-MONCRIEFF. A brief and clear exposition of the theory of evolution, with a discussion of the evidence for and against it. Cloth, 50 cents.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 341 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

Vacation Books Sent Post Free

Let us send them after you in one installment or serially throughout the summer. Our service reaches you wherever you may go. Write for our Summer Book List.

THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE
26 West 42nd Street, New York

H. L. Mencken on The Nation

(Reprinted from the Baltimore Evening Sun for July 6, 1925. Copyright the Evening Sun.)

WHAT the circulation of The Nation is I don't know. In the sixtieth anniversary number, issued last week, the present editor hinted that it is considerably above the maximum of 11,000 scored by his earliest predecessors. I have heard gabble in the saloons frequented by New York publishers that it runs to 30,000, 40,000, even 50,000. But no one, so far as I know, has ever suggested that it equals the circulation of even a third-rate daily paper. Such dull, preposterous sheets as the New York Telegram, the Washington Star, the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the Atlanta Constitution sell two or three times as many copies. Such magazines for the herd as True Stories, Liberty, Hot Dog and the Saturday Evening Post sell fifty times as many.

Nevertheless, if I were a fellow of public spirit and eager to poison the Republic with my sagacity, I'd rather be editor of The Nation than editor of any of the other journals that I have mentioned—nay, I'd rather be editor of The Nation than editor of all of them together, with every other newspaper and magazine in America, save perhaps four or five, thrown in. For The Nation is unique in American journalism for one thing: it is read by its enemies. They may damn it, they may have it barred from libraries, they may even—as they did during the war—try to have it put down by the police, but all the while they read it. That is, the more intelligent of them—the least hopeless minority of them. It is to such minorities that The Nation addresses itself, on both sides of the fence. It has penetrated to the capital fact that they alone count—that the ideas sneaked into them today will begin to sweat out of the herd day after tomorrow.

Is the Creel Press Bureau theory of the war abandoned? Is it impossible to find an educated man today who is not ashamed that he succumbed to the Wilson buncombe? Then thank The Nation for that deliverance, for when it tackled Wilson it tackled him alone. Is Coolidge headed for a grand debacle? Is the Golden Age beginning to be sicklied o'er with a pale cast of green? Then prepare to thank The Nation again, for it began to tell the harsh, cold truth about good Cal at a time when all the daily journals of America, with not ten exceptions, were competing for the honor of shining his shoes.

* * * * *

I OFTEN wonder that the great success of The Nation under Villard has made such little impression upon American journalists—that they are so deaf to the lessons that it roars into their ears. They all read it—that is, all who read anything at all. It prints news every week that they can't find in their own papers—sometimes news of the very first importance. It comments upon that news in a well-informed and sensible fashion. It presents all the new ideas that rage in the world, always promptly and often pungently. To an editorial writer The Nation is indispensable. Either he reads it, or he is an idiot.

Yet its example is very seldom followed—that is, forthrightly and heartily. Editorial writers all over the land steal ideas from it daily; it supplies, indeed, all the ideas that most of them ever have. It lifts them an inch, two inches, three inches, above the sedimentary stratum of Rotarians and ice-wagon drivers; they are conscious of its pull even when they resist. Yet very few of them seem to make the inevitable deduction that the kind of journalism it practices is better and more

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 29, 1925 No. 3134

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 131
EDITORIALS:
Cancer 133
Seven Years After 134
France's Color Line 134
The Women, Bless 'Em 135
DARROW VS. BRYAN. By Joseph Wood Krutch 136
THE HOLY ROLLERS ON SHIN BONE RIDGE. By Allene M. Sumner 137
FRANCE, BANKRUPT. By Robert Dell 138
THE DEFLATED FARMER. By James W. Quigley 140
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 141
CORRESPONDENCE 142
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Christ Dead. By MacKnight Black 144
Brigham Young. By Kimball Young 144
The Battle for a World Court. By Lewis S. Gannett 144
Poetry and Science. By Robert Louis Burgess 145
The Assimilated Jew. By Johan J. Smertenko 146
Books in Brief 146
Drama: "Art" in the Movies. By Gilbert Seldes 148
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Mussolini's Fascist State 149
Publicity for Armaments 149

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IT'S AN ILL WIND that blows nobody good, and the uncomfortable experiences of the French in Morocco are having a sweetening effect upon the French attitude toward Germany, and speeding up the evacuation of the Ruhr. The French and Belgians have already abandoned most of the territory which Poincaré invaded in January, 1923, and the so-called sanctions cities, occupied in March, 1921, are to be evacuated in August. It was an open secret that Herriot wanted to leave the Ruhr a year ago, but did not dare—he feared the outburst of Nationalist hate at home. Nationalism in France today is well occupied in whistling to keep its courage up for Africa. Abd-el-Krim has harried the French lines with altogether unexpected success, and the constant announcements that he has failed to take Fez or Taza do not alter the fact that the French forces have been in almost constant retreat. More troops, and still more troops are needed; France has a Boer War on her hands which it may take her years to settle. The appointment first of General Naulin, then of Marshal Pétain, to command of the field forces, indicates the alarm felt in the War Ministry. Suddenly the military men themselves have become unconcerned over the "German peril"; they want the Rhine troops for use in Africa—and the evacuation which Herriot feared is being accomplished without a murmur of protest.

WAR IS STILL WAR and soldiers are still soldiers, whether the scene be in Flanders or in Morocco. A Paris dispatch which we find in the Washington Post, regarding the African War, betrays a confidence in the short memory of Americans which is probably well justified:

> Paris, July 8.—In a bombing raid against an open market along the Werga River, where 2,000 Riffians were buying and selling provisions and animals, a French air squadron with 3,000 pounds of bombs killed and wounded 800 Riffians.

Eight years ago we were being whipped into war by similar stories told about the Germans. Bombing an open marketplace where children played and women haggled and bartered? Only Germans, we were assured, were capable of such infamies. Yet this dispatch from Paris breathes no hint of shame, and it has been followed by glorious accounts of American airmen volunteering to help carry on the good work.

THE UNITED PRESS carried clearly in its dispatches what other agencies seemed to miss—that the commission appointed by the diplomatic corps in Peking to investigate the killings at Shanghai reported that the municipal (foreign) authorities were to blame for the deaths of the students shot down while demonstrating on May 30, and recommended that the police officials be discharged. That would seem light enough punishment, but the arrogant aliens of the Shanghai Municipality protested. Shanghai Municipality, they said, was not subject to the diplomats at Peking, and they would tolerate no such interference with their rights. Such an attitude on the part of the foreign colony goes far to justify any anti-foreign movement which may arise in China.

THE WAY IN WHICH NEWS is sometimes recorded, and sometimes fabricated, in the daily press is nicely illustrated by comparing the account of doings at "White Court" on July 15 as told in the New York Herald Tribune with the dispatches printed in other New York morning newspapers. In its issue of July 16 the Herald Tribune carried prominently on its first page a dispatch from its correspondent, Carter Field, which bore the heading "Calles to Fall, Huerta Agent Tells Coolidge," and began as follows:

> Swampscott, Mass., July 15.—That the Calles Government of Mexico, which recently defied the Coolidge Administration and belittled protests against seizures of American property, would be overthrown within a few months was indicated today to President Coolidge by Rinaldo H. Cole of St. Louis, who came to Swampscott as the representative of the Huerta revolutionary party.
>
> Mr. Cole, who represented Madero in this country and finally obtained recognition for him, and who later represented Carranza, finally winning President Wilson to recognize him, left for the President's perusal a long list of outrages on Americans and seizures of American property, illustrating the "bolshevistic" policy of the Calles regime, it was learned. Owing to the President's trip to Quincy today, Mr. Cole was not able to see him, but left the data he had brought to Swampscott with Secretary Sanders.
>
> Mr. Cole declined to say a word about his visit except that he desired to pay his respects to President Coolidge, whom he knew when Mr. Coolidge was a fellow-guest at the Willard Hotel in Washington.

TO THE CASUAL READER this account gives the impression that a man plotting revolution against Mexico has called in that capacity and been officially received at "White Court" and that his story of the impending fall of President Calles has been received with friendly and believing ears and passed on with every indication of importance to the press. Of course such action would be an almost unheard-of affront to a friendly nation, but in view of the Administration's recent extraordinary statement in regard to Mexico it is not unbelievable. Fortunately, however, we do not need to believe it. Upon consulting the New York Times of the same date we discover not a word about Mr. Cole's visit. The New York World puts its Swampscott dispatch on an inside page, and the only allusion to Mr. Cole is contained in the following words at the foot of a column devoted to other incidents:

> Richard H. Cole of St. Louis, who was a representative of President Carranza of Mexico in this country prior to the recognition of the Carranza Government by President Wilson, called at White Court today and left a letter with Secretary Sanders enumerating a large number of alleged outrages upon Americans and property seizures in Mexico.
>
> He also made the prediction, it is said, that within a few months the Calles Government will be overthrown by the De la Huerta forces. President Coolidge did not see him.

The World's account was a record of the news; the Herald Tribune's was a fabrication of it.

EDMUND BENICZKY was Minister of the Interior when Admiral Horthy's Hungarian dictatorship was young. Today he is out of office and at outs with the Government—chiefly because Horthy wants the throne for himself and Beniczky wants it for a Hapsburg. And, as often happens when thieves fall out, the public learns by the feud. Beniczky is now telling what he learned in office of Horthy's participation in the murders of the white-terror period. When political murders were becoming too frequent, in 1919, Beniczky and others went to Horthy's headquarters and asked if the arrival of the army in Budapest would be accompanied by pogroms. "No pogroms," said Horthy grimly, "but some men will have to swim"—alluding to the custom of drowning political opponents in the Danube. Among those who had to swim was Somogyi, the Socialist leader, editor of the Nepszava. Beniczky blames Horthy directly for his murder. One of Somogyi's articles, he says, was suppressed by the censor, in February, 1920, but a copy of the suppressed part was sent to Horthy's camp and read at his mess-table. Horthy arose, indignant, and shouted: "Enough of words; let us have acts." Before the month was out Somogyi was done to death by two of Horthy's officers. Beniczky accuses Horthy of protecting the murderers, and of complicity in other murders. It is a strange thing when a cabinet minister publicly accuses the chief of state of murder. It is a still stranger thing when the charge is passed over in virtual silence. But Horthy's Hungary is paying its debts, and our State Department will probably continue to help it when it can, as by gagging Horthy's enemy Count Karolyi.

KARIN MICHAELIS tells, in the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, an amazing story of D'Annunzio and the beautiful Villa Cargnacco on the Lago di Garda. Because Henry Thode was a German, his villa was confiscated by the Italian Government during the war. After his death in 1920 it was opened and occupied by the poet-politician. Frau Thode went to see D'Annunzio, who promised to use his influence to have her house restored to her, or at least to give her a chance to buy it back. Within a few weeks, however, D'Annunzio himself mysteriously became the official owner of the villa. Frau Thode's letters were unanswered and when she called in person she was not received. Only after the Danish Authors' Club protested publicly did she hear from D'Annunzio. He begged her to protect him from criticism of his conduct in regard to a house he had "bought . . . on harsh terms from the Italian Government." This time he promised to give her from the house any objects she should name. She asked for the manuscripts and papers in her husband's desk, certain personal possessions, and some valuable paintings, but D'Annunzio refused to send all these things, and forced Frau Thode to sign a receipt before she received any of them. The trunk which he said contained "all manuscripts" was found to be filled with worthless papers and trash. The paintings had been sold at auction long before. When her friends again protested indignant letters came from D'Annunzio. "I have let myself be abused," he wrote, "with the patience of a Franciscan. . . . I have shown myself and will show myself superhuman."

THERE OUGHT TO BE an organized movement, instead of merely undirected sentiment, to end capital punishment in the United States. We think that the strength of opinion against this anachronism and barbarism is stronger than legislators imagine if only it can be assembled and expressed. Hence we welcome the birth of the League for the Abolition of Capital Punishment, with headquarters at 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. The league is calling a national conference, to meet in New York City October 23, 24, and 25, after which it will introduce bills to abolish capital punishment in various States, beginning with New York. Eight States have already done away with the death sentence: Michigan, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, and North and South Dakota. Four States—Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Missouri—reestablished capital punishment in 1918 under the pressure of post-war reaction. It is tragically true, as the league points out, that the death penalty has come to be a class punishment, practically reserved for the poor and friendless.

A TAXICAB DRIVER of New York City, we note with glee, is contesting the right of the Police Department of that municipality to compel him to wear a coat and collar while behind the wheel. His lawyer, with the devotion that his kind have for seeking legal loopholes rather than basing a case on broad principles, is denying the authority of the Police Department over taxicab drivers, owing to a recent decision of the New York courts upsetting a long line of home-rule legislation as unconstitutional. This is the wrong way to go about a right demand. We do not believe that under any law—past, present, or prospective—it is any more constitutional to prescribe a coat and collar for taxicab drivers than it would be to order kid gloves and silk hats for attendants at hot-dog stands or evening dress and starched shirts for "dock wallopers." If it is constitutional, such a regulation ought to be met with mass defiance anyhow. Taxicab drivers should organize for the specific purpose of going without coats and collars and making fools of pompous pouter-pigeon administrators.

Cancer

THE little boy's dog had developed a strange lump on the under side, and the little boy's father, who was a doctor, shook his head gravely and said that he thought that Trick had better go. You could not be too careful about a pet in a family of children. The children, of course, were disconsolate, but while the whole question hung like a cloud over the household a doctor friend came and suggested that he would take Trick over to the institute and see what could be done there.

And so, three days later, the little boy went with his father to get the dog, apparently none the worse in health or spirits for a dose of ether and a surgical operation. But even more entertaining than the sight of Trick with a white bandage wound around her middle and tied in a frivolous row of knots up the back, was the institute, room after room filled with glass apparatus and rows of test tubes, rooms full of white mice and guinea pigs and, pride of the establishment, two monkeys, whose blood, the men thought, was nearer that of humans than the blood of any of the other animals. Most of the men who worked there wore beards, for that was twenty-five years ago, when a beard was a trade-mark of the scientific callings. They were looking for the cause of cancer.

That institute still is looking for the cause of cancer. It was given and endowed for that. The only mention of it in the newspapers has been the announcement of the death of its director, killed by a chronic disease whose course was accelerated by his persistent refusal to stop an important series of experiments. It is one of a dozen or more laboratories throughout the world where men whose names are unknown, and always will be unknown, are spending their lives in the study of some one little aspect of this dreaded disease. The guarded announcement that two British scientists think that they have seen the "causative agent" of cancer as a disturbance of light rays, so infinitesimal as to elude the most powerful microscope, must call to mind these dozens of unseen workers, these decades of patient experiment, yielding now and then some crumb of enlightenment to point the way to further work, but more often with no greater satisfaction than the honest exercise of the scientific spirit—that spirit which led an English business man to spend what time he could snatch from earning his living in arduous study to perfect microscopic technique, and an English railroad worker to achieve his scientific education by an effort which would have staggered a lesser determination.

Like other first-rate scientific work the studies by Dr. Gye and Mr. Barnard, which the British Medical Research Council announced last week, are built on a synthesis of earlier experiments. In 1911 an American, Peyton Rous, succeeded in producing sarcoma in fowls by inoculating them with a filtered substance taken from other chicken tumors. This success seemed to indicate that there was some agent—cautiously Dr. Rous refrained from assuming that it was a living organism or virus—present in the causation of cancer, and that this agent was so small as to pass through a filter. But opposed to the theory of a definite virus have been the fact of many varieties in types of tumors, and the apparent clinical evidence that cancer is not transmitted from person to person. Dr. Gye, accepting Dr. Rous's studies, believes that his further work not only confirms them but reconciles the objections raised by the opposing scientists who insisted that the evidence was all against the presence of a specific causative organism. This definite organism exists, he believes, in various types of malignant tumors; but it can produce cancer only when it is associated with a chemical substance, also present in tumors, which he calls "the specific factor."

In support of these claims the advance announcement of Dr. Gye's work tells of success in producing apparently typical sarcoma in a chicken by the use of virus taken from a human cancer and mixed with the specific chemical factor from a chicken tumor. Other experiments with rats and with mice seem to show that the same organism is present in each—and combined with the specific factor it will produce in an animal the special kind of cancerous growth typical of that kind. Dr. Gye's work is said to have been confirmed by other members of the Research Council in independent examinations. There is no body whose announcements are to be awaited with greater hope.

To find the cause of cancer, if that has been done, is not, of course, to find its cure. Koch found the tubercle of tuberculosis in 1882, and it is only now, more than forty years later, that announcement has been made of the discovery of a specific chemical—a salt of gold—which seems in some cases to be able to dissolve the fatty covering of that organism and destroy it in the human body without breaking down the surrounding tissues. But to learn the nature of the enemy undoubtedly is the first step toward attacking him. The press reports, which still are the only published accounts in this country of Dr. Gye's work, suggest that there has been at least a partial success in finding an antibody which is able to neutralize or destroy his cancer virus in the test animals. If that is true the way may lie open to the real conquest of one of man's ancient enemies.

In the meantime all that the most illustrious physician can do for his patient is to repeat the little which has been proved. Cancer—the crab—gradually spreading and eating away life itself, always starts as a localized disease. It is likely to develop at some point in the body where there has been a chronic irritation, by chemicals used in certain occupations, for example, or by some such mechanical agent as an ill-fitting dental plate. It is a disease of middle age and old age, and much of the undoubted increase in its incidence is due to the fact that more people now live to reach the forties, fifties, and sixties than ever before. The only hope of eradicating the disease lies in recognizing it in the early stages and cutting or burning it away. When that is done the victim may live out the rest of his natural life. But neglected or concealed, it spreads to poison and destroy the whole system.

The newspaper discussion of the work of Dr. Gye and Mr. Barnard has given the lay world a heartening glimpse into the quiet house of science. It may help to lay the phantom terrors of cancer. But at least for the present the real dangers remain, and to the person who suspects or fears them there can be no other helpful advice than to seek at once the most competent medical help which he can command.

Seven Years After

MR. BERNARD BARUCH has tendered Mr. Owen D. Young $250,000, more or less, for the purpose of conducting an investigation into war profiteering—into "war profiteering as a cause of war, and the possibility of preventing war by taking the profit out of it." The study will be carried on by the Walter Hines Page School of International Relations at Johns Hopkins University, of whose board of trustees Mr. Young is chairman. Research is to be conducted both here and abroad, and the final report will not be due for at least three years. The plan has received the blessing of General Pershing, who in a letter to Mr. Young sees a heightened morale in the army when it is known that wealth is equally conscripted with men.

It is well to recall some of the fabulous earnings of sturdy American enterprise in 1917 and 1918. Senate document No. 259, which Senator La Follette wrung out of an unwilling Treasury Department, sets forth the figures of thousands of nameless companies. The profits of half the coal companies reported ranged from 100 to 7,856 per cent on their capital stock. Seventeen woolen and worsted mills out of 45 listed, reported earnings of more than 100 per cent on their capital stock—one company reaching 1,770 per cent. The Chicago packers doubled and trebled their normal earnings. The United States Steel Corporation in 1916 and 1917 salted away $888,931,000—or $20,000,000 more than the par value of its outstanding capital stock. Canners of fruits and vegetables earned up to 2,032 per cent; furniture manufacturers up to 3,295 per cent; clothing and dry goods stores up to 9,826 per cent. Of 506 flour mills reported, 84 earned 100 per cent or better, one reaching 2,628 per cent. Two-thirds of the listed bakeries earned better than 20 per cent—34 companies going over 100 per cent. Senator Capper, in a speech on the floor of the Senate, declared that the total profits taken by private industry during the war years equaled the total capitalization of the companies concerned. For every dollar standing to the credit of stockholders on the books a dollar came back to them—the bulk of it from war profits.

Now Mr. Baruch is not a Red. He is not to be confused with that pitiful minority which in the late crusade for God and democracy made bold to raise a howl for the conscription of wealth. Not at all. As chairman of the War Industries Board he occupied perhaps the most strategic and important position of all our loyal defenders—not excepting the President. On his shoulders rested the quite colossal job of coordinating the whole industrial structure of America in an attempt to move men and goods as the social crisis demanded, rather than permitting it to follow the chaotic vagaries of business as usual. That the job was physical rather than financial the profit figures show. At any rate he moved the goods. Few save Mr. Baruch can realize just what a monumental task that was in a country besotted in the rights and obligations of freedom of contract. He was much too busy and much too intimate with the Administration to trade in any such treasonable nonsense as the conscription of wealth—at that time.

But now, after seven years of prayer and meditation, he is ready to hand out a cool quarter of a million for what would probably have landed him in Leavenworth in 1918. Nor is he the only one. Mr. Bergquist of the American Radiator Company has evolved a plan for putting every industrial plant in government service on the declaration of war. The Christian Science Monitor in an able series of articles has recently outlined another plan following the same lines. The rank odor of profiteering across the shining battalions has begun to disturb many nostrils, seven years too late.

But better late than never. And Mr. Baruch's action is particularly significant. With his hand on the pulse of the whole industrial mechanism, he was peculiarly and uniquely in a position to know whether the strangulation of profiteering would let down the morale of the forceful captains of industry. His mature conclusion—on which he stakes a small fortune—seems to be that it would not; that industrial mobilization might conceivably proceed on a profitless basis. Mr. Baruch has announced no such conclusion, but it is difficult to see how he could be induced to part with a quarter of a million unless he believed that it could be done. And even more important, he must believe that the very threat of such a procedure—the certainty that it would be adopted with the declaration of war—would have a profoundly depressive effect on the whole phenomenon of jingoism and militarism. Battered as we are with bitter memories of what actually happens when the drums begin to beat, we can only wish Mr. Baruch and Mr. Young godspeed. Never was there a research job more worth doing.

But just why does General Pershing come into the picture?

France's Color Line

THE bitter struggle in Morocco between the Riff tribes under Abd-el-Krim and the authority of Governor General Lyautey raises for reexamination the question of the success of the French colonial experiment in North Africa—especially in relation to the race and color question.

France has a deserved reputation of having come closer to solving the color question than any other great Western Power. The situation both within France itself and in her colonies is free from those tragic prejudices which make Britain's dominion in Egypt and India seem so hopeless and form a continual ferment of injustice and conflict in South Africa and in the United States. Snobbish Americans who recently tried to carry their accustomed treatment of the Negro to Paris and demanded the exclusion of that race from some of their favorite resorts received a sharp reminder of the different situation there and here. Resort owners who bent to their demands were promptly punished by the French Government, and the Americans were warned that they could not import their race prejudices into France. Other colonial Powers of the Twentieth Century have generally asserted, directly or indirectly, the doctrine of white superiority. "But France," as William Milligan Sloane says in his recently published "Greater France in Africa," "flatly asserts that there is no race and color question, at least officially, and uses every effort to secure complete equality, even social."

The French attitude toward race and color has two main sources. One is the natural tolerance, the spirit of "live and let live," which is one of the finest characteristics of the French people. The other is a definite political policy which recognizes the value of the people of North Africa as a military reservoir and sees the advantage of holding their friendship and loyalty. Yet in spite of the generally reasonable attitude of the French, both official and unofficial, toward race and color, equality is far from achieved in North Africa, if we accept the account of Mr. Sloane. In fact, equality is a slogan for political consumption rather than an actual administrative program. Mr. Sloane visited Morocco and Algeria as a guest of the French Government and a representative of the Committee France-America. The account of his visit may without offense be said to be friendly toward France. Yet he does not conceal that, in spite of any assertion to the contrary, there is a race and color question in North Africa and that French experiment is, at best, only an approach toward the enormous difficulties and intricacies of a problem where science and reason find themselves continually halted by ancient human prejudices and passions. Even in Algeria, where France has had a foothold since 1815 and general control for three-fourths of a century, Mr. Sloane finds that race equality is not yet a reality.

> The literature of French Africa is fairly large [he says], and many so-called novels deal with real life in Algeria. A dispassionate reader finds the plot, either incidentally or mainly, concerned with the hard lot of natives who, after being Gallicized, aim at social equality. There is in them a frank admission of the friction between the subject and dominant races. This would seem to indicate that in Algeria at least there is a race, if not a color question.

There are many complexities of race and color in North Africa. The Arabs belong to the Semitic branch and the Berbers to the Hamitic division of the Caucasian race. Both are therefore technically "white," but long exposure to African suns and circumstances has given them a hue almost as dark as that of the Negroes, who have for centuries formed another considerable element in North Africa —larger still today, when France imports troops from south of the Sahara to fight her battles for her. In the cities there is also an appreciable Jewish admixture. Mr. Sloane says that in the large cities of Algeria the Europeans and the natives have separate quarters, although mixing in a business way. Of the country communities Mr. Sloane gives this description:

> Some are purely Oriental towns of small size, with crooked dirty streets, a little market-place and scanty bazaars, with a mosque and shabby minaret. Others are just as purely European, built of low one- or two-storied bungalows, arranged on streets in some variation of the checker-board plan, with a public square, shops, and a tavern or two. In the European towns of Algeria there are always a few natives, in the native towns a few Europeans. But for all practical purposes the permanent inhabitants are segregated from each other.

Segregation in a modified form is also under way in Morocco. The mixing of Europeans and natives in the large cities has not been entirely satisfactory, says Mr. Sloane.

> Accordingly at a certain distance, a mile at least, generally more, from the great towns and administrative centers of each district there have been erected small French hamlets where the officials and their families reside in pleasant French homes. . . . These bits of France, kept discreetly apart, seem to give no offense to the natives, content with their own unmolested towns and cities, their mosques uncontaminated by infidel feet, their bazaars and market-places.

The Women, Bless 'Em!

CHICAGO has decided to include women on its juries; Detroit has opened the smoking seats on its trolley cars to the gentler sex, and Nantasket Beach near Boston has boldly set out public benches marked "Reserved for Women—Smoking Permitted." But in New York a stalwart judge sent a bold young miss to jail because she ventured on the street in a male Palm Beach suit and a flat straw hat. "Knickers are the limit," said the magistrate.

Just why a young lady should desire to hide her nether limbs in the curious bifurcated bags affected by twentieth-century man is a problem for philosophers; but that problem seems to us simpler than the solution of the fears of the magistrate. Presumably he thought that in sentencing the girl to jail he was protecting society against some impending danger. What was it? Knickers he approved; and apparently he had no protest to make against the knee-length skirts and "bobbed hosies" which adorn the city streets. Trousers, however, caused him to shudder.

Men have always taken a certain pleasure in shuddering at the ways of the wild young women. Cato, a good many hundred years ago, cried out against the "new" woman: "What sort of practice is this of running out into public, besetting the streets, and addressing other people's husbands?" Juvenal, three hundred years later, thought that the current feminine taste for literature was likely to lead to homicide; Giordano Bruno, the enlightened reformer of his day, generously proclaimed: "I allow women to learn: to teach, never!" And Giuliano de' Medici would not permit the ladies to hunt or play tennis.

When, in 1852, the suffragists sought to introduce the ample garment which came to be known as the "bloomer" the moral sense of good Americans was shocked. Mobs drove the daring creatures off the streets; small boys hooted them, and followed them singing:

> Gibbery, gibbery, gab!
> The women had a confab,
> And demanded the rights
> To wear the tights.
> Gibbery, gibbery, gab!

And what were the lascivious garments affected by Amelia Bloomer and her friends, which caused such a furore and gave Mrs. Bloomer's serious paper, the Lily, such a boost in circulation? They were not the bloomers of today. They consisted of a skirt reaching half way between the knee and the ankle, with "moderately full trousers" below, gathered with an elastic band at the ankle—or, in winter, tucked into high shoes.

Years after the crusaders had abandoned their effort at dress reform the bicycle brought belated relief to the beskirted female. Now the young women regard even the bicycle bloomer with hoots of scorn. A new generation has arisen which does not know that employers used to forbid their slaves to wear short sleeves or to bob their hair. They breathe the air of unconscious freedom—and fill it with the smoke of their cigarettes. Who today would hail the flapper with such a toast as greeted Miss Anthony when she made her maiden speech:

> Our characters they elevate,
> Our manners they refine;
> Without them we'd degenerate
> To the level of swine.

Darrow vs. Bryan

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Dayton, Tennessee, July 19.

WHEN on the fourth day after the opening of the famous trial at Dayton Clarence Darrow arose with the characteristic hitch of his shoulders and began his first electrical speech, a tremor went through the assembled army of newspapermen as they awoke with a start from the spell which Dayton had cast upon them So calm was the confidence of the little town, so indisputably real were the proceedings which had seemed at a little distance utterly preposterous that one was on the point of taking the trial with a certain seriousness not merely as a social phenomenon, but as a discussion of a real question. One was rapidly approaching the point where one could hear without amazement the opinion of a man who saw nothing unreasonable in the proposal to scrap all the geological and biological science of 125 years in favor of the picturesque myth of Genesis. Here was a court duly convened to pass judgment upon a crime which had arisen out of a law duly passed by the legislature of a sovereign State; here, arranged in order, were the opposing counsel; and here, strangest of all, was a grave judge, clothed in the majesty of the law, who was known to all as a staunch supporter of those to whom Tennessee's fantastic statute seemed sound common sense. Either all the visible world or oneself had obviously gone mad and one was not sure it was not oneself.

Nor had there been up to that moment a single incident to break the spell. Dayton had received her visitors with a slow and kindly smile which seemed to say "Rest assured, we shall annihilate you as gently as we can," and in the courtroom the same atmosphere had prevailed. With that courteous drawl of the South, so disarming to those who do not know with what inflexible obstinacy it can give utterance to the blackest prejudices, the judge had welcomed the visiting counsel and they had responded with suitable words. Securely intrenched behind religion and respectability, the prosecution anticipated no real unpleasantness, for its members had never in their lives heard any one question, save in apologetic terms, the complacent combination of ignorance and superstition for which it stood. That the defense could be other than defensive it never doubted, and it seemed as though no one would have the courage to tell these simple bigots where they really stood. They were mild because their authority had never been questioned, but they had succeeded somehow in making it seem that to tell them the truth about themselves would be the mere brutality of a boorish guest.

Then on this fourth day Darrow arose. He began as all before him had begun, with trivial courtesies. He thanked the court for bestowing upon him the title Colonel; the judge, with a twinkle of good fellowship in his eye, bade him "take it back to Chicago," and the vicious circle of empty courtesies seemed once more to have established itself when, with a transition too quick to be noticed, Darrow was suddenly in the midst of an impassioned oration, shaking his finger in the face of the astonished judge and denouncing in angry, rage-stirring words the intolerance, bigotry, and arrogance of that community of which the judge himself was known to be a typical member. Upon the face of the latter was written shocked amazement, and the correspondents rubbed their ears to be sure that they heard aright, but the spell was broken and Dayton heard for the first time the voice of an enlightened man who was not afraid to speak his mind.

In Tennessee, as I said in a previous article, intellectual courage is almost dead. Whatever is done in the name of patriotism or religion may consider itself as exempt from any but the most respectful criticism, and anything like a vigorous liberal opinion seemed as unreal and remote to Dayton as the Daytonian psychology seems to a man who has spent his life in intellectual society. Even the State University had given the acquiescence of silence, but here, come from afar, was a man who dared to do what no Tennesseean had done—hold up a mirror that she might see herself as the world saw her—and the effect was electrical. That Dayton was converted I should be far from maintaining, but she recognized courage and she respected it. For the first time the insolence of ignorance was shaken because for the first time it was questioned.

What Darrow's speech would look like in cold print I do not know, but there was unquestionable greatness both in the passion with which it was uttered and in the calculation of the moment for utterance; and when he concluded with the solemn warning that "with flying banners and beating drums we are marching backward to the glorious age of the sixteenth century when bigots lighted faggots to burn the men who dared to bring any intelligence and enlightenment and culture to the human mind" even Dayton stopped to think. However much or little it may have directly accomplished, it gave to Tennessee an invaluable example of the only possible way in which she can fight the bigotry which is drawing her back into barbarism.

Many a time during the course of that eloquent tirade and many a time during the next few days when Darrow, Neal, Hays, or Malone rose for a few seconds to voice some legal objection in terms which implied unmistakably their contempt for this court in which no fairness could be expected, the eyes of the crowd turned toward the peerless leader from whom it confidently awaited vindication and triumph. Though for several days Mr. Bryan continued unbroken the silence which he had maintained, the increasing speed of the fan which he used and the tightening of the lines about his mouth showed that not a few of the arrows were reaching home and that he was stung to the heart by these men who refused to respect the bogus claims to learning and liberality by which he set so much store and treated him as the fraud which he is. Finally he could stand it no longer. He got up to say merely that in due time he would answer, and the applause which greeted this announcement showed clearly how fully his audience expected him to keep his word.

At last the moment came and he arose to make his plea for the exclusion of all testimony from either scientists or theologians. He began with the now famous references to his long list of honorary degrees, but he must have been subconsciously aware of the fact that though any college can grant honorary degrees it is beyond human power to confer any honorary learning, for he soon turned to develop his chief plea—a plea for ignorance as uncorrupted as possible by any knowledge. There is, he said, no such thing as a Bible expert; learning is useless and only faith can count. The opinion of a bushman just converted is as good as that of the scholar who has devoted a lifetime to the study of the text. Even the most ignorant man in all the throng was, I believe, a little ashamed, and all eyes turned to Dudley Malone, who had been chosen to answer him of the silver tongue.

Of Malone's speech I have no space to give an account but it was, like the speech of Darrow, undoubtedly great when considered as a part of the drama which the defense was staging. With all the vocal art and the genuine passion for which the occasion called it pleaded for fair play, it stated the simple case for light against darkness, and, reaching its height, it taunted Bryan in stinging words with his cowardice in declaring before the world that the trial at Dayton was a duel to death between science and religion and then refusing to fight the contest which he himself had so loudly proclaimed. Nor was there the slightest doubt who, for the moment, had won. A dormant sense of fair play had turned even the fundamentalists for an instant against their leader, and the applause which broke forth, twice as great in volume and duration as that which had greeted Mr. Bryan, showed conclusively that in this particular duel Mr. Bryan had lost even in the midst of his own camp. It seemed almost true that, as Mr. Mencken, seated behind me, excitedly exclaimed, "Tennessee needs only fifteen minutes of free speech to become civilized."

For a moment one was almost sorry for the great leader who had fallen so low. Driven from politics and journalism because of obvious intellectual incompetence, become ballyhoo for boom-town real estate in his search for lucrative employment, and forced into religion as the only quasi-intellectual field in which mental backwardness and complete insensibility to ideas can be used as an advantage, he already knows that he is compelled to seek in the most remote rural regions for the applause so necessary to his contentment. Yet even in Dayton, as choice a stronghold of ignorance and bigotry as one could hope to find, he goes down in defeat in the only contest where he has met his antagonists face to face. For a moment, as I said, one pities him and yet such pity is, of course, not really called for. Even as he loses he wins; no argument and no real victory are needed. The judge, ruling as he knows he was expected to rule, debars from the jury the only testimony which is really pertinent to the case, denies to the defense the only plea which they would desire to make, and the trial at Dayton is, to all intents and purposes, over at a time when the jury has not been allowed in the courtroom for more than fifteen minutes.

No one knows what the ultimate result will be. In a higher court the law may be pronounced unconstitutional or the present proceedings declared a mistrial, but whatever happens the affair at Dayton has taught several valuable lessons. It has shown conclusively that the danger, often referred to by liberals, of laws that will reduce the United States to a bondage more complete than that of the darkest puritan village of colonial New England, is no fantastic danger but one real and present; and it has shown also that the only possible way in which that danger can be fought is with a bitterness and vigor equal to that of those who provoke it. The mob is up; it has tasted blood and smelled smoke. Fair words are useless, for with every concession it grows in strength and determination; and it will not do to rest quietly behind the Constitution, for the Constitution is not an impregnable wall. It is subject to change and, as Mr. Darrow said in a quotation from Bancroft which we may have occasion to find all too true, "it is right to preserve freedom in constitutions, but when the spirit of freedom has fled from the hearts of the people, then its matter is easily sacrificed under the law." So far as Tennessee is concerned the only question worth asking is "How many are her Neals?" And so far as the country at large is concerned, "How many are her Hayses, her Darrows, and her Malones?"

The Holy Rollers on Shin Bone Ridge

By ALLENE M. SUMNER

THE Holy Rollers of Dayton, Tennessee, chose the week of the evolution trial for their revival time. "The sin down there in the valley must be wiped out by the glory of the Lamb," said the Rollers.

The Holy Rollers of Dayton have no church. God frowns upon money, they say, and the contractors and carpenters of Dayton refuse to put stone and mortar together without money. The Holy Rollers, therefore, found their "arbor church" on Shin Bone Ridge—two massive elm trees, their huge limbs swollen and cracked with age, their leaves interlacing. Rough wooden benches semicircled the elms. And crude tea-pots with fat white wicks crammed into their snouts blew opal flame into the silver of the moonlit night. Night things all about. The screech of the bob-cat. The wail of the whippoorwill. A whir of bats' wings, and the staccato of insects. The great mountains like black-robed Druids keeping watch over their own.

The Holy Rollers, a hundred or more, sat on the benches and on the dew-wet grass. Curious folks from the town came to their cars and sat and listened. A deputy sheriff with his pink-dressed girl—sometimes there is trouble.

"Folks, we's only got'n three books an' they ain't all aliken but we can holler somehow," said Preacher Joe Leffew, clad in blue shirt, torn across the back, showing his sun-bronzed flesh, with torn blue overalls reeking of the mule team. The hymn rolled out. A hymn thunderous with rhythm. There was a stamping of bare and hobnailed feet, a swaying of bodies, old men and old women, girls and boys and little children.

> We ain't goin' to sin any more, Lamb,
> We ain't goin' to sin any more, God,
> We's all goin' to glory, God,
> And wash in the blood of the Lamb.

The song became a dirge and the dirge became a fiendish thing, rising in howls and wails and moanings that stilled the wild things of the night.

Preacher Joe Leffew preached. "Some folks thinks as how as we-uns are funny people. They come here, poor sinners that they are, to mock an' revile us. Here's our word of Scripture. 'An' Christ reeled to an' fro, as a drunken man.' Now, children, dear children, some folks think that means the Lamb was a drunkard. T'aint so at all. It says 'as a drunken man.' You cain't tell me God's son ever went home all soused up."

Preacher Joe Leffew assailed education. "I ain't got no learnin' an' never had none," said Preacher Joe Leffew. "Glory be to the Lamb! Some folks work their hands off'n up 'n to the elbows to give their young-uns education, and all they do is send their young-uns to hell."

"Glory to His name," shouted the huddled figures, misty-gray in the night damp.

"I ain't let no newspaper in my cabin for nigh unto a year since the Lord bathed me in His blood," said Preacher Leffew.

"Glory to the Lamb," wailed the chorus of the saved.

"I never sinned enough to look in one of these here almanacs."

"Praise His name," wailed the chorus of the saved.

"I've got eight young-uns in the cabin and three in glory, and I know they're in glory because I never learned 'em nothin'."

"Glory to the Lord," wailed the chorus of the saved.

"I've gotta team of good mules and a wagon an' that's all I have got, but I'd give 'em away tomorrow for more of this good old-time religion."

"Praise God," thundered the chorus of the saved.

Testifying began. An old woman of seventy, her gray hairs straggling over her lean, sun-bronzed face. Hands at her hips, she paced the circle hemmed in by wooden benches. She twisted her sharp-boned old body into gyrations, touched the ground, shrieked and moaned. Ma Ferguson "speaks with tongues" and testifies with strange and stirring words.

"We cain't repine on no flow'ry beds of ease," said Ma Ferguson. "We gotta save the daughters—gotta save their bodies—gotta stop fornycation."

"Glory to God," wailed the chorus of the saved.

A group of calico-gowned mountain women came forward, each about to bring one more potential Holy Roller into this vale of grief and woe, each carrying an infant in her lean, bronzed arms. Like a Greek chorus in the hollow of the night they moaned and swayed and cried together, rocking their babies in rhythm with their "speech of tongues." The hard, dry years that sap the living juice from the bodies of mountain women had leathered their faces. The strange light of a vision was in their eyes. They dropped their little bundles of baby flesh. The moon was high now. Blue and silver and amber it dripped light through the elm leaves. The mountain women dropped to the ground. They clutched hands and kicked and frothed and moaned: "Gotta save the daughters—gotta save their bodies—gotta save their bodies——"

Again the preacher, his eyes popping out like blue marbles, his shock of corn-colored hair on end, preached. He dragged a bench from the outer circle into the central hollow. "Come, sinners," he implored, "come to the moaning bench."

Song after song was wailed in the hollow of the night.

> From the manger to the cross,
> Not a moment's time was lost.

Drama. A spurt of orange. A girl's shrill treble laugh dying into a hoarse sob. A girl of sixteen in a flaming sport dress had thrown herself, a little huddled heap, upon the bench. Her hands dug into the dirt of the ground. Sobs wrenched her. Her voice was piping and shrill. "Jesus, save me; God, help me; Christ, come to me."

The "saved" surrounded her. Ma Ferguson bent her white hairs over the bench, an arm about the sobbing girl. The mountain women huddled about her. Preacher Leffew stroked her white arm: "Save her from fornycation, God; Jesus, put Your mark upon her."

Hour after hour passed, the treble piping was hoarse. Midnight—and the Holy Rollers, damp and limp with exhaustion, lay flung out upon the grass.

France, Bankrupt

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, June 27

AFTER a platonic demonstration of 240 Socialists, Radical, and Communist deputies in favor of a capital levy—platonic because, whatever the merits of the proposal, it could not solve the immediate difficulties—Parliament has adopted the government measures by overwhelming majorities. It could not do otherwise, for the eleventh hour has been reached. The state has to pay nearly two billion francs on July 1 for bonds issued in 1922 which fall due on that day and have not been renewed, and the Treasury is empty. Failing a compulsory moratorium, which would have amounted to an act of national bankruptcy, the money had to be found somehow.

It has been found by a new currency inflation. The further increase of the note circulation by six billion francs —in addition to the increase of four billions voted in April —will just cover the bonds falling due on July 1 and those coming to maturity on September 25, which amount to about 3,800,000,000 francs. It is true that it is not an inflation to meet a budget deficit, and the floating debt is not increased by it, since the new banknotes will simply be exchanged for bonds. Nevertheless, it will inevitably affect the exchange value of the franc. The heavy fall in the franc during the last few days has been due to the anticipation of a new issue of banknotes. The Paris stock exchange has been in a nervous state, which, as the pay day of July 1 approached without any provision being made to meet it, verged on panic.

The payments due in July and September are not the only immediate difficulties that M. Caillaux has to face. The danger of a huge floating debt is becoming more and more evident. For the last ten years the French Government has been inflating by an unlimited issue of treasury bonds repayable in three, six, or twelve months, which are in effect banknotes bearing interest. This is one of the makeshifts by which the annual budget deficit has been covered. So long as the holders of treasury bonds renewed them when they fell due, as most of them did until a few months ago, this system of camouflage inflation, which has been, of course, one of the principal causes of the fall of the franc, went gaily on without thought for the future. It was evident that, if for any cause confidence was shaken, the holders of treasury bonds would stop renewing them, and I, for one, have been saying for the last five years or more that this would happen sooner or later. It is happening now. The state is being called upon to reimburse treasury bonds at the average rate of about two billion francs a month. Unless this can be checked somehow, France is faced with imminent bankruptcy, for the total of the floating debt is about the same as that of the consolidated debt—150 billion francs in round figures.

One would have thought that the holders of treasury bonds would prefer them in present circumstances to banknotes—and M. Caillaux rather counted on that when he first took office—but it is not the case. The hoarding of banknotes in private hands still continues, although the notes hoarded have already lost anything up to three-fourths of their value according to the date at which they were first put in the stocking or under the bed. It seems impossible to eradicate the French mania for hoarding. The Bank of France estimates that the gold coins hoarded by private individuals in France amount to about two billion francs (equivalent to about eight billion paper francs). There is more sense in hoarding gold, although, of course, it is disastrous from the point of view of the general interest that money should thus be kept idle, but to hoard notes in present conditions is insane. Nevertheless, something like 10 per cent of the French paper currency is probably hoarded at this moment. One of the objects of hoarding is to evade taxation. This is an example of the French lack of the only useful form of patriotism—civism or public spirit. The habit of hoarding is one of the causes of French financial difficulties, and one of the reasons why the national income of France is lower in proportion to the national wealth than that of most other countries. It compels the state to maintain a much larger currency than is required for the purposes of circulation, it diminishes the national revenue by concealing taxable capacity, and it immobilizes a large part of the capital of the country, which is not available for any productive purpose.

During the last few weeks M. Caillaux has made one proposal after another for dealing with the situation thus created, but what the bankers approved the politicians disapproved and vice versa. His best proposal, perhaps, was the ingenious solution of fixing a maximum limit for the amount of banknotes and treasury bonds combined, without fixing the proportion of either category. This would have enabled banknotes to be issued to meet treasury bonds as they were presented for repayment, without increasing the floating debt. It would not have meant a new inflation in the true sense of the term, but would rather have prevented any further inflation. The bankers, however, feared that this would not be understood by the French public, which does not realize that an unlimited issue of treasury bonds at short term is just as much inflation as an unlimited issue of banknotes. The rulers of France during the last ten years have taken care that the French people should not realize it. They have persistently asserted that they were not inflating. M. Caillaux, therefore, dropped this suggestion and fell back on the attempt to consolidate the floating debt by a "gold loan" issued only to holders of treasury bonds and in exchange for such bonds.

At present this loan is quite voluntary, but, in my opinion, the chances are that it will before long have to be made compulsory. I doubt whether a sufficient number of treasury bondholders will take the loan in exchange for their bonds unless they are compelled. It is understood that the interest is to be only 4 per cent, that of the treasury bonds being 5 per cent, but it is to be guaranteed at the rate of the dollar exchange at the moment of issue. Thus, if the franc fell subsequently to half its exchange value at the time of issue, the interest would rise to 8 per cent in paper francs, and so on, and the market value of the stock would rise in paper francs accordingly. Of course, on the assumption that the franc is going to depreciate much more, this is a great advantage to the investor, who would be better off with the loan than with treasury bonds, but that assumption is rather a damaging one for the state to make. In effect, the French Government is saying goodby to the franc, or, if not, investors will have no motive for taking the loan. No doubt the loan gives the French Government a motive for arresting the fall of the franc, but then where is the attraction to the investor? If the franc could be stabilized at its present rate, every treasury bondholder that subscribed to the loan would be worse off. It is to be feared that the fact that the French Government so evidently anticipates a further depreciation of the franc will not tend to restore public confidence. It is at best a desperate remedy, but the situation is desperate.

M. Caillaux cannot be blamed. He inherited the situation. His first business was to balance the budget as the necessary preliminary to any measures for stabilizing the franc and putting the Treasury on a sound basis. He has succeeded in doing that, if his taxation proposals are accepted, but he is now called upon to provide for sudden emergencies due to the follies of his predecessors. If chauvinism and patriotism were synonyms, patriotism would induce the holders of treasury bonds to exchange them for the new loan, but the French have never yet shown any disposition to sacrifice their personal financial interests, or what they believe to be their interests, to the public good. As somebody said during the war, the French bourgeois are quite willing to let their sons be killed, but you mustn't ask them for five francs. My belief is that it will be found necessary to consolidate the floating debt by a compulsory loan, but we shall see to what extent the loan is subscribed, and to what extent it checks the demand for repayment of treasury bonds. If the loan be subscribed wholly or principally by persons that would otherwise renew their treasury bonds and the demands for repayment continue to the same or even a greater extent, as is possible, the problem will not have been solved, and the present dangerous situation will continue.

One thing, at any rate, is done by the law just passed. The maximum amount of the floating debt is limited to the amount at which it stands after the subscription of the loan. This means that no more treasury bonds can be issued, except to replace bonds presented for repayment, and that there can be no further inflation by this means. The amount of the floating debt can be increased in the future only by the sums necessary to repay loans at short term, as distinct from treasury bonds, when they come to maturity. On December 8 another series of bonds issued in December, 1922, to the amount of about ten million francs, will fall due. If all the holders, or the majority of them, demand repayment, it will be a serious matter.

In spite of the large majority by which the law was passed by the Chamber, the position of the Government is gravely shaken. In the vote on the Socialist counter-proposal of a capital levy two-thirds of the Left Bloc voted for the proposal and against the Government, which had made the question one of confidence. In the final vote the law as a whole was adopted by 330 votes against 34, but there were more than 200 abstentions, including all the Socialist deputies.

The Left Bloc is, in fact, disintegrated, and the two principal factors in its disintegration have been the war in Morocco and the financial question. M. Painlevé has always said that he would not continue in office without a majority of the Left. He may feel justified in remaining for the present, since the majority of the Left voted with the Government on the adoption of the law—there were many abstentions on the Right—and it is desirable that he should, for a change of government at this moment would not facilitate the solution of the many urgent problems of internal and international politics. Moreover, it would now be almost impossible to form another Government of the Left unless the Socialists consented to join it. That they are most unwilling to do, for it would mean, among other things, taking the responsibility for the war in Morocco, and it is unlikely that the party would in any case consent to ministerial participation. The Socialist national congress on July 12 may do something to make the situation clearer, but at this moment it seems unlikely that the present Government can last long. The conflict about the capital levy will be renewed, and there is strong feeling among the Radicals as well as the Socialists that M. Caillaux's taxation proposals are not sufficiently bold and do not demand enough from the rich.

The Deflated Farmer

By JAMES W. QUIGLEY

HAS the farmer come back? An answer to this question is necessary to any conclusion regarding the genuineness of prosperity in the United States. Farming in the Northwest, and in parts of the South, is virtually, and to a considerable extent actually, in receivership. The hard lot of the farmer has been the primary cause of the failure of the largest railway unit in the United States, two of the largest fertilizer companies, several important packing companies, and a great number of other manufacturing corporations, wholesale companies, and retail businesses. Banking suspensions, which aggregated 119 and 107, respectively, in 1910 and 1911, typical pre-war years, numbered 578 in 1923, 613 in 1924, and 255 for the first half of 1925. More than 70 per cent of these closed banks are in fifteen Western States.

The agricultural depression, while it lasted, was so severe as to threaten depopulation even of productive communities. This was forcibly brought to my attention in 1923 in connection with a report of an investigation as to the advisability of assisting farmers in Golden Valley County, Montana, to pay 1923 taxes. An examination of the tax list showed that, out of a total of approximately 900 farmers who undertook to farm in 1923 to some extent, and who had been landowners, not over 200 would be able to hold their land. The property of all the rest had been foreclosed or was in process of foreclosure or was to be foreclosed in the course of the next few months. The tax record showed that only 160 farmers residing in the county and operating their farms had paid as much as half of their 1923 taxes. Of this number, approximately one-fifth owed part of their taxes prior to 1923. With taxes almost entirely unpaid, it is obvious that other debts of these farmers received scant attention.

Corporate reorganization commonly has for its purpose the reduction of fixed charges. When actual and prospective earnings of a company are clearly inadequate to justify the annual charges for borrowed money, the only solution is a drastic writing down of capital assets and capital liabilities. Like that of the industries dependent upon him, the farmer's answer to his financial troubles was bankruptcy. Farm-land values in the Northwestern States increased 200 to 250 per cent from 1914 to 1920. The 1914 values represented a fair estimate of the worth of the land as a capital asset. Taxes on this land increased during the same period 150 to 325 per cent. If one doubles the price of land and more than doubles the taxes, and uses these inflated values as the basis for the farmer's debts, the hopelessness of his situation should occasion no surprise. While any general statement must be varied for the individual farmer and particular locality, agriculture is today essentially a deflated industry. It has scaled down its inflated capital account and reduced its fixed charges. Its floating debts have been eliminated. As a result, it is able to reap the fullest advantage from the increased price of farm products.

The United States courts closed approximately 18,000 bankruptcy cases in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914. Of these, approximately 1,000 were cases of farmers. In the fiscal year of 1924 approximately 42,000 cases were closed and of these nearly 8,000 were cases of farmers. While the total number of cases increased about 125 per cent, bankruptcy petitions of farmers increased 600 per cent. The farmers' proportion of all cases was 1/18 in 1914, 1/5 in 1924. Farmers' cases were 1/9 of the Georgia total in 1914, ¼ in 1924; 1/10 of the Nebraska total in 1914, 1/3 in 1924; 1/3 of the 1914 Montana total, 2/3 in 1924; ½ of the 1914 North Dakota total, 4/5 in 1924; 1/3 of the 1914 South Dakota total, 3/5 in 1924. Georgia showed a 1,000 per cent increase of farmers' bankruptcy cases in ten years; Nebraska, 1,300 per cent; Montana, 900 per cent; North Dakota, 600 per cent; South Dakota, 500 per cent. These figures take on an added significance when it is recalled that a farmer cannot be forced into bankruptcy, and that, by assignments under State laws, homestead and other exemptions, and transfers of property to relatives, there are numerous devices other than bankruptcy by which the farmer, as a practical matter, can put his property out of the effective reach of creditors. The dissemination of the knowledge of methods of debt evasion and the ease with which this knowledge can be successfully applied has undermined the morale of many Middle Western and Southern communities and is the cause of much concern to bankers and others doing business in those localities.

The actual result of bankruptcy has been financially beneficial to nearly every farmer, whether renter or landowner, whose burden of debt was excessive. If a renter, his personal and family exemptions usually leave him a considerable nucleus of property for recommencing operations, with all debts wiped out. If a landowner, his situation is not so simple, but the result is similar. Suppose a landowner has title to 160 acres, valued by him at $150 an acre, or $24,000, and worth, on a fair capitalization of earnings, $100 an acre, or $16,000. Against this he has a first mortgage of $9,000, which, with past-due interest, amounts to about $10,000. He has bank debts of $4,000, secured by chattel mortgage on farm machinery and live stock which cost $6,000 and is fairly worth $3,000 at depreciated values. These debts are additionally secured by a second mortgage on his farm. Besides these secured debts, he has miscellaneous obligations amounting to $1,000 or more to local merchants, doctors, fertilizer companies, and others. The farmer becomes discouraged and, following the example of his neighbors, he files a petition in bankruptcy, known locally as "taking the cure." His sole listed assets consist of his equities in real estate and chattels. The filing of the petition in bankruptcy forces the first mortgagee to foreclose his mortgage, on which there is certain to be a default. There is no market for real estate at any price in a bankrupt community and the first mortgagee is forced to bid in the property at the foreclosure sale for the amount of the mortgage. He thus squeezes out the holder of the second mortgage. The chattel mortgagee has no course open except to foreclose his mortgage. It is to the interest of the first mortgagee, who now has title to the property, to keep the farmer on the land, so he offers to rent the farmer the premises, furnish him with seed, and buy in the chattels at the foreclosure sale. There is no chance for the holder of the chattel mortgage to get fair bids for the personal property. The residents of the community have no current resources, and, even if they had, they would not bid against a neighbor. Unless the chattel mortgagee can take over the property himself, which in most cases is impossible, the actual result is that the chattels are sold for a few hundred dollars at the foreclosure sale, either to the farmer owner or to the first mortgagee for the owner's account. It is commonly said that at a foreclosure sale a mule with a dollar-bill tied to his tail will bring sixty cents. I have before me the record of three foreclosure sales on which the mortgagee realized $222.43, $343.43, and $346.80, respectively. The value of the chattels sold, according to the financial statements of the owners, was from $3,500 to $5,000 in each case. Some of the individual items on the sheriff's returns are as follows:

3 mules	$18.00
Wagon and harness	[illegible]
13 ranch horses	7.00
Wagon	[illegible]
Drill	5.00
8 plows	[illegible]
Threshing machine	15.00
Fordson tractor	16.50
3 cows and 1 yearling	[illegible]

The last stage in the farmer's rehabilitation follows his discharge in bankruptcy. The first mortgagee reconveys the land and the chattels to the farmer for a sum equal to the old first mortgage plus the amount advanced for the repurchase of the chattels and takes a new long-term first mortgage as security. The farmer has his land back, with his machinery and his live stock. His second mortgage, chattel mortgage, and all his current floating debts are extinguished, wheat is $1.50 a bushel, and the Department of Agriculture promises him the third largest corn crop on record.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has been hitchhiking. His young friends have long been telling him of the joys of the road, and he saw no reason why years of presumed discretion should keep him from acquaintance with this national sport. When he was young the wild young men were supposed to take to the sea—though very few did; today, apparently, all the young men and women take to the road. Tales of transcontinental pilgrimages stirred the Drifter's blood; modestly, he set out to try the highways of Vermont.

* * * * *

CITY folk are suspicious of the stranger when on their own heath—or cement; but the Drifter had supposed that a city man touring the hill-country with his wife would be glad to give a weary foot-passenger a lift. Not so. The Drifter acquired a new yardstick for automobiles. A Ford with a vacant seat meant a sure offer of a lift; any modest country car or local delivery wagon meant probable hospitality; the big polished city touring car or limousine was sure to whiz past in silent disdain. It may be different in the West; for the sake of the continental hitchhikers the Drifter hopes so.

SOME say that hitchhiking has been overdone, and that the automobilists lose patience with the abundance of parasitic pedestrians. The vice-president of a cracker-factory, after inviting the Drifter to ride, poured forth a flood of carrier's fears. He hardly ever picked up hikers, this worthy said; they were too likely to repay their host by beating him and robbing him. A series of accounts of such affrays in the South and the Far West, all told in detail, but at fourth or fifth hand, followed. The Drifter gasped a pained expression of gratitude under the circumstances; his host replied that after all he was glad to help—his club's motto was: "He profits most who serves best." "And what is the club?" "The Rotary Club." The Drifter kept his peace, while the discourse on service flowed on.

THE vice-president of the cracker factory, however, while venting his fears and his Rotarian ideals, drove twenty miles out of his way in order to help the Drifter toward his goal, and appalled the Drifter by stopping in one village to buy strawberry ice-cream cones for himself and his guest. Indeed, all the Drifter's hosts were overwhelmingly generous. A young theological student who was earning his tuition by peddling cakes through the mountain villages presented the Drifter with one of his finest products; and a philosophic mechanic opened a discourse on fishing by offering the Drifter a cake of sweet chocolate. A lonely traveling salesman was pathetically grateful for company; and one friendly soul, after dropping the Drifter, did an errand of his own and then cruised on up the Drifter's little-traveled road to help him further on his journey.

THE Drifter passed signs that marked the route to Calvin Coolidge's birthplace, but his infidel feet turned in another direction. Nothing that he saw in those hills explained the taciturn President to him. He found the Vermonters eager to talk about their green hills. Several had spent odd days working on the "Long Trail" that follows the mountains from Canada to Massachusetts. An awning-maker begged the Drifter to camp with him that very night. These men knew where the fish lurked, and spoke of hunting trips with enthusiasm; they had scant gift for poetic expression, but poetry was in their hearts. The most passionate hunter among them, after telling of bear and deer, and of balsam camps and lonely ponds, added: "I like to hunt. But somehow I don't care much about killing the animals any more."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

An Answer to the Left Wing

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The arguments advanced by Mr. Louis Hyman in your issue of July 22 in defense of his acts and the acts of his fellow-"joint-actionists" are as mythical and as removed from reality as is his "committee of action."

It is hardly necessary, at this time, to reiterate that the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union has, ever since its organization, maintained a consistent record as a progressive labor union, and that it has never attempted and does not now attempt to control the political views or activities of its members; that it does not consider it improper for a local union to arrange May Day demonstrations or to invite radical speakers to address such meetings.

A definite line of demarcation, however, must be drawn between the mere expression of political views by the members within the organization, or their political activities outside the organization, and activities which have for their object the committing of the union to an outside organization to the extent of taking orders from such organization and thereby dividing the union along lines entirely foreign to its aims, objects, and struggles.

A movement of the latter kind has developed within the last few years under the auspices of the Communist Party, the Workers Party, the Trade Union Educational League, and similar groups. The all-important feature which distinguishes these organizations from all other radical political organizations which we knew in the past is that their definite and announced purpose it to dictate policies of our union, to "capture" its officials and locals, to discredit the administration of our union under all circumstances, and to bring dissension and discord within our ranks. That this is the purpose of the organizations mentioned is clearly shown by their own publications, their official programs, and above all by the consistently abusive, hostile, and pernicious attitude of their Jewish organ, to which Mr. Hyman and his fellow-"joint-actionists" loyally and steadily contribute.

Mr. Hyman denies that the majority of the suspended members of the three executive boards are members of the Workers Party and says that only minorities among them belong to it. When these suspended officials were running for election last fall they all denied before the election committee that they were Communists or that they belonged to any leagues hostile to the I. L. G. W. U. They all signed statements to the effect that "they do not belong to any Communist leagues and that they consider such leagues as a menace and a detriment to the trade-union movement." When they got into office, however, they threw off their masks and began to sabotage every constructive effort of the union. Now they are professing that not all of them are members of the Communist Party, but they are just as truthful and sincere about it as they were when they denied it before the election committee last fall.

The rest of Mr. Hyman's argument is, from the point of veracity, just as substantial. A sample of it is contained in the assertion that the union's policy is to "call fake strikes and to line the pockets of its henchmen"—a statement so preposterous that it will only provoke smiles among our members. In line with it is the statement that "they have demanded an accounting for the expenditure of $2,000,000 by the Joint Board," made obviously to create the impression that the Joint Board spends lavishly millions of dollars without system and accounting, whereas it is known to anyone who has ever had any dealings with the Joint Board that each penny it spends is carefully accounted for by an elaborate accounting and auditing system which is always open to inspection by responsible members of the organization, and that most of these expenditures were approved by this self-same Mr. Hyman in his capacity as secretary of Local 9—together with the other secretaries of the other local unions—and also as a member of the finance committees during strikes.

Concerning the charge of "undemocratic system of representation" at the Joint Board, which gives each local the same representation regardless of numbers, this system was adopted by the Joint Board nearly twenty years ago for no other purpose than that of giving every trade and craft in the industry represented in the Joint Board an equal voice so that the smaller crafts might not become overwhelmed by the larger trades, and have their interests ignored and unfavorable restrictions imposed upon them.

New York, July 17

MORRIS SIGMAN,
President, International Ladies' Garment Workers Union

A Loan to Honduras?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Honduras, one of the five Central American republics, is now taking lessons from the bankrupt nations of Europe. Shrouded in an air of mystery and concealing themselves from outsiders seeking information on their errand, a Financial Mission has reached Washington and set up offices with the final intention of seeking connections with some banking firm in order to negotiate a loan of about $20,000,000 with which to put the country on a sound and sober financial basis.

The purpose of the loan as stated in the official press of Honduras is to liquidate the old English debt which has ever been an irksome matter to the country, all outstanding internal indebtedness arising from revolutions, and the balance, if any, to undertake some useful public work.

With due respect to the present occupant of the Honduran presidential chair, whom we consider a really honest man, we are reluctant to concede that if this money is secured it will be invested for the purpose sought. No one in Honduras distrusts Dr. Paz Barahona; he is a really honest man, but he has the worst sort of people behind him, men that have made grafting a real art. Two of his chief backers, long before he ventured into politics, struggled hard to negotiate a similar loan with J. P. Morgan, but their plans were thwarted. Correspondence was intercepted in which they conspired to saddle on the country a protectorate in order to put through their plans for a loan.

Granting the good intentions of the Honduran government to set its house in order, with what revenue does it intend to pay off this loan? We know of no other revenue but the customs. There are no taxes in Honduras such as we have here. But should the customs be pledged a grave situation will arise. The matter of the stability of the government will have to be insured and this cannot be accomplished in a roundabout way. There is no question that Dr. Paz Barahona is not solidly seated; every week the papers carry news about uprisings in Honduras. Thus if the loan is granted under these conditions, once more the United States will be involved in the unpleasant task of collecting private debts.

We have nothing against Dr. Paz Barahona, but we consider it the duty of good citizens to point out these facts, so that the American people may form judgment on this new scheme of international banking and, if possible, save themselves the humiliation of having the United States marines act as collectors for the money lenders of Wall Street, as they are now doing in Nicaragua without any authorization whatsoever of the Congress of the United States.

New York, July 4 JULIO CÉSAR VALLE

The War Against Evolution

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In view of the necessary condensation of my article, The War Against Evolution, and of the consequent misapprehensions involved in some of its statements, will you please make the following correction:

It was not the State Library of Georgia which was refused appropriation lest it contain books on evolution. The bill which was defeated was one to permit counties, school districts, or municipalities to establish and maintain public libraries; this was defeated 57 to 63, largely through fundamentalist influence.

In North Carolina the war against evolution has been carried on not through refusal to employ teachers who believe in the theory but through censorship of high-school textbooks by Governor Cameron Morrison, with the cooperation of the State Board of Education. Governor Morrison more than a year ago stated: "I will not allow any such doctrine or intimation of such doctrine to be taught in the public schools."

In the statement regarding the University of Texas the phrase "Although there are, of course, many evolutionists who are atheists" should read: "Although there are, of course, many evolutionists who are theists."

San Francisco, July 2 MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD

Have the French Read Flaubert?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Of course nobody can read everything; so it seems fair to wonder how many French statesmen read a certain book called "Salammbô," by one Flaubert. The book, as you may remember, is devoted to describing what might happen if France should employ a great army of Africans, and if, either out of resentment at the rejection of some demands of theirs or for mere plunder's sake, the Foreign Legion should head a mutiny of the Africans.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Ballard Vale, Massachusetts, June 11

For Viands and Vamps

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Anent this hullabaloo about race. I have always been an advocate of the golden extreme; I detest the pinchbeck mean, but in this uproar about Nordics and the opposite I am moved to inquire, Why not take a nice, safe, mealy-mouthed fifty-fifty, good lord, good devil stand?

What are the diagnostics of civilization? Obviously good cuisine and women.

As to the first, Sidney Luska, one of the great unknown Americans, tells us that, next to the French, Jewish cookery is the best in the world. I assert that American Negro comes third.

In re the second, hearken to the most appreciative lover of our era, J. H. Curle. In "The Shadow-Show" this Australian, after passing in review all the other women of the earth and noting their defects, concludes thus: "My affinity lies in the Gothic North. Austrians, Germans, and Scandinavians are the women of my dreams. A wintry landscape, with a fairish woman in her furs, is civilization's masterpiece."

So there you are. If you live to eat, choose the others. If you live for women, root for the Nordics. Yours for viands and vamps.

New York, June 8 PAUL MUNTER

Esther Lea Yarnell

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: At the country home of Mr. and Mrs. John Cooper Packard, east of Pasadena, on Sunday afternoon, June 21, about fifty of the close personal friends of Esther Lea Yarnell, who recently passed away, gathered to pay tribute to her beautiful memory. Mrs. Samuel W. Packard presided.

Letters and telegrams were received from friends of Miss Yarnell who could not be present, notable among them being messages from Tom Mann, British labor leader; Eugene V. Debs, who wrote of the gladness brought him by a visit from Miss Yarnell when he was in Atlanta penitentiary; Mother Jones, Clarence Darrow, Art Young, Bruce Rogers. There were messages from civic bodies, including the American Civil Liberties Union, and from Berlin.

Pasadena, California, June 24 G. K.

Mr. Bok's National Song

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In reading Edward W. Bok's "Our United States," a two-stanza "Song of the Nation," I was instantly reminded of Katharine Lee Bates's "America the Beautiful." It seems incredible that the thoroughly Americanized Mr. Bok, a man twice thirty, was not familiar with Miss Bates's universally known and loved patriotic song when he composed his own song. Likewise it seems incredible that if he were familiar with Miss Bates's poem he should have made use of expressions either identical with some of hers or similar to them, for by Mr. Bok's own written and published confession he has led one to infer that he is neither ignorant nor unoriginal.

His line "Whose fruited hills and amber fields" immediately calls to mind Miss Bates's lines "For amber waves of grain" and "Above the fruited plain." Mr. Bok's version is hardly an improvement on Miss Bates's. Perhaps he is a bit less accurate, too, in describing our hills instead of our plains as fruited.

The beginning of Mr. Bok's second stanza: "Across the seas we stretch our hand In Brotherhood of Man" is reminiscent of Miss Bates's well-known "And crown thy good with brotherhood, From sea to shining sea."

If Mr. Bok knew Miss Bates's poem how he could have written "Of homes undimmed by woman's tears" without thinking at once of her "Undimmed by human tears" is difficult to conceive. And if he did know her poem, why should he have written a phrase in the same rhythm and with the same wording except for one change? Miss Bates has "alabaster cities" "undimmed by human tears," while Mr. Bok has the "homes"—which make up the cities—"undimmed by woman's tears." Miss Bates is more universal, Mr. Bok more specialized.

Portland, Maine, June 7 CAROLINE E. VOSE

Falstaff's "Green Fields"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your article in the issue of June 24, Improving Shakespeare, recalls a note in the Evening Post fifteen or twenty years ago from the Shakespearean reader, George Riddle, suggesting that the "green fields" were the "green pastures" of the Twenty-third Psalm—memories of early teaching coming back to the old man at death.

Rochester, New York, June 22 M. T. L. GANNETT

Books and Plays

Christ Dead

By MacKNIGHT BLACK

The sun-tanned feet of Jesus
Were two dead sparrows on the ground,
And his eyes were candles that a wind had touched.
His flesh was an echo that the hills desired.

But Jesus walked again with Matthew,
And his eyes were fire with John.
His body was thunder from the lips of Luke.

Now he is dead at last. Men walk with men.
Now he is dead. And their eyes have lost his eyes.
Now he is surely dead. And their bodies must follow his own.

But Jesus Christ is treading their blood
And Jesus Christ is burning their eyes
And Jesus Christ is he who is ever against their breasts!

Brigham Young

Brigham Young. By M. R. Werner. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

JOSEPH SMITH, the founder of Mormonism, was a mystic, a dreamer, an improver, whose differentiation between reality and fancy was so hazy that, coupled with his adolescent tendency to mental dissociation, he produced those audacious and remarkable Americana: "The Book of Mormon," "The Doctrine and Covenants," and "The Pearl of Great Price." Brigham Young, the savior of Mormonism in its darkest hours, was a practical-minded Yankee, an extrovert, with a firm grasp on reality. He was not a man of fantasy or introspection. The mechanism of his mind he himself uncovered when he remarked:

> This is my philosophy on thinking, and if I were obliged to think for ten years, and not erect a building or [illegible] or in any way put my thoughts into execution, I would materially injure my mental faculty, through want of results for it to rest upon.

Under Young's leadership the institution found its final form, with many of its unique features of social control and its strong sense of group solidarity.

The roots of Mormonism lie in that great democratic upheaval after 1800 which gave rise, on the one hand, to religious revivalism and, on the other, to the political expression of the masses which finally swept Jackson into office. Almost all its major peculiarities are related to features common to the culture of 1800-1840 west of the Alleghanies. Its economic developments, too, its tithings, its several attempts at communism and cooperatives, and its present commercial-industrial hold on the Great Basin are worthy of study. Divergent practices, such as surround the belief in divine revelations, in divinely appointed priesthoods, and particularly in polygamy, were imposed within a generation on thousands of people of different, even antagonistic, backgrounds. For the student of cultural history it speaks much as an example of social change under the appropriate emotional stresses within and the converging environmental crises without.

As Mr. Werner maintains, one can scarcely write the biography of Brigham Young without writing the history of the Mormon church. Thus, after a brief chapter on the birth and early years of Young, over a third of the book is taken up with the period of Joseph Smith. Throughout the latter's lifetime, Young, while a trusted apostle, never came into direct favor. Young's early contributions were confined to extensive proselyting, both in the States and in Europe, and in directing the escape of the Mormons from Missouri to Illinois during a period when Smith was in hiding. These two activities, however, did much to enhance his prestige with the bulk of the common membership of the church, and Smith's death gave him his opportunity.

It was evident that the Mormons could never remain in Illinois, and Young began that great exodus to the West which meant the salvation of the church. Werner's description of that pilgrimage is perhaps the ablest section of his book. It was largely due to Young's dominant will, to his insight into political and economic situations, to his choice of competent lieutenants, and to his sense of humor and balance that he brought thousands of people into the Great Basin and there founded communities, stimulated agriculture by irrigation, fostered local industries, and within twenty years constructed a self-sustaining culture in a desert.

Here the Mormons felt secure from their enemies, the gentiles, a thousand miles away. But Utah could not remain in the isolation of stage-coach and covered-wagon days. The transcontinental railroad cut across the territory, the local industries languished, and the gentiles came in increasing numbers, especially upon the discovery of gold and silver in the Utah mountains. Once more Mormonism came into contact with the outside world. And before his death Brigham Young was to witness the insidious influences at work which are, no doubt, ultimately to wipe out the cultural distinctions between his people and the rest of the country.

Young spent his last years bolstering his people against the gentiles and in conflict with the federal government over polygamy. He died at the age of seventy-six, mourned by his thousands of followers as a modern Moses and deprecated by his enemies as the greatest traitor to his government since Aaron Burr and as the most monstrous opponent to decent Christianity since Nero.

Legends are certain to surround such men as Young. The sources of information about him are highly biased. On the whole, Werner has done exceptionally well in presenting Young's portrait. Especially happy is his frequent use of Young's sermons, which give the best clue to his mentality and philosophy. Whatever the future of Mormonism, Brigham Young will stand with Robert G. Ingersoll, Dwight L. Moody, Frances E. Willard, P. T. Barnum, and others, as one of the most striking figures in that emerging American folklore of which we have only lately been conscious.

KIMBALL YOUNG

The Battle for a World Court

The Permanent Court of International Justice and the Question of American Participation. By Manley O. Hudson. Harvard University Press. $4.

Security Against War. By Frances Kellor and Antonia Hatvany. The Macmillan Company. 2 volumes. $6.

WHY is it that the National Council for the Prevention of War and the League of Women Voters and thousands of church societies urge so passionately that we join the World Court as a great step toward world peace? And why is it that others are so alarmed lest by joining it we somehow compromise our purity and postpone the great day of good-will on earth? I have read patiently Manley Hudson's plea for the court and Frances Kellor's attack upon it, and still I do not know.

It isn't much as a court. The nations of this cautious, selfish, over-victorious Allied world of ours made it, and they no longer even pretend to wear haloes. None of them was willing to give it much power; and they have been timorous about referring important matters to it. But it has acted reasonably and expeditiously whenever it has had a chance. Even Miss Kellor admits that; and she has such a magnificent bitterness against the League and all its works that when she admits anything good about them she is extraordinarily convincing. The court, in the East Karelia case, even showed a bold independence of the League that gave it birth. In that dispute between Russia and Finland it declared itself incompetent to judge, Russia having refused to appear before it. That, it seems to me, was a splendid and deserved rebuke to the Council of the League, which ignored, as the League has always resolutely ignored, the fundamental flaw in its own constitution—its failure to include Germany and Russia as equal partners. What is the use of prating about international ideals in a body which clearly and constantly shows its double parentage in the victories of Versailles and the capitalist fear of a proletarian state?

The court is better than the League. No political chancellery dictates to any of its judges. The Hague conferences were unable to build a permanent court because the little nations and the big could not agree upon a method of electing judges satisfactory to both; the League constitution, with its two bodies—one in which, as in our Senate, all the states are equally represented and one in which the Great Powers preponderate—offered a compromise solution. The Powers nominate by geographical groups, and both Assembly and Council must vote for a judge before he is chosen. If Germany, Russia, and the United States were to participate in the choice it would seem to be as good a compromise as can be devised. Some compromise there must be; it is nonsense to insist that Liberia and Siam and Panama stand upon an absolute par with the great empires of the world. The facts that the court is thus a creation of the League and that the League sometimes turns to it for advisory legal opinions need not upset one's equilibrium, even though one is convinced that for the United States to join the League at this juncture would help chain Europe further to the prison of Versailles. Nor need the fact that the European nations have been slow to trust their troubles to the court destroy faith in the court or lead one to suppose that a different court would be better. The world will still be made up of the same nations even if we should start afresh upon the basis of the old Hague treaties.

There are wise folk who oppose joining the court unless it at the outset outlaws war and codifies international law. The phrase "outlawry of war" appeals to the American heart; but I doubt if the American people understand what it means. The American Legion adopted a resolution favoring it at New Orleans; I am sure they did not mean the words they used. Put it another way: Compulsory submission of all international disputes to arbitration—are we ready for that? Would we, for instance, arbitrate our dispute with Haiti? I should like to see a forthright campaign to educate the American people to willingness to discuss their international problems with other nations. And I wish the League of Nations people would be silent for a while, and permit the people to think about international questions without injection of that emotionalized issue.

Something about the League of Nations corrupts the mind. Manley Hudson, usually a person of exceptionally astute and discriminating scholarship, finds in his 287 pages of text and 75 pages of documentary appendices upon the court no room for the text of President Harding's St. Louis speech requiring revolutionary changes in the League's court; for Judge Moore's crisp comments on the suggestion that the court be asked to render advisory opinions; for Mr. Root's sage memorandum on the relation of the court to the question of codifying international law; for the statement, made by the committee of jurists called into consultation by the League, when the Council of the League insisted upon limiting the jurisdiction of the court; or for Senator Borah's alternative proposals. Mr. Hudson's religious devotion to the League and all its works destroys his critical acumen; one would hardly realize from his narrative that the Council of the League had again and again refused to submit contentious questions in their entirety to the court, or that because of the hesitations of the League Council Poland had evicted nearly a thousand German colonists in defiance of the opinion rendered by the court.

Miss Kellor's book gives documents which are missing from Mr. Hudson's. Her first volume, in which she analyzes the League's action at Vilna, in Silesia, Corfu, the Saar, and elsewhere, would be a useful antidote to the mushy sentimentalism of the current collegiate devotion to the League, if the professors would wade through its pages. As a history of the League, however, it is no fairer than Mr. Hudson's story of the court. Austria and Hungary are relegated to footnotes; the tone is persistently bitter; at times Miss Kellor gives evidence of a kind of Europhobia which blinds her to facts. To treat the League's interventions in Latin America as if they were outrageous interferences with a province where we ruled with far-seeing benevolence, for instance, is silly. Read with Mr. Hudson's studies, her second volume gives a rounded picture of the court. Each book requires the other as a supplement.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Poetry and Science

Earth Moods and Other Poems. By Hervey Allen. Harper and Brothers. $2.

HERE is the modern poet at his painful task of digesting science. In Mr. Allen's own words, "the first section, 'Earth Moods,' is for the most part an attempt to phrase poetically some of the modern conceptions of life . . . it is an epic of man in the northern hemisphere from the last ice age to the voyage of Columbus. It is presented from an astronomical perspective. . . ."

An epic without a hero, one would say at first, for this abstraction, "man," is no individual and therefore can be no hero. Later one realizes that there is, after all, a hero: Scientific Intelligence on a distant star which has been chosen as this year's meeting-place of the International Scientists' Association; and after the monographs on ethyl and the atom have been read, a half hour is granted to a queer fellow, doubtless a friend of one of the scientists, who puts on a movie for the serious thinkers, reeling off calculatedly fantastic visualizations of their mentations for them during a period of rest and refreshment. In short, Mr. Allen's plight is that of every contemporary poet who is too big to immerse himself in personal emotion, who has no ancestral religion to sustain and vivify and concentrate his imagination, and who plays with the avowedly "poetic" mythologies in deft abstracted manner while wondering what to do next.

Epic was never achieved in this mood, but certainly an enlargement of the field of experience over which lyric emotion can crystallize is gained by prolonged brooding on the facts of science—and this enlargement Mr. Allen achieves. For the thoughtful poet, brooding far backward over the history of his race instead of meditating only upon the brief history of his affair with Cynthia, finds his lyric moments here and there, as does Mr. Allen in many a notable passage in this volume that has seemed, as he says, to require "an almost epic treatment." But it all remains too static to be true epic; there is not the sublimely monotonous flow of some few overwhelmingly alive individuals down rivers of environment long accepted by the poet and his age. Leif the Lucky, Columbus, and the poet himself are all young tourists, and at any moment their newfangled ship may blow up.

Funeral at High Tide, in which the poet displays familiar landscape, accepted mythology—that of "Oh God! Oh! Jee-sus!" —and the simplicities of white fishermen and Negro mourners, is supremely successful; it obeys that formula of complete digestion of environment, mythology, and characters which must prevail if true epic is to be done on the larger scale to which this poet aspires.

ROBERT LOUIS BURGESS

The Assimilated Jew

God of Might. By Elias Tobenkin. Milton, Balch and Company. $2.

IN this book Mr. Tobenkin has answered Israel Zangwill. The ideal of assimilation which Zangwill presented in his "Melting Pot" is put to the test and found to be a sentimental bubble. Here a young Jew consciously throws himself into the cauldron that is America but cannot fuse with the dominant elements there because they refuse to accept him and deny the affinity between a Jew and the other peoples of a typical American community. This poignant tragedy comes at a propitious moment, for today the Jews in America are facing the problem which agonizes its hero and the gentile population is becoming conscious of the pressure which the non-Jews in this book unwittingly exert on Samuel Waterman.

Waterman finds that neither intermarriage nor acceptance of most of the American mores unites him with the people he has adopted. As another "assimilated" Jew puts it, "Nobody bothers about your belief or unbelief—it is conformity that people demand. . . . If I had known eighteen or even fifteen years back what I know today, I would have gone where nobody knew me and would have buried my Jewish origin as deep as I could. . . . Then it was still time." But Waterman cannot conform. Memories of an orthodox upbringing; an inability to accept conscientiously the dogmas of Christianity, and the inevitable ties that bind him to the faith of his father keep him from church affiliations, though outwardly he has broken with his family in order to marry a gentile, and keep him a stranger in his town and to his family.

The general reader—and this novel is most emphatically for the general reader—will feel that the story of Samuel Waterman is only begun. Will he join the swaying congregation which prays to the God of Might? If so, will he part from his wife, lose his children, and challenge the small town? Can he continue to hold the anomalous position? Or will he surrender? Until these questions are answered the book must be judged incomplete. It is incomplete in another sense. Had he delayed the action of the plot to paint the panorama of the small Nebraska town as it is tangent to the life of the Jew, Mr. Tobenkin might have achieved greatness. As it is his novel ranks far above the shoddy sentimental reactions of those Jews who, becoming articulate in English, have contributed popular paeans to the Promised Land; it ranks with the best Yiddish interpretations of America.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Books in Brief

Orphan Island. By Rose Macaulay. Boni and Liveright. $2.

Miss Macaulay tells of a boatload of orphans, bound from London to San Francisco, wrecked, with their governess, a nurse, and the drunken ship's doctor, on a coral reef, and of the social taboos, forms, and conventions they set up and adhered to for seventy years—until discovered by the Thinkwells. It was no doubt a pleasant island, little frequented, with gentle rains and all the fruits and flowers of Tahiti in abundance; yet it became a land of prejudice and rebellion, of furtive drinking and mean pride, a spot forever England—and Victorian England at that. Nor was this evolution the result of a falling away from grace. Rather it was the direct consequence of a laying-on of civilization, the working of a stern, uncompromising faith in virtue, not unmixed with a contempt for the humors of the poor. Indeed, this satirical expedition of Miss Macaulay's proves (if it proves anything) how much of sweetness and toleration we owe to just such unregenerate rascals as Villon and Marlowe, how much of sanity to Falstaff, of beauty to Rabelais—and how little life would be worth living if Washington, as he is expounded to us, were indeed our ideal.

Gold by Gold. By Herbert S. Gorman. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

In the accepted tradition but with a new method Mr. Gorman brings a poet to New York and displays the process of his disillusion. Karl Nevins has a book of poems accepted by a metropolitan publisher. He fancies himself a genius, deserts his wife, and finds his chosen hell in New York. Encountering the pundits and the intellectuals, he watches them blow like puffed kites in the wind. Mr. Gorman lends his hero a soul of glittering perceptions, and yet tries to destroy him as a silly man of talent. The paradox is never quite resolved. The method is borrowed from Joyce; and though the words spin like golden rockets in a leprous sky they never quite assume the form of an inner original integrity. Joyce alone is Joyce. Mr. Gorman is enormously clever and often dazzling, but he has not yet found his own style.

The Groote Park Murder. By Freeman Wills Crofts. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

The House of Seclusion. By Marion Hervey. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

Two mystery stories in the dull if popular tradition whereby after the finding of the body the detective smells a clue and finally nips the murderer in the bud. Interminable dialogues and garrulous innocent bystanders disclose the core of the secret in a series of interviews as artistic and exciting as a court record.

Sea Horses. By Francis Brett Young. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The horses of Francis Brett Young have suffered a sea change within the deep green waters of Conrad's subaqueous world. The mood and color of Conrad's prose and Conrad's mind and especially Conrad's own practice of unique romance wash about the sea horses conjured up by Francis Brett Young so that Mr. Young often appears only as an honorable ghost just as Conrad himself so often appears as not much more than a discreet ghost of the blood-boltered Russians. A melancholy captain bound in by delicate scruples and gathering frustration (he is too much like the Heyst of "Victory") accepts as supercargo a woman in difficult circumstances. The crew all wear the garb of picturesque villains or austere seamen doing their duty. Africa and a fever port glower like an embodied horror. It is work of admitted distinction and enchantment, but Mr. Young herein is too often going about Conrad's business.

Greater France in Africa. By William Milligan Sloane. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Readers whose interest in the Moroccan war has led to a desire for further information about France's colonial experiments in Northern Africa will find a useful and up-to-date survey in this volume. The author visited Morocco and Algeria as a member of a group invited by the Committee Franco-America. Thus he saw the region primarily through official eyes, with both the advantages and handicaps of such a method. Mr. Sloane not only discusses the graver problems of the French protectorate but finds room also for notes on the picturesque and artistic aspects of the country. The book is illustrated with some excellent photographs, but there is only one map, and that rather unsatisfactory.

Swallowing the Anchor. By William McFee. Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

We would be tempted to say of Mr. McFee that he is more interesting as a man than as a writer were it not for the thought that if he hadn't turned writer we would not know how interesting a man he is. He is a marine engineer by vocation, a writer only by avocation. Clearly he regards himself as a good engineer—and he sticks to it. Apparently he is not equally sure that he is a good writer—but he sticks to it. We think he is right—in sticking to both. Each makes the other more worth while. Objectively Mr. McFee has little to say, in spite of wide experiences and extensive travels. Subjectively he has much to communicate—of which there is evidence in the twenty-seven essays, mostly on literary topics, collected in this book.

The Messages and Papers of Woodrow Wilson, with editorial notes and an introduction by Albert Shaw, and an analytical index. George H. Doran Company. 2 vols. $3.

Some day some conscientious plodder will assemble all the public papers of Woodrow Wilson, edit them, footnote them, and index them so that the student may find his text with ease. This edition comes nearer it than any yet issued. Like Dr. Shaw's compilation of 1918 it begins with the First Inaugural Address, omitting the magnificent material of the "New Freedom" period and the "Seven Sisters" addresses. It leaves out the preparedness addresses of 1916, but assembles the state papers which prefaced our entrance into the war and includes the full series of addresses in Europe and on that last trip West which brought the breakdown. The index is too slight to be very valuable, and a careful editor would not have left uncorrected such simple slips of the stenographic ear as "Adjur-Badjan" for Azerbaijan.

Memoir of the Harvard Dead in the War Against Germany. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe and Others. Vol. V. Harvard University Press.

This last volume, concluding the record of the 373 Harvard men who died in and through the war, includes many men who died after the armistice. One was a pilot in the Kosciusko squadron killed flying over Lemberg in preparation for war against the Bolsheviki. Another was slain by apaches at Brest; still another's bruised body was found in the Rhine. Influenza took most. The war found its victims in curious and varied ways, but one word inevitably rises to consciousness as one reads these memoirs of these venturesome boys who met death gladly. It is "gallant."

Commercial Yearbook of the Soviet Union; 1925. Edited by Louis Segal and A. A. Gantalor. B. W. Huebsch. $2.50.

Here is a new kind of book about Soviet Russia. There is no propaganda in it—unless facts and figures and texts of laws be propaganda. How much cotton did Russia grow in 1923? How much better was that than the 1922 figure and how much worse than in 1913? Here is the answer. What is the depth of water in any Russian port, and what quay space is available? Who is the Russian diplomatic representative in London or Athens or Mexico City? How many shoes did Russia make last year? How many did she import, and whence? How big is her army? What proportion of her trade in woolen [illegible] in oil is carried on by private individuals, by cooperatives, by the state? How many automobiles has she? How many schools? What are her tariff duties? Her tax laws? The answers are all here. It is as matter-of-fact a record as a report by the Department of Commerce. Business men will find more in it to interest them than agitators will. Bolsheviks and Red-hunters can dig material out of it to prove Russia's rise or [illegible] as they wish. But no one will find passion in it. Russia is here again a part of the world of everyday common-sense life.

James Gibbons Huneker. By Benjamin De Casseres. Joseph Lawren. $1.50.

The volume comprises a tentative bibliography of Huneker's writings, for which his admirers will be grateful, and forty pages of homage by Mr. De Casseres. Although Jack London, Edwin Markham, James Branch Cabell, and other men of letters unite, on the jacket of the book, to honor Mr. De Casseres's genius, what he has to say about his friend and hero is undiscriminating as criticism, strained as epigram, and out of date as Philistine-baiting. It is a pity. Huneker was a great personality, and his services to American culture it would be difficult to overestimate. He deserves the honor of intelligent criticism.

Aristotle. By John Burnet. Oxford University Press. 35 cents.

Few except specialists realize that the existing works of Aristotle, impressive as is their scope and bulk, are, in the main, not the writings published during his lifetime and known throughout antiquity as his works, but his private lecture notes. The implications of this important fact are brought out in Professor Burnet's address, delivered before the British Academy, along with valuable suggestions toward determining the chronology both of the existing and of the lost works of the Stagirite. Particularly interesting is the emphasis placed upon the period of Aristotle's residence in Ionia, and upon his kinship with the Ionian philosophers. In this connection Professor Burnet takes occasion again to stress the neglected fact that few of the great philosophers of Greece were Athenians.

advt.

HELP — WANTED
by an Advertiser

The above caption was suggested by the thought that not everybody reads the advertisements. Frequently, the small classified notices are as interesting as news.

An artist who wants someone to share her apartment and her interests over in Paris; an estate for sale of eighty-six acres—apples, cherries, pears; trout, salmon; bear, deer, geese, Chinese pheasants; more prosaic, a lawyer who wants a secretary—or a Radcliffe graduate who wants to tutor; or an instructor of English who is looking for a new connection; or an importer who wants a business assistant. . . .

Sometimes the results secured by just a few lines are amazing. To one such advertisement over one hundred replies were received. In partial explanation is the fact that readers of The Nation are uncommonly responsive to a message in The Nation—even to an advertising message.

Read the classified section and use it if there's something you want; a position, an employee, an apartment, a lessee, an estate, or a buyer. Advertise your need in The Nation. Write the Classified Advertising Department of The Nation for information.

Another volume of amazing adventure

FROM PRESIDENT TO PRISON

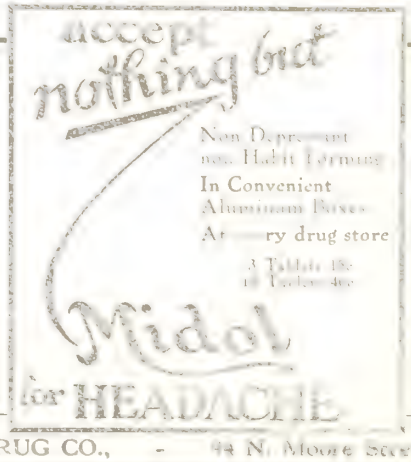
By FERDINAND OSSENDOWSKI

BECAUSE of his command of Siberian resources, gained as already told in "Man and Mystery in Asia," Dr. Ossendowski was sent to act as chemist in the supply service of Kuropatkin's army. He tells of the confusion and corruption which followed the Japanese War, of the [illegible] of 1905, of his Presidency for 53 days of the ill-fated Far Eastern Republic, and of the prison to which he was sent on its collapse. Characteristically vigorous and enthralling. $3.00

MAN AND MYSTERY IN ASIA

BEAST, MEN AND GODS

E. P. DUTTON & CO., Publishers, 681 Fifth Ave., N.Y.



GENERAL DRUG CO., - 93 N. Moore Street, New York

[illegible] please mention The Nation.

"Art" in the Movies

By GILBERT SELDES

THE hardest thing a critic of the movies has to face is the accusation that he wants to make the movies artistic. The reason this is a crime is, of course, that art doesn't sell; and the critic, whenever he has the good fortune to talk to a professional, feels the underlying hostility which means "you want to bankrupt me."

The last thing I want to see is a movie made for the pleasure of a few aesthetes. I have been assured that we shall come to it; that a chain of little movie houses, like the little theaters, will give new vitality and new artistic standards to the movie; and that gradually the movie, like the commercial theater, will incorporate the good discoveries of the artistic groups. This is possible; but unless there is a great confusion of terms, it seems to me unnecessary. "Art" when used roughly about the movies usually means good interior decoration, Duse-like restraint in registering emotions, and the elimination of banal plots and incidents. It also suggests a great infusion of "artiness"; the whole attitude of movies for the few is arrogant and patronizing. Regard the mechanics of the stage and you are instantly aware that at its best a play can have only a few hundred auditors at one time; look at the mechanics of the film and you see that, while you can have a movie for one spectator, the natural thing is to have hundreds of thousands simultaneously—the limit is really the product of multiplying the number of prints by the number of spectators; it approaches infinity. I am in favor of its doing so.

The confusion, I suspect, arises from our habit of saying that a film is inartistic when we dislike the plot, a standard we might as well apply to the "Vanities of 1925." We say it, again, when the methods used are a little obvious, when, in order to show us that a husband is no longer in love with his wife, a director can think of nothing but having the gentleman thumb his nose at the lady in public. But these are largely matters of intelligence; the directors may be right in assuming that their spectators do not understand a shrug of the shoulder, and the whole notion that subtlety is the basis of art is open to question. It is possible that the moving picture can handle only broad effects; it is certain that a satisfactory picture can be made with them.

The artistic elements can exist in a film without for a moment touching upon the subject in such a way that the spectator is made uncomfortably aware of them. The structure of the whole film, the relation of part to part, the rhythm of the action and its variations—all these can give a picture artistic qualities, and they are as possible in a slap-stick comedy as in a super-spectacle.

We get further if we ask of a picture only that it be technically a good picture—that it utilize the capacities of the camera to the full. In this respect the most interesting films made in America today are the quarter, half, or one reel "short subjects" which usually follow the news of the day. Sometimes they are scenics, sometimes trick photography, sometimes drawn pictures or combinations of drawn and photographed pictures; and they are always interesting. The aesthete of the films hardly recognizes them, because they offer very little scope for imagination, in the story sense, or for composition; and none for plot. But these films are made with complete mastery of the instrument. The last one I saw in the way of trick photography was a joy. It represented a cow in a meadow. The cow walked. Presently the fore part lengthened itself and then again collapsed, or walked away entirely from the hind quarters; a moment later the cow was facing itself and walked head-on into itself. The whole thing was pure movie and was done with perfect skill. Another example: a film made by Soviet Russia—for what propaganda I cannot say, as it dealt with the work of the ice-crushers which open lanes in the Arctic. I happened to see this on a bill which also presented Caligari and Chaplin in "The Fugitive"—certainly the best movie program I ever saw, and entirely devoid of "presentation features"—and the Russian "actuality" seemed to be as interesting in its way as the main film or the comedy. Every position the camera could assume was utilized; you saw the copper-clad nose of the ice-boat as if it were a knife-blade, cutting the ice; you saw the ice open and the streak of water was like a lightning flash; you saw planes and skyscrapers created by the camera. The film actually had beauty of a natural sort, reformed by mechanical skill.

Yet the average director of the average film still uses his camera as a meat-chopper; even the simple trick of slow-motion is abjured, as if it would break the illusion of the film. The occasions when trick photography can be used are not, of course, unlimited; the misfortune is that our realistic films have driven all thought of anything not strictly accurate off the screen. That still leaves a wide scope for the camera: the field now occupied by purely conventional gestures and registrations can be refertilized by using the further developments of the methods of taking pictures; and the field of the caption can be cut down. The caption is essentially a connective, not an explanation, because the camera, if put to the test, can explain itself.

Master the camera and you will have started internally to make pictures properly artistic; ignore it, and all the art applied from the outside will only be façade, artiness, and eventually bunk. Master the camera and use your dullest plots, your worst happy endings; you will have comparatively good pictures. Ignore it, and your Othello, and Tess, and Penguin Island—if you choose them as possibly great pictures—will be "artistic," and terrible.

THEATER

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
466 GRAND ST.

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents

"WHAT PRICE GLORY"

A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings

PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

China's Servitude

A survey of foreign control in China, by Charles Hodges, assistant professor of politics of New York University, will appear in next week's issue of The Nation, followed by more articles and documents from Harry F. Ward, whose article The Meaning of Shanghai was published in The Nation for July 22.

International Relations Section

Mussolini's Fascist State

ITALY is passing through a period of political and social change. Single events, however important in themselves, can hardly give the significance of this change or its direction. The following summary of the accomplishments of the last parliamentary session is reprinted from the London Observer of June 28:

The parliamentary session has just closed with a series of dramatic surprises. Signor Mussolini has given the country plenty to think about during the holidays. During the last few sittings of the Chamber three important laws were passed in rapid succession, regulating respectively the position of the bureaucracy, the activities of the press, and the power of the Government to legislate by the use of royal decrees.

Without entering into details, it may be said that the general effect of these measures will be to strengthen the position of the executive and render it difficult if not impossible, for either Parliament, press, or civil servants to offer opposition to, or criticism of, its methods.

Lest the full import of this victory should be lost on the country, the Prime Minister closed the Fascist Congress last Monday with one of the most remarkable speeches he has ever made. It is an absolutely clear statement of his deliberate intention to create a Fascist state, a state in which Fascism will not be a part of the nation but the nation itself, so that the words Italian and Fascist shall come to be synonymous, just as are practically the words Italian and Catholic. As a preliminary, he announces that parliamentarism has been conquered. The laws that have been passed so far are for the defense of Fascism; those that will be put before the country in the autumn will carry on the work in a constructive and creative sense.

A Real Fascist State

That these intentions are the logical outcome of Signor Mussolini's policy for the last three years no one can doubt who has made any consecutive study of his acts, which are invariably plain, and of his public utterances, which have never been tortuous. The very boldness of his conceptions has caused many people to assume that he could not possibly mean what he said, and to hope that with time Fascism would slough off its most marked characteristics and cool down into a party more or less like any other, ready to give and take. They can hardly think this any more after his last declarations. He has flung out a straight challenge to his adversaries, and, in the absence of any really strong, homogeneous opposition, he may possibly go some way toward realizing his ideal of a state in which "all the power will be to all the Fascists."

So far as Mussolini is concerned the old Italy, the Italy of Liberals, Democrats, and Socialists, has passed away. We are at the dawn of the new Italy, which needs new institutions, new laws, and an entirely new directive. What is to be the type of the new Italian? He is to have "courage, intrepidity, love of risk, a repugnance for pacifism at all costs, readiness to dare both in individual and in collective life, and a hatred for all that is sedentary. He is to show discipline in work, respect for authority, and to feel pride every hour of the day in the thought that he is Italian."

This, as a Roman paper calls it, is the breviary of the perfect Fascist. In the new Fascist Government the executive power will practically control the destinies of the nation, for it is continuous and omnipresent.

> It is the power that finds itself called at any moment to solve vast problems, to decree great things, to declare war, to conclude peace. This power, which disposes of all the armed forces of the state, which controls day by day the complex machinery of state administration, cannot [illegible] a second place. It cannot be represented by a group of puppets who dance according to the caprices of popular assemblies.

A Constitutional Innovation

Yet Parliament is not to be abolished; it is even to be strengthened in one sense by the introduction of new forces. An organization of national syndicates will group the workers and producers of the country together in their different categories and classes. In the Italian Chamber of the future two-thirds of the deputies will be elected as before by universal suffrage, the remaining third will consist of technical representatives of the arts, professions, and industrial and agrarian interests of the country, elected from among the members of the local syndicates. This innovation, which has no precedent, will need the creation of an entirely new electoral law. It forms the basis of the constructive legislation now in course of preparation by a parliamentary commission of eighteen, popularly known as The Solons.

Signor Mussolini openly admits that in his hands Italy's goal is empire, not necessarily territorial, for empire may be political, economic, or spiritual. Yet Italians must never forget that their capital is Rome, the only city that ever succeeded in founding an empire on the fateful shores of the Mediterranean, and that the realization of the Fascist dream can only be attained by the formation of a granitic block of united national will.

It cannot be denied that these conceptions have a kind of Napoleonic grandeur, while no one can doubt Mussolini's ardent patriotism and his genuine belief in the possibility of leading Italy, through his own methods, on the path of happiness and prosperity. Like Napoleon, he has impressed himself upon his country with dynamic force at a critical moment of her history, and future historians may say of him, as Marmont said of his hero, "There was so much future in his mind." He stands for a reaction which, whatever may be its eventual outcome, has certainly resulted in the greatly increased vitality of the Italian people. He and Fascism together have come through storms which must have broken a smaller man and disintegrated a party that had not in itself some very vital cohesive elements. As it is, the party stands today before the country welded together in that iron discipline which Mussolini wishes to impose upon the whole nation.

Publicity for Armaments

THE League Arms Traffic Conference at Geneva aroused little general interest and understanding in this country. With the exception of the ban on poison gas its accomplishments were hardly noticed in the press. The following estimate of its importance by Charles Roden Buxton is reprinted from Foreign Affairs (London) for July:

The main result of the Arms Traffic Conference will be a greater degree of publicity for the arms traffic. There will be also a greater degree of government responsibility for it. A license has to be given by the government of the exporting country for any arms exported. As regards "category one" [arms exclusively destined for war], the export cannot take place at all except to a government. As regards "category two" [arms which may be used either for warlike or peaceful purposes], these may be exported to private individuals; but the consent of the government of the importing country must first be secured, if the laws of such country require it. The new arms traffic convention has a clause saying that the numbers of aircraft exported are to be published, but no other description is required, so that it gives no information with regard to aircraft for military purposes.

The arms traffic will probably continue on the same vast scale as at present; but we shall know more about it. It should be remembered that Article 8 of the Covenant of the League of Nations laid down, six years ago, that the members of the League would "interchange full and frank information" on armaments; and the new convention will be a slight step in that direction.

It is also a gain that the question is taken out of the sphere of private enterprise and brought into the sphere of government action. This will, at any rate, make it easier to get the same principle applied to a much bigger problem—that of the private manufacture of armaments.

Publicity

These results are not to be despised when we remember the great volume of the arms traffic and the powerful impression that would be made on public opinion if only the facts could be brought home. The League of Nations has published a useful volume of statistics. In the course of three years, from 1920-22, twenty of the principal countries exported war material to the value of over £45,000,000. And this figure did not include ships of war, aeroplanes, tanks, or armored cars. Even apart from this tremendous omission it must be remembered that the figures are very incomplete. They are not the result of any special inquiry, but are merely extracted from official or published reports. It is probable that a very great volume of traffic is entirely concealed.

The odd thing about the report is that while it shows £50,000,000 worth of exports, it shows only £17,000,000 worth of imports! This is partly because a number of importing countries make no returns; but it is also symptomatic of the fact that governments are much less ready to tell the world about the arms they receive than about those which they send to others.

America, it may be noted, heads the list of arms traffickers, Great Britain being second, and France third. (It is impossible to say, however, how much of the British exports consist of consignments to British possessions or British forces abroad.)

It is of special interest to note that during the period under review the total import of arms into China, even taking the officially admitted figures only, amounted to nearly £1,000,000.

What We Are Up Against

We may wish well to any efforts, however feeble, to show up this gigantic scandal. It is as well to realize, however, the feebleness of the effort, because the causes of that feebleness are matters of considerable interest from the point of view of foreign affairs in general. The main reasons why more was not done at Geneva were the following:

1. The desire of the great arms-producing Powers to keep their export as secret as possible. Hence the British amendment excluding warships, etc. (to which I allude below), and the complete dropping of the provisions for examination of consignments of arms in transit.

2. The fears of the governments that the restriction of the arms traffic would deprive their private manufacturers of those markets abroad which are required to keep their works going on a sufficiently large scale.

3. The desire of the small non-producing states to obtain arms freely—and if possible secretly—and not to be at the mercy of large producing states.

4. America's fear of being drawn too much into the League of Nations. Hence the dropping of the Central Information Bureau under the auspices of the League.

5. The unwillingness of independent states, such as Persia, to be treated as "prohibited zones."

6. The absence of Russia from the conference. Hence the decision to drop the obligation of publicity, so long as Russia should not adhere to the convention, on the part of the states bordering on her territory.

The effect of these difficulties, taken all together, was that the original draft convention, weak as it was, was considerably whittled away in the course of the proceedings. Many states were more concerned with their own particular objections than with the general object of the conference; and there was, unfortunately, no great driving force in support of effective action.

In the days of Mr. MacDonald's premiership, or even in the days when Lord Robert Cecil was a power in the deliberations of the League, such a driving force would have been supplied by the British Delegation. This was not to be looked for from a delegation consisting solely of the Earl of Onslow, Under-Secretary to the War Office. His assistants (with the exception of Mr. E. H. Marker, of the Board of Trade) consisted of the British military, naval, and air representatives on the Permanent Advisory Commission on Armaments. All the other important delegations (notably the French and American) contained numerous delegates, and among them men of political influence and distinction. The contrast was much commented on. The composition of the British Delegation suggested that the British Government regarded the subject of the conference as being purely military and having no political importance.

One of the fundamental difficulties in the way of disarmament is the place occupied in the counsels of the League by the members of the Permanent Advisory Commission (military, naval, and air experts). From being a mere advisory body to the Council, this body has risen to a position of quite unmerited power, and has impressed its attitude of mind on the whole of the discussions. It is impossible for the soldier or sailor—except in very rare instances—to approach the question from the right angle.

The British amendment excluding from the scope of the convention "ships of all kinds designed exclusively for war, with their armaments" (including submarines and submersibles), and also airships, aeroplanes, etc., was the chief sensation of the conference. The leading Geneva paper, the Journal de Genève, said: "It has produced the effect of a thunderclap in conference circles. . . . Military aeroplanes and men-of-war are not to be considered as armaments!" It was opposed by France and others. It was eventually carried as regards aeroplanes, but as regards vessels of war and their armaments a new article was inserted providing for certain information to be published—more limited, however, than in the case of other armaments.

Contributors to This Issue

Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation's dramatic critic, is a native of Knoxville, Tennessee.

Allene M. Sumner is on the staff of the Cleveland Press.

Robert Dell is The Nation's correspondent in Paris.

James W. [illegible] is a Middle Western lawyer, [illegible] for an organization having large Western agricultural interests.

MacKnight Black is a poet living in Philadelphia.

Kimball Young is associate professor of psychology at the University of Oregon.

Robert Louis Burgess is editor of the San Jose News, San Jose, Calif.

Johan J. Smertenko is a member of the editorial staff of the publishing house of Alfred A. Knopf, not temporary [illegible] as he was incorrectly described in the contributors' column for July 15.

Gilbert Seldes, former editor of the Dial and author of "The Seven Lively Arts," writes a monthly critique of [illegible] for The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 5, 1925 No. 3135

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 151

EDITORIALS:

William Jennings Bryan 154

Germany's Peace Offensive 155

Dayton—And After 155

Hail to the Chief! 156

THE STRATEGY OF THE SCOPES DEFENSE. By Arthur Garfield Hays 157

COMMUNIST ART. By Louis Fischer 158

THE TALE OF LENIN AND THE CZAR. By L. Saifulina. Translated by Jessica Smith 160

T. S. ELIOT. By Edwin Muir 162

THE HIRED MAN. By Rexford Guy Tugwell 164

WHAT LITTLE MARY LEARNED ABOUT HISTORY. By Jimmie Criswell 166

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 167

CORRESPONDENCE 167

BOOKS AND MUSIC:

The Sign. By Amado Nervo. Translated from the Spanish by J. M. Bejarano 170

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 170

Saga and History. By Donald Douglas 170

Mr. White's Wilson. By Zechariah Chafee, Jr. 171

Englishmen Look at Their East. By Adolf E. Zucker 172

Roosevelt in a China Shop. By Orrin Keith 172

Timid Bravery. By D. W. Prall 173

How Well Is Europe? By Arthur Warner 173

Books in Brief 174

Music: Landowska's Contribution. By Pitts Sanborn 175

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

China's Servitudes. By Charles Hodges 176

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

OFFICIAL FIGURES obtained by the United Press from the office of the League of Nations in Geneva in connection with the eleventh anniversary of the outbreak of the World War show that seven years after the end of the slaughter there are 6,055,144 men in the standing armies of fifty-nine nations. There are more men today preparing to murder and be murdered than when the "war to end war" began in 1914.

> One of the contributing causes of the Great War—the competitive race for supremacy in armaments—is actively revived today [says a United Press dispatch from London]. Now it is for the supremacy of the air. Great Britain has prepared an air budget of $77,565,000, designed to contest France's domination of the air.
>
> Only seven years after the most terrible of wars nearly every power in [illegible] is preparing for the "next war."

The United Press dispatch recalls that Sir Laming Worthington-Evans, British Secretary of State for War, replying to a parliamentary question, said British scientists had killed 1,001 animals in the last year in research for poison gases, while Mussolini, speaking in the Italian Chamber, said: "Do you think the Great War was the last war? We must be prepared because the next war will not give us time to prepare, but may come totally unforeseen." The Japanese Navy Department has announced the construction of twenty-two warships with a total tonnage of 124,000, and the War Commissar of Russia recently told the Congress of Soviets that the international situation would not permit Russia to reduce the army below 552,000.

THE UNITED PRESS correspondent goes on to cite indications of the war spirit in Europe:

> Jugoslavia has bought an additional 150 military airplanes from France. Russia is purchasing large quantities of airplanes in Holland.
>
> The Italian Minister of Marine urged the passage of a naval budget of 1,000,000,000 lire, or fifty-five millions more than previously.
>
> Fokker, the famous Dutch designer, has invented a super-fighting airplane of 1,000 horsepower, carrying six machine guns and a half ton of bombs, and traveling 180 miles an hour.
>
> J. C. C. Davidson, parliamentary secretary of the British Admiralty, announced in Commons that 345 war vessels have been laid down in the world since the armistice and 200 more are projected.
>
> France is establishing an air base at Cherbourg which is much commented upon in Britain.

These indications are solely in the Old World. But are we of the New World doing our full share to avoid the catastrophe of a "next war"? Have we not at this moment a naval fleet in the Pacific, sent to impress the Orient with our power, and are not the Congressmen who lately visited Hawaii clamoring for a greater armament of the island? In the face of all this it is hard to have patience with those who champion merely the alleviation or the limitation of war. Is there any possibility of restraining this madness except to lay down arms and refuse point-blank to fight or prepare to fight?

"DO YOU KNOW"—ask Edward Hachtel of the Fellowship of Youth for Peace, John Nevin Sayre of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and Tucker P. Smith of the Y. M. C. A.—

> That [illegible] college students and [illegible] high-school students drilled in uniform for three hours every week in the last college year? (See War Appropriations Hearings, U. S. House, 1925, also U. S. House Report 288, page 14.)
>
> That 745 officers and 1,000 enlisted men have been detailed by the War Department [illegible] on this restoration of youth in the schools and colleges? (See Army List and Directory, March 1, 1925, pp. 50-62.)
>
> That in contrast only 119 officers were thus engaged in 1916, with no attempt being made at that time to enlist high-school students in this Crusade of Militarism? (See Army List and Directory, December 1, 1916.)
>
> That the War Department in the fiscal year 1925 is spending on summer camps alone $2,100,000 for the purpose of inducing 28,000 citizens to take military training in these camps? There were no such camps previous to 1921. (See War Appropriations, U. S. House, 1925. Also U. S. House Report [illegible].)
>
> That today in many high schools and universities military training has been made compulsory, so that boys who are not Quakers are subject to coercion? Yet neither the National Defense Act, nor any land-grant act to State universities, nor any other federal enactment requires any institution to maintain compulsory drill. (See brief regarding military training at universities, by Walter L. Longstreth, prepared for Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, obtainable at Room 15, 1305 Arch St., Phila., Pa.)

MOST OF US KNEW in a general way. Few of us have been awake to the extent of this organized threat to the young manhood of America. The War Department has fooled us. The Junior Reserve Officers Training Corps Manual says:

> The purpose of this book is not to make soldiers out of your boys, but to develop them physically, morally, and mentally into the best type of citizens, capable of defending our flag should an emergency arise. . . .

The Infantry Drill Regulations for 1925 for use with the R. O. T. C. manual, however, instruct the officers frankly and without bunk:

> Always remember that the men are the material being trained and molded for the work of battle. They should be handled with the same care which an expert artisan gives a fine tool.
>
> So it is necessary that a drill instructor look and act at all times on the drill field and elsewhere like a trained soldier, if he is to create in the minds of his men a desire to be like him. They are being trained to be soldiers, and the model should be actually before them.

The high-school R. O. T. C. schedule gives 40 hours to physical training, 248 to military drill, and not a minute to citizenship. The college course gives (in four years) 6 hours to physical training, 506 to military training, and not a minute to citizenship; the citizens' military camps give a perfunctory 5 hours to citizenship; 10 to physical training, 5 to hygiene, and 90 to military instruction. Further information on this camouflaged campaign to militarize America may be obtained at Room 385, Bible House, New York City.

ENGLAND'S COAL CRISIS is no ordinary strike threat; it may end in the reorganization of the industry. So far the moves made on both sides are only jockeying for position in the struggle to come. The present break between owners and miners comes at the end of a three-months conference which attempted to find a way out of the situation. The coal industry in England is in a precarious position; since the war four crises have occurred and each time only minor tinkering has been done. Exports have fallen off enormously, operating costs are high, and the employers declare that they cannot continue to run the mines at a loss. During the last 18 months 400 pits have been closed down; more than 200,000 miners are out of work. Wages, in proportion to the cost of living, are far below the level of 1914. The miners have declared, and they have been strong enough to maintain their stand, that they will not consider a reduction in wages or a lengthening of the seven-hour workday. Consequently the owners have given notice of the termination, on August 1, of the present agreement with the miners, and the miners have responded by threatening to strike. The railwaymen have warned that they will refuse to move coal in case of a strike; and talk of a general strike has been heard. The owners, however, have refused to withdraw their notice; possibly they wish only to bring the present long-drawn-out dispute to a head; or they may hope that the Government will get them out of the hole. It would be typical of British history if a Tory Government should move toward the nationalization for which Labor has fought.

THAT FORCE BEGETS FORCE is so well known that it is hard to hold Mussolini and the Fascist Party guiltless of political brutalities in Italy even when they may have had no direct hand in them or have made definite efforts to prevent the outrages. If newspaper dispatches are to be credited, the recent attack upon Deputy Amendola, chief among the opponents of the present regime, was not officially inspired by the Fascisti. Amendola had gone to Montecatini to take the water cure for which the town is famous, but a crowd surrounded his hotel and became so menacing that local Fascist leaders urged the deputy to leave. He did so, his motor car guarded by Fascist militia to the town gate. Later he was ambushed at night and severely beaten. The trouble with Fascist efforts in an affair like this is that no one can hope to hold in leash men who daily drink in a gospel of force and violence from their great chief, Mussolini himself. The Fascisti will have to do a lot of house-cleaning higher up before they can expect decency in the ranks.

ITALY'S IDEA OF HOUSE-CLEANING, however, seems to consist in the expulsion of foreign correspondents who tell unpleasant truths. She has just expelled George Seldes, representative of the Chicago Tribune, on the ground that his dispatches were misleading and exaggerated. We do not believe the charge—having followed the work of Mr. Seldes (a brother of Gilbert Seldes) for many years. But even if it were true it would be no reason to expel him. Such high-handed action can only lead outsiders to believe that Italy is attempting to conceal something shameful. We are proud to note that the Rome representatives of the New York World, Chicago Daily News, Philadelphia Public Ledger, Christian Science Monitor, and the United Press have protested against the treatment of Mr. Seldes and announced that if the Mussolini Government persisted in its attitude they would ask their newspapers to withdraw them from Rome. The European correspondents of the American press have more than once demonstrated their loyalty to the principle of the freedom of the press, and we hope that their home offices will boldly sustain them.

ACCIDENTS WILL HAPPEN even in the worst-regulated families, and it is not exactly the fault of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company that announcement should be made of permission to increase its passenger rates just at the moment when publication of its semi-annual report showed a largely increased net income in the last six months. The New York Public Service Commission has given permission to the railway to raise its commutation fares within the State by 40 per cent, while the Interstate Commerce Commission has allowed an increase in interstate commutation rates of 20 per cent. At the same time we learn that the net income of the railway for the first six months of 1925 was $2,663,574, as against $473,514 for the same period in 1924, which raises the question whether on the basis of recent income any rate increases are justified. Much more important, though, to the public at large is the question whether in the long run higher rates will not defeat their own end by diminishing the company's business and thus its income. Everybody knows that automobile buses are giving the railroads stiffer competition than ever before on short hauls. Yet the railroads generally are quite without imagination or enterprise in meeting this competition.

"WELL, IT'S THEIR OWN FUNERAL," is the easy conclusion of the average person. It isn't. The nation has invested its materials and labor to the extent of millions of dollars in the railways, and it is of far more consequence to the average person that this plant be utilized and run for his benefit than it is to the stockholders and officers. It is an axiom of physics that one can move a given load easier and cheaper on hard wheels over an unyielding track than on flexible wheels over an even slightly irregular roadway. The advantage of the motor bus or truck lies chiefly in the smaller capital outlay necessary, in a saving in loading and unloading, in the flexibility of its routing, and in operating economy due to the use of smaller vehicles. But so far as the railroads go, the capital expenditure, to a large extent, has already been made. To take advantage of that outlay we think they will have to organize their own collection and delivery services (reducing the existing appalling duplication and waste) and run more and shorter trains. For a railroad like the New Haven, with a large amount of short-haul passenger traffic, there is obviously a field for one-car trains operated by gasoline engines or other power cheaper than the modern locomotive. In our issue of June 17 we noted an experiment of that sort by the New Haven. Certainly railways can no longer hope to meet automobile competition by the outworn formula of raising fares and reducing the number of trains.

HOUSES WITHOUT PROFITEERING are rising—slowly but safely. We commented in our issue of July 22 on the importance of the experiment of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, which, on new housing in New York City renting for $9 a room per month, made a net profit of 9¼ per cent for the first full year of operation. This ought to be a spur to cooperative building, since commercial builders are not offering anything comparable to the apartments of the Metropolitan Life for less than two or three times the price. But cooperative building, like all other kinds of cooperation, makes headway with difficulty in the United States. New York City, of course, is littered with so-called cooperative apartments, mostly at high prices, which have been constructed within the last few years. Some of them are doubtless good investments for those who have the money, but they need to be expertly scrutinized, for the real-estate agents and builders take their profits before the public is invited to come in and "cooperate."

COOPERATIVE HOUSING of the true kind seems to have its best future not by means of specially organized groups but through labor unions, fraternal bodies, and other existing societies. This latter method has the advantage of starting with an already-organized group of persons of similar ideas and economic status, and it provides a business experience and stability which otherwise may be lacking. The garment-trade unions in New York City are an instance. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers are engaged in a cooperative housing enterprise, while the Labor Home Building Corporation has just obtained a loan of $950,000 from the Prudential Insurance Company with which to finance a five-story apartment house in the Bronx to accommodate 242 families. Behind the Labor Home Building Corporation are the International Ladies' Garment Workers, the International Fur Workers, the United Cloth Hat and Cap Makers, and the Pocketbook and Leather Goods Workers. It is estimated that the carrying charges for the apartments, including amortization, will be about $14 a room per month.

ANOTHER SPECIALIST in forging Soviet documents has been arrested—this time in Vienna. Alexander Jakubowitz is the gentleman who supplied the Tsankoff Government in Bulgaria with evidences that the Soviet Government inspired the bombing of the Sofia Cathedral and planned other outrages. He also did a lively business providing fearsome documents for the Rumanian and Jugoslav representatives in Vienna. Austria's police found him in possession of an excellent set of forging implements and an unfinished "Soviet document." Unfortunately Mr. Jakubowitz needed one more die to perfect his screed, and the missing die was in Berlin, where his friend Drusilovski, the super-forger, had just been arrested. And so his plans went agley. Austrian law does not provide any penalty for mere forgery; it must be proved that the forger obtained money for his products. Since the gullible Balkan envoys are not eager to expose their gullibility in court, the matter rests there. Meanwhile, however, Bulgaria, on the strength of this gentleman's forgeries, has persuaded the Allies to permit her to increase her army, and has officially murdered some hundreds of persons who never knew who had invented the documents that incriminated them.

NOT ALL MIRRORS ARE AIDS to vanity. Sometimes the picture of America as reflected in the foreign press is a little startling. As, for instance, the comment of the Glasgow Forward upon this New York dispatch to the London Times:

MUNICIPAL TRADING IN PETROL—STANDARD OIL COMPANY'S SUIT

(From Our Own Correspondent)

NEW YORK, June 3.—The Standard Oil Company has brought a suit in Nebraska the outcome of which is awaited with great interest in many other States. The suit is for a perpetual injunction to restrain the city of Lincoln from maintaining a retail petrol [British for gasoline] station. At this station the city sells petrol to motorists for 18 cents a gallon, although the oil company maintains that 22 cents a gallon, which it charges, is a fair price.

In its petition the Standard Oil Company contends that the only grant of power in the law which permitted the city to frame its own charter was for its own government. The selling of petrol retail, it asserts, is not part of the business of government; furthermore, petrol is not a necessity, so that there is no warrant for the exercise of police powers to justify the city selling it.

"Seldom," says the Forward, "has one seen a more naked and unashamed illustration of the sheer undisguised greed of private 'enterprise.' . . . A public authority sells 'petrol' to motorists at 4 cents a gallon cheaper than the great oil trust sells, so the public authority is haled before the law courts, and an attempt made to prevent the public receiving the benefit of public enterprise."

William Jennings Bryan

BRYAN early won the love and confidence of a vast section of the American people, and he held his devoted personal following for nearly thirty years. With the echoes of the Dayton trial still in our ears, it is easy to forget the great crusades of his early days and to miss his significance in American life. The New York Herald Tribune of today can afford to speak of his exacting moral code and of his political honor. In 1896 the Tribune wrote that

> The wretched rattle-pated boy, posing in vapid vanity and mouthing resounding rottenness, was not the real leader of that league of hell. He was only a puppet in the blood-imbued hands of Altgeld, the anarchist, and Debs, the revolutionist. But he was a willing puppet, Bryan was—willing and eager. None of his masters was more apt than he at lies and forgeries and blasphemies and all the nameless iniquities of that campaign against the Ten Commandments.

What was the secret of this hatred in the newspapers, which pursued him all his life? It was more than free silver that made the Tribune foam. The "boy orator of the Platte" represented in that day what his contemporary La Follette expressed in the next generation—the protest of the Western farmers against the domination of public life by the vast aggregations of capital centering in New York City. We forget today the denunciation in Bryan's 1896 platform of "government by injunction as a new and highly dangerous form of oppression by which federal judges, in contempt of the laws of the State and rights of citizens, become at once legislators, judges, and executioners." We remember the "cross of gold," and forget that in the same speech Bryan eloquently pleaded the cause of the federal income tax (which even The Nation of that day regarded as a dangerous precedent) and insisted—doubly interesting today—that the income-tax law was not unconstitutional when it was passed or the first time it went before the Supreme Court. "It did not become unconstitutional," he said, "until one judge changed his mind; and we cannot be expected to know when a judge will change his mind." There in 1896 Bryan was pointing out the fallibility of the Supreme Court, as La Follette insisted upon it in 1924—and it is profoundly discouraging to reflect that the country in 1896 seemed to be more open-minded on the question than in 1924.

The curse of his free-silver mistake followed Bryan all his life. The "gold standard" is a kind of fetish in the business fraternity; like Bryan upon religion, they will not reason, but prepare for battle on mention of the phrase. Much of the criticism of monometallism in the years preceding the Bryan and McKinley campaign was justified. No one could foresee the Alaska gold rush or the development of the Transvaal mines, which made the success of the gold standard possible while inconspicuously giving that larger basis to the currency for which Bryan and his cohorts had somewhat unintelligently fought. The historian smiles to think that Bryan was feared all his life because in 1896 he bore a standard which McKinley, Lodge, and other heroes of the Republican faith had earlier espoused. They, however, spoke for "free silver" at a safe time and without any sense of protest against Eastern capital. Bryan helped to make it a class issue and a sectional issue. "Upon which side shall the Democratic Party fight?" he asked a hesitating convention. "Upon the side of the idle holders of idle capital or upon the side of the struggling masses? Burn down your cities and leave our farms," he cried, "and your cities will spring up again as if by magic. But destroy our farms, and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in this country." And accordingly all the power of capital, idle or occupied, was thrown against him, and the newspapers bayed at him as at few men in the history of this country.

Instinctively Bryan chose the side of the people as against the powers of money, but it was his weakness that his heart was much stronger than his head. La Follette knew his issues; he studied, he toiled to master every fact and every detail before he made his smashing public indictments. La Follette's career in Washington was an attempt to work out on a national scale policies which he had already applied on a smaller scale while governor of Wisconsin. Bryan had no executive and almost no legislative experience. He was lost when pinned down to detail. He had no talent for administration; in the State Department he floundered. It is significant that the man who sincerely fought the Presidential campaign of 1900 upon the issue of anti-imperialism bears the official responsibility for two of the most outrageous examples of brute imperialism in American history. He was engaged in negotiating an excellent if somewhat vague series of peace and arbitration treaties with all the nations of the world; and while he was doing that American troops ruthlessly invaded Vera Cruz in Mexico, and later stamped out the century-long independence of Haiti. Of course Bryan took no initiative in either of these proceedings; but neither did he do anything to stop them. He fought imperialism more effectively on the Chautauqua circuit than in the State Department. He resigned as Secretary of State because he thought the President's course was drifting dangerously toward war; but he did nothing else to stop the drift, and when the war came he ridiculously volunteered as a private. And his last wish was to be buried in the Arlington military cemetery, on the strength of his military record in raising a regiment of Nebraska volunteers for the Spanish War. Always the heart swept him on, with no check from a reasoning head. When the anti-evolution issue came up he dashed valiantly to the defense of the Christian religion without stopping to inquire whether the Christian religion was in danger or how it could best be defended. And when Clarence Darrow got him on the witness stand he revealed himself as a pathetically sincere and pitifully ignorant old man.

The lapse of time leaves heroes stranded. Bryan was stirring as a boy orator, pleading for the people against the powers of capital; he was splendid preaching democracy to an imperialist age; he was magnificent when in 1912 he made the Democratic convention nominate Wilson in spite of itself; there was something noble in his lonely gesture of serving grape juice to the foreign diplomats, taking his convictions seriously even in public office—but it is pathetic to think of the hero of such crusades spending his last years selling real estate and attempting to keep science out of the schools. The world has a right to ask of its leaders something more than sincerity and a generous heart.

Germany's Peace Offensive

GERMANY'S answer to the French security notes is another step toward peace. A long vista of negotiations opens ahead, but Europe is on the right road. And vastly more important than the phrases of the diplomatic notes is the fact that the French troops are out of the Ruhr. That mischievous invasion of German territory plunged Europe anew into a haze of war talk. Drums beat, troops marched, men talked angrily. Hate boiled on both sides of the Rhine. France was still so bitter that Herriot, a year ago, dared go no further than to give a secret pledge that the French troops would come out in August, 1925. Germany, naturally, has not yet recovered from the ill temper stirred by Poincaré's act of war, with all its ruinous aftermath.

Now the troops are out at last. France is back within the military frontiers set by the Treaty of Versailles. Stresemann's note, and his subsequent speeches, clearly imply his expectation that in return for Germany's agreement to a security pact France will go further and consent to evacuation of the Cologne sector. The treaty, it will be recalled, provided that the Cologne sector would be evacuated after five years, if Germany had fulfilled her obligations under the treaty, the Coblenz sector after ten years, and the Mainz sector after fifteen years. Cologne was due for evacuation in January, and there is only the scantest of technical excuses for the delay. England and France punctually notified Germany that because of her defaults they could not proceed with the withdrawal as scheduled, but it took them three months to agree as to what the defaults were. Let us hope that the day of such chicanery is past. Germany is making the modifications in her military system which the Allies suggested, and complaints on that score seem to have ceased. The irritating presence of the French troops in the Ruhr is no more; if the Allies will only proceed to liberate Cologne, too, at once, they will go far to give the fulfilment policy in Germany the support which it needs.

France has been taught to put her faith in force. She has acquired a habit of looking eastward at her larger neighbor, and of shuddering—and believing that only an army on guard can preserve her. Possibly the amicable tone of the present discussions will help to cure her of that unreasonable state of mind. The urgent need of her troops in Morocco may also be of assistance. Sooner or later she will have to rely for security upon the pledged word of other nations—including Germany—and upon the rightness of her own actions. Ten years hence, fifteen years hence—some time—the whole Rhineland will have to be evacuated; and if she taxes herself eternally to maintain, with a population two-thirds of Germany's, an army five times as large, she can only lose in the economic competition which lies at the root of national power.

Germany has offered France a pledge never to make war; to accept the Western frontier as binding and to resort to arbitration in case of disputes concerning the Eastern frontier. France replied, insisting that Germany first join the League of Nations, and reiterating, in somewhat ambiguous terms, her right to resort to force if Germany failed in her treaty obligations. Germany's reply is, as M. Briand said, a reasonable basis for further negotiations. She is willing to join the League, but only upon assurance that she will not be obliged to violate her neutrality by aiding in a war or by transshipping foreign troops across her territory. Forced by treaty to reduce her army to 100,000 men, she feels she has the right to ask that she be freed from military obligations. Furthermore, she naturally declines the suggestion that France—ally of both Poland and Czecho-Slovakia—become a "guarantor" of Germany's treaties with those nations. Some of the most controversial points the note leaves untouched.

And that may be just as well. The fundamental need is for a peace atmosphere. Too much debate can spoil the air. It is something to be grateful for that Germany and France today find it possible to write polite notes without thumbing their noses at each other. There is, of course, a certain unreality in this long-range hallooing by means of studiously worded notes. How long will it be before their representatives can sit down together, face to face, and actually work out an agreement? Perhaps, when the two nations acquire the habit of friendly conversation France will throw off that strange obsession which has led her to demand that every "peace pact" be sealed by military guaranties. When the nations begin at last to talk peace in terms of peace, instead of thinking of it in terms of threats and penalties, Europe will really have emerged from her dismal war psychosis.

Dayton—And After

THE liberal, enraged by the fantastic proceedings at Dayton, is likely to be impatient with any effort merely to ameliorate the situation there revealed. He is in no mood for compromise and he feels like proclaiming boldly the right of every citizen to speak or to teach as his conscience dictates. Yet the fact remains that such a right, however desirable it may be, is not recognized by either our law or our customs. Some restrictions are and will continue to be, at least for many years to come, placed upon the freedom of teaching by both law and public opinion; and no general or absolute recognition of the right to such freedom is to be expected. Conditions have for years been bad—Tennessee, after all, is only doing by statute what other States do by public opinion. In many States a Catholic is virtually barred from the teaching profession; during the war dissent was rigidly suppressed—a Quaker teacher was ousted in New York City merely because she preferred not to conduct Liberty-loan campaigns among her pupils; and the Geneseo (New York) State Normal School is now stirred by the dismissal of two instructors whose Columbia-University brand of psychology was considered too radical by their superiors.

What the affair at Dayton has proved is simply this: There is no law so fantastic that it may not be passed by a legislature and supported by a court. Liberals who have sometimes amused themselves by imagining burlesque statutes to illustrate a reductio ad absurdum of the Volstead Act or the Clean-Books Bill are on the point of awakening to find their nightmares real. Those who saw Mr. Scopes on trial can be surprised by nothing. For a long time it has been known that not one legislator out of a dozen had the courage to vote against anything introduced under the guise of "morality," but the fundamentalists in religion, ethics, sociology, and manners are only beginning to understand the extent of the power which this fact puts into their hands. The success at Dayton has surprised even them by its completeness, and the next year will see a flood of bills introduced into the legislature of every State in the Union which will make the worst buffooneries of Kansas seem almost sensible. Busybodies are likely to unearth a dozen such statutes as that which Congress unwittingly passed precluding payment of salaries to teachers who are guilty of "disrespect of the Bible." Such harmless-appearing gestures can be made to include in their prohibitions anything from the theory of evolution to Thomas Hardy's novels. There is no science which does not somewhere and somehow exhibit "disrespect for the Bible," no history which does not cast some aspersions upon national heroes, and no literature that cannot be regarded as both "dangerous" and "immoral." Stretch the legislation which every legislature is ready to pass as the laws against espionage, syndicalism, or "discouraging recruiting" were stretched and you will paralyze all education, all journalism, and all literature.

There is, we fear, no power on earth which could at the present moment cause Tennessee to repeal her anti-evolution bill, and very little hope that liberals will be able to win anywhere in the United States the complete intellectual freedom which they believe they have a right to have. In the face of such circumstances it is folly to take one's stand simply upon abstract principles of freedom; specific attacks upon this or that will have to be met with specific objections. Speak to the average Tennesseean, or, for that matter, to the average New Yorker, about academic freedom, and he will no more know what you are talking about than he would if you spoke to him concerning the metaphysical aspects of the trinitarian dogma or any of the other unconsidered theological conceptions which he is perfectly willing to see written in the statute books if assured that they promote good morals. But prove to him that the doctor who cut out his appendix, and all the scientists for whom he has a vague respect (gained largely from the Sunday newspapers), consider the theory of evolution a necessary part of scientific training and he may possibly be persuaded not to make a fool of himself.

The ultimate fate of the Tennessee law in the supreme courts of the State and nation will not really depend upon its constitutionality or unconstitutionality. If it is thrown out, any one of several grounds may be given for the decision, but the real reason will be that the judges recognize its absurdity and are therefore willing to seize the best available technical excuse for declaring it invalid. Constitutional guaranties of this freedom or that are feeble reeds on which to lean, and they are wont to fail a minority when it needs them most. So the fight for free speech, free literature, or free science will, in the main, be made, in each instance, upon the reasonableness of the individual case. Hence the necessity for that strategy at Dayton which Mr. Hays of the defense counsel describes elsewhere in this issue. The time seems to have passed, in America at least, when popular indignation can be aroused in defense of an abstract principle of the sort which appeared important to those founders of our government who believed freedom worth defending for its own sake. If liberals win the case against the Tennessee law they will not, thereby, win the acceptance of any general principle. They will have killed one bit of fool legislation, but they will be compelled to fight almost as hard against the next. The fact that a judge believes in evolution will by no means prove that he is willing to tolerate radical sociology or tobacco.

Hail to the Chief!

BELLEVILLE, ILL. (By Associated Press).—Big Chief Henkemeyer, a cigar-store Indian for fifty years, will soon have a place of prominence and dignity as a statue on Perrin's ledge overlooking the Illinois River. He will be placed on a concrete pedestal on the estate of J. Nick Perrin and will be unveiled in September with special exercises.

The wooden chief has stood on a rostrum before a local cigar-store for twenty-five years. Previous to this his stolid visage had graced a tobacconist's shop in St. Louis for twenty-five years and was purchased by the late Peter Mohr for the sum of $70.

The ancient chief in his full regalia has been crated for his journey to Perrin's ledge, where he will be set on the loftiest pinnacle.

The Indian figure has withstood the onslaughts of all kinds of weather. It was damaged once, when a Fourth of July reveler placed a pinwheel in its mouth which resulted in the burning of a cheek. Chief Henkemeyer is five feet high.

HAIL to the Chief! This bluff old wooden Indian is among the last of a once mighty line of rulers one of whom stood just outside the door of every cigar store worthy of the name in the older America. The fact that Chief Henkemeyer is to be transported from his natural and rightful realm to an artificial kingdom away from the odor of tobacco is a sharp reminder that the older America in which he ruled has passed. For the change of position is not a promotion for Chief Henkemeyer. He may enjoy purer air and a finer view on Perrin's ledge, overlooking the Illinois River; more people may gaze at him and his pedestal may be kept in better repair than before; but he will become a puppet instead of a real ruler. The divine right of kings will be his no more, because he will be despoiled of his kingdom. He may gain in pomp, but his power will be about that of the Sultan of Morocco since the French occupation.

It was a real and an interesting kingdom over which these old cigar-store Indians presided, and it has passed away almost as completely as have the chiefs. The owner of the old-fashioned cigar store was an individual and not a chain. He gave away no coupons good (after collecting for several years) for a paper knife or a silver-backed hair-brush, but he peddled a large amount of village gossip and he was a good companion for the lonesome, for he kept open at hours when about every other kind of shop was closed. He kept open even on Sundays!

And he dealt in rather a different line of goods from the links of the modern chain. The cigarette had not yet made its conquest. Only anemic young fellows smoked it. Men smoked cigars or pipes. Women didn't smoke at all—at least only very wicked ones did. Also men chewed. A "chaw" of tobacco was as necessary as a smoke. Today, even in the Supreme Court of the United States, chewing tobacco is going out.

Chief Henkemeyer will be lonesome sometimes gazing out over the Illinois River, especially on cold nights and Sunday mornings—when his old realm of Tobaccoland was the liveliest. But he would be even lonelier if he tried to return to his realm—for it is no longer there. It has gone with the Indians and the bison—West! The old rulers will soon be found only in museums of antiquities.

Hail—and farewell—to the Chief!

The Strategy of the Scopes Defense

By ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

EDITORIAL comment on the Scopes case seems to indicate a complete misunderstanding of the purposes and strategy of the defense. "A Wandering Defense" is the characterization of the New York World, which presents the issue as a clear one—whether "the State of Tennessee may establish the Bible of the fundamentalists as the official standard of truth in the public schools."

Mr. Darrow's eloquent argument on the motion to quash the indictment showed that the defense never misunderstood the main issue. This was clear throughout the trial—from his first claim that the law was unconstitutional because it "makes the Bible the yardstick" of every man's learning, to his last shot at Mr. Bryan in which he proclaimed his purpose to prevent the educational system of the United States from being throttled by ignorance and bigotry.

But there was more to the case than that. We presented a supposititious law parallel in text, making it a crime to teach, contrary to the Bible, that the earth moved around the sun. The difference between the two laws was that the Copernican theory is well established. The court, without hearing evidence, held the Tennessee law constitutional on its face. We wished to show by scientific testimony that the facts substantiate the theory of evolution, and thus to prove the recent law as unreasonable as the supposititious one. If unreasonable, the law would not be within the police power of the State. Thus the introduction of this evidence had a sound legal basis and was pertinent to the issue involved. Mr. Malone's brilliant speech related to this question. He took Bryan's slogan of a duel to the death, and pointed out that Mr. Bryan's idea of a duel was to strap his adversary to a board and threaten him, defenseless, with a flaming sword. Why the fear if the proofs of evolution are not effective?

But this was not all. If the fight of liberalism and honest thinking is to be won it must have the support of millions of intelligent Christians who accept the Bible as a book of morals and inspiration and who thus find no conflict between it and any scientific fact. They were entitled to the presentation of their point of view. This led to evidence of what the Bible is, its history, meaning, translation, application, and interpretation. Mr. Bryan was called as an expert on the Bible. He admitted that the earth was millions of years old. He agreed that no intelligent person would accept the Bible literally. Even from Mr. Bryan our case might have been proved. And such evidence would further show that the law was indefinite and therefore unenforceable; was unreasonable and therefore unconstitutional.

It is to this phase of the defense that most of the criticism is directed, for it led to the position that evolution and the story of creation in the Bible are not necessarily inconsistent. Even if the Bible and the theory of evolution were entirely contradictory the law is a bad one, so why take the position that they can be reconciled? On their face they are utterly inconsistent. But this assumes that all people think alike. The Holy Rollers in the hills of Tennessee insist that the earth is flat: "Look at it, brother, look at it." So with the dissenters and the Bible: "Look at the words, brother, look at the words." Churchmen answer: "Look at the spirit, brother, look at the spirit." We felt that there was a real value, not only because it was sound law and a fair defense but likewise from a public point of view, in presenting the position of millions of churchgoers who are defenders of science. We made it clear that as lawyers we expressed no opinion on this, but that the evidence would completely answer the bigot's contention that we must choose between science and religion or even between science and the Bible.

After all, if we were to accomplish anything of real value it was important to recognize the point of view of the fundamentalists. They insisted that since religion should not be taught in the public schools it was unfair to teach a theory that to them negatived religion. To them religion is the Bible. To them evolution is described by the statement of Mr. McKenzie acting for, if not speaking for, the State of Tennessee. "God threw a dish-rag into the sea and said 'Now be a good boy and behave yourself and in about six million years I'll come around and make a man of you.'" These people would admit the importance of separating church from state, but they would demand that while the Bible was not to be the "official standard of truth" in the schools, neither was evolution. They feel that this law eliminates both. In the words of one of the State counsel: "If I have to choose between education and religion, I'll choose religion." In the words of a preacher in the hills: "I thank God I ain't educated." Evidence which would tend to show that there is no conflict between religion and science, or even between the Bible, accepted as a book of morals, and science, would be more effective in answering their claims than a mere contention that the schools must be free to teach what these fundamentalists regard as irreligion. And to show the unreasonableness of the law no evidence could have been more persuasive to the presiding judge.

In other words, the defense, far from having wandered, was based upon three definite propositions: First, that the law was unconstitutional because it attempted to make the Bible the test of truth; second, that the law was unconstitutional because in the light of present-day knowledge of evolution, to be adduced from scientists, it was unreasonable; and third, that the evidence of Mr. Bryan and other students of the Bible would show not only that there was no inconsistency between an acceptance of the evolution of man and of the Bible, but would also show that the law was indefinite as well as unreasonable, because no two persons understand the Bible alike.

Many would have presented the simple issue that the law on its face violated constitutional guaranties. The defense went further and sought to show that such laws result in hate and intolerance, that they are conceived in bigotry and born in ignorance—ignorance of the Bible, of religion, of history, and of science.

Dayton at first was friendly but unresponsive, then antagonistic and impervious, then tensely hostile, then mildly interested, then eager. The youth were triumphant.

They cheered Darrow. Possibly no one's attitude was changed, except perhaps subconsciously, but thought permeates. They greeted Darrow as an infidel, found him an agnostic, acclaimed him more sympathetic, more tolerant, more kindly, and more Christian than the prosecution. The psalm-singing, prayer-meeting, muttering groups in the courtyard the first days, surrounded by signs threatening future punishment in hell to unbelievers, gave way to circles of men earnestly discussing the issues in the main streets. Representative Butler, who introduced the bill, learned for the first time that there was more than one Bible and thought the scientific evidence would give him a "right smart" education. The jury expressed disappointment not to have heard the words of scientists which they had feared would weaken their faith. A fundamentalist minister told me they had been terribly shocked when we had objected to prayer in court, but later had talked it over and had thought perhaps we were right, that it wouldn't have been fair to have had the fundamentalist minister of each juryman practically suggesting a verdict to his parishioner! Another minister asked me to send him a work to which I had referred—Andrew D. White's "The Warfare of Science Against Theology." The judge said he would receive, and I know he will read, Darwin's "Origin of Species' and "The Descent of Man." Robinson's drug-store will contain a circulating library of works on evolution, the first one consisting of the scientific evidence in the record of this trial. The intelligent minority in the State, heretofore amused, is now ashamed. Lawyers of Tennessee at first refused to be connected with the case, then offered advice sub rosa, then openly proclaimed themselves with the defense. It is possible that laws of this kind will hereafter meet the opposition of an aroused public opinion. That was not without our purpose. If we have succeeded to some extent, we feel we have answered the criticism of those who regard the issue as a narrow one of constitutional law.

What the trial lacked in dignity it gained in democracy. The real basic questions involved were brought into the open. The question is not whether Howard Morgan learned that life had developed from a single cell, which information didn't "hurt him any." The question is not merely one of whether such laws accord with American institutions. The question is whether among civilized people ignorance and intolerance, even when indulged in by the majority and made into law, should be permitted to stifle education.

That people should derive light and education from court proceedings may be novel, but can hardly be objectionable.

Communist Art

By LOUIS FISCHER

WORKINGMEN in Russia laugh when you tell them that British labor meetings open with a prayer or that English Socialists celebrate their victories in church. The Pope's recent encyclical against Communism rather shook some of the Catholic followers of MacDonald until they decided on a sort of condominium of Marx and the Holy Father, the one to color their politics, the other their religious life. But to the Bolshevik such a combination is as strange as it is impossible. Communism is not merely an intellectual luxury, a code of law to be put on and doffed when the need arises. It is a philosophy of life which determines its adherents' class sympathies, religion, social behavior, and moral standards. It has as direct, and as negative, an attitude toward church attendance and wife-beating as it has toward capitalism and imperialism.

This is one of the essential differences between the Socialist and the Communist, the evolutionist and the revolutionist. The Socialist lives the life of the ordinary bourgeois mortal, only his mind accepts as correct and wise a certain economic doctrine. On the other hand, the Communist who does not eat, dress, lodge, think, work, marry, and die bolshevistically is not a good Communist. There can be millionaire Socialists, but a rich Communist is an anomaly. To be sure, many Russian Communists, especially many Russian Communists working abroad, do not live up to the high standard of their party, but it is important to note that the standard exists, that entrance into or expulsion from the ranks of the party depends on it, and, moreover, that it has been distilled out of long practice.

If Marxism purposes only to change governmental forms and to nationalize mines and banks and factories its aims are indeed limited, for there is something evil in all government and the millennium will not arrive as a result of nationalization. These reforms must be projected a step forward into the personal, non-political lives of men, into the realm of culture. It is no accident, therefore, that Trotzky writes "questions of Life," in which he treats of marriage, the family, swearing, public kitchens, etc. He does so as a statesman, not as a dilettante. Nor is it by chance that he comes upon the subject of "Literature and Revolution." His book by that name is more a political treatise than a criticism of art: How is the revolution changing social forms? Do these new forms, can these new forms, express themselves in art? In the same way, [illegible] of the Communist Party follows a discussion and resolution on peasant soviets or the federal budget with another on conflicting schools of poets and prose writers.

The revolution of 1917 was not tantamount to the substitution of one ruling party for another. It was a gigantic social upheaval. It well-nigh destroyed an entire class; it certainly made the ways, traditions, customs, culture of that class non grata. It released a great stratum of society which had been held under foot. This stratum is educationally inferior to its ex-rulers, but physically and spiritually it is healthier. It is strong, young, capable of action, sure-footed, and does not need fox-trots and "La Garçonnes" and other forms of vicarious excitement.

Inevitably, tastes and demands for art have undergone modification in Soviet Russia. The changes are definite and tangible. Thus, the famous Russian ballet is popular no longer; people consider it a vermiform appendix of the past. Dostoevsky, Turgenev, Chekhov, Pushkin, Lermontov, the outstanding lights of Russian literature, find few readers and fewer adorers. Tchaikowsky, the gifted composer, is considered passé. The renowned Moscow Art Theater of Stanislavsky, Moskvin, and Kachalov which charmed America and Europe frequently bores the Russian animated by the spirit of these times. The new attitude toward matters of art suggests the question, "Is a thing of beauty a joy forever, or do art values fluctuate in the tide of events? Is art the possession of a certain class and age or is it universal and eternal?"

One would think that Geltzer, Kondaourova, and Abramova dance as well in 1925 as they did in 1916, that if anything the scenery they use for their ballet performances is richer. Nevertheless the same people, plain bourgeois people who enjoyed the ballet a decade ago, feel that it is unreal today. The Russian ballet, except in a few of its productions, is so perfect a reflection of imperial Russia and so accurate an echo of court life that it looks like a remnant of the Middle Ages.

It took but a few years for Chekhov, Pushkin, and other "great writers" to become classics, if we would speak charitably, and to have outlived their usefulness, if we are to be more realistic. Consider Chekhov's "Cherry Orchard" or his "Three Sisters," or Pushkin's "Evgeni Onegin." They portray a society which is dead and deal with problems which do not exist in Russia today. With the tremendous revolution in sex relations which has occurred since 1917 much of the fiction of preceding generations, which so often deals with love, must necessarily transport itself to the scrap-heap. It is as outmoded as would be the work of astronomers who believed the earth flat.

In Germany during the inflation period Dostoevsky was much in vogue. He still is. Not in Russia, however. It is not that he is under an official ban; students of the Moscow universities are required to read him as part of their course. But the quintessence of Dostoevsky is foreign, antagonistic, and repulsive to the spirit of the revolution. All Russians, and even non-Russians who have any soul-contact with the revolution, are aware of this, for not to understand so fundamental a fact is to misunderstand everything in the revolution that is not statistics and decrees. Cynics, philosophic doubters, and the Prince "Idiot" type do not make a revolution. A large part of the pre-war Russian intelligentsia—Dostoevsky was its idol—paralyzed itself by indecision and endless and meticulous balancing of the scales of theory. It lost itself in the never-ending maze of its own speculations and devitalized itself by its own argumentation. If it ever mustered enough courage to make a move it permitted the advantages thus gained to slip from its hands. At best it dissipated its nervous energy in isolated acts of futile terrorism. But the present revolutionary era is the day of the strong and clear-willed. The revolution, before its precipitation and after, demanded quick action. A Raskolnikov would have been swamped by the merciless succession of events.

Most of the characters of Dostoevsky, genius and great psycho-pathologist that he was, answer no popular demand. Let Karamazov debate through whole chapters on the existence of a god. The Russian of the revolution knows that there must not be a god. Theism, to him, is part of the system of capitalism, and he has learned to look upon capitalism as a beast rotten and decaying. Therefore Upton Sinclair, who voices this view of the present state of society, is a best-seller. To Chekhov's portrayals of dainty, manicured ladies and tight-waisted gentlemen they prefer Jack London, full of fresh air, rich movement, coursing life. Yet they can dream with Wells and with him build castles in the ether, for they, like him, have seen the faint vision of a new world. Gogol's "Revizor" and his other satires on the society that was, also Gorki, who lived and worked among the masses in the "Lower Depths," appeal to the mind which now rejects Turgenev and Andreev. What could be more natural?

Of course the spirit of the new times deeply stirred the Russian theater. But since the essential function of the theater is to interpret and give form to a content which need not be and often is not written for it, the effect of the revolution on the Russian theater has, generally speaking, been confined to a search for original externalities and for new modes of expression. On the stage of the Kamerny, Tairov experiments with cubism and constructivism; the Theater Revolutzii tries new perspectives and dull color tones; Granovsky in the Yiddish Theater makes his actors move on a horizontal plane as usual and up and down a vertical plane too; he moreover tries by means of recitations in chorus and movements in concert to create an illusion of the Jewish Ghetto and Pale; the little Semperante ventures into the field of impromptu acting and of shadow casting; the revolution gives the most limitless freedom to all sorts of theatrical empiricists and faddists. We come finally to Meyerchold, the outstanding talent of the revolutionary theater. In one performance of his, machine wheels and windmills keep time with the emotional tempo of the persons of the play; he takes Ostrovsky's "Woods," which pictures the life of the middle nineteenth century, and passes it through a proletarian atmosphere—the result is a burlesque. He willingly and gladly makes his theater, which, incidentally, is one of the best-paying theaters in Moscow, a soap box for the propagandist. Meyerchold is feeling his way. Occasionally, as in his recent "Bubus," he fails completely, sometimes he is realistic even unto vulgarity, but always what he puts on the boards is strong and young.

Is Meyerchold producing proletarian culture? No. At best he avoids what is non-proletarian. Are Upton Sinclair and Jack London proletarian writers? No. At best they are non-bourgeois.

There is no such thing as proletarian culture, says Trotzky. There will be no proletarian culture and there cannot be, is his further contention. "Indeed there is no reason to regret this," he writes. "The proletariat assumed power in order to have done forever with class culture and to blaze the way for a culture of all of humanity." Trotzky divides history thus:

"Prehistorical 'history' of primeval man; ancient history with its slavery; the Middle Ages with their serfdom; capitalism with its exploitation of voluntary wage-earners; and, finally, the socialistic society with its painless—let us hope—transition to the governmentless commune." The dictatorship of the proletariat, we read further, is not this last ideal form of social organization, but the "revolutionary-military way of achieving it." During this revolutionary-military period "there is more destruction than new construction." The fight for life, the struggle against the omnipresent enemy, the effort to vouchsafe to all at least a modicum of material well-being completely absorb national energy, leaving little free for the creation—not of new culture—but of a new culture. Russia is at present passing through just this in-between era. It will end with the coming of the commune which, in turn, will be brought about by the world revolution. How long shall we have to wait? Twenty—thirty—fifty years, is Trotzky's estimate.

In the meanwhile Russia is culturally active. The professed aim is a democracy of culture rather than an aristocracy of intellect. More books are being read now than ever before in Russia, read by the man in the street and by the peasant behind the plow. Literacy and education are being brought to the dark millions; Soviet Russia is honeycombed with tens of thousands of workingman and village clubs which are lecture hall, library, social center, meeting-place in one. The number of communal kitchens and communal laundries, as well as of child nurseries, which free the woman from the home and help make her economically independent, is increasing. The Soviet Government is a gigantic internal propaganda organ. Hordes of agitators buzz along the countryside and distribute their information and literature—for aeroplanes, for child welfare, for chemical preparation, for the planting of corn, for the use of tractors, for the International Rote Hilfe, against illiteracy, against swearing and drinking, against slovenly farming.

Simultaneously hundreds of imagist, impressionist, centrifugalist, futurist, constructivist, and so-called "proletarian" poets and "proletarian" and peasant prose writers are putting their wares on an absorbent market. Most of them are young and groping; some, Demyan Bedni, Mayakovsky, Pilniak, Saifulina, Yessenin, for instance, have won their spurs. Many of them are popular in the literal sense of the word: they are read by the populace, by the cab-driver, the lowly mujik, the coal miner, and car conductor.

The minds of what we are wont to call the "common people" have been working hard since the revolution. There is an insatiable thirst for knowledge accompanied by a higher standard of living. The demand of the peasants for the resuscitation of the Soviets is one sign of cultural progress. [illegible] thousand [illegible] correspondents (selkors) and as many factory correspondents (rabkors) who write as unpaid and enthusiastic "free lances" for the bolshevik press are another such sign. I asked an old woman in a village what difference the revolution had made. "We talk more," she replied. Talk, indeed. But it is not gossip. They are discussing serious political and economic problems. They are stimulated by a wave of mental activity which is sweeping all Russia.

The Tale of Lenin and the Czar

By L. SAIFULINA

Translated by JESSICA SMITH

IT was a large ooyezd,* far from the capitals and great cities. Entire foreign countries might have been contained within its boundaries. It was full of gold mines, distilleries, and tallow works. There were great stretches of rich black earth, and over the meadowlands wandered herds of sheep and goats with that soft fine down from which the famous Orenburg shawls are made. The population was rich and various, and came from many regions, with many different habits and customs. Farther away, along the river Samarka and deeper in the steppe country, [illegible] of thte Mordvians, the Bashkirs, and the nomadic Kirghese. People of different races, with different ways of life, and different faiths—Pravoslavnies, Old [illegible], [illegible] Evangelists, and many other creeds, concealing their faith from the government in this far-away place.

Here there were rich peasants with thousands of dessiatins of land, and landless peasants, too poor even to build a [illegible] for themselves. And [illegible] away in the most distant spots in the darkly ignorant Cossack stanitzas and Russian villages there were the petty intelligentsia—doctors, teachers, agricultural experts, librarians—oppressed by the backwardness and darkness of the villages. Now and then they received papers from Orenburg bringing news of the life of the rest of Russia. But the papers were received within a reasonable period only at those Cossack stanitzas which were on the main road, or at the gold mines, or at the ooyezd town itself. In the raw depths of the ooyezd, papers and news were quite lost. The villages of this ooyezd were hundreds and more versts away from the main town and from the single-track railroad line to Orenburg.

In our village there were peasants who confused Kerensky with Rodzianko. And the women and young folks were not in the least interested in such games. But in the turbulent winter of 1918 both the low-built town and the far depths of the ooyezd were powerfully agitated by the bolshevist alarm. And with this alarm came the name "Lenin." It came, and not one of the inhabitants of the ooyezd, diverse in blood and possessions and thoughts as they were, remained indifferent to this name. In the rich Cossack stanitzas, in the villages where the landed Old Believers ruled supreme, among the rich sectarians—among all of these the tales of Lenin were nourished with that hatred which only a great and strong enemy can inspire, a hatred which is more like an ecstasy of admiration. They seldom accused him of selfish motives. They created legends about him as about some being from a mystical, supernatural world. I have heard Old Believers and Sectarians ecstatically chanting passages from the Bible, invoking for Lenin the number of the beast, 666, the number of the Anti-Christ. His name emerged from the village darkness, where the names of all others were choked in abysmal ignorance. Only his name blossomed, and blossomed miraculously. Among the rich peasants it was spoken with respect and hatred; among the poor with unalterable faith and reverence. Of all the stories I heard there is one which I remember more accurately and vividly than the rest.

I heard it in a hutor on the road to town. The mujik Nikita Minushev was journeying 140 versts to the city for news, in that stormy winter of 1918, and he had taken me along with him. A cold wind and a fine stinging snow caused us even before dusk to turn into a post station in an isba belonging to an acquaintance of Minushev. Sprawled over a rickety wooden bed and on benches before a samovar green with age, were already many travelers turned aside from the road. Until darkness they watched one another with their furtive mujiks' eyes. They exchanged the usual opinions about the price of bread, the lack of goods, and they spoke very, very cautiously about the new conditions in the country. But at one o'clock the light began to grow dim from the steam issuing from the unclean clothes of the peasants and from the breathing of those gathered together in the little isba, and to cast flickering shadows on the beams under the ceiling, and then the peasant women began to talk. The spare, gray-faced woman, with her glittering black eyes, and ashy-gray hair straggling out from underneath her platok, told the sleepless ones a story about Lenin, and how he divided the people with the Czar:

* A geographical district, roughly corresponding to a county.

Once upon a time there came to the Czar Mikolashka the most important of his generals. "Oho, your majesty," he said, "you must know that in a certain kingdom in a certain land there has appeared a man well versed in all the sciences. His rank is not known, he carries no passport, and he goes by the name of Lenin. And this man threatens your majesty and boasts that he will come to you, Czar Mikolay, and that with one word he will take all your soldiers unto himself, and that all your generals and officials and noble officers and even yourself, Czar Mikolay, will be turned into dust and blown away with the wind, such is the word he has!"

And at that the Czar Mikolashka was frightened. He stamped his feet and wrung his hands, and he cried out in a loud voice: "Write immediately to this man whose rank is not known, who carries no passport, and who goes by the name of Lenin. Tell him not to come against me with his word, not to shatter me and my officials and my high-born officers into dust, and for that I will give to this man half of my kingdom!" Then there came running to the Czar many learned people with their quills and paper; they sharpened their pens, and wrote to this man Lenin: "So, Lenin, do not come against the Czar Mikolay with your word, but take unto yourself half of the kingdom of Mikolay, without any fighting, without any abuse!" And very soon came the answer from that man whose rank was unknown, who carried no passport, and who went by the name of Lenin. And thus wrote Lenin to the Czar Mikolashka: "So, even as it has been written, I agree to receive from you, Czar Mikolashka, half of your kingdom. Only I will write for you the agreement as to how it shall be divided. Not by provinces, not by ooyezds, not by volosts. But this is the way, just as I prescribe it, this is the only kind of a division to which I will agree; and so that there need be no further discussion on the matter, I will [illegible] down for you. Take to yourself, Czar Mikolashka, all the white-bones: your generals, your officials, your high-born officers with all their distinction, with all their rank, their crosses, their gorgeous epaulets, with their noble wives and with their white-boned children. Take your gentlemen landowners with all their riches, with their clothes of silk and velvet, with their gold and silver dishes, with their wives and their offspring. Take unto yourself your merchants with their goods and countless treasures, and take all the wealth from the banks. Take to yourself all the factories with their equipment and their machines and all their riches. But give to me all the black-bones—the mujiks, the soldiers, the factory workers, in all their common overalls. Only leave me the cattle for breeding, the meadows of grass, the mother-earth for plowing."

When the Czar Mikolashka read this letter he kicked his heels together for joy, clapped his hands merrily, and ordered his generals and officers and officials thus: "Write at once to this Lenin that we entirely agree to everything. And for all that he's such a wise man and knows a secret word, look how foolish he is! For he leaves to me all my countless treasures, all the merchants' goods, all the landlords' property, and he takes for himself only the black-bones, who are of no use whatever. And we shall easily find other black-bones to guard my treasures, and we shall make soldiers out of them, and so we shall live again in peace and prosperity." And then there ran again to the Czar, as fast as they could, panting, many learned people. They sharpened their pens, and they wrote that the Czar was agreed. And they didn't even jeer at Lenin, lest he should think better of the bargain, and come against them after all with his secret word.

And so in good time, very quietly and softly, Lenin gathered together all his soldiers and mujiks and workers. The Czar had already taken his white-bones and gone far away. And as the mujiks and the soldiers and the workers gazed about them, there came up to them a very simple peasant, and said to them "Comrades, good-day!" And then as far as your eye could see he shook hands with everyone, and said in a loud voice: "You and I will all be equal one with another, just as we are now, comrades. Only follow my instructions. I am learned in all the sciences, and my comrades will not be the worse for it." And the soldiers answered him in their soldiers' way "Right, Comrade Lenin, we are ready!" And the factory workers, the literate city folk, with their usual politeness, did not contradict him either. But the mujiks were offended because they thought there had been some mistake in the reckoning, and they began to growl, to glare at him, to push forward: "And why have you given up all the countless treasures?" they demanded. "If you had divided them among us we might have been able to improve our condition." But Lenin just smiled and wagged his head, and said these words in answer: "Don't get excited, don't reproach me, just gather your cattle together and go about your business, and then everything will be quite clear. I did not take the treasure for you because there are many thousands of you, but of the white-bones there are only a few hundreds. As for wiping all the white-bones entirely from the earth, for that I know a word, but it is still not complete—I have still not reached the bottom of it. But for all the black-bones of the earth I have a word which is sure. And so I say to the Czar: "Nowhere will the white-bones find for themselves either soldiers or workers. All will come under my hands and refuse to serve you; and as they are not producers, your white-bones, but only spenders, so it will come to pass that they will not live long under the bright light of the sun."

And in good time it happened so. There came men galloping on horseback to Lenin, bringing him news from Mikolashka the Czar. And thus wrote Mikolashka: "Oho, Lenin, you have duped me. You have taken unto yourself all the black-bones, and you have given to me not producers but only spenders. All my generals and my highborn officers stand like horses without their soldiers. They only drink and eat and grow fatter and fatter all the time. The gentlemen-landowners have gone through all their stores. They have already used up all the fine clothes from their trunks without thinking, and torn up and dirtied everything. My merchants are ruined, for without the mujiks they have no customers for their goods. My factory owners have worn out and spoiled all their machines. For with all their learning they have no practical knowledge—they cannot even adjust a screw. And I cannot get the black-bones to work for me. They all rush to you, at your secret word. And our affairs have come to such a pass that there is nothing to do but lie down and die. And so now all my generals will go against you in order to win back for me the black-bones."

And so it came to pass that there was a war between the white-bones and the black. But the white-bones could not hold out very long, as the generals and the high-born officers were only used to yelling commands at their soldiers, and moving about their warriors here and there as they pleased, and not at all used to fighting wars themselves, so delicate were their veins. And so it came to pass even as was said by the man whose rank was unknown, who carried no passport, and who went by the name of Lenin—that the white-bones did not stay in the bright light of the sun for long, and they soon turned to dust and were blown away with the wind.

The lamp went out. The mujiks snored. A woman murmured a question, but the spare old peasant sitting on the floor in her sheepskin coat went on chanting, as if in a prayer, the droll and touching words of her tale. This is the first peasant legend about the man by the name of Lenin in an ooyezd very poor in legends, where many bright names have sunk into oblivion.

T. S. Eliot

By EDWIN MUIR

PROBABLY no writer of our time has said more things about the art of literature which are at once new and incontrovertible than Mr. T. S. Eliot has said. He has written very little. His criticism is contained in "The Sacred Wood," a small book, and in "Homage to John Dryden," a still smaller one. With every subject he has attempted he has only made a beginning, said a few pregnant or subversive words, and stopped. His criticisms of Dante, Blake, Swinburne, and Dryden have the appearance of footnotes. The series of essays in "The Sacred Wood" on the problems of criticism end with a remarkable economy of generalization. Even in essays which are more full, in those on Ben Jonson and Marvell, Mr. Eliot seems to be filling in the few strokes needed to complete a portrait rather than drawing an original one himself.

This impression of incompleteness is largely misleading. It is only when one tries to discover what essential aspect of Jonson's talent has been left untreated in Mr. Eliot's essay that one realizes how nearly complete it is. His prose is deceptive because in it he exercises continuously the faculty, rare in our time, of always saying more than he appears to say. In his essays he seems most of the time to be concerned with minor points, but he is in reality concerned always with essential ones. His critical method consists in pressing a small lever and thereby lifting an unsuspectedly heavy weight. His essays are full of observations which do not appear important, but turn out to be those on which a really just generalization would be based. Accordingly his criticisms continuously grow in interest: they are among the few written in our time to which one can go back and find something which one perusal, or two, did not yield. In one way Mr. Eliot is the most complete critic of our time. What he does choose to say he says most unassailably. He rarely sets down an opinion without being conscious of all that has already been said in favor of or against it, and his final pronunciation is not only something new, of the same solidity, the same order, as what has been said already; it is at once a summing up and a revaluation. No one writing today has a stronger sense of tradition. He has written profoundly of it in his essay on Tradition and Individual Talent, saying not merely that we are judged by tradition but that we also modify it; that by adding one new work of art to those which constitute tradition we do something which is enough to change, however slightly, its character; and that thus tradition is a thing which is forever being worked out anew and recreated by the free activity of the artist.

Admirable and profound words—yet why is it that in spite of them Mr. Eliot always appears to us to underestimate the free character of tradition, the fact that in its living perpetuation it gives the artist his proper liberty and is not so much a thing to be submitted to or imposed as to be discovered and welcomed? The influence of tradition on Mr. Eliot's criticism is not to make it uniformly bold and comprehensive but more generally to make it too cautious. He often draws back where a genuinely classical writer, a writer in the full stream of tradition, knowing the dangers, seeing the raised eyebrows of all the past and hearing the warnings of the present, would have gone on. Mr. Eliot feels answerable to tradition for every judgment he makes; but this accepted responsibility, while it gives his criticism weight, sometimes makes it rashly timid. Thus, if his enthusiasms are never wild, his understatements sometimes are. One is struck by the sheer oddity when he describes Goethe's "Faust" as "a very able and brilliant poem," and when, admitting that a few "many-sided" men must "probably" be conceded to history, he adds: "Perhaps Leonardo da Vinci is such." It is as easy to lose one's sense of proportion through excessive caution as to lose it through excessive rashness. In these instances Mr. Eliot's caution becomes mechanical, and functions where it is not needed and has no meaning.

But if his criticism is sometimes weighed down by his sense of tradition, it is also enriched and enlightened by it. His great gift as a critic is that of seizing the artistic source and justification of a convention, the necessity in a poem of elements which may appear artificial, the real virtue of a school, the essential law of a work of art. He makes every work live while he considers it, for he sees its articulations, the necessity for them, and their living functioning. Thus, though at times he may appear to be concerned with craftsmanship alone he is in reality concerned with the organic structure, trying to discover whether it is a living body or merely an agglomeration of dead parts. He does not show a writer's "qualities," therefore, but the principles of his art. The reward of this difficult and concentrated way of approach is that in Mr. Eliot's criticism the work of art, stripped of all incidentals, shines with its own essential light, and that in an immediate way the artistic problem is brought before us. In penetration, knowledge, intuitive apprehension of the inner laws of a poem Mr. Eliot deserves to be ranked with the chief English critics.

His criticism has had a considerable influence on younger writers; his poetry has had perhaps even a greater influence. But his influence as poet has not been in the same direction as his influence as critic. The author of "The Sacred Wood" and Sweeney Erect is obviously a writer of contrasts. Certainly the poet in Mr. Eliot sets out to obey the critic. The idea, for example, that since the Elizabethan era poetry has been losing its complexity, richness, contrast, surprise, subtlety—a favorite idea of Mr. Eliot's, and a very fruitful one—is as clearly to be seen in his poetry as in his criticism. His poetry does attempt to restore some of the psychological richness of Elizabethan poetry, to be more full and diverse, to attain a new and more vigorous beauty. But in aiming at one thing it in reality achieves another. It has not the fulness and suppleness, the mixture of extreme refinement and natural coarseness of Elizabethan poetry. These elements are present, it is true. "The Waste Land" has extreme refinement and extreme coarseness; but they are not harmoniously and variously combined, producing a diversity of rich effects; they are set down side by side, in contrast, not in combination. Mr. Eliot's poetry is in reality very narrow, and in spite of its great refinement of sensibility, very simple. In the main it is a statement of two opposed experiences: the experiences of beauty and ugliness, of art and reality, of literature and life. To Mr. Eliot in his poetry these are simple groups of reality; their attributes remain constant; they never pass into one another; and there is no intermediate world of life connecting and modifying them. The plan of the early Sweeney Among the Nightingales is the same as that of "The Waste Land." The raw fact and the remembered vision, the banal and the rare, the crude and the exquisite, reality and art, are set down side by side.

> The circles of the stormy moon
> Slide westward toward the River Plate,
> Death and the Raven drift above
> And Sweeney guards the horned gate.
>
> Gloomy Orion and the Dog
> Are veiled; and hushed the shrunken seas;
> The person in the Spanish cape
> Tries to sit on Sweeney's knees.

That is the simple contrast which one finds again and again in Mr. Eliot's poetry; and all the poet's admirable subtlety of mind is directed not to varying the contrast but to making it as violent as possible. This he effects in two ways: by releasing the contrast suddenly at the moment when it will produce the maximum shock, and by refining the passages of formal beauty and psychological obscenity until their juxtaposition has an element of horror. The former device is unworthy a serious poet; the latter has yielded Mr. Eliot many exquisite lines and a few passages [illegible] ing a curious mood, not of despair, nor of mere depression, but of something which seems to combine both and to pass beyond them:

> A rat crept softly through the v[illegible]
> Dragging its slimy belly on the bank
> While I was fishing in the dull canal
> On a winter evening round behind the gashouse
> Musing upon the king my brother's wreck
> And on the king my father's death before him.

It is in passages such as this that Mr. Eliot has attained nearest to beauty in his portrayal of actual experience; for in his passages of pure beauty the inspiration is almost always literature. This passage has the same quality as the earlier:

> The sable presbyters approach
> The avenue of penitence;
> The young are red and pustular
> Clutching piaculative pence.

It is the artistic realization of what Mr. Eliot failed to express, and betrayed, when he wrote

> The red-eyed scavengers are creeping
> From Kentish Town and Golder's Green.

It is, in short, the expression of a mood in which a hatred of squalor disguises a certain pleasure in squalor. This mood is not uncommon, as most people would have to admit if they had Mr. Eliot's courage; and could it be grasped with all its implications—as Baudelaire grasped similar moods—it would no doubt be found to be profoundly significant. But Mr. Eliot does not grasp its implications. His presentation of it is at once bold and timid—it is inconclusive, and, one feels, deliberately so. The mood is not pulled out into the light frankly and cleanly as one of Mr. Eliot's Elizabethans, for instance, would have pulled it out. And it is for this reason that his poetry is sometimes displeasing, as all things fragmentary and unrealized are. It is not displeasing because the poet expresses his anguish so fully that we cannot endure it, but because he does not express it fully enough. For when the sense of the pain of life is fully expressed, with nothing kept back, with no self-protecting veil between the poet and his suffering, it brings release. And release Mr. Eliot's poetry rarely attains. It is not false or shallow, but it is inconclusive: it lacks immediacy and importance. It expresses an attitude to life, not a principle of life. The difference between

> Non val cosa nessuna
> I moti tuoi, nè di sospiri è degna
> La terra. Amora e noia
> La vita, altro mai nulla; e fango è il mondo, to quote a poet who had even more than Mr. Eliot's gloom, and

> Then how should I begin
> To spit out all the butt-ends of my days and ways?

is a difference fundamentally in seriousness. As a poet Mr. Eliot lacks seriousness. He is bitter, melancholy, despairing, but he is not serious. There are moments when seriousness is given him. It is his in the two beautiful and [illegible]ble stanzas which conclude Sweeney Among the Nightingales:

> The host with someone indistinct
> Converses at the door apart,
> The nightingales are singing near
> The Convent of the Sacred Heart,
>
> And [illegible]
> When Agamemnon cried aloud,
> And let their liquid droppings fall
> To [illegible]

But when that seriousness is absent what is left? Not, indeed, a pose, but an attitude which will seem in another few years as obsolete as Byron's or Musset's seems to us now. It is, curiously enough, an attitude very like theirs. Disdain for life, loneliness of soul, the sardonic gesture, the mysterious sorrow—all these are in Mr. Eliot's poetry. They are also in Mr. Huxley's novels, they have been called the spirit of the age, and it is impossible to take them seriously.

But although Mr. Eliot's work has not the fulness and seriousness of great poetry and does not reflect the spirit of the age so much as a fashion, it is something beautifully finished and quite unique. In it an anguished vision of the world is expressed in light verse. In all of Mr. Eliot's finest poems, in the various poems about Sweeney, Burbank with a Baedeker, Whispers of Immortality, The Love Song of Prufrock, the mood and the treatment are deliberately too trivial for the theme. That is Mr. Eliot's method, and it is one which can admirably render a deep loathing for life; but little else. Grief appears somehow both intensified and belittled when it is expressed in the most artificial terms the poet can find; disgust assumes the importance of a conviction steadily held when pains are taken to discover the most polished formula for it.

> But though I have wept and fasted, wept and prayed,
> Though I have seen my head (grown slightly bald) brought in upon a platter,
> I am no prophet—and here's no great matter;
> I have seen the moment of my greatness flicker,
> And I have seen the eternal Footman hold my coat, and snicker,
> And, in short, I was afraid.

There everything is underlined, every word is written for effect, and we are intended to know it. In its hint of theatricality this poetry is like Heine's, but the theatricality is not ironical as Heine's was. Heine could only have spoken of the eternal Footman with his tongue in his cheek; Mr. Eliot does so with perfect seriousness. His theatricality is always meant: he may often appear, but he very rarely is, ironical. His utterance is a sort of elegant bombast used sincerely; and the real distinction of his "sable presbyters," his Princess Volupine, his Grishkins, is that they are not what they look—that is, creatures of a melodramatic fancy—but seriously intended symbols to body forth a genuine vision of life. Very few poets have used symbolism of a similar kind for a similar purpose, and to have done so establishes Mr. Eliot's originality. At the same time it is clear that in these symbols a great variety of meanings could not be expressed. And although his symbolism makes Mr. Eliot's poetry arresting, piquant, unique, it makes him fatal to imitators and definitely a poet of inferior range. The instrument of expression he has forged would not serve for a great poet, and could not be used by an unskilful one. What value it could have for our time it is hard, therefore, to see. But the value of Mr. Eliot's criticism, on the other hand, is palpably important, and will probably become more so.

The Hired Man

By REXFORD GUY TUGWELL

I. The Passing Phase

THERE is a labor problem in the country. The farm laborer used to be called the hired man and is still in some parts; but the hired man of other years is a passing character; the hired girl, or "maid" as the city knows her, is disappearing too; and they are going for something like the same reasons: the feeling of being under direction at all times, the long hours, the heavy work, the want of a social group to adhere to, and in general a sense of oppression and lack of freedom.

Certain demands of the human organization must be complied with if the pitiable psychic results of maladjustment are to be escaped. The impulse to boss is quite as strong in the average man as the desire to be bossed; at best we are something like mechanisms designed for a hunting, wandering, nomadic life, and we will escape at the first opportunity from regularity, monotony, and sustained and directed effort.

The human mind revolts from factory labor with all the accumulated strength of millions of years of evolved adjustment to an entirely different life. The outdoors calls to men and their minds and bodies respond automatically and powerfully; the suppression of this group of tendencies helps to account for some manifestations of urban unrest. But the hired man when he left the farm could not foresee unhappiness. It looked like an easy life to him in the city. He had been able to exercise his nomadic impulses more or less on a two-hundred-acre farm, but there was a chance to escape the other unpleasant features of farm life and to find the humanly necessary relationships of a social group—all by going to the city. Important, too, in influencing the hired girl and the hired man to change was the feeling of social inferiority that goes with living as well as working on the job; one of the few aspects of factory work mitigating its hard circumstances is the chance the workman has at home to be among equals.

There is another cause for the scarcity of hired men: provided a man has the minimum physical and psychic qualities necessary to farming success, it is easy for him to become a farmer on his own. There is no reason why a good man should work long for another in the country. Farm papers forever enlarge on the hardships of farm life, among them the obstructions to ownership; but these difficulties are not very real, not, at least, to be compared with the restrictions on like opportunities in the city. On the whole it is astonishingly easy to rise from hired man to owner; nothing can keep a man down but his own limitations; it is so easy, in fact, that most of the hired men who did not go off to the city have themselves become farmers.

II. The Hired Man of Romance

Riley drew him; he was a kindly sort; an all-around helper and very nearly a part of the family. In blue jeans and a hickory shirt, he took the children rides on the hay wagon and knew about doodle bugs and such. Even I can well remember him, but in New York State, not Indiana; just lacking usually the qualities of complete independence, yet not needing close direction in the day's work; resenting it, in fact. He rose at dawn and did chores, worked all day in the fields, and did chores again at night till dark. He demanded few of the good things of life; uncouth, awkward, a great chewer of tobacco, a great believer in the traditional method, old age took him by surprise. And his end was the county poor farm like as not, an end not unpleasant except for the social stigma.

Robert Frost knows him in New England, shows him coming home to the farm place to die after going off a-wandering. Hear him saying: "Home is a place you somehow haven't to deserve"; and feeling this place where he'd worked and given service owed him the home relationship all men crave. Seen at this distance, the man of labor in the fields and barns he did not own seems to me to deserve a nation's gratitude. He acquired but little else and not many thanks in his time; and he helped greatly at a pioneer task. It must be remembered that he worked side by side with the farmers who cut off the forests and field by field reduced a good part of the continent and almost the whole of many States to tillable condition. A person who has never worked in the hardwoods through the winter and spring; in the snow and cold and the slush and mud of March; and never tried to break a stumpy field to the plow scarcely can have an adequate conception of the task. We who buy our farms now are apt to look across the smooth, cleared acres without a thought of their primitive condition or any surge of sympathy for the sweat and pain of hard living it cost to make farmland of it all.

It was a job that called out the last resources in men, a job to try men to the utmost, soul and body. There were poor roads and therefore few and poor markets; this meant that the farm had largely to be a self-supporting unit. There were isolation, hard labor, long hours, and rewards far in the future. Later, of course, the rewards began to come; but all through a century of this sort of thing there was the hired man, working by the farmer's side, carrying half the burden and looking forward to nothing. The reward, if it ever came, was not coming to him; and he never has had any reward.

In time there came a change in the relationship between the farmer and the hired man; as pioneer conditions passed and roads were built the farm ceased to be so distinct a social unit in itself; neighborhoods now formed the social group; and neighborhoods have in our own time been infinitely widened by the automobile. Wider markets and somewhat greater farm prosperity have followed. And the hired man finally got to be less a member of the family and more a servant as enlarged neighborhoods enabled farmer to associate with farmer and created an employed and an employing class; and as prosperity increased it became more and more apparent that there existed a real difference in economic status. This difference had been kept in the background all through the pioneer period because most men lived alike and had open to them about the same pleasures. The hired man had been as good as the family; he was so no longer. Therefore, in the period beginning roughly with the beginning of this century the hired man had to be of a somewhat lower mental type, without any great spirit of independence, any marked abilities, or even any great skill and knowledge of his own.

Hired men began to be scarce; and such as there were proved altogether unsatisfactory. The labor problem had arrived on the farm.

III. The Changing Job

The industrial revolution on the farm really began just after the Civil War; and even now it is nothing like so complete as the revolution in the processes of the production of factory-made goods. Horseless farms are still in the future and there is still hard manual labor on the farm rather than the machine-tending activities of the factory. But machine tending becomes more and more important, mechanical cleverness gradually overbalancing in usefulness physical strength and endurance. Now a different man is required. A good mechanic can be a highly successful farmer in rather a short time.

The new farmer has only to use the telephone to confer with a highly trained, community-paid expert in the farm bureau office at the county seat. There he can be advised what, how, and when to plant, the best methods of cultivation, and the complete technique of caring for the crop. How to combat disease, a matter of growing importance, he can learn from this expert too. And he no longer has to save and care for his own seed; it is done much better commercially, and the farm bureau is willing to see that it is really better done.

All this means that the farmer of the future to be successful must be a man willing to drop the traditional method and depend on expert advice even though it runs contrary to long-founded notions. He must be the sort who is willing to recognize that a man who spends his life studying, say, the blossom-end rot of the tomato probably knows more about the disease than a general farmer can know, even though his life is lived in laboratories and not on the farm. All of us whose ancestors were farmers know that this is just the sort of men they were not.

More and more as time goes on mechanical processes become important at every stage of cultivation. The tractor plows and fits the land, cultivates, threshes, and cuts the ensilage. The motor and gas-engine milk, saw wood, and pump water. Spraying for disease control is a power process; and so it goes. The farmer of the future may be a slighter and a softer man, but he must be a clever tinkerer. And his hired man will be a mechanic who can keep the tractor running.

The city has pulled farm labor away and the job has changed so that the old kind of man is no longer wanted. He must be a better man—or a poorer one. No great, uncouth, kindly, silent men are needed. But at harvest time there come out of the cities a swarm of casuals. This is something new.

IV. Casualty

He is not called a hired man any more; and really he is not, in the old sense, at all. He comes for the days of the harvest, and goes. Sometimes we know his name; oftener the women and children go in fear of him because of his crooked look and the slouching bravado of his carriage, and we know him as "Bill" or "Jim" or "the tall one," "the lame one," and so on.

It will be nearly harvest time when they begin to drop off the way freights and make their way along the country roads, stopping at this farm and that, picking up rumors of a crop ripe here or there, working a few days and moving on. At the very time I had this article in preparation a particularly bad case of this sort of casualty came to my attention. He was a man about thirty-eight, thin, emaciated, and with the rotting teeth, dull eyes, and scabbed lips of his type. His physical condition made it impossible that he should be able to deliver a good day's work for his wages. He came along a road where I was playing with a small daughter and something in the pathetic look he threw at her riotous health and youth hurt so that I stopped him. He had arrived in the country too early and had not found work; characteristically he had not started out until he had been driven from New York by hunger; he had been on the road two and a half days and had walked over a route I estimated at sixty-odd miles; he had eaten nothing but a little green fruit and his feet were a mass of sores. He tore at a piece of bread with his teeth as a dog tears at flesh.

In my county thousands no different come for the fruit picking, plums, peaches, grapes, apples. The work begins in August and lasts intermittently until the winter apples are harvested late in October. But in the wheat country and in other specialized sections it is much the same, except that fruit picking is pleasanter labor than almost any labor known to man; and that grain harvesting is just the reverse.

Here, if we have a sizable farm we have a separate house, empty the rest of the year, where the pickers camp. We hire a cook and furnish them with beds; and we are glad when their work is done and they are gone. They are unclean, and we want them to have no contacts with our family life; they smirch and subtly contaminate whatever they touch. Persons who talk and write about the romance in the life of the casual ought occasionally to be reminded of the kind of human material they are and of the conditions of their lives. Most of us who have dealings with them know neither whence they come nor whither they go; but some of us have seen a city lodging house in winter. I need not go into that: the crowding and promiscuity, the underfeeding, the uncared-for sickness, the perversions, the distortions of manhood. Nevertheless, this outcast of the cities such as the specimen I have described, emaciated, worn out with lack of nourishment and unthinkable vices, is one of the types of our hired men of today.

The other type may fairly be described as a casual, too, although he forms a somewhat different problem. Not all retired farmers have been successful before they retired; a great many have been forced out because they lacked the personal qualities of success. They drift into the villages and depend for a poor livelihood upon a day's work here and there on near-by farms. The number of their kind is swelled by the failures in the easy competition of village life. This is the country proletariat. The village drunkard is a time-honored type; we can now see that he was a drunkard because he was a failure in life and his numbers have not been lessened by prohibition. This man's characteristics are not greatly different from those of the drifters who come down out of the cities for the harvest save in one respect. He has a family and usually a large one.

Conditions of life are easier for him here than they would be in the city; there is little rent, there is less costly fuel; and there is cheaper food, for his wife has a garden. Natural bent and adversity have soured him; he is often physically unwell and lacking in the precautions of personal sanitation that would build up vigor. This is the precise mental and physical type of drifting casual distinguishable on construction jobs in the Northwest woods and mixed in with lately arrived foreigners doing the lowly labor of the nation everywhere.

He is a familiar country figure and far more numerous and significant than is usually believed. He feels that society owes him a great deal and he does not scruple to take what he can acquire in not too dangerous ways. Every country person knows his sort and knows that there are more and more like him as farms require greater efficiency for success. There are none of the qualities of toughness, persistence, and shrewdness in him that make even unintelligence partially successful. We have not noticed him because he is not coherent, remains ungrouped, and so has little stimulation to revolt. But we shall be hearing more of this particular country casual in the future.

What Little Mary Learned About History

By JIMMIE CRISWELL

Benjamin Franklin

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN had a great many brothers and sisters, so he had to walk around Boston with a loaf of bread under each arm, where he also bought a whistle. When he grew up he used to fly a kite with a key to it, and he got a lot of electricity out of the clouds and put it in Leyden jars, which was a good thing, because now we can use it for a great many things. He is especially famous for his sayings, which he used to publish in an almanach, until the Saturday Evening Post was started, and then he put them in that. He was a great help to America in its early days and did a lot for the country.

Napoleon Bonaparte

Napoleon Bonaparte was the greatest general in the world. He fought a great many battles with everybody else, and he always won them. Once he went to Russia, but the Czar of Russia, who was called Peter the Great, set fire to the town and the French had to retreat, and lots of them died because they got lost in the snow on the steps. After this he won a lot more wars, until it was time for the battle of Waterloo, at which a lot of Napoleon's soldiers fell into a sunken road, and so the Duke of Wellington won the battle and the Germans could capture Paris, and Napoleon had to go and live at St. Helena, which he did not like very much. He married the Empress Josephine, and also Maria Theresa, and their son was made king of Rome.

Lord Nelson

Lord Nelson was the Admiral of the British Navy and won a victory, which was a good thing for England. He had only one arm, and something had put his eye out, so he used to look at things through a telescope with it and say he didn't see it. His wife was a beautiful lady named Mrs. Hamilton, and they painted lots of pictures of her. He beat the Spanish Armada at Trafalgar, only he was killed while so doing, so all the sailors had to wear black handkerchiefs. He was hit very badly by a cannon-ball, which killed him, which was a pity. His last words were: "Kiss me, Harriet," and then he told them not to give up the ship, and so they didn't, and England won the war.

Martin Luther

Martin Luther is famous because he was a Lutheran and everybody else was a Catholic. He thought this was very wicked, and so he nailed Theseus onto the front door of the church. But the Pope sent a bull after him and chased him away, and so he started the Reformation, which is commonly known as the Hundred Years' War, because it lasted a very long time and did a great deal of damage. After this, the Pope was not allowed to leave the Vatican any more.

Captain John Smith

Captain John Smith was a very brave man and discovered Virginia, only Indians captured him, who would have destroyed his life, but a beautiful Indian maiden named Pocahontas saved his life and all the Indians smoked a pipe of peace, and so Virginia was made an English colony, which was a good thing, because Sir Walter Raleigh could raise tobacco there, and they made a great deal of money. Afterward they were married, and we don't hear much more about him.

FREDERICK THE GREAT

Frederick the Great was the king of Germany. He was a very good king, although he was a German. He fought a great many wars with Maria Theresa about silesia, which was a good thing for Germany, because they always won and got more silesia. He wouldn't let anybody in the army unless they were over six feet tall, and so the army was very powerful and won all the wars. Frederick the Great was very fond of dogs and lived in Potsdam. Only there was a wind-mill in the way, which he ordered them to tear down, only they wouldn't because they had a right to have it there, so Frederick said he would uphold the law and leave it be.

QUEEN ELIZABETH

Queen Elizabeth was a very great queen, and she was queen of England during the Spanish Armada. She was an intimate friend of Sir Walter Raleigh, who laid his cloak on the ground for her and thus kept her clean. Although she never got married, she was called the Virgin Queen, and was very popular. After the Armada was over, she cut off the head of her sister, who was called Bloody Mary Queen of Scots, because she wanted to be queen instead of her. She lived a long time and when she died she was beloved by everybody.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has been to Atlantic City. He has eaten in blatant hotels, larger than towns, gaudy and rich and unreal. He has seen bathing suits made of crossword-puzzle designs with the puzzle all worked out. He has seen babies two years old dancing the Charleston on Young's Million Dollar Pier at 11:30 in the evening. He has seen a public dance floor, of vast acreage, filled with couples whirling, racing, jiggling, heaving, side-kicking, with a speed and competence unmatched in any polite hotel ballroom. He has ventured out at night and seen thousands of grown men and women being trundled in go-carts along the endless Boardwalk, and other thousands walking—walking nowhere in particular, with a blaze of gaudy shops and shows and restaurants on one side and on the other a dark ocean rolling in unnoticed, insignificant, almost invisible.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has stopped at a stand where a cheese concern offers foaming glasses of buttermilk and sandwiches toasted on electric griddles with rich yellow cheese bubbling between the crisp slices. He has stopped at a stand maintained by a well-known orange distributing company and sipped juice squeezed with visible honesty from glowing samples of California's best. He has yielded to the carnivorous delights of steak sandwiches, rare, tender, and juicy, and made up in rolls like some super-hotdog. He has looked into shop-windows where the latest obscenity in Kewpie dolls hangs side by side with jade from China and bowls from the North Carolina hills. He has seen window displays of vast overhanging knickerbockers which make plus-four a conservative estimate, and bathing suits that might be called minus-eights. He has seen whole shop-fronts given over to pictures and maps showing the rich delights of Coral Gables, or Palm Beach West, with young men in dazzling white flannels lounging in wicker chairs in front, prepared to sell you the whole coast of Florida for a consideration.

* * * * *

AND in broad daylight, with the Boardwalk subdued by the sun, he has seen brown arms, strong legs, bright sunshades, gray sand—and, beyond and between, the ocean itself tumbling in, dousing the just and unjust alike. He has seen children, at peace with sand and sea, at home and oblivious in the midst of the crowds and jazz, the noise and the general air of insanity; he has watched them playing in the waves, digging sturdily toward China, and has envied them their cool unconcern. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Dayton

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your interesting editorial of July 8 on Tennessee vs. Truth you say: "We can hardly question the right of any people to decide how and what the youth in its schools shall be taught." On this important point, incidental as it may seem to the generally excellent doctrine of your article, may I venture to ask if we ought not daily, and especially when a legislature or our Congress is in session, watchfully to question the right of the people or its representatives to pass any law or make any decision which is not essentially right? If, for instance, the Tennessee Legislature, as you well say, has been extremely foolish, why not question its right to enact folly into statute law and thus proceed to drive truthful teachers from its schools?

I assume that you do not suppose that democracy consists in a mechanical system of counting the noses of opposite factions in order to secure a show of public law and order. If democracy is worth having at all, it must be based upon a certain spiritual or humane respect for the fellow-men who constitute any political unit. Neither is it properly a continual contest between dissatisfied and angry parties, but rather a reasonable approach and a means of development toward a friendly system of cheerful cooperation in pursuing common interests. In other words, it fails to constitute a tolerable government, so far as any party in it, however large, is disposed to treat another party or group in an unfair or unneighborly manner.

Does not this cardinal principle need to be made clear to a generation who are still largely living upon the mischievous tradition of the arbitrary governments of the past, that its majority, once established in power, possesses a species of mystic "right," like a king, or an aristocracy, or a pope, to enforce its will upon its minorities, or to make the laws for a despised helotry? On the contrary, the entire history of the rise of democracy is a series of protests, ineffectual at first, but slowly winning their way, against the notion that "might can make right"; that is, that any group of "great" men, or any number of ordinary men, are good or wise enough to compel their opinions upon others, few or many, who are unpersuaded and unwilling to conform to their urgency.

There is not a nation in Christendom that is not today getting its fill of the unrighteousness that a false democracy perpetrates. The fact is that mankind has not as yet learned to practice its democracy any better than its religion, the two functions being indeed far nearer to fundamental identity than is commonly supposed.

We wonder whether meddlesomeness is not the special vice, as well as the favorite pastime, of a half-baked democracy. Meddlesome people are inclined, under the popular sway of "the holiness of the majority," to impose all sorts of rules of conduct upon their neighbors. We are furnished, accordingly, at immense cost with the melancholy ancient symbolism of the rule of threatening and fear—jails and penalties and spies and handcuffs and armed police, and worst of all, the inhuman bitterness and contempt which traditionally attend the presence of a "criminal class."

This is not to say that there should be no laws. I wish rather to urge that the real need is spiritual. It is the need of genuine sympathy, and the patience that belongs with sympathy, and ever so much more outlay of education and persuasion, without which our "pains and penalties" and threatened punishments leave a nation uncivilized and reduce democracy and religion to hypocritical forms.

Southwest Harbor, Maine, July 8 CHARLES F. DOLE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If the State has not the right to say what children in schools supported by the State should not be taught, why [illegible]?

As a Pennsylvanian it is my right to believe the government of the commonwealth and of the United States should be overthrown by force, but should I teach such doctrine, openly and at my own expense, I would land in jail, and the Supreme Court would sustain my conviction. The right of the legislature of a State to enact that no public-school teacher should teach the pupils in school that the moon is made of green cheese, or that the earth is flat and rests on the shoulders of Atlas. I am a member of no church, profess no religious creed, and believe the Tennessee law more asinine than a bunch of monkeys assembled as a legislative body would have enacted, but being for law enforcement, even to the extent of jailing a man who mashes a bunch of grapes, adds sugar to the mash, and permits God or nature (whichever best pleases the ear) to create an alcoholic content of the mess equal to one and one-half of one per cent by volume, I naturally am for strict enforcement of the anti-monkey law.

Huntingdon, Penn., July 6 WM. WALLACE CHISOLM

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: H. L. Mencken's article, In Tennessee, has aroused my ire. I think it was his crack at plumbers that started me off, as I am a steamfitter, but I shall attempt to back up prejudice with reason.

Now, of course, Mr. Mencken, being "a specialist in human liberty," is entitled to look down on pedagogues and mechanics; but what he overlooks is the fact that a good workman takes a great pride in his work, and when his boss tells him to teach a system of biology or put in a piping system which he knows is wrong that workman is liable to speak out his mind without being "filled with subversive ideas by specialists in human liberty."

Ossining, New York, July 9 ARTHUR QUINN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Krutch's article on the cowardice of the Tennessee University folk is most timely. Just add, however, another straw. In South Carolina, where Cole Blease of hideous memory still performs as the leader of the State and threatens a state proscription of evolutionists as well as a federal enactment against science, the State University, in fear and trembling at its recent commencement gave every graduate a Bible with his diploma! This was in the nature of a fetishistic propitiation of the powers that be and Blease. The professors are tongue-tied and terrified before this sacrifice to Moloch.

Germantown, Pennsylvania, July 17 GALILEO

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the study of Dayton, in your issue of July 8, the writer observes: "The good people of Dayton, at least those one sees about the streets and in the stores, understand that no decent evolutionist claims man is descended from a monkey."

As a reader who has been familiar with Darwin's two great works for many years past, may I quote two passages from Chapter 6 of Part 1 of "The Descent of Man"?

> In forming a judgment on this head with reference to [illegible]. This family is divided by almost all naturalists into the Catarhine group, or Old World monkeys, all of which are [illegible] structure of their nostrils, and by having four premolars in each jaw; and into the Platyrhine group, or New [illegible] of which are characterised by different structure of the nostrils, and by having six premolars in each jaw. Some other small differences might be mentioned. Now, man unquestionably belongs in his dentition, in the structure [illegible] or Old World division. . . .
>
> The Catarhine and Platyrhine monkeys agree in a multitude of characters, as is shown by their unquestionably belonging to one and the same order. The many characters [sic] which they possess in common can hardly [illegible] species; so that these characters must have been inherited. But a naturalist would undoubtedly have ranked as an ape or a monkey an ancient form which possessed many characters common to the Catarhine and Platyrhine [illegible] and some few, perhaps, distinct from those now found in either group. And as man from a genealogical point of view belongs to the Catarhine or Old World stock, we must conclude, however much the conclusion may revolt our pride, that our early progenitors would have been properly thus designated. But we must not fall into the error of supposing that the early progenitor of the whole Simian stock, including man, was identical with, or even closely resembled, any existing ape or monkey.

There is a very good library in the city of Mount Vernon. The other day I asked one of the librarians whether there was much call for Darwin's works, since the Dayton controversy became celebrated. "Not for Darwin's works," she replied, "but they ask for lots of books about Darwin."

Mount Vernon, New York, July 9 DREW BOND

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of Mr. Krutch's timely article on the pervasive cowardice of public men in Tennessee, is there not abundant material, never more evident than right now, for a similar article on the absence of intellectual and moral integrity among our well-known men of science? Whoever has read Andrew Dickson White's masterly volumes on "The History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom" recalls how the ruthless recital of the facts showed the uniform absence of moral or intellectual integrity on the part of ecclesiastics as a whole: first denouncing the scientific view as false to the facts and destructive of religion, then with the inevitable advance of science attempting to read the new truth into the old formulas, and finally, in some cases, denying they had ever opposed the scientific view! This ecclesiastical attitude is perfectly understandable—nothing else was to be expected. But what are we to think of the integrity of scientific men today who, in the face of a challenge which demands honesty above all things, are denying the existence of any necessary antagonism between the practically universal teaching of our churches and the plain logic of science?

San Francisco, July 16 W. T. BROWN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Toward the elucidation of the Tennessee muddle I should like to contribute the view of a jurist of forty years' standing. It will be found that the issue is not by any means between evolution and inspiration but concerning our unique methods of legislation.

The idea prevails that "We the people" are competent to enact any restriction that at the moment may be regarded as proper. If we are competent to determine by law what a man may eat or drink, what he shall take for the support of his physical body, we must be equally competent to determine by law what he shall take for the support of his mental or spiritual body. There is no escape from this deduction. In the science of law both assumptions are ultra vires. They constitute tyranny and not law.

In countries where there is no written constitution, what is ultra vires is regarded as unconstitutional. But we have adopted a narrower interpretation of that term. What is ultimately needed as the outcome of the present dispute is a recasting of our conception of what is constitutional, an appreciation that there can be no amendment of a constitution which is not an enlargement of liberty; curtailment being dangerously near tyranny, if not actually so.

San Francisco, July 16 EDWARD MARSHALL

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Are the fundamentalists and Mr. Bryan given full credit for the reasonableness of their position by President Hibben and others in the present controversy? It seems to me that they are not.

The laws of evolution postulate a struggle for existence with the survival of the fittest, a logical sequence in which there is no conflict with reason. But the minute God is introduced and purpose is attributed to evolution we find that the law of the destruction of the weak becomes in reality the law of the destruction of those created weak on purpose to be destroyed. Can the law as now stated be reconciled with modern Christian conceptions?

It appears to me that it is not the fundamentalists who are bungling in their logic.

Dark Harbor, Maine, June 20 JAMES F. PORTER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The shameless exhibited disclosure of the American spirit of intolerance in the Dayton episode is simply the logical sequence of the Prohibition Amendment and the Volstead Act. In the face of this plain fact a little honest reflection on the part of The Nation would be good for its soul. The spirit of the KKK is abroad; the almost fanatical intolerance of America is loosed. It stirs the imagination to think of the possibilities in the light of what we are witnessing.

Brooklyn, July 18 WM. TAYLOR

The Kathleen Mavourneen Treaties

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you give me space in which to answer a letter of Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick, in your issue of June 3, in which he criticized certain statements made in my article which you published on May 6? I said that the instructions to the American delegates to the Geneva opium conference had been made public. Mr. Fosdick says "the American instructions were never made public."

In May, 1923, Mr. Porter first went to Geneva to a meeting of the Opium Commission, and laid before it the American suggestions as to the first steps to be taken to end the opium traffic, i.e., that opium production should be limited to the medical needs of the world and that all other use should be considered an abuse and not legitimate. Later on, the Council and the Assembly of the League of Nations accepted these suggestions in principle and the League called an international conference to see how the opium traffic could be curbed.

The sixty-eighth Congress appropriated money to send an American delegation to Geneva, passing a resolution known as H. J. Res. 195 (February 21, 1924). Part of this reads as follows: "Whereas as the result of the conferences in January, May, and September, 1923, between the representatives of the United States and the governments represented by the League of Nations, the latter governments agreed that the United States construction of the Hague Opium Convention . . . represented the objects which the treaty was intended to accomplish, and that any other construction would render the treaty ineffective and of no practical value . . . it was decided: (1) If the purpose of the Hague Convention is to be achieved according to its spirit and true intent, it must be recognized that the use of opium products for other than medical and scientific purposes is an abuse and not legitimate. (2) In order to prevent the abuse of these products it is necessary to exercise control of the production of raw opium in such a manner that there will be no surplus available for non-medical and non-scientific purposes." This is the bedrock and foundation of the American attitude toward the opium trade. The resolution then continues, and after appropriating money for American participation, ends with these words: "Provided, That the representatives of the United States shall sign no agreement which does not fulfil the conditions necessary for the suppression of the habit-forming narcotic traffic as set forth in the preamble."

These are "instructions" if you like, and they were made public months in advance. They had also received the approval of both the Council and the Assembly, and the Geneva conference was convened with the American attitude already well known. Our delegation hoped to cooperate with the other nations and to bring forth a real improvement on the vague Hague Convention of 1912, and not be fobbed off with a Kathleen Mavourneen treaty, "it may be for years or it may be forever," before something is done to stop the abuse of opium.

But, that there might be no mistake as to the American attitude, Mr. Porter had prepared two books, which set forth in minute detail the American point of view. "The Traffic in Habit-Forming Drugs," is a collection of documents, papers, congressional resolutions, and letters from cabinet officials and other prominent men, all covering a period of years, from the Shanghai conference onward, and including H. J. Res. 195. This was printed in both French and English, and shows how American opinion has been inflexibly anti-opium from the earliest days of our interest in the subject. The second book, "International Control of the Traffic in Habit-Forming Drugs," sets forth in triple columns, for easy comparison, the old Hague Convention, the suggestions as to revision of the Hague Convention offered by the Opium Advisory Committee, while the third column contains the United States suggestions as to revision. These two books were sent to every delegate to the conference, and the surplus copies were snapped up by others. The second, on international control, was afterwards printed in French and issued by the League as Document O. D. C. 34. Together, they were variously known as the American suggestions, or proposals, or point of view, or instructions, or what you will. Therefore, I feel that Mr. Fosdick is mistaken when he says the American instructions were never made public.

May I suggest that any one interested in the happenings at Geneva should read Dr. Willoughby's book on the two conferences,* particularly the chapter, Final Conclusions. On page 459 we find that the British Government had instructed its delegates to refuse all discussion of certain specified matters, one being "any resolution specifically affecting the domestic regulation of the production and use of opium and cognate questions of internal administration in India or any other portion of the British Dominions." This protected production, smoking, and eating, and was directly opposed to the American contention that opium should be limited to medical use only. Hence the deadlock, ending in the American withdrawal, since we could sign no agreement which countenanced a continuance of this abuse.

Stone Ridge, New York, July 9 ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

* "Opium as an International Problem. The Geneva Conferences." By W. W. Willoughby, professor of Political Science, Johns Hopkins University. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1925.

Books and Music

The Sign

By AMADO NERVO

Translated from the Spanish by J. M. [illegible]

Talk not to all about things sublime and essential.
Scatter your flowers to the poor.
Descend to the level of him to whom you speak, so as not to humble or distress him.
Be frivolous too when you are with the frivolous; but once in a while, as if unsought or even as if thoughtlessly, drop into their cup, on the foam of frivolity, a very small petal from the rose of your dreams.
If it is not noticed, recover it cautiously, and, always smiling, go away. It means that their hour has not yet come.
If, however, someone picks up the frail, small petal, as if askance, and caresses it and inhales its fragrance, give him forthwith and carefully a sign of discreet intelligence.
Then take him aside and let him behold one or a few of the marvelous flowers of your garden; tell him of the invisible divinity that surrounds us all; and give him the magic word, the Open Sesame of true freedom.

First Glance

MYSTICAL poets have differed very little among themselves with respect to the images which they have employed to render their visions intelligible, or at least imaginable. And this is not strange in view of the fact that no proper images are available. There is no known literary device by which a truly ecstatic state may be communicated. But the poets who have made the attempt have agreed with remarkable unanimity, even with a sort of monotony, upon an approximately adequate image—the image of light. Time to them is a vale of shadows, a cave of reflected glory, a copy of death; while eternity is a "white radiance," a sun, a field of stars, a child's unshaded soul. Ideal things have usually been conceived as brilliant things. And poets have succeeded in saying so in proportion to the art which they have applied to the problem of expression. On a large scale Dante and Milton proceeded by indirection—beginning their ambitious narratives in a hell of darkness so that in the end an indescribable radiance might with some measure of power be implied if not revealed. On the lesser scale, among the minor mystics, a more direct path has been taken, and in some cases a more intense conviction has been caught. One passionate phrase or one ingenious figure or one divine cadence has been sufficient.

Among the minor mystical poets "Æ" cannot be said to be one of the most passionate or ingenious or divinely lucky. Immensely important in literary Ireland today, he is a man whom one respects. As philosopher, leader, and friend he is reported to come as near perfection as a human being comfortably can. As poet, however, he has seldom been more than pure and unaffected—and those qualities are not enough. In his earlier volumes he outlined a mood rather than pierced to the center of a vision; and now his "Voices of the Stones" (Macmillan: $1.25) only continues that outline with faint if delicate tracery. But a single stanza has the shock of originality:

The cold Gods of the air
Bend by me on the hill,
Climb to the utmost crag,
Leap out, then all is still.

But a single poem has both the clarity and the finality which indicate that the necessary effort toward knowledge is made:

[illegible]
Through a long [illegible]
In the heart of age
A child wakes sleeping.

No invisible mother
Was nigh him there
Laughing and nodding
From earth to air.

No elfin comrades
Came at his call,
And the earth and the air
Were blank as a wall.

The darkness thickened
Upon him creeping,
In the heart of age
A child lay weeping.

The rest is simple statement, in none too varying terms, of the poet's faith in a far and shining perfection which any mind must recognize.

Through most of his "Hesperides" (Macmillan: $1.75) Ridgely Torrence is also a mystical poet, but one without the courage of his fancy. Having hung his golden apples in the Western Isles, he gathers them again and brings them home; having entertained a vision of some perfection outside himself, he decides that it is within him after all. Therein he may be more subtle and right than "Æ" in his child's innocence can ever be; but he is not so interesting. Milton's reference to "A paradise within thee, happier far" is effective as an afterthought to an epic of Eden and the Empyrean; as the theme of that epic it would have been deadly. Mr. Torrence, skilfully and beautifully as he writes, cannot escape the consequences of a somewhat didactic theme. In the end his world is neither here nor there; neither stone nor star.

MARK VAN DOREN

Saga and History

The Mistress of Husaby. By Sigrid Undset. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

The Tree of the Folkungs. By Werner von Heidenstam. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE ghost world of history may be conjured from the shades of the past in forms of legendary poetry or in a documentary realism which makes dead women and spent battles appear like aspects of contemporary life. In any case the process is sure to be a trick. Not one of us can turn back the wheels of our brains and think as our ancestors thought, mix our blood with the blood they shed in violence or persecution, or indeed enter into their bodies and walk the straight or twisted roads of their various dispensations. Whatever we may pretend of sympathetic imagination or knowledge or hieroglyphics we realize that they must enter into our bodies, speak with our voices, and think with our brains. We can change our environment, but never our inheritance. The dead always buries its own.

The best historical novelists, therefore, make little effort to give back the past as a grotesque incantation of obscure dialect, mock literary rhythms, and a great smothering bog of historical detail. The men and women in "War and Peace" talk and act as if they were contemporary to ourselves: that is, as they appeared to each other to talk and act. The heroine of Undset's "The Mistress of Husaby" does not, like Scott's heroines, serve as a fine quilt of nicely sewn chivalrous moralities, and the Norsemen in von Heidenstam's "Tree of the Folkungs" do not shout old Norse war songs freely translated and sounding like the roar of costume actors. Kristin Lavrans is living now just as much as she was living as Erlend's lover in "The Bridal Wreath" and Erlend's wife in "The Mistress of Husaby." She is not a medieval poetic allegory like so many word-blown myths in historical novels, and she shows very well that women are very much of a piece except for the accidents of space and time. The fact of her living in the fourteenth century in Norway does not make her talk and act as if she knew that she is a heroine in a novel any more than the Romans who lived during the fall of Rome had any idea that Rome was falling or that Gibbon would write about their lives or that history is full of lessons and tendencies. Indeed the truth of "The Mistress of Husaby" is almost oppressive in its slow passage of days spent as all of us do spend our days, whether we are put into a novel or whether we are contemporary and therefore dull. "The Mistress of Husaby" is not a brazen clamor of battles and sudden elopements, of sword thrusts and poetic justices. After their love affair in "The Bridal Wreath" Kristin and Erlend are married. Kristin has seven children, one a year, and keeps house. Erlend plays politics and helps keep house. The times are vexed with dynastic and foreign turmoil, but, as in our lives, the wars do not spin like a moving picture. House must still be kept, the children taught manners, and clothes mended. Erlend does not leap from turret to turret, his sword on the one hand, his lady fair on the other. He is a husband and Kristin is a wife. They act as they must act from their character and not from dramatic inventions.

It is so true that often it is rather dull with the acknowledged dulness of life. Kristin spends much of her time agonizing about her love affair with Erlend before their marriage. Herein she acts and feels as no doubt she did act and feel according to the savage morality of a frontier civilization which regards any marriage as sacred, a maid lost if she knows the beauty of passion, and man justified only if he accepts legal vows as the pledge of love. Sigrid Undset appears to identify herself completely with her characters, and Erlend is given entirely from his own point of view and not alone from his wife's. Certainly Sigrid Undset cannot herself accept all this bother about "sin," which is the chief agent of the difficulties between Erlend and Kristin. Yet she makes her men and women [illegible] within themselves and their own times that thereby she gives the most binding illusion of contemporary life. These people are the pawns of their time as we are the queens of ours, and that is the only method whereby genius can make of the past anything except a tiny blaze of poetic fireworks, milk-white heroines, and leaping prancing knights of old.

In "The Tree of the Folkungs" you do not get so much the illusion of contemporary history as the exquisite enthralment of a saga. "The Mistress of Husaby" is daily life and "The Tree of the Folkungs" (though the content is often just as historical) is a poem even as Homer is certainly not daily life. The eleventh and thirteenth centuries in Sweden appear like the effortless beauty of a dream rather than as the slow dredging of life. The characters are symbols and allegories rather than men and women, and all the confused wars about dynasty and plunder and political ambition take on the shining contours of a vision beheld in a deep mirror. Kristin and Erlend (with a slight change of speech and costume) might very well and probably do live next door to your own house. Folke Filbyter and Magnus and Valdemar are splendid embodiments like the warriors in Homer or the gods of the Norse. "The Mistress of Husaby" and "The Tree of the Folkungs" interpret the Middle Ages with a difference that is an absolute distinction in art. It is your own choice whether you prefer history to saga or can believe both as they are here so finely wrought. "The Mistress of Husaby" is the inevitable sequel of "The Bridal Wreath," and readers of von Heidenstam's "The Charles Men" will find in "The Tree of the Folkungs" a truth no less profound and a poetry no less beautiful.

DONALD DOUGLAS

Mr. White's Wilson

Woodrow Wilson: The Man, His Times, and His Task. By William Allen White. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

MR. WHITE has been so prominent in the American Progressive movement that high expectations are aroused when he writes the life of one who, with the possible exception of Mr. Roosevelt, was the foremost national leader of our time. Unfortunately, serious obstacles have prevented him from answering two of the most important questions which the reader asks about Wilson.

First, what was Wilson really like as a man? The greatest biographies grow out of the intimate personal acquaintance of the writer with his subject. We are told from day to day what he did and said, what he thought of men and affairs and the universe. Mr. White knew Wilson only through a few brief interviews. Other biographers, though lacking personal acquaintance, have been able to picture the mental and emotional development of the man in his letters. Mr. White, while he has evidently had access to some of these, was not authorized to reprint them. They are evidently to be reserved for the life by Ray Stannard Baker. These two great gaps, caused by want of personal knowledge and of correspondence, are imperfectly filled by the valuable information which the author has painstakingly gathered from Wilson's friends and associates.

The second question has to do with the development of Wilson's political ideas. Together with Disraeli, Wilson is one of the few men who set forth their political views in their writings before they engaged in active politics. Like Disraeli, Wilson's performance differed very widely from his program. When and why did he change? Mr. White's own political experience might have enabled him to picture the growth of Wilson's political views, but he fails to do so. He dismisses his books as mostly college texts. This is not an adequate description of "Congressional Government," which is a picture of a political system in action that takes its place beside Bryce's "American Commonwealth" and the "English Constitution" of Wilson's favorite, Bagehot. A fascinating study might be made of the contrast between the views of the Professor and those in the book and Wilson's conduct in office. Somewhere in his letters and conversation and state papers the material must exist which would enable us to trace the change.

Much more could have been done to fix Wilson's place in the Progressive movement, with which the biographer was actively familiar. Mr. White's statement that Wilson was at first unfriendly or indifferent to the movement probably has some basis in fact, but it still rests too much on conjecture. How do we know, for instance, that Wilson was "quite oblivious of the tumult in the East and the turmoil in the hinterland"? There must be notes of his lectures at Wesleyan and Princeton which would give concrete information on the matter. Mr. White's best contribution to this question is his emphasis on the Princeton controversy as turning Wilson's attention to the undue influence of great wealth upon matters of national importance, and his narrative of Wilson's relation to the Democratic machine when he became candidate for Governor of New Jersey. At this point the biographer's knowledge of practical politics enables him to say much of distinct value.

Although the subtitle holds forth promise of an account of Wilson's "times," little is said about this; much less than was to be expected from a close neighbor of Populism and Mr. Bryan. The best contribution is a single phrase, the chapter-heading on the 1916 election: "Our First National Liberal Victory." Unfortunately, as in most discussions of Wilson, the war overshadows in this book his achievements for American liberalism. The fifteen months between his first inauguration and August 1, 1914, deserve a much more intensive study than they have ever received. For a record of progressive legislation his first term may compare with Gladstone's first administration. Even after the war begins domestic questions ought to receive attention from a biographer—for instance, the controversial Adamson law. And adequate study would treat failures in liberalism as well as successes. Why, for instance, did a man whose whole training should have led him to value brains in politics consent to the haphazard selection of ambassadors? Was this owing solely to Bryan? How far did Wilson's dependence on the Democratic machine in the South force him to abandon his liberal program?

Such a friendly man as Mr. White is frequently shocked by Wilson's inability to make and keep friends. It must be said that the universal denunciation of him on this point loses some of its force when we remember the friends of his successor.

A material fact bearing on Wilson's character, a fact concerning which Mr. White gives us little information, is his health. Even while he was at Princeton it was rumored that he took two hours' rest in the middle of each day. May it not be that a limited physical vigor caused him to dismiss persons and topics abruptly, in much the same manner as a hospital nurse unceremoniously sends out a visitor when the patient shows signs of fatigue? Wilson may have disregarded customary courtesies because he felt forced to save his strength for matters for which he thought it imperatively needed. If he had possessed the inexhaustible vitality of Roosevelt he might have put forth just the little energy required here and there to prevent subsequent disasters. Anyone familiar with invalids will comprehend these sudden and irritable refusals to think or act further in a given direction. Mr. White hints at this explanation and shrewdly recognizes that Wilson's strength could have oeen much economized if he had not been unwilling to delegate important tasks to able subordinates—a fault wholly alien to the genial Kansan.

For all its merits of friendliness and insight, we lay down the book with the feeling that the story has not yet been told. This man was far more than "a shy, middle-aged gentleman." He cannot be explained by Mr. White's constant attempt to balance his Scotch maternal ancestry against his Irish forebears. Those of us who were aroused by Wilson in 1912 and 1916, as never before or since, are waiting impatiently to learn more of his mind and soul. We have waited through years of detraction; we have read, and heard praised without limit, all that was written against him by Walter H. Page, generously open to the contagion of English war-time fever, of whom it has been said that he was an excellent ambassador but that he was sometimes a little uncertain which country he represented; a man who, though an honor to America and a warm-hearted friend of Wilson, remained throughout wholly incapable of understanding the imperialism of all the warring nations, the temper of our West which did not want war, and the President's endeavors to build up a nation-wide desire for a permanent international settlement. Until we have Wilson's letters, the best answer to such attacks is found in his state papers, of which Mr. White makes too little use, and which even after the lapse of years revive in us the deep emotions of the day they were written. No biography can give us this man so well as the paragraph in the address of January 22, 1917, which begins: "They [the terms of a lasting peace] imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory." That the speaker of these sentences should have been content with the Treaty of Versailles is one more, and the greatest, problem in the life of Wilson for which we still await the answer.

ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR.

Englishmen Look at Their East

Western Civilization and the Far East. By Stephen King-Hall. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

The Occident and the Orient. By Sir Valentine Chirol. University of Chicago Press. $2.

THESE two complementary volumes by Britishers—one dealing with China, Japan, and Siberia, while the other covers practically the rest of Asia as well as Egypt—survey Oriental history and politics up to the summer of 1924. Both have grown out of the vital need for the White Man to take cognizance of startling changes in what he has regarded as the "unchanging Orient."

Mr. King-Hall pictures, with a fine sense of humor and a rare talent for forceful understatement, the opera bouffe of the chronic wars fought in vast China since the 1911 revolution. Trade is hampered, yet it is constantly growing; while in 1911 the post office transmitted 116,000,000 articles, it handled 442,000,000 after the ten years of civil war. The author believes neither Chang Tso-lin, Wu Pei-fu, Sun Yat-sen, or, as one would say now, his party, the Kuo-min-t'ang, the "Christian" General Feng, nor any of the intellectual leaders strong enough to unify the country; but he holds that since China has produced strong administrators in the past she will do so again, and he hopes that the regeneration of China will not be a military one as was Japan's. The rise of the Nipponese he calls the wonder of the twentieth century, equal to the French Revolution in world importance.

The contrast between Sir Valentine Chirol, a veteran journalist who first "heard the East a-calling" fifty years ago, and Mr. King-Hall, who fought in the World War, is as fascinating as that in Tolstoi's "Two Generations." Sir Valentine harks back to Gladstone and uses sonorous Biblical allusions; the younger man hopes that "Eastern and Western gear wheels can be synchronized and clutched together without stripping of teeth." The older man thinks little of Lloyd George, the Labor Party, and the League of Nations, while he believes in the "grave responsibilities" of European powers in Asia; much the same thing the young man calls "each nation trying to filch some national advantage from prevailing confusion."

Though the age and attitude of the two writers differ so widely, yet their concrete suggestions are very similar. Westerners must recognize that the Orientals are awakened. They must understand that "self-determination," which ran its inevitable course in Europe in spite of the Holy Alliance, will affect the East. While there can be no question of mass immigration of Orientals, yet individual Asiatics ought to be treated without show of race prejudice. The feelings of the Eastern nations ought not to be needlessly wounded; it is folly to give the Japanese "hard words where they merely wished for soft soap."

ADOLF E. ZUCKER

Roosevelt in a China Shop

Roosevelt and the Russo-Japanese War. By Tyler Dennett. Doubleday, Page and Company. $3.50.

THOSE who are of the Roosevelt cult will revel in this story of their hero's incursion into the field of international politics, as the hero himself reveled in the incursion. He sees Japan about to bait the Russian bear. The courage of the little fellow appeals to him; and besides, it will be just as well if the bear is checked up a bit. So he prepares to play the grand monarch's part at the jousting. He will watch; he will encourage; he will disapprove; he will even tip the scales slightly if it suits his royal whim. And then he will patch up the quarrel and announce the victor.

The game was full of the action Roosevelt craved. He saw Russia pressing eastward in Asia, and he felt it portended no good for American interests in that part of the world. He saw Japan, with England's backing, ready to stop the Russian advance. American interests were involved; and in foreign affairs he was America. No more was needed. He forthwith told Japan that we should be more than benevolently neutral toward her efforts. He told Germany and France that if they did not confine themselves strictly to their own affairs and let Japan alone, he would take America into the war at Japan's side.

Thus he arranged the war. Next he turned his attention to the peace. Russia might be needed to hold Japan in check if she became too obstreperous later on. China must be preserved in her integrity to serve as a market for American goods. Japan must not be too victorious, but she must be compensated for her admirable effort. The Russian tidbits like South Manchuria and Sakhalin were hardly commensurate. What could be done? Ah, yes! Korea! A rather unnecessary country anyway. And Japan wanted it. Why not let her have it? To be sure, we had a bit of an old treaty with Korea in which we had agreed to protect her if any other nation tried to injure her, but then that was only a treaty. Surely, let Japan have Korea if she wanted it and get Japan to agree in return for our acquiescence to let our Philippines alone. It was so ordered.

It was a magnificent revel, and Roosevelt with his usual luck—a luck which, it must be admitted, was three parts skill—came through it unscathed. America cheered the Japs and damned the Russians and was quite satisfied at the outcome of the struggle. They were not to know until Mr. Dennett got to searching around in the private papers of the late President how great a part they had played in bringing about the result. They were not to know until then how the great Teddy had played football with their Constitution; how, considering himself a Foreign Office, he had taken all the liberties with their lives and fortunes that Downing Street habitually takes with the lives and fortunes of the people of the British Empire. They thought Congress had the sole right to make war, but they would have discovered their mistake if Germany or France had refused to stay put. In fact, no absolute monarch ever played the international chess game with quite so free a hand as Roosevelt did.

Both those of the Roosevelt cult and those of the opposition then, should be grateful to Mr. Dennett for this thorough study and impartial presentation of the inner workings of American diplomacy under Theodore Roosevelt.

ORRIN KEITH

Timid Bravery

Things and Ideals: Essays in Functional Philosophy. By M. C. Otto. Henry Holt and Company. $2.50.

IF Mr. Otto's convictions were not of a slightly sentimental color, "Things and Ideals" might be called a brave book; but with all its fluent and pleasant interest it has not this stirring character. It is a clear, brave saying that America is not God's country, as the world is not God's world; or in Mr. Otto's terms, that the hunger of the soul for cosmic support is not to be satisfied by any heavenly manna in the way of revelation or of eternal values. And it is sound, if somewhat obvious, reasoning that rejects any easy evasion of the fact that the good life is to be found here upon earth among men or else is simply not to be found. Mr. Otto agrees with Mr. Dewey—and with many less illustrious persons—not only that we are part of nature but also that nature is part of us; so that while the hope of supernatural aid in our undertakings is superstition, it is only good sense to believe that with natural means we can make over both ourselves and our ideals into something not so very different from what we might wish them to be. So it is, I take it, that iron and other materials can be made into railroads, and that railroads in turn can form such efficient and even desirable (i.e., impulse-satisfying) habits in human organisms as might well be called contrary to human nature. More than this. It is not unreasonable to suppose that our varying ideals might be adjusted to the production of a life offering the greatest possible satisfaction to human desires in general; for it needs no miracle to make men prefer this satisfying life to the bare acquisition of possessions.

Such is in general the contention of these twelve essays, and it is a contention which should at least be taken on its merits. But one does ask how it is possible for a philosopher to take so seriously and to criticize at such length the casual talk that passes in the current magazines for reasoned opinion or the thousand and one pronouncements of grave editorials or occasional speeches or entertaining letters. Such discussion has no doubt some symptomatic import; but it is strange to find it treated as if it were to be logically refuted. One does not argue with such accidental obsessions any more than one argues with a lover—unless, I suppose, one is a parent or a teacher. And this suggests an explanation. A college teacher is accustomed, when he is talking seriously, to talk to adolescents, and he is only too likely to write what is suitable to adolescent intelligence and to take such writing seriously himself. Any one, too, who can fall into the sentimental tone of some of the pages where Mr. Otto is discussing the "acquisition of soul" is close enough to the feelings and minds of faintly intellectual young Americans to speak their own loose language. Which may mean that he is close enough to easy-going intellects in general to be of use to a great many grown-up Americans—and others. Speaking pragmatically, then, these essays have their own philosophic truth, even when they go so far as to take a highly subjective view of science itself. But philosophers of other schools will be sure to find them wanting, if not in depth and scope, then perhaps in intellectual distinction or merely in appropriate brevity.

D. W. PRALL

How Well Is Europe?

Reconstruction. By J. D. Whelpley. Funk and Wagnalls Company. $3.50.

"THERE is now no such thing as a [illegible] Europe," says the author of this volume, a recognized authority on world trade, in this study of economic conditions six years after the armistice. "Europe has not only recovered from all material damage done but has greatly improved her position over that of November, 1918, and even that of 1913. . . . Europe in 1925 is more populous, richer, more highly developed, and better able to carry on the activities of industry and commerce than it was in 1914, so far as material, plant, and labor supply are concerned." Then a dark stroke is added to the otherwise glowing picture: "It is humanity which is still devastated and not the region itself." Fear is the ruling emotion in the world today, while, as a corollary, power is the dominating force. "The state has a closer grip upon the actual affairs of its citizens and upon the citizen himself than it had in 1913, but this grip is not the result of greater sympathy and understanding between the state and the people" and the time is approaching "when the people of every country in the world will revolt against the tyranny of the state and its drain upon the vitality of the nation."

Mr. Whelpley dwells upon the vast mountain of public debt under which the Allied powers are struggling and thinks that, with the exception of Great Britain, the only escape is in abandoning the pretense of paying these great sums and in reducing the cost of government establishments. In spite of the physical recovery of Europe the trade of the world is less than in 1914, due to the lessened purchasing power of millions of people and to an increased industrial nationalism.

American assistance is necessary for the recovery of Europe, Mr. Whelpley thinks. Thus he welcomes the Dawes Plan, but believes the financial demands upon Germany will [illegible]. ARTHUR WARNER

Books in Brief

The Challenge of Asia. By Stanley Rice. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.25.

This able essay is written by a man who, while a Britisher to the core, has removed himself to the Olympian heights and, after reading everything on every side of every question affecting the relations of East and West, proceeds to discuss those relations with a detachment and a lack of bias quite out of the ordinary. After a discourse which charms us with its style and its erudition—the author seems equally at home in the fields of politics, economics, sociology, military science, literature, religion, philosophy, art, and music—he arrives at the not startling conclusion that the challenge of Asia is political.

"Gentlemen of the Jury." By Francis L. Wellman. The Macmillan Company. $4.

The author of this book, a veteran of our bar, belongs to that happy group of men who see the world progress by codification and amendment. He describes the vagaries of the jury system, brings in instance after instance of oppression and injustice, and at the end suggests reforms—such as better ventilated jury rooms. His gods are of the field-weed variety; his eulogies go to men like the late Judge Bartow Weeks, who tried the Gitlow case; Judge Goff of the Becker trial, and William F. Howe, who in his day was the Ring Lardner of the Court of General Sessions. While he retells the story of bloody Judge Jeffreys, he mentions no parallel during our passing years. Yet there were instances during the recent political trials of judges who bullied counsel as well as the prisoners, and who stretched the power to punish for contempt. Mr. Wellman, who for thirty years has watched the wheels of justice turn, is weary of arguing the ways of their turning, knowing that long after he is done with pleading the juggernaut of the American system will keep on clumsily and mercilessly grinding. Like most reminiscences of a busy man who has arrived, the book suffers from overabundance of confidence, lack of profundity, and, above all, lack of editing. But it is entertaining.

Principles of Economics. By Raymond T. Bye. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Here is a clear and careful elementary statement of strictly orthodox economic doctrine. For those who still feel that there is any educational value in classical economics, and who have freshman classes to teach, this book will perhaps be more useful than any other. It goes farther toward creating an illusion of reality than most of them, because its illustrations are more modern and because its diction is cast in that certain naive but dogmatic mold that, as teachers know, makes textbooks "go" with students. Anything that helps to mitigate the unreality of orthodox economics is a blessing to those who have to teach it. The present reviewer will not attempt to disguise the fact, however, that for the good of economic science he hopes that not a single copy will ever find its way into a freshman's hands. This is not because he feels that its writer has failed in what he proposed to do, nor, even, that he does not in a way sympathize with the purpose, but because it seems to him to represent that mode of approaching the study of industrial life which is best calculated to cut off at its very inception any thrill of discovery or any creative satisfaction that a student might otherwise possibly feel. It makes of economics a body of received dogma rather than an experimental science; and it [illegible] a pedagogical method which admittedly [illegible] cram dogma down the students' throats in certain-sized chunks which are measured by the length of chapters, rather than the method that tempts them to intellectual adventure by successive challenges to their ingenuity. Mr. Bye says that he intends now to write a book of problems. It seems to the reviewer too bad that he felt it necessary first to write a book of "principles." He has a feeling that the problems will not be so freely nor so liberally discussed as they would have been if the principles had not come first; for somehow, now, the hostages have been given, the "system" has been presented. Everything hereafter will have to fit into it. And it seems only too likely that many of the vexing problems of contemporary economic life will refuse to find solutions that will fit the laws adumbrated here.

Love. By "Elizabeth." Doubleday, Page and Company. $2.

The author of "The Enchanted April" appears to have forsaken that light vein for something a little closer to the accepted formula for successful fiction—something which breaks up conveniently into instalments, and may be read in that manner without great loss. She has thickened the plot and thinned the emotion; her latest novel is perhaps more filling, but it is certainly less nourishing.

Soundings. By A. Hamilton Gibbs. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

Mr. Gibbs has cast his novel unreservedly in the romantic mold; all base metals have been excluded. He has fused it with the fervor of his own belief; there is nothing half-hearted or halting about its glamor. One might argue that his characters and his situations are a trifle hand-picked, that they are too ineluctably right; but since they fit so perfectly in the romantic relationships which he has fashioned for them the objection is overruled. "Soundings" has gaiety and depth and glow, which is all that one ordinarily asks in a love story—and more than one ordinarily gets.

The Mulberry Bush. By Sylvia Lynd. Minton, Balch and Company. $2.50.

The acid test of a collection of sketches such as this is to read them consecutively. There are twenty-odd brief stories in this volume—each of them scarcely more than the evocation of a mood and a few strokes of characterization—and yet so skilfully has the mood been created, and so deft is the characterization, that they easily stand the test. Every line has significance; the effect is delicate but in no degree precious.

Martha. By Percy Marks. The Century Company. $2.

Tested ingredients have gone into the fashioning of this story. Mr. Marks is sure of his ground; he never ventures far from the blazed trail of sentiment. The history of a girl, half-Indian and half-English, is set forth with romantic trimmings—a guitar, a beautiful face, a trustful confidence betrayed—and ends upon a note of sadness, plaintive rather than ironic.

Napoleon. Von Emil Ludwig. Berlin: Ernst Rowohlt Verlag.

In his collection of portraits entitled "Genie und Charakter: Zwanzig männliche Bildnisse," Emil Ludwig announced himself as a biographical psychoanalyst of the school of Plutarch. The limits of those slender sketches held him to scant and insufficient formula. In the new volume, with seven hundred pages for one soul, he heaps up traits and tendencies till we have—not as with the Twenty—crude outline drawings, but detailed, dispersed, and puzzling Dürer line-engravings. Ludwig is not a historian. He gives no bibliography, and he has probably never gone back of the popular biographies. He often tells us as fact what scholars are by no means sure of. But his contribution is his inference as to character and genius. He cares [illegible] for Egypt or Waterloo, nothing even for Josephine or Sir Hudson Lowe, except as the record of what Napoleon did furnishes a clue as to what Napoleon was.

Music

Landowska's Contribution

THE further we go with the twentieth century—and it has now attained a respectable age, an age when characteristics are asserting themselves unmistakably—the more clearly we see its sympathetic relation in music to the eighteenth. At first glance such a declaration may seem extravagant. Polytonality, atonality, multiple rhythms, the deliberate use of the quarter tone, even some of the orchestral instruments would have been as inconceivable to the eighteenth century as the radio. But for all that the essential moods and the creative impulses of the two periods are curiously alike. Stravinsky and Honegger show far more kinship to Bach than to Beethoven. Contemporary writers in the smaller forms, composers of music that is "amusing" in purpose rather than designed primarily to communicate emotion, suggest again and again Frenchmen, Italians, even certain Germans of the eighteenth century. Music today as then is oftener cerebral than it was under the imperious romanticism of the nineteenth century. It is minutely studious of form, even though the form seem strange or elusive; it is inexorable in matters of detail; its astonishing innovations leave no room for lax or fragmentary workmanship. Usually it suggests or evokes an emotion, or merely takes the emotion for granted; rarely does it seek to express feeling by actually embodying it in tone after the forthright and luxuriantly romantic manner of the nineteenth-century masters.

Our century could more easily give the world another Handel, a second Gluck (not forgetting Handel's historic sneer!), than a new Schubert, a new Schumann, a new Wagner. Indisputably, in music, the nineteenth century, though it has not yet ceased to dominate us, must face a discipline of semi-retirement, a time of proving and elimination; doubtless it will return purified and refreshed in the twenty-first century, when our music of today will, in its turn, suffer a partial eclipse. But the period through which we are passing already belongs increasingly to our own century and the eighteenth. Where thirty years ago were Handel, Gluck, Rameau, Couperin, the Scarlattis, the lesser Bachs, where even Johann Sebastian Bach, father of all, and the divine Mozart, compared with the conspicuous favor they enjoy today? It is the history of every continuing family repeating itself in the immaterial substance of an art. The parents must suffer the chagrin of seeing their carefully nurtured offspring turn with the years in an instinctive sympathy to the doting grandparents whom fondly the parents had believed at a safe distance away.

The elect apostle of the eighteenth-century music to twentieth-century America has been Wanda Landowska. This is said without undervaluing the similar labors of certain prominent orchestral conductors—notably Messrs. Stokowski, Monteux, Mengelberg, Walter, and Koussevitzky. First honors still must go to the Polish woman who has made the harpsichord live again, who plays Mozart on the piano "as if Beethoven had never been," whose voyages of discovery through uncharted seas of composition in the hundred years before the death of Haydn, and even earlier, have resulted in the recapture of a rich treasure of forgotten or neglected music, in the correction of erroneous ideas as to interpretation and performance, and in the writing of an authoritative book upon this period of incalculable importance and revivified interest.

Winter before last Mme Landowska had already revealed to us the possibilities of the harpsichord, not at all as a mere precursor of the piano, but as an instrument with a vivid independent life of its own. In the same season she proved her supremacy in certain fields of piano music. Her extraordinary musicianship and intellectual and emotional finesse, the chiseled perfection of her phrasing, her incomparable resourcefulness and taste in ornamentation, her unerring command of varied and delicate nuance, and a patrician disdain of anything suggesting excess in her playing had imparted to her interpretation of Mozart's music the quality of a veritable evocation. But it was not until this spring, when Willem Mengelberg twice conducted for the Philharmonic Society Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," that Mme Landowska, Bach, and the eighteenth century took complete possession of their joint heritage in this second quarter of the twentieth century.

One does not have to be far descended in the valley of years to remember perfectly when "additional accompaniments" to this and other choral works of Bach were a subject of acrimonious dispute. Folk wrangled about the fitness of many a page of Bach as "worked out" by, let us say, Robert Franz. They divided over the admissibility of an anachronistic instrument like the clarinet; they argued pro and con the claims of transposition where Bach's brass parts run perilously high for modern instruments. But nobody, save perhaps an antiquarian or two, thought of summoning to action the harpsichord, an instrument that Bach and Handel indicated as sustaining a major role in the accompaniment of oratorios, cantatas, and operas. Had any temerarious musician seriously advanced the claims of this antiquated relic a contemptuous majority would have dismissed it at once as outmoded, feeble, merely quaint.

In these April performances of the "St. Matthew Passion" the score at last emerged in its incorruption, thanks to the experience and faith of Willem Mengelberg in supervision and conducting, and to the competence of Wanda Landowska in handling the harpsichord part, which she had many times played in performances directed by Mr. Mengelberg in Europe. Because of these two exceptional musicians, the instrumental scheme of the work was restored to virtually the conditions imposed by Bach himself. The result was a novel and arresting beauty of orchestral color. The use of oboi d'amore and of the harpsichord along with the other instruments of Bach's own scoring was responsible for this ravishing result. Presented thus, Bach's orchestra wooed our ears with an unaccustomed and other-worldly loveliness, and through its iridescent fabric the myriad voices of the harpsichord, awakened by Mme Landowska, spoke out with a bardic freedom and fervor. In employing the harpsichord alone as accompaniment to the narrative of the Evangelist, Mme Landowska made it seem the rapturous messenger of a rhapsodic annunciation. As an ensemble instrument, there is a peculiar sonority in its plucked strings that binds together the instrumental and choral bodies and makes the thought of any modern substitute for it a pitiable subterfuge.

One may fearlessly set down these performances of the "St. Matthew Passion" as epoch-making in our local understanding and appreciation of Bach, and thus as the culminating contribution of Wanda Landowska to her advocacy of the harpsichord among us of America and her illustration of the authentic spirit of eighteenth-century music.

PITTS SANBORN

THEATER

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

China's Servitudes

By CHARLES HODGES

THE treaties and other accumulated diplomatic arrangements between China and the powers constitute the legal basis of the limitations on the free exercise of sovereignty by the Chinese Government. It is a network of undertakings that enmeshed the old Middle Kingdom and which the republic inherited willy-nilly. It is perhaps the greatest network of circumscriptions ever binding a people in the history of the family of nations: its ramifications include jurisdiction over Chinese territory; administrative autonomy; economic freedom of action; and the sovereign right of self-defense. No ancient and honorable people, awakening to their full implications, could fail to resent them. Indeed, did not the Chinese now challenge these admitted infringements of sovereignty, we might well doubt China's right to claim a place in international society.

These foreign "vested rights," as it were, are based upon either general treaties or more or less dubious special arrangements. In the first case, they are buttressed by the combined interests of the powers; in the latter, they depend on the strength of the particular power concerned, and the interlocking of such pretensions with similar rival claims, for their maintenance. The formal treaty arrangements generally cover matters such as China's tolerance of foreign judicial processes and municipal administrations under the exercise of the right of extraterritoriality. The special arrangements between China and the more acquisitive among the powers include pledges regarding the appointment of administrative experts, the use of foreign advisers, and the invidious provisions contained in seemingly legitimate commercial and financial concessions.

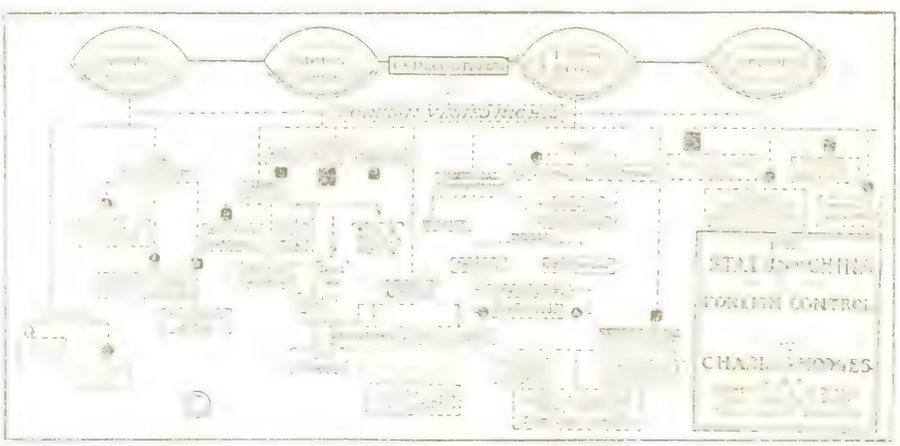
The spread of alien interests into the very heart of the machinery of China's governance presents an involved picture of foreign penetration—both political and non-political.

For the purposes of analysis, the situation may be simplified by dividing China's integrity into four distinct aspects. The accompanying graphic presentation separates the problem into matters concerning territory, administration, finance and economics, and defense.

From the time of the First Foreign War China has been threatened by territorial mutilations. The less dangerous, perhaps, have been the outright cessions such as characterized Britain's acquisition of the island of Hongkong in 1842; and the Japanese victory of 1894, the Peace of Shimonoseki giving Japan the island of Formosa in fee simple. China's defeat at the hands of Japan opened up the phase of indirect territorial alienation through leaseholds and the development of preferential foreign rights of a particular power in a part of the vast territories of China comprehended in the term spheres of interest. Alienation by leasehold was initiated by Germany in her acquisition of the base of Kiaochow for the period of ninety-nine years under a convention concluded in 1898. Russia, France, Britain, and, subsequently, Japan became beneficiaries of the process at China's territorial expense. The spheres of interest were negative rather than positive; that is, they were pledges exacted from the Chinese Government to the effect that certain parts of China, wherein particular powers held they possessed primary interests, would not be thrown open to rivals for development without prior consultation with the power supposed to be first concerned. These spheres were built up on the ground of territorial propinquity, as in the case of Russia in Manchuria or France in South China, and reinforced by the possession of a strategic leasehold with its implied or state right to the "hinterland"; or they rested on commercial predominance, instanced by the British policy of prior interests in the Yangtze Valley. The documentary basis was either treaties between China and foreign nations individually concerned or agreements confirming the division of the spoils among the powers themselves—as witness the Anglo-German Agreement of 1898 and the similar Anglo-Russian undertaking in the following year. In addition, the development of special railway zones, best seen in Manchuria, created lines of communication administered under the policing and law of the dominant power.

Finally, there are the municipal areas wherein all the nationals of foreign powers, under the general treaty rights, enjoy the privilege of residence and trade under their own administrations in most instances.

Alien influences in the government of China are of three sorts. They are the foreign direction of the most important Chinese sources of revenue under international regimes; the extraterritorial administrative invasions covering courts, postal communications, and wireless; and the general use of foreign advisers and experts in China's administration, many of them occupying their positions by virtue of the diplomatic influence of their home governments.



ALIEN CONTROL IN CHINA

The large black squares indicate privileges the powers pledged themselves at the Washington Conference to return immediately to China.

The small black squares indicate foreign interests to be curtailed or abolished in the future.

The small black circles mark activities which the powers agree will not be extended or renewed in the future.

Unmarked: alien control not affected by any action of the powers.

The direct invasions of China's administrative integrity are long-standing. The maritime customs came into being through the breakdown of Chinese administration at the time of the Taiping Rebellion in the 1850's, the Americans, British, and French providing emergency machinery under which their nationals continued to pay the 5 per cent duties imposed under the first foreign treaties. Circumstances led to British predominance in customs direction from that time, the Chinese Government in 1898 confirming the appointment of a British subject to the inspector generalship so long as Britain's trade exceeded that of other powers.

The treaty powers also have a vise-like grip on Chinese fiscal autonomy. The exactions of the early nineteenth-century Chinese officials were a fruitful source of difficulties between foreigners and the Middle Kingdom, and the early treaties made the tariff duties part of the international agreements. These duties are still fixed by convention and China is not free to change them except by the consent of the treaty powers. In a world of changing values and national circumstances, China has found the "conventional tariff" to be one of her most costly concessions to the foreigner. Not only has the preponderance of alien commercial interest been thrown against any endeavor of the Chinese to gain the revisions to which they have been entitled; anything like a protective tariff for native industry has been out of the question.

The Chinese posts, originally part of the custom service, fell under the influence of the French; an exchange of notes between France and China, likewise in 1898, committed the Chinese to the use of French advice in postal reorganization, and it was reinforced in 1902. Later the direction of the Salt Gabelle, taken over by the central government from the provinces in 1909, fell to another British subject. All of these "'services" are likewise "stiffened" by foreign subordinates; and until recently, apart from the nominal Chinese headship, the Chinese were but slowly advanced into the higher positions of administration. The honesty and the efficiency of these internationally manned services cannot be gainsaid; but dubious diplomatic claims have from time to time crept into even the recruiting and assignment of foreign officials. This second group of alien administrative interests, the posts, wireless, and courts, rise and fall with the status of extraterritoriality. They are administrative invasions of Chinese sovereignty—abnormally resting on essentially abnormal international conditions.

The third group of foreign vested "rights" are indirect in character, comprised in the advisers of a dozen different nationalities on the pay roll of the Chinese Government. The powers are very jealous of the opportunities presented by having an expert strategically placed, in a position to watch national interests while serving the general cause of China's modernization; and the Chinese are far from free to choose whom they shall pay to shepherd them out of Oriental governmental ways. Some of the bitterest battles among the Peking legations have arisen in the conflict of foreign interests represented by the appointment of this man or the dropping of that; and the history of Japanese endeavors to oust the American adviser to the Ministry of Communications in post-war days is a typical instance of what is taking place behind the scenes and not included in the State Department's annual "Foreign Relations of the United States," under our usual official editorial policy.

Passing to financial and economic matters, we come to the real material interests behind the play of diplomacy. Leaseholds, with spheres of interest and influence, were the attempts of foreign offices to stake out political claims to economic monopolies. Extraterritoriality in the widest sense was but the means to a commercial end—the opening of a great market with the greatest security to Western enterprise. The services under foreign control were to assure foreign bondholders, on the one hand, of their coupons being met; and, on the other, of the maintenance of equitably administered charges on alien business. The foreign advisers were listening posts for national opportunities and pawns in the game of remaking China, at a price, according to specifications dictated by particular national interests. These came out into the open in the struggle for concessions dealing with commercial opportunities, railway development, and loans. In the heyday of this dollar diplomacy, it meant monopolistic commercial rights manipulated from China's central or provincial authorities in the face of bitter rivals; and political loans of the most questionable banking character.

These developments, so especialy marked since the close of the nineteenth century, vitally affected China's defense. Leaseholds meant foreign-occupied bases. The diplomatic balancing of one power against another meant the progressive undermining of the military position of China, as each of the foreign nations concerned sought to strengthen its Far Eastern grip. Ultimately, it meant war—conflict within China's territorial jurisdiction between alien powers—as shown by the Russo-Japanese War of 1904, fought in Manchuria, and the Japanese intervention against Germany in Shantung with the outbreak of the Great War in 1914. Other complications presented themselves in foreign garrisons elsewhere in China; the military menace of foreign-administered communications, especially in combination with extraterritorial railway zones confined principally to the old ex-Russian and the prevailing Japanese interests in North China; and special alliances, such as the notorious Sino-Japanese Arms Pact of 1918.

Foreign armed forces on Chinese soil fall into three classes—legation guards maintained under the provisions of the Boxer Protocol; other regular national forces; and local corps of foreign volunteers. Under the first group there are about 1,000 troops of the treaty powers in the Legation Quarter of Peking; and at points commanding access from China's capital to the sea are 4,000 more. The nationalities include American, British, French, Italian, and Japanese forces. The special position of Japan in Manchuria is marked by railway guards and garrisons, based on the reversion to Japan of the old Russian treaty rights in this respect following the War of 1904-1905. A Japanese army division normally is stationed in South Manchuria; and sixteen independent battalions of railway guards, each unit numbering over 600 rank and file, may be maintained under the Treaty of Portsmouth. The local corps are best exemplified by the Shanghai Volunteer Corps, a municipal militia numbering some 1,500 men of all arms. England also maintains Sikhs recruited as police in her treaty "settlements."

There are four phases in the efforts of China and the powers to readjust these perversions of international relations. While the original treaties between China and the outside world contemplated periodic revision of provisions such as dealt with the 5 per cent ad valorem tariff, little had been done during the nineteenth century. But after the Boxer troubles of 1900 the way seemed pointed for a reformation of these fiscal conditions. The Mackay treaty with Britain in 1902, followed by similar ones negotiated with Japan and the United States in 1903, pledged these powers to revise the conventional customs duties every ten years and promised increases in the level of rates, provided China herself reformed in particular the native customs, or likin, charges. Moreover, the then Imperial Chinese government stiffened its attitude toward the railway and bank diplomacy of the more predatory powers. Between 1900 and 1908, the basic principle of Chinese ownership was written into every concession for communications; and during the period 1908-1913, it was supplemented by the insistence on Chinese administrative control with foreign experts confined to specified posts.

The troublesome days of the republican revolution of 1911-1912 were hardly out of the way before the Great War ushered in the critical period in recent Chinese affairs. The efforts of the Chinese Government to force the tariff issue in 1912 on the double ground that the customs yield had fallen below the 5 per cent basis stipulated in the Boxer Protocol of 1901, and that the Anglo-Chinese Commercial Treaty of the following year provided for revision within a decade, failed of acceptance by the powers. With the recognition of the Chinese Republic in 1913, the question was again blocked by the attitude of Italy, Russia, and Japan. But the desire of the Allies to get China into the Great War by 1917, with the customs yield dropping to 3 per cent, brought about the customs conference of 1918; it at last enabled the Chinese to get the fourteen nations involved to agree to slightly more adequate rates within even the low treaty percentages. Here the diplomacy of the United States was used to underwrite the Allies, America promising China very definite support in the eventual peace conference that was to go to the roots of the whole question—from tariff autonomy to foreign leaseholds.

China failed to get any consideration of her claims at the Paris Conference. The Chinese Delegation presented forty-one pages of exquisitely printed memoranda entitled Questions for Readjustment which covered the renunciation of spheres of interest; the withdrawal of all foreign forces and police; the closing of all alien posts and other communications; the abolition of consular jurisdiction; the relinquishment of lease territories; the restoration of foreign settlements; and tariff autonomy. This program, inspired, we may say, by the pledge of American cooperation, was buttressed by a 90-page "Claim of China for Direct Restitution to Herself of Kiaochow," and a 47-page "Claim of China," etc., for the abrogation of the notorious Japanese treaties of 1915. The subsequent story of the refusal of the Chinese Delegation to sign the peace treaty is the record of our first great failure to meet the full implications of the Far East situation at Paris in 1919.

The Washington Conference opened the fourth phase of China's pilgrimage in search of justice at the hands of the powers in 1921. Sandwiched into the primary issue of naval armaments, the problem of China was again sidestepped as much as it was advanced toward any fundamental solution. The return of foreign-held bases was begun with Japan's assent to retrocede the leasehold of Kiaochow and Britain's similar action regarding her adjacent holding of Wei-hai-wei; but Japan was not affected in South Manchuria, nor was France inclined toward any generosity regarding her leasehold of Kwangchow-wan in south China. All the powers, however, maintaining postal administrations in the Chinese Republic's territories agreed to their suppression. These comprise the restitutions the powers proposed immediately to make to China's sovereignty.

The second category of actions at the Arms Conference regarding hapless China deals with pledges made by the powers as to curtailing or eventually abolishing certain privileges. The solution of the basic issues of (1) extraterritoriality, and (2) tariff autonomy, were pushed once more into the future. The first problem was dealt with in Resolution 4, promising China a commission of inquiry into the administration of justice to report within a year of its convening, internal conditions, however, obliging China herself to ask its postponement. The second was subject of a special customs treaty—heretofore held up by France's refusal of ratification—laying down a systematic modernization of the Chinese tariff. The provisions covered an immediate temporary revision to further adjust the work the commission of 1922 already was undertaking; the imposition of a surtax to aid Peking revenues; further increases in the customs charges when China reformed her entirely native-controlled likin; and a schedule of duties to be revised every seven years. In this group also goes Resolution 6, which provided a commission to consider the withdrawal of all armed forces from China; it was made contingent upon that country's ability to "assure the protection of lives and property of foreigners."

The third category includes those declarations of principle set forth in the first, or "Nine-Power," treaty signed at Washington dealing with the problem of China. Sponsored by the United States, the agreement represents a restatement of the accumulated policies of American diplomacy in regard to East Asia embodied in the most formal of compacts adhered to by all the principal powers. It attempted no reformation of existing conditions but dealt exclusively with the none-too-bright future—once again there was pledged adherence to the "open door"; equality of opportunity was bolstered up to cover every diplomatic maneuver toward preferential interests; China's integrity was reaffirmed; and the undermining spheres of influence, the monopolistic concessions, the sinister combinations among the powers in defiance of such excellent principles were denounced. Applied a quarter of a century prior to the Washington Conference, it would have blocked the political, administrative, and economic enervation of China by recent world politics—or precipitated war on the Pacific.

Contributors to This Issue

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, was a member of the defense counsel in the Scopes trial.

LOUIS FISCHER is The Nation's Russian correspondent.

L. SABANEYEVA is one of the younger Russian writers. Her work is mentioned in Mr. Fischer's article.

EDWIN MUIR is an essayist and the author of a recent volume of verse, "First Poems."

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL is assistant professor of economics at Columbia.

AMADO NERVO was a Mexican poet and philosopher. He was sent by the Carranza government as ambassador to Uruguay, where he died.

LEWIS DOUGLAS is a lecturer in English at Columbia University, and author of "The Grand Inquisitor."

ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR., is a professor of law at Harvard and author of the volume "Freedom of Speech."

ADOLF E. ZUCKER was for five years assistant professor of English at the Peking Union Medical College.

CHARLES HODGES is assistant professor of politics at New York University.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 12, 1925 No. 3136

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 179

EDITORIALS:
- England's Socialist Tories 181
- California Justice 182
- Outlawing War by the World Court 182
- Miami the Mighty 182

WAR AMONG THE RAILROADS. By H. G. Andrews 184

THE REHOBOTH QUESTION. By Albin E. Johnson 186

OIL. By Altha Leah Bass 188

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 189

CORRESPONDENCE 190

BOOKS:
- Dilemma. By Virginia Moore 191
- Henry James's Home-Coming. By Gilbert Seldes 191
- A Russian Miscellany. By Avrahm Yarmolinsky 192
- Mangled Evidence. By Louis R. Gottschalk 192
- Pictorial Biography. By Herbert S. Gorman 193
- Shakespeare and Marlowe. By Samuel C. Chew 194
- Books in Brief 195

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Modern Slavery in Africa 196
- Slavery in English Kenya 196

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THIRTY THOUSAND REFUGEES lodged in wretched barracks on the German-Polish border—the newspaper stories revive cruel memories of the homeless French refugees who poured south and westward in the spring of 1918. That was war. This is the war spirit surviving in the East of Europe. Poland is evicting the Germans of the annexed provinces—those who were unwilling to renounce their German citizenship. They made their choice, she says, and must abide by it. Under the terms of the wretched treaties signed, in the name of "self-determination," in 1919, Poland has a legal right to drive these Germans from their homes, and she is exacting her pound of flesh. The outside world cares little for legal technicalities—it is appalled by Poland's inhuman brutality. These Germans, most of them were born and have lived out their lives in territory which the statesmen carved out and handed to Poland; they are being torn from their farms, driven across the imaginary line that marks a national frontier. Poland thinks thus to make the task of unifying her peoples easier. We shall see whether her home task will be made simpler; certainly she is doing all in her power to make permanent the anti-Polish feeling in Germany.

THESE MISERABLE TENANT FARMERS are only the first instalment in Poland's program. They are the Germans who owned no landed property. There are more thousands to come—men and women with real property, with more at stake in Poland, who may, however, be better able to provide for themselves than these poverty-stricken deportees. Germany, meanwhile, talks of reprisals. But the Poles settled in Germany are for the most part migratory laborers with no roots in the soil; they will not suffer as do the thousands of Germans torn from land which they and their ancestors have tilled and sown. One suspects that Poland's sudden realization of this long-threatened plan of expulsion is part of a subtle campaign. Poland and Germany have been unable to agree upon a commercial treaty, and both have set embargoes upon exports from the other. Such commercial war hurts Poland most. Is she seeking, by cruelty to these luckless ones, to force Germany's industrial barons to terms? Poland has been before the League of Nations and the World Court more than once for her efforts to get rid of German settlers on her lands. By delay, equivocation, and outright defiance she has carried through illegal expropriations. Now she has found a legal method to continue ousting Germans from the world we helped make safe for democracy.

GEORGES SYLVAIN is dead—and who in the United States recognizes even his name? Sylvain had for five years been the leader of the band of Haitian patriots who in season and out of season have proclaimed their determination that their country shall be rid of the American incubus. Educated in France, he belonged to the elite of the black republic. He served it in various posts before American marines destroyed its century-long independence—among others, as Minister to the Holy See and to the French Republic. France made him a member of the Institute and an officer of the Legion of Honor. After the collapse of the military effort to repel the American invaders Sylvain organized the Patriotic Union of Haiti, which twice sent missions to the United States in the vain hope of awakening the American people to the brutalities being committed in Haiti in their name. With unfailing hope he told his people that in the end right must win. But the American troops have remained, and the domination of American business has grown more and more complete. Last year, after another futile effort to win a regular election of a new Senate to replace that which General Smedley Butler, brandishing his gun, dissolved eight years ago, Sylvain organized an irregular election and himself became a member of the rump Senate which again proclaimed Haiti's rightful independence. The Nation is proud that it was privileged to aid Sylvain in his long fight as a patriot, but its pride is mixed with shame that Haiti is not yet free.

A GREAT SILENCE has fallen over China. The statesmen who speak in the name of England, France, Japan, and the United States are presumably in deep thought. We hope it will be fruitful thought, but the uniform experience of the past has been that whenever the powers, following a public display of good intentions, lapse into silence, they also lapse into fruitfulness. We were treated, at the time of the Washington conferences, to a great display of self-congratulation on the good-will of the powers toward China; and now, three years later, we have just discovered that owing to the detail of France's failure to ratify nothing whatever has been done toward realizing the era of good-will. It took a national strike, following the official murder of a score of young Chinamen by British police, to rouse the world into so much as a repetition of the expression of good intentions. Senator Borah has announced that he will bring the Chinese question to the floor of the Senate when that body reconvenes, and a body of public-spirited missionaries and others is holding a conference on Chinese-American relations at Johns Hopkins University in September. So far so good. Meanwhile the Chinese have been on strike for ten weeks, in the hope of getting some immediate action, and they are hungry. As far as the dispatches indicate the statesmen are chiefly concerned with the method of whitewashing the official murderers at Shanghai. The most effective sympathy which the Chinese are getting comes from an American ommittee which is raising funds to help the strikers. Its treasurer is Morris Ernst, of 7 Dey Street, New York City, and we urge our readers to be generous.

AMERICAN MARINES were on the eve of leaving Nicaragua on August 2, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Managua. Their return to this country will undoubtedly be the cue for considerable comment by our newspapers, as inadequate and misleading as has been the interpretation of the events of our thirteen years' military occupation—without consent of Congress and without declaring war—of a friendly and supposedly independent republic. We will be told how our diplomacy, backed by the marines, has lifted Nicaragua out of political anarchy and financial chaos and put the country back on its feet, but we will hear little or nothing of the three fundamental aspects of this adventure, i. e., that our entrance was uninvited, unnecessary, and unconstitutional; that before we gave our aid to financial reconstruction we first so wrecked the finances that assistance became necessary; that before withdrawing our troops we arranged for the organization of a constabulary with an American military officer at its head, the net result of which may be to give us as much control over Nicaraguan politics as during the occupation of the marines.

THE WRONG TO NICARAGUA has been a subject of frequent comment in The Nation. The essential facts were set forth by John Kenneth Turner in our issue of May 31, 1922, and in an editorial, The Republic of Brown Bros., the following week. The adventure began in 1909 with an attempt to depose President Zelaya. He may have been a scoundrel who deserved deposing, but it was none of our business officially to help do it. Neither did we make the gesture from high moral motives. As usual, we were led into it by the nose by soldiers of fortune and financial interests looking for quick and easy profits. Our interest in controlling a possible rival to the Panama Canal route was used as an excuse for American diplomatic interference, and led in 1916 to the ratification by Congress of the Bryan-Chamorro treaty, the underlying purposes of which were carefully concealed. Previously Zelaya had been overthrown through American money, and Diaz, a puppet of our business interests, had been seated in power by the action of President Taft in sending nearly 2,500 marines into Nicaragua. From then until 1924 we officially dictated who should be President of Nicaragua. We also insisted upon the validity of a number of doubtful claims, foisting "loans" upon the country with which they were liquidated and other unnecessary services performed. Only a small part of these "loans" ever left New York, and by the time our financiers were through with their manipulations the state railways and the government bank had come into their hands and Nicaragua had a debt of about $15,000,000, with an American official administering the customs.

NICARAGUA IS NATURALLY an enormously rich country, and financially she is about back on her feet. Due to this, and to insistent criticism here at home, the Washington Administration permitted Nicaragua to have a measurably free election last autumn. Victory went to Carlos Solorzano, candidate of the National Liberal Party, opposed to American control. It was announced that the marines would be withdrawn when Solorzano was inaugurated at the beginning of 1925. But at the new President's request their departure was delayed pending the organization of a constabulary with Major Carter, an American, at its head. What inducements or pressure—if any—led to President Solorzano's request for such a constabulary we do not yet know, but the possibilities of political control through it are obvious. A Nicaraguan correspondent of the Diario Latino of San Salvador writes:

> The new form of Yankee intervention in Nicaragua, as we have so often repeated, is the constabulary, only now it is to be more offensive, in that it will be more direct, less disguised, and highly insulting. From now on the Government will have no control of the army, nothing to do with firearms, nothing to say about any of these matters. The only man who can make and unmake the military forces of Nicaragua at will is to be Mr. Carter, officer in the active service of the United States army, and consequently subject only to the superior officers in his country.

The Nation is glad to hail the withdrawal of our marines from Nicaragua—but it will watch developments.

THE ANTHRACITE WAGE NEGOTIATIONS are an empty exercise in rhetoric. The problems of the industry are not being debated. The miners' problem is how wages can be increased by the industry as a whole when the two largest companies show only a small profit and a considerable group of minor companies make even scantier profits. Behind these the profitable companies hide. How can the miners share in the prosperity of the industry as a whole? They might debate the merits of a wage pool or nationalization. They are doing neither. They might inquire why they and the public should continue to pay for the real-estate speculation in coal lands which keeps the profits of those two large companies down. They are not doing that either, although the United States Coal Commission condemned the practice of adding the cost of that speculation to the price of coal. The miners are simply banking on the political breaks of the game of Senator Pepper vs. Governor Pinchot. They stand to lose.

COAL CONSUMERS are less interested than they used to be in better wages for the anthracite miners. The miners have not succeeded in preventing the coal companies from adding every wage increase to the price of coal. Even Governor Pinchot was unable to prevent that practice. So today the operators stand as the opponents of higher prices. Until the miners effectively attack their practice of refusing to pay wages out of profits the coal consumer will remain apathetic. The operators are saying today that oil, soft coal, and other substitute fuels make it impossible for them to raise prices. But they do not say that they will not increase prices if there is a coal shortage or if the menace of fuel-oil competition passes. They give no guaranties of any kind that prices will not go up. However, the fruits of stupidity may ripen: If the operators are forced to increase wages, some of them will go to the wall, and that will bring greater unity in the industry; if the miners lose, they will be two years nearer a realization that their only hope lies in intelligent nationalization.

PROFESSOR EDWARD M. EAST of Harvard allowed his neo-Malthusian doctrines to lead him into unfortunate paths at the Williamstown Conference. His first steps were in the right direction. He met Count Cippico's demand for imperialistic expansion to take care of Italy's excess population by the reasonable suggestion that Italy reduce her excess. Unluckily, he went further and adopted the dubious position that Italy's surplus millions were poor stuff anyhow, a cancer in the nation's body of which it was naturally eager to rid itself, but which other nations had no desire to absorb. Here he plunged into a tangled wilderness of controversy. He made Italians of all parties angry; patriotism was aroused; the record of our Italian immigrants was invoked to deny his charge; President Garfield uttered soothing rebukes—and the original point was lost. Professor East might better have stuck to his one unanswerable contention. Italy is vastly overcrowded; her soil cannot support her population. If she exported a half million people a year, the relief would only be momentary; the hole would promptly be filled by an increased birth-rate. A nation must adapt itself to its boundaries. Let the Italians bear children intelligently, in numbers that can be fed; and not seek in new territories and colonies a patent medicine to cure their ills of overproduction. Professor East should have stopped here.

THE TWO OLD PARTIES (we might write it the too old parties) will applaud the recommendation of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor to keep out of third-party movements in future, and work along strictly nonpartisan lines. Others will not applaud, but they will not care a great deal. They may ask, reflecting ironically upon the less than half-hearted support given to the La Follette movement in 1924, When did the federation ever do anything else? Also they may rest assured that no theoretical policy laid down in advance of the event amounts to a snowball in the hot place; when another new-party movement vital to organized labor as a whole develops, the question of what to do about it will have to be forced, and it will be decided then without regard to previous pronouncements. It is not true that third-party movements in this country have been unsuccessful. The present Republican and Democratic parties both began as such movements and, although recent efforts have been less successful, they present, nevertheless, the main hope of progress. The A. F. of L. program of supporting so-called friends of labor among Republican or Democratic nominees leads—to the present state of our politics.

England's Socialist Tories

ENGLAND is not going to have a general strike—not even a coal strike. But she is not averting the strike threat by her usual process of last-minute muddling compromise. The Government—Mr. Baldwin's Tory Government—has taken the drastic step of assuming the deficit of the gasping coal industry. The miners are happy, because the menace of a reduction in their pitifully low wages is removed; the owners are content, because they do not have to shoulder losses. Only the Tory taxpayers, faced with new and incalculable tax bills, growl. They voted out Labor to avoid just such socialistic experiments, and now their own safe-and-sane Government has outramsayed MacDonald, agreeing to make up the deficit of coal companies which cannot earn a profit with the current wages.

Mr. Baldwin's action carries England further toward socialism than the Labor Government moved in its entire term of office. The subsidy offer, even if it is only temporary, is based upon the acceptance of the principle, which two government commissions had already asserted, that a living wage should be a first charge upon the industry. The owners accept no such principle, as their determination to shut down the mines rather than continue operation upon the current wage scale evidenced. The miners, of course, made the principle the foundation of their case. Now if the Government goes so far in its acceptance of this principle as to agree to subsidize the coal-owners in order to make the living wage possible, where is it to stop? It cannot idly stand by and pay the extra cost of inefficient operation. It cannot permit uneconomic mines to be reopened and operated under the benign encouragement of a government guaranty. Already miners are coming to the Government asking it to reopen mines that have been closed for months. The Government cannot accept responsibility for the deficits of an industry without assuming virtual control of it. The subsidy-policy of the Tories leads straight to Labor's program of nationalization. And what applies to coal applies by the same logic to the railroads, to shipping, to steel and to other industries.

Indeed, there are rumors of other socialistic moves by the Baldwin Government. When Mr. Baldwin went to the electors on the issue of a protective tariff nearly two years ago he met defeat—largely because the voters feared that a protective tariff would raise the cost of food. His supporters are still clamoring for a protective tariff; they believe that is the only solution for England's industrial depression. It is rumored that Mr. Baldwin is investigating the possibility of some government control of food prices—possibly even of food supply—which would make it possible to ask the voters once more to indorse a protective tariff, this time coupling that issue with a pledge of government-guaranteed low food prices.

Tories in England are not what they are in the United States today. Mr. Baldwin, instead of getting angry, faces facts. He said last spring that

> We are confronted today, and shall be more and more, with great consolidations of capital managed by small concentrated groups, and by great organizations of labor led by experienced and responsible leaders. That position must be accepted.

If Mr. Baldwin realizes the Labor program under Tory auspices he will act according to good British precedent.

California Justice

A JUDGE who gets off the bench and serves as witness for the prosecution; a defendant charged with corruption of a juror who never was a juror and whom the defendant never saw; a man sentenced to five years in prison for discharging the ordinary routine duties of secretary of a defense committee—these are some of the features of a trial recently concluded in Sacramento, California.

It was the third trial of Tom Connors for jury tampering; and it was perhaps the strangest specimen of California justice thus far offered by that strange State. To understand the situation it is necessary to go back to March, 1923. At that time there was a bill before the California Legislature to repeal the criminal-syndicalism act. A number of liberal, labor, and radical organizations circulated leaflets revealing the iniquitous workings of this war-time law and urging moral support of the repeal bill. Among these organizations naturally was the California branch of the General Defense Committee of the Industrial Workers of the World. Tom Connors as secretary signed and sent out some 20,000 of these leaflets. The names of the citizens addressed came from the telephone-books of the various cities, and nothing beyond their names and addresses was known concerning them.

Now it chanced that at that time in Sacramento, the State capital, there was a trial for criminal syndicalism involving three members of the I. W. W., Judge Charles O. Busick, and the Sacramento Bee. The Bee, rather a fair and well-edited paper in other respects, reserves its sharpest stings for the I. W. W. Its editorials are frequently incitements to violence against this organization which its owner, C. K. McClatchy, so ardently hates. Of this, more later; the real star in the drama is Judge Busick himself.

Charles O. Busick has a little more than a year still to run as judge of the Superior Court. He has tried nearly all the criminal-syndicalism trials held in Sacramento, and has been regarded as uniformly unfair and prejudiced. On one occasion a change of venue was asked because of his bias; Judge Busick heard the evidence against Judge Busick, decided that Judge Busick was fair, and proceeded to try the case. It was in his court that defense witnesses were not permitted to testify, as not having knowledge proper to the case, unless they stated they were members of the I. W. W.; whereupon as they left the stand they were arrested on a criminal-syndicalism charge, having confessed themselves members of the outlaw association. Their convictions have been upheld by the Supreme Court of California and the men are still in jail. Judge Busick is also the author of the famous anti-I. W. W. injunction, by which it becomes an offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to be a member or officer of the I. W. W., and a man can be and has been sent to jail, without jury trial, in Los Angeles, hundreds of miles away, for violating an injunction issued by a judge in Sacramento. This injunction has been made permanent, and is still in force though nowadays seldom used.

To return to the criminal-syndicalism trial in Sacramento. On the venire for the jury—Judge Busick selects his juries from the registered voters, as do other Sacramento judges; the panel is not drawn by lot—were two men, one named Arnold, the other Bennett (a literary coincidence having no relation to the intellectual standing of the venire). Neither of these men actually served on a criminal-syndicalism jury, and therefore neither was ever a juryman in a position to be "tampered" with. But both of them, being in the Sacramento telephone-book, received copies of the printed plea for repeal of the criminal-syndicalism act sent out by Connors's office.

These leaflets they carried to Judge Busick, who thereupon secured the arrest of Connors on a charge of jury tampering, the leaflets being the only evidence against him. The first trial resulted in a disagreement, the second in a conviction and sentence of five years in San Quentin. After Connors had served more than a year he obtained a third trial, which has just ended in the same conviction and sentence. It is interesting to note that while the second trial was in process another man was tried for jury tampering in the little town of Woodland, near Sacramento. This man had introduced the defendant to a juryman in a bootlegging case and solicited the best efforts of the juror in the defendant's behalf. He was convicted, and sentenced to—five days, as against Connors's five years!

When Connors's third trial started, with District Attorney J. J. Henderson and his assistant Renfro prosecuting, and another Henderson—R. W. Henderson, the blind labor attorney—acting for the defense, it was suddenly discovered that the prosecution had "lost" the evidence submitted at the previous trials—namely, the envelopes addressed to Bennett and Arnold containing the leaflets. The court immediately granted permission to use the transcript of one of the former trials as evidence. Every motion of the defense, including one for change of venue before the trial commenced, was overruled as if automatically. The judge himself assisted the prosecution liberally with advice and encouragement. "Aren't you going to object to that, Mr. Renfro?" was a phrase frequently on His Honor's lips.

Finally he abandoned his bench and took the witness stand to testify that he had been sent and had seen the envelopes and leaflets. Immediately the defense offered a motion that if the judge was going to act as a witness for the prosecution another judge must occupy the bench. This motion was promptly denied, and when his testimony as witness had been heard by himself as judge, His Honor stepped back into the judicial seat. He justified this action by saying he had not physically left the bench—he had only stood up!

Meanwhile, during the five days of the trial, the Sacramento Bee poured forth news items and violent editorials against the I. W. W. and all its supposed works. The jurymen received the Bee regularly, and they all knew that Connors was a member of the I. W. W. This, however, was not "jury tampering," and no one has suggested arresting McClatchy.

Tom Connors is a slight, boyish-looking fellow, appearing younger than his years of experience as lumber-worker and labor organizer would seem to make him. He takes the situation with calmness and courage. But his philosophical acceptance of his personal suffering does not make the proceedings against him any less of a disgrace to the State of California and to the nation at large. "Tennessee justice" has become a phrase for laughter; "California justice" is something uglier.

Outlawing War by the World Court

A POLL of the Senate is said to show a small majority in favor of our entry into the World Court on the basis of a compromise between Senator Pepper's plan and the so-called Harding-Hughes-Coolidge reservations. Nevertheless any small majority in favor of the Court will have hard going against the powerful opposition of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is not merely Senator Borah's strategic position, but his intellectual ability and moral passion which make it so important to win his advocacy of any plan for international justice. He has stated that he will support our entry into the World Court only if it can be coupled with the outlawry of war and the codification of international law.

Hence the peculiar significance of the proposal recently advanced by a mixed group of men and women, some known for advocacy of the League and the World Court and some for opposition to the League and advocacy of the outlawry of war. This program contemplates immediate entry into the Court on the basis of the Harding-Hughes-Coolidge reservations plus an agreement that our adherence is limited to a five-year period unless within that period a general treaty embodying the principles of the outlawry of war has been negotiated and adopted.

This proposal has been criticized as impracticable on several grounds: (1) Europe will not now accept the principles of the outlawry of war as an institution; (2) the United States which might like the idea of the outlawry of war will not accept the affirmative jurisdiction of the Court over all justiciable questions, which is essential to the outlawry of war in practice; (3) the practical difficulties of a codification of law will prove insuperable at least within a five-year period.

We can only tell by trying. The German offer of a security pact provided that the nations signing should outlaw war between themselves; and the effort of the Geneva protocol to define and outlaw aggressive war was a step toward outlawing war. As for the codification of international law, draft conventions for the Pan American Union have already been prepared for consideration and the League itself has at last made a beginning. The real difficulty, we fear, may be America's refusal to accept compulsory jurisdiction over all non-domestic quarrels. And without this we cannot see any great gain in joining the Court at all.

Of course enormous problems remain: the underlying problem of the economic causes both of war and imperialism; the problem of keeping law fluid so it will not freeze into unchanging form, perpetuating existing injustices; and the details of procedure. But at least in America all these problems will be easier to face if the spirit of constructive adjustment of differences which brought together men hitherto so opposed in tactics as former Justice Clarke of the League of Nations Nonpartisan Association and S. O. Levinson, author of the plan to outlaw war, can be made to prevail. It may be long before lovers of peace will reach complete agreement on method or philosophy but every bit of united action they can honestly take together will confound the cynics, the militarists, the worshipers of selfishness and force, whose preparation for new wars imperils all hope for the future.

Miami the Mighty

WHAT newspaper in the United States prints the greatest amount of advertising? The New York Times? Wrong. The Chicago Tribune? Wrong again. You might as well give up; unless you are an expert in advertising you won't get it in fifty guesses. You won't even get the right State. For it is not a newspaper of any of our great metropolitan centers. It is the Miami Herald!

Miami and Florida are booming. We've known that for some time, but we've seen no more impressive confirmation of it than a page advertisement in the Editor and Publisher for July 18, in which the Miami Herald sets forth that it has doubled its advertising in the course of a year and gives the following table of the lineage of it and its nearest competitors, published seven days a week, for the first six months of 1925:

Miami Herald	18,024,587
Detroit News	16,414,678
Chicago Tribune	15,948,574
New York Times	13,587,936
Los Angeles Times	13,156,654
Washington Star	12,671,279
Pittsburgh Press	11,885,342
Los Angeles Examiner	10,862,405
St. Louis Post-Dispatch	10,556,160
Columbus Dispatch	10,478,036

Among newspapers printed only six days a week the only serious contender against the publications of the above list, in space devoted to advertising, is the Chicago Daily News. For the period under review it printed a lineage of 10,331,-101, but this was less than that of the Detroit News, which for six days a week had a lineage of 11,998,266, and the Miami Herald, the lineage of which reached 13,419,560.

A glance at the Miami Herald shows that it prints an issue of about fifty pages on week days—and heaven only knows how many on Sundays. Naturally its advertising is mostly of real estate, but its ordinary week-day issue shows some ten pages of classified material. Naturally also its rates are low. It charges twelve cents a line for classified advertising, while for similar material the New York Times gets from forty cents to a dollar. Still it is space that counts in a boom town. And the Miami Herald covers the space.

Nor is the Herald the only prosperous newspaper in Miami. The new tower of the Miami News, modeled after that of Spain's Giralda, rises 270 feet and is illuminated at night. The Editor and Publisher prints photographs of the interior, including a "magnificent room, overlooking the sea," occupied by the society editors. The News is owned by a man by the name of Cox—James M., to be precise—who once ran for some national office or other, the Presidency as we remember it. Naturally this speck in his career has been forgotten since he began to publish a daily in mighty Miami, whose population is growing so fast that it will take two federal censuses to count it, whose wealth is increasing at such a rate that depositors in its banks have to stand in line as long as one does to obtain a ticket to the world's championship baseball series.

Well, all this is as it should be. Miami is the boom town preeminent in our paramount boom State. And advertising is the essence of booming just as booming is the essence of advertising. Boom on, Miami!—until the boom meets the boomerang.

War Among the Railroads

By H. G. ANDREWS

IN Wall Street there is a saying that the ticker talks. It does. Most listeners believe that, among other things, the ticker has been talking a great deal about railway mergers. Most certainly there has been a broad basis for ticker conversation of that sort. Few days have been so barren that they have not brought forth a new crop of merger rumors. Some days have even brought the mergers.

All of this is important. A railroad merger is consolidation in the process of evolution. And the railway consolidation idea when launched was to be the Moses which would lead the American public out of its transportation wilderness. Consolidation was to bring with it lower rates, a national railroad system, which would make a maximum use of all railroad facilities, pool advantages, share burdens —and require dollars invested in railroads to work for an equitable wage.

The mantle of leadership in the consolidation movement was draped over the shoulders of the Interstate Commerce Commission by the hopeful Congress which framed the Transportation Act of 1920. The Interstate Commerce Commission accepted the congressional mandate. It prepared a tentative plan. Railroad executives, bankers, and numerous unattached citizens wearing no particular label countered with other plans equally tentative. Consolidation entered the era of discussion. Attention centered upon details, with the result that there was increasing confusion regarding principles. Doubts multiplied as to whether railway consolidation, when it came, would be devised solely in the public interest or whether the traditions and expectations of private property would determine the course of action.

For five years this issue has been evaded. But procrastination has reached the end of the alley. Three men have compelled a showdown. They are O. P. and M. H. Van Sweringen and Leonor F. Loree, president of the Delaware and Hudson. All three are men who have known what they wanted. Their ambition has been to accumulate railroad systems which would look so big that other systems considered great would look small.

O. P. and M. H. Van Sweringen started in Cleveland, Ohio, with a real-estate business, and proceeded to build it up into a continental transportation system. They gathered in the Nickel Plate, the Pere Marquette, the Hocking Valley, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and other odds and ends hauled from the railroad scrap-heap as junk. The lines now under their control rival the facilities possessed by the Pennsylvania or the New York Central. Apparently a good job well done. The operating cost of the lines merged will, as a result of unification, be reduced $6,000,000 a year, say the Van Sweringens. Fixed overhead has been reduced. The capitalization of the lines in the Nickel Plate merger is some $125,000,000 less than the capitalization of the lines merged.

The Van Sweringens are now attempting to justify their activities, having been brought to bar by minority stockholders, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and railroad executives who would like to get what the two young men from Cleveland now have. The issue, from the standpoint of the public, is whether the Van Sweringen mergers do not render consolidation on the basis of a national transportation system increasingly difficult.

As for Loree, he is driving at a furious pace and is a part of the record which shows how the consolidation wheels, as they are now geared, go around. In order properly to place Loree in the present scheme of things it is necessary to recall a bit of history. When the Transportation Act was signed, sealed, and delivered, railroad executives celebrated the event by making it known in various ways that they considered themselves blood brothers. They were all going to work together and repair all the damage the government had done to the railways while it was administrator. And they were going to consolidate facilities after a fashion that would establish coordination and cooperation wherever railroads ran. Consolidation was the first step in the big program. Discussion was necessary. Conferences were called. The president of the New York Central would blandly inform the gathering that he thought his system, when completed, should include the Central Railway of New Jersey, as well as the leased lines of the Philadelphia and Reading. As for the Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburgh, that just could not be fitted into any system except the Central.

Then the president of the Pennsylvania would arise and remark that his system represented seventy-five years of effort. In the interest of efficient service it should keep everything it had. There were, however, some leased lines controlled by his colleagues which he really thought he should have. More talk of the same kind, and then the conference adjourned. The executives would shake hands and assure one another that they had made real progress. Then they would bolt for their offices and lay plans to grab all the properties the other men in the conference were most anxious to obtain.

The result has been that the railroad executives have ceased to be blood brothers. Recently it has been next to impossible to get them into a room together. That is the situation into which Loree plunged—so fighting mad that he stuttered. His particular grievance was this: Four railroad executives decided that they would end discussion and fix things. They proceeded to divide the railroads east of the Mississippi. Loree was not one of the four. His was a "small" road and his line was part of the loot to be parceled out.

Then Loree got busy, launching the most ambitious railway consolidation scheme conceived since the days of Harriman. He leased the Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburgh, strengthened his position in the Missouri, Kansas and Texas, began reaching out after the Wabash—projecting a system which would extend from Montreal into the remotest parts of our Southwestern territory. The backbone of this system is to be the New York, Pittsburgh and Chicago, a new line to be constructed from Easton (Pa.) to Pittsburgh. Loree has been before the Interstate Commerce Commission justifying his plans—with practically all of the other executives appearing as a part of the opposition.

This is only a part of the story. What Loree and the Van Sweringens have been doing in a big way others are doing in more restricted spheres. The St. Louis and Southwestern has passed to the Rock Island, which, in turn, may pass to the Southern Pacific. The Texas and Pacific has merged with the Missouri Pacific. The big railroad fish are swallowing the little fish. And the ticker has been celebrating the feast. "Low-Price Rails Advance on Merger Rumors," "Merger Rails Lead Upward Swing," "Merger Rails Market Favorites," so chronicle the financial writers. Wall Street is placing its bets. As one inspired market commentator recently wrote:

> Who thinks that stocks are not cheap? Still, the future movements of the stocks depends [sic] largely on the outcome of the merger which former real-estate men of Cleveland contemplate putting through with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The big system will be formed. Members of the Interstate Commerce Commission will ratify it.

And that, just now, is the Wall Street wager. The bet is that the few provisions of the Transportation Act drawn in the interest of the public will prove inoperative and that when the act loses its baby teeth it will not grow new ones.

In defending its interests the public must use the weapons at hand until it can forge new ones. The Transportation Act has been heralded as a sword and buckler by the consolidation fundamentalists. Modernists, therefore, have reason to give increasing consideration to the question of how far this relic of an old order meets the needs of a new era. In the range of discussion regarding railway consolidation the provisions of the Transportation Act regarding it have been well-nigh forgotten. This is what the act has to say:

> The commission shall as soon as practicable prepare and adopt a plan for the consolidation of the railway properties of the continental United States into a limited number of systems. In the division of such railways into such systems under such plan, competition shall be preserved as fully as possible and whenever practicable the existing routes and channels of trade and commerce shall be maintained. Subject to the foregoing requirements, the several systems shall be so arranged that the cost of transportation as between competitive systems and as related to the values of the properties through which the service is rendered shall be the same, so far as practicable, so that these systems can employ uniform rates in the movement of competitive traffic and under efficient management earn substantially the same rate of return upon the value of their respective railway properties.

Impressive, perhaps, were it not for the joker. Consolidation is as yet permissive. It must proceed upon the basis of mutual agreement. The railroad executives must determine what is best for the country, coupling that decision with a determination of what is best for the lines they represent. Railroad consolidation, therefore, in its present phase is not a movement toward cooperation. It is an elimination contest. As Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania, once remarked: "How can a strong road get the consent of its bond and stock holders to consolidate with a weak road?" The issue, from the railroad point of view, is one of present profits, the maintenance of present advantages. Consolidation on a national scale presupposes the equalization of advantages and the standardization of returns upon capital invested in transportation.

The Transportation Act and recent decisions of the courts carry the canons of railway consolidation, so far as there are any. The difficulty here would seem to be that the decisions of the courts and the spirit of the act are not in agreement. The Supreme Court in the Wisconsin rate case declared that "commerce is a unit and does not regard State lines." It declared, further, that it was the affirmative duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to take steps to maintain adequate railroad service for the people of the United States. This decision clearly established a railroad as a part of a national system. Its obligations are national, since the line between Podunk and Pikeville must some day carry produce consigned from New York. Weak railroads are essential to permanent national prosperity.

What is a weak railroad? It is one that does not earn enough to pay its keep. This failure may be due to local conditions, bad management, or the rate schedule. For schedules which enable some roads to pay large dividends year in and year out keep other roads at the starvation-point all of the time. And right here is the nub of the whole matter. Railroad rate schedules are not fixed by the people who own the roads. They are fixed by the people who use them—by the customers. For the Interstate Commerce Commission, the courts, and the Congress are, theoretically at least, the people in action. This brings up a question of practical justice. What right have the people to penalize capital invested in a necessary transportation project? The courts have held that the returns to railway investors should be reasonable. Is it reasonable that the Michigan Central should earn $76 a share, that the Union Pacific should pay a 10 per cent dividend, the Atchison pay 7, the B. and O. 5—sometimes—while many lines have not earned a dividend in years?

An important fact railroad executives sometimes overlook is that the railroads ceased to be private possessions when they became public utilities. They also ceased to be local institutions when the Supreme Court decided that notwithstanding its State charter no railroad could, under the protection of a State, enforce a rate which was destructive of the rate structure erected under federal auspices. Moreover, the advantages accruing to particular lines disappeared when the courts sustained the contention that railroad earnings above a figure deemed a reasonable return could be drawn upon for the support of a national railways system.

Thus it is that the logic of all the decisions of the courts tends in the direction of the conclusion that dollars legitimately invested in necessary railroads should stand upon a parity—and that the next step is to recognize the progress made by providing the standardized return contemplated by the judicial findings.

It is for these reasons that consolidation is not likely to get very far on the unanimous-consent basis. Railroad executives and railroad-security holders will contend for every advantage they now possess. The railroads will seek to make all of their special privileges income-producing. Lines which monopolize waterfronts will cling to their holdings. Those possessing terminal monopolies will hold them as long as they can. However, the people can compel joint use of terminals. They can, step by step, force the creation of a transportation system that is really national.

But they must first clear away some legislative underbrush. The Transportation Act contemplates consolidation. Consolidation is a step in the direction of cooperation. Cooperation is the alternative to unrestricted competition. Nevertheless, the competitive principle is written into the Transportation Act. Railroads are to share advantages, approach a parity as to return—and continue competition. Those who contend for the competitive principle explain that they contemplate competition in service only. Very well. Why not frankly recognize that situation? There are two factors to be considered. First there is the railroad itself—the right of way, the rails, the appurtenances which a leased line turns over to the company which leases it. Then there is the operating group—the transportation company, if you please. The relations suggested are those which exist between the owner of a building and the tenant who rents the use of a business house.

The railroad is the permanent factor. It cannot be wiped out of existence because it does not pay. It is a part of the national highway system. Highways properly belong to the people. The business under those highways can, perhaps, best be developed under private auspices.

At any rate, the situation as it exists now is manifestly unfair. The public, through its government, sits in on the transportation game. But it takes no risks, not having purchased any chips. It protests whenever any move is made to abandon railways which have ceased to pay their way. If it is desirous of effecting consolidation, the public must recognize that government-owned roads would necessarily be welded into a national system and that roads which regard themselves as private possessions never will come in on a national consolidation plan voluntarily. Compulsory consolidation, therefore, looms as the alternative to consolidation engineered from the private-interest point of view. And compulsory consolidation is evidence of such power, and is inevitably so drastic in its leveling that it is only government ownership under another name. Government ownership has a fearsome sound in many quarters. And yet there are some advantages attached to ownership. An owner can require a tenant to comply with the terms of his lease. Owners have rights and to a certain extent they are partners with those who utilize their properties.

However the dice fall, this much seems certain. Consolidation of some sort is in the offing. Decision regarding the principle of consolidation cannot be evaded for five years more. There are two brands of consolidation—consolidation conceived wholly in the public interest and consolidation conceived from the standpoint of private interest. Wall Street is betting on the second. Watch the ticker.

The Rehoboth Question

By ALBIN E. JOHNSON

THE mandates system of the League of Nations, heralded panacea for righting wrongs of misgoverned peoples, is face to face with one of the most perplexing problems it has ever been called upon to solve.

The Rehoboths of South Africa are demanding their independence.

To the ordinary reader that means nothing. Few have ever heard of the Rehoboths. Fewer still know who, why, and where they are. But among those few are William I of Germany, who, back in 1885, concluded a treaty granting them absolute independence; Generals DeWitt and Maritz, intransigent Boers, whose incipient revolt against the British died a-borning in 1915 when the expert riflemanship of the Rehobothans stopped the drive of the German colonial forces into the Union of South Africa and prevented a juncture of rebellious burghers and the Kaiser's troops; the present administrator of the South West Africa mandated territory, who was constrained to call upon 1,000 soldiers and several airplanes to subdue the patriotic fervor and "hopes for freedom cherished in the breasts of the majority" of the Rehoboth community—and the present Permanent Mandates Commission of the League, whose task it is to decide the respective merits of moral obligations and material interests.

For those others who are uninformed, the Rehoboths are a community or, as they declare, a nation of about 8,000 souls inhabiting some 5,000 square miles of the "most fertile land in German South West Africa." And on the fact that the land they occupy is "most fertile" hangs this story. Originally the Rehoboths were South Africans of European origin. Some fifty-odd years ago they penetrated the territory which the Germans later claimed, and squatted in their present locality. They intermarried with the natives, especially the Hereros, a tribe which Prof. E. H. Schwartz claims are descendants of the Vandals. The result was a "distinguished-looking people with a strong political sense and far above the natives in intelligence." They adopted the name of "Rehoboths" from a European missionary and set about to carve a kingdom out of the jungle. Their land lies well in from the coast and was little visited until the Germans, in their exploitation of their colony, sought to bring the community under control. This effort soon ended—chiefly because of the brave resistance the Rehoboths made—and the invaders asked for a treaty.

The pact expressly defined the borders of the Rehoboth country, recognized the government as a political entity, waived all rights of tribute or exploitation, and specifically agreed that the nation should go on being a nation. The fact that the territory was completely surrounded by German soil made no difference. And for once, according to the Rehoboths, Wilhelmstrasse saw fit conscientiously to observe [illegible].

During the period from 1885 until 1915 the Rehoboths continued unmolested. They were ruled by a kapitein or president, elected by a raad or parliament, which in turn was chosen by votes of the eligible male population. Laws and courts were set up and functioned normally and naturally. There were controversies with other tribes, the Hottentots and Hereros, but these usually were settled favorably for the Rehoboths. In 1915, with the World War well under way, the colonial German forces started their drive into Union territory for the purpose of forming a juncture with the DeWitt-Maritz rebels. They called upon the Rehoboths to join them. This was refused, the kapitein citing a provision in the original pact with the Kaiser which specified that in case Germany went to war with other white peoples the Rehoboths were to remain neutral. The colonial administration immediately abrogated the treaty and issued an ultimatum. The Rehoboths answered the ultimatum by dispatching a well-armed force to the frontier. So effectively did they dispute the advance of the German colonials that General Botha was able to suppress the rebellion and then throw his forces into position to threaten the line of communication of the Teutons.

At this moment the kapitein of the Rehoboths evaded the German lines and made his way to Swakopmund, Botha's headquarters, and with the old treaty in his hand asked the Boer general if the British would respect it should the Rehoboths join the Allied forces. Tapping the document, General Botha, according to Cornelius van Wijk, the kapitein, replied: "All that this gives you, you at least shall keep."

From then on until the end of the war the Rehoboths "stood shoulder to shoulder with the British, despite their weakness, in the struggle for liberty and right."

The World War ended. Versailles granted to the British Empire, or the Union of South Africa, the mandate over what was formerly German South West Africa. Gijsbert Reitz Hofmeyr, "a companion of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George," was appointed administrator. And the Rehobothan troubles began.

The administrator decided that the "Gebied of Rehoboth" was an integral part of his mandate. The Rehobothans were under administration rule, the same as the rest of the 4,500,000 natives—Hottentots, Hereros, Kaffirs, Swazis, Basutos, and others. Protests were made to the South African government, the League, the British governor generals, Prince Arthur of Connaught and [illegible] Buxton, and even to King George. But all to no avail. Said the Rehoboths:

> General Botha promised to respect our independence. We are an autonomous people, with our own government, our own laws, our own schools and churches . . . we are neither a community nor a union, but a people and a nation . . . living on land that has been in our possession for more than a half century.

To which Hofmeyr flung back:

> Indolent loafers, squatting on the most desirable portion of Southwest Africa . . . treacherous, unreliable people who betrayed the Hereros to the Hottentots, the Germans to the British [to which betrayal Hofmeyr owes the position he now holds] . . . ignorant, degenerate, and furnishing shelter to lawbreakers from all the surrounding region . . . seeking to arouse the native population into revolt against the government . . . cherishing hopes of independence instilled by certain Europeans and still desired by the majority.

The last an undiplomatic admission at this stage of the game.

Hofmeyr's administration has not been unsuccessful. The administrator managed, by unfair tactics, the Rehoboths allege, to secure the Old Raad's signature to a treaty which surrendered practically all the rights enjoyed under the pre-war conditions. The Old Raad was immediately repudiated and thrown out of office; the majority elected a New Raad, refused to obey the administrator's decree, and appealed to the League. The administrator countered by declaring the New Raad an illegally elected body and supported the Old Raad with military force.

> We have done all that is within our power, but to no purpose [writes the New Raad to the administrator]. We withdraw ourselves once and for all and shall no more ask your counsel or advice . . . we remain henceforth totally independent of you because we see that the magistrate and the administrator persist in forcing the people against their will to bow to the deposed raad and also even to the agreement. . . . We will not obey any laws except those of our own raad; we will serve only the laws of our fathers which are still independent.

The Old Raad appealed to the administrator, who, with law and regularity on his side, issued a proclamation. The New Raad, which, even Hofmeyr admits, represented the overwhelming majority, was abolished; all rights, prerogatives, papers, moneys, duties whatsoever exercised by the kapitein and raad and courts were vested in Major Manning, magistrate appointed by the administration.

"This is the law," proclaimed the administrator. "And as it is the law, regardless whether it is just or desirable, it must be obeyed."

But the Rehoboths—"indolent, ignorant, degenerate loafers" that the administrator regarded them—were not ready to quit. Under the leadership of their deposed kapitein and a Dowdney Drew (called a European by Hofmeyr in his report) they carried on their policy of non-cooperation. It is even charged that they were planning military reprisals (perhaps reminiscent of Sinn Fein days in Ireland). The administrator sent several hundred police into the community. Reports of uprisings among the 4,500,000 Hereros, Hottentots, Kaffirs, and other blacks drifted in. A German tramp steamer, the Nordmaark, was captured off the west coast of South Africa, laden to the decks with rifles, machine-guns, and ammunition. It had cleared from Hamburg. Its destination has never been ascertained—or revealed.

Finally, one Sunday morning, after a flying column of 750 South African troopers had marched through a rainy night, the administrator delivered his coup de grace. With airplanes hovering overhead the Veldtmen surrounded the Rehoboth village. Taken by surprise at this move—they had regarded the administrator as a "devout churchman who would not break the Sabbath"—the Rehoboths were disarmed and some 700 made prisoners. Hofmeyr's official report tells the rest of the story:

> Four hundred of the prisoners were punished . . . fines from two to thirty pounds sterling and jail sentences from four days to three months at hard labor. . . . The manner in which the Rehoboths have defied the administration has made the natives defiant, too. . . . Martial law has been declared.

Thus the situation stands. The Rehoboths have been completely subjugated for the time being. They are a "native population." The treaty rights, respected by the German Kaiser for almost fifty years, are repudiated. The mandates commission of the League of Nations has almost unlimited power. It can recommend that a mandate be canceled or changed. It can force a mandatory power to recognize the Rehoboth pact with Germany or even grant the people independence. Or it can decide that "the march of civilization and progress justifies repudiation of moral obligations in behalf of material interests."

Eight thousand peoples are not many. Fifty-odd years' occupancy undisturbed of 5,000 square miles of "the best territory in South West Africa" does not necessarily mean a clear title to that land if "victors in the war" desire different. Despite the fact that the Rehoboths fought for the Allies they can still be considered as "conquered peoples" and dealt with accordingly.

But what does matter is that census figures show the native population of Africa, especially South Africa, is increasing rapidly and the white population is decreasing. Eight thousand dissatisfied "natives" with a "high political intelligence" can easily produce fermentation that may in time prove disastrous to the supremacy of the white rulers of the world's largest continent.

Oil

By ALTHA LEAH BASS

"BRAMAN, OKLAHOMA." Thus, in a cramped hand without any flourishes, the farmer or the merchant wrote it in the hotel directory in Oklahoma City or Wichita or even Kansas City, when some unusual business of selling cattle and hogs or buying a half-year's stock of merchandise took him beyond the quiet monotony of Braman. The young men of the town did not write it thus, or at all, in hotel directories. They preferred, rather than confess their Braman origin, to sign themselves from Blackwell, Oklahoma, which is twelve miles southeast of Braman and is a thriving little city with a glass factory and oil refineries and picture theaters and intersecting railways and filling-stations polished to laboratory cleanliness. Braman claimed, in round numbers, a population of five hundred souls, though the number was round rather than accurate if the family of the Methodist minister for a certain year happened to be small or the death toll of aged folk and infants heavy.

For Braman, till less than two months ago, was a village apparently forgotten by God. Its population consisted of the settlers who had homesteaded there in the Cherokee opening of '93, of their relatives who had come on later when land was still cheap and farming an occupation of some promise and hopefulness, of their children who had intermarried and were now rearing families of their own, and of an occasional merchant with his family who came in the eager hope of putting fresh zest into the town's business and after a few months moved on to fields of brisker activity or remained to content himself with a fly-specked stock that stood in the same order, item for item, from year to year on his shelves. It was the sort of town traveling salesmen "made" in two hours, if possible, getting away by freight train or bus when the one-passenger-train, each-way-daily schedule proved inadequate. If the wheat failed, through the ravages of a late frost or the chinch bug or hot weather in "filling" time, the farmers of the community hoped for compensatory returns from their alfalfa and corn crops, which an inopportune rainstorm or a few days of hot wind might reduce to nothing. Sometimes throughout a season all the crops were good, and farmers and merchants alike celebrated their prosperity by buying new Fords or going on little visits to their folks back East in Illinois or Missouri. Sometimes, in spite of the rich loam soil, all the crops failed, and the ministers of the town went unpaid, the stock of dry-goods and even of groceries held over on the shelves for another year, and most of the families felt the pinch of taxes and doctor's bills. Housewives fed their starved sense of beauty by the courageous growing of flowers that the mid-summer heat usually blighted, by making jars of pickles and jellies that were little culinary triumphs, by baking angel-foods and crocheting lace that vied for prizes at the autumn community fair. Through a succession of cloudless summer days the barber and the banker and the grocers passed the time on dusty croquet grounds at the back or the sides of their business buildings, while stray customers waited till the end of a game to be served.

In winter the same groups, with additional farmers who were free for an occasional half-day from the less arduous farm work of cold weather, sat around big drum stoves or small gas heaters in the stores and the barber-shop and related the sparse news of the community: the death of a registered cow, the condition of the winter wheat, the recent home-talent play at the high school. It was a meager, direct, honest life in Braman.

Then, when other topics failed, they discussed the prospect of bringing in oil at the community oil well on the old cow lot in the east end of town. There was some gleam of romance, some remote possibility of change in the quiet course of Braman annals. Many of them had given over their vacant town lots to form the community lease; two oil promoters named Hicks and Helmerick had hired the Herbert Oil Company to drill for them on the ten-acre lease on which cows still grazed when drilling operations permitted; and spasmodic drilling took place.

Then without warning the miracle happened to Braman. Oil was struck within the town limits. To the pious, it seemed that God had remembered his forgotten people; to the more worldly minded, the facts seemed to be that the drilling company met with an accident that brought in the oil well which they intended to keep sealed under a layer of cap-rock until leases had been bought up solidly at the leasors' own terms. Storage, oil companies admit, is cheaper in the ground than in tanks. And leases are undoubtedly more cheaply and readily bought in unproved territory.

The people of Braman talk of it now with an air of pride and mystery, as peasants talk of the birth of a royal child. "It come in on the twenty-first day of May," the honest, overworked mayor explains to curious visitors. "'Bout 'leven in the morning she shot right over the derrick, when nobody knew they was within five hundred feet of oil. I was out in the country and didn't know about it till an hour or so later, and then she'd shot over the derrick three times. By the middle of the afternoon the town had begun to grow, and the next day the place was alive with oil men—buyers and drillers and speculators and geologists—till you couldn't hardly see anybody you knew. When that cap-rock blowed off, she blowed something more'n a few barrels of oil into Braman. I'll say she sure did."

And so she did! In two weeks' time the whole aspect of the quiet town was changed. The skyline is no longer one of trees and cottages, but of oil derricks, one in each of the twenty-seven town blocks and several in many of them. Huge trucks carrying oil casing creak and bump down the unpaved streets; eating and rooming houses (four or five beds in the room if the floor space permits) fill the few spots that drilling has left vacant; a hastily built airdrome gaudily offers old pictures and stale vaudeville to the crowds that penetrate the gleam of its corrugated iron front on Broadway; slush-ponds take the place of lawns and vegetable gardens. The harsh noises of tool-dressing, rig-building, oil-drilling drown out the clatter of dealers bargaining with lot owners and blend crazily with a wailing radio, while over all the heavy dust sinks tirelessly and the summer heat pours in steady brightness. Housewives, even the most meticulous, have left off their dusting and baking because dirt heaps crowd their door-yards and their men are too busy bargaining over town-lot leases to remember their meal hours. The little park is crowded with rows of tent-houses. Here women cook and wash and children play and whole families eat and sleep, by choice or because they cannot rent houses in this town that has tripled in population without increasing its size by a single block. Where is there labor or lumber for homes when oil rigs must be built?

The school-yard has its derrick, overtopping the red brick building that has suddenly grown inadequate. The churches, four in number, each have a share in some well being dug nearby. On Sundays the drilling drowns out the choir's feeble declaration that "There is a Fountain Filled with Blood." "Better sing it,

> 'There is an oil well filled with oil,
> Running fifteen hundred barrels a day,'"

the dusty driller grunts.

In a "dog-house" just outside one church a dapper young geologist keeps the log of the well his company is drilling. He records all its strata with scientific care, while inside the church the minister prays for "the victory of the old-time faith and the triumph of the truth of the Old Book over all its adversaries." Geological strata, dumped before him in streaks of sand and rock and mineral, prove nothing at all to him.

But the spirit of Braman has changed. She has hope; she has feverish excitement; she has romance. Once conscious of her own municipal inferiority, she is now proud, head-high, ready to compare her oil sands with the best the oil industry has unearthed. Fat men, worth millions, walk her streets and bargain with her humble citizens now grown shrewd and wary. Men talk, not of the little business of crop success or failure, but of the showy homes they will build, of the trips they will take to California "and ride the Pullman all the way," of the municipal improvements they will achieve if the town property develops oil. Here appears a bit of pathos of lost opportunity: a boy of twenty-five with good prospects of coming into a half a million dollars laments that he did not have two or three thousand a few years sooner, when he could have studied law before he married and had a family; a spinster, old and detached from life in her early thirties, laments that she cannot play the grand piano that her first royalty has bought. But there is little time for regret while the crowds increase and the wells drill deeper and excitement grows more tense.

July fourth, the experts declare, ought to reveal the facts as to whether Braman is built over a great oil pool or whether its one producing well is a false lead, signifying nothing. Now, in their new confidence, Bramanites announce a three-day oil celebration, July third to fifth, with the prospect of a gusher being brought in to thrill the crowd of celebrants. Where such a crowd will eat, where they will sleep, even what they will drink unless the inadequate water supply can be hastily supplemented, are matters scarcely to be considered in the sketchy planning of Braman's great oil festival. For once, and perhaps for long if the four oil sands are proved to exist, Braman is on the map.

Meanwhile, the extent of leased territory about Braman increases, prices for leases soar, and plans to take care of the prospective oil through refineries and pipe lines grow definite. The dust thickens, the days grow hotter, the wheat stands in the shock for want of threshers, but derricks rise daily on the skyline, and the mad race down into the earth for oil goes on. Now Braman's young men proudly sign themselves as Braman's own when they register in out-of-town hotels. Now they carry banners on their cars announcing their stupendous growth and their coming oil festival.

"Braman Invites the World."

In the Driftway

THE breakfasts of Carl Van Vechten, as he describes them in the American Mercury for August, have been varied and satisfying. "But," the New York World inquires of him belligerently, "have you ever tried beans?"

> If you have not, you have a most faulty understanding of breakfasts, to say nothing of history. Beans are the most notorious American breakfast there is. They were served to the American army in France every morning, rain, snow, or shine, just after reveille. Sometimes they were plain, sometimes they went with bacon, sometimes they were embellished with a slice of pickle on the side. The ostensible theory underlying this breakfast was its caloric value. The real theory was that any soldier who had eaten such a breakfast would be mad enough to lick a whole platoon of Germans. Well, it was hard while it lasted, but it worked. We won the war.

The World is right. Apart from the war, beans are so important a breakfast dish in the history of America that Mr. Van Vechten must be a spurious sort of citizen unless he is familiar with this ritual. It used to be true in New England—there has been some backsliding in recent years—that no God-fearing family (and they were all that) failed to make its Saturday-night supper and Sunday-morning breakfast off baked beans and steamed brown bread. As a Saturday-night supper this combination has few superiors. As a Sunday-morning breakfast—— Well, the Drifter has always laid the gloomy character of New England theology to those breakfasts. Any minister who crowded beans and brown bread on his stomach just after rising on Sunday morning could hardly help going out and preaching a three-hour sermon on eternal damnation, while any layman who went through such an ordeal would naturally regard even such a discourse as a relieving aftermath.

* * * * *

ALSO Mr. Van Vechten pays too little attention to pie as a breakfast dish. True, he says that when he was working for a Chicago newspaper and had to be on the job at the convivial hour of 4 a. m., he used to prepare for the day's work by a hurried visit to a lunchroom, where he downed a cup of coffee and two pieces of apple pie. But there is something in his tone which suggests that Mr. Van Vechten looks back upon this function as an unusual feat instead of in line with sound American tradition. Now, when the Drifter was a boy pie was an accompaniment—almost the pièce de résistance, in fact—of breakfast in most respectable households of the farming communities of the Middle West and New England. He thinks it is still going fairly strong today, although our agricultural communities have become annoyingly citified in their eating habits within recent years.

* * * * *

THE last time the Drifter ate pie for breakfast was when, during college days, he was sent with another young man to some sort of convention in a small Western town. The Drifter and his fellow-delegate were entertained by a generous family which expected them to eat two kinds of pie for breakfast and sleep on a feather mattress at night. The Drifter and his mate negotiated the pie, but they rebelled at the feather bed—the time was late in June. They were afraid boldly to cast it aside; they used to remove it each night and in the morning return it to its place, rolling on it several times to make it look as if it had been slept on.

* * * * *

THE simplest breakfast the Drifter recalls was originated by a friend when he was an art student in Paris. This friend had been used to fairly bountiful American breakfasts at home, but in France he decided to conform to custom. He began the day with a simple petit déjeuner of a roll and butter, with hot chocolate, which he prepared in his studio before starting off to his morning classes. After a few days' experience the young man omitted butter as a luxury and a nuisance (the latter was the more influential factor) and later he decided to forego milk in his chocolate on similar grounds. After a week or so more it occurred to him that hot water added no great amount of nutriment to his chocolate, and he began to save time by munching the bar as he ate his roll. As the days grew shorter, and it got harder and harder to get up in the morning, the young man arrived at the 100 per cent efficient breakfast. He abandoned the roll and ate the chocolate on the street as he dashed from his bed to his art school.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Oil, Judges, and the Law

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial comment in The Nation of July 1 on the decision of Judge Kennedy upholding the validity of the lease of the Teapot Dome oil reserve furnishes an excellent illustration of how easy it is for even the most intelligent lay opinion to go astray in discussing decisions of the courts in complicated cases. You speak of "Judge Kennedy, differing on identical points of law and evidence from his colleague, Judge McCormick." Precisely the contrary is the case. Judge McCormick found the Elk Hills leases to be illegal upon two grounds only: (a) That the evidence before him sustained the charge of "fraud and conspiracy" and (b) that the leases contained "an unlawful delegation of power" to the Secretary of the Interior. In his opinion Judge McCormick says: "If it were not for the fraud and conspiracy . . . and the unlawful delegation of power in the agreements, the contracts and leases in suit would be authorized and would be binding obligations upon the United States of America under the act of June 4, 1920."

Therefore, if Judge Kennedy in deciding the Teapot Dome case were disposed to adopt Judge McCormick's conclusions upon the law, he would be bound to sustain the Teapot Dome lease unless he found that the evidence before him sustained the charge of "fraud and conspiracy" or that the lease contained an "unlawful delegation of power" to the Secretary of the Interior. As a matter of fact, Judge Kennedy found that the evidence before him did not sustain the charge of "fraud and conspiracy" and it was not seriously contended by the Government that the Teapot Dome lease contained any "unlawful delegation of power" to the Secretary of the Interior such as Judge McCormick found in the Elk Hills leases. It therefore follows that, except in respect of the charge of "fraud and conspiracy," regarding which it is undisputed that the evidence in the two cases differed widely, the two judges reached the same conclusions. Stating the point differently, if Judge McCormick had been deciding the Teapot Dome case his own reasoning in the Elk Hills case would have compelled him to uphold the Teapot Dome lease unless he found that the evidence sustained the charge of "fraud and conspiracy."

New York, July 29 PAUL D. CRAVATH

[We took pains to point out that the two cases were "not precisely alike"—that the evidence of conspiracy was less direct in connection with Teapot Dome. But one of the grounds for declaring the Elk Hills lease illegal was that it contained an unlawful delegation of power to the Secretary of the Interior. This came about through an order by President Harding transferring the oil reserves from the Navy Department to the Department of the Interior. Judge Kennedy's decision necessarily upholds this order, while Judge McCormick said it was "in excess of the executive power of the President." As to the many other points where the two decisions seem to be in conflict we have not read a stenographic report of the evidence and doubt if Mr. Cravath has. But a special dispatch to the New York Times from Los Angeles on the day of the Teapot Dome judgment said that it differed from the Elk Hills decision "in nearly every important point in issue," while a telegram to the same newspaper from Washington described the rulings as "generally at variance." Moreover, our "lay opinion" is supported by the legal mind of the chief counsel for Mr. Doheny, whom we quoted as saying: "There is no distinguishing between the two cases. On the real facts either Judge McCormick or Judge Kennedy is wrong."—EDITOR THE NATION.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I regret that I should have to include in my letter of congratulations to you an exception to one of your editorials. I congratulate you upon your sixtieth anniversary; you have fought with superlatively meritorious fortitude and courage. However, I am rather surprised that your disagreement with the decision of Judge Kennedy in the Teapot Dome case should provoke you to an unfair and unfounded criticism of the law.

I read of Judge Kennedy's decision with as much chagrin as The Nation did; I am, too, one who has but little reverence for our judges; the many travesties of justice which I have witnessed and the number of ridiculous opinions which I have read have made me cynical of the law's majesty and potency. But I deny that there is justification for the editorial contained in your issue for July 1.

You ask why Judge Kennedy and Judge McCormick should reach different legal conclusions. Well, why do Professor Conklin and other biologists disagree with Dr. Kammerer on the question of "inheritance of acquired characteristics"; why do in the field of philosophy rationalists wage war with the empiricists; why do psychologists disagree; why did Hamilton and Jefferson disagree? Why do people have different opinions?

And who has claimed for the law scientific certainty? Judge Bailhache in the case of Belfast Ropewalk Co. vs. Bushell, 1918, 1 K. B. 210, 213, wrote: "Unfortunately or fortunately, I am not sure which, our law is not a science."

I am unqualifiedly in favor of criticism of our courts and judges as well as of our other institutions and officials. But it seems to me criticism ought to be fair and justified. The Nation's editorial to my mind was not.

Brooklyn, June 30 JACOB LIPPMAN.

Retribution

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was encouraging to a tired radical to see the following in a Buffalo department store:

"The Truth About the Treaty" by André Tardieu, 15c, the $4 book.

"The Peace Negotiations," by Robert Lansing, 10c, published at $3.

"Woodrow Wilson as I Knew Him," by Joseph P. Tumulty, $1.45, the $5 book.

"The Kaiser's Memoirs," 15c, the $3.50 book.

"Prohibition Inside Out," by Roy A. Haynes, 55c, reduced from $2.50.

Buffalo, June 15 W. C. MUELLER

Books

Dilemma

By VIRGINIA MOORE

That you breathed air and, later, ceased to breathe
Becomes a spike to split the mind upon:
Quick limbs and haughty hair could not bequeath
Immunity from death, and you are gone
To mix the fine-spun mortar of your flesh
With sorrel seed and crumbled dogwood bark. . . .
What are companions if they are not fresh,
Pale inmates of an unfamiliar dark?
I will not say your spirit roves somewhere,
Now that your eager body lies so low;
I do not care—I do not want to care—
What use of caring if I cannot know?
God! how can beauty molder, thus, in you?
—Sometimes I think my mind is moldering, too!

Henry James's Home-Coming

The Pilgrimage of Henry James. By Van Wyck Brooks. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

WITH his book on Henry James Mr. Brooks sets another illuminated square in his mosaic representing the American artist in his relation to the American scene. Nearly everything he has written is a contribution to this capital subject, and although I question his assumptions and often disagree with his conclusions I hope he will be encouraged to continue. In essence he seems to believe that a society is good if it is favorable to independence of mind and to the creative spirit; and that all our hopes for a decent arrangement of the productive system or for the settlement of the subway tangle in New York or for the abatement of national hatreds or for a thousand other things—that these are important only as they tend toward a society in which the artist, representing the highest reach of independence and creative power, can happily exist. This is an unusual attitude in America, where, more frequently, the artist's importance is measured by his contribution to the maintenance, or at best the improvement, of social conditions. In "The Ordeal of Mark Twain" Mr. Brooks presented to us the plight of an artist harried and ultimately defeated by American morals, by American business. In his new work we have the obverse of the medal: an artist, intelligent enough to recognize the fatality, for him, of life in America, escaping to Europe and meeting defeat there because of his separation from his native land—because "it was as if he had not lain on the ground, had not touched the ground, for twenty years, as if he had been living in a balloon."

That is the theme and it positively bristles with challenge. I pass over the main idea, that the expatriate always loses by his detachment, that an artist must "contract local saturations and attachments . . . and strike roots" into his home country. The particular instance ought to illumine the general theme sufficiently, and I propose two questions about James. Was America ever—could America ever—be the home of Henry James? And was his work vitiated and thinned by his exile? My own answer, as I am a confirmed worshiper of James, is no to both questions.

From the time he was a "mere mite of observation" James seems to have felt himself "born to discriminate à tout propos." His was a watchful, critical mind, he was intellectually eager for and responsive to every sensuous appeal. He lived in a time when action and not observation, enthusiasm and not criticism, was required; in a country with tremendous faith and energy but with no dignity, a country which entirely denied the faculty of discrimination by fanatically repudiating the whole idea of rank, and one in which the fading Puritan and the pushing pioneer neglected in themselves and hindered in others the pure enjoyment of the senses. There was business and there was nothing else, nothing else native, to which one could attach oneself. The youth who was to be an artist was fed constantly on European dainties. Mr. Brooks's first chapter is an admirable picture of the Europeanization of the youthful James's mind. William, his brother, escaped because he found an Agassiz; Henry found no artist who had remained in any way American to assure him that the two terms, artist and American, were at all compatible.

He was himself meditative, speculative; and the accident which kept him out of the Civil War may well have persuaded him that detachment was the cardinal virtue and that action only corrupted. But all his qualities were inherently favorable to such an attitude, and one in particular: his irony, his skepticism of all human endeavor. He was interested in "cases of conscience," in human emotions, in courage above all; but he was always aware of the "immitigability of our mortal predicament." It was not an attitude to be warmly embraced in America, where the very air seemed to persuade one that energy and the republican system could change all things in time.

James, in short, when he went to Europe returned to his spiritual home, to a land of fixed values, of social structure, of accepted discipline, to a society where there was, in addition to the basic conflict for bread, room for spiritual adventures. He went to the country which, in his mind, corresponded to his temperament. He was wrong; Europe, England were never as noble as his image of them. Mr. Brooks quotes the remark of Ford Madox (Hueffer) Ford that James "had found English people who were just people singularly nasty." Immitigable, indeed! And James was never deceived.

It displeases me to think of James as the kind of snob Mr. Brooks makes him appear; but that is not so important. Nothing, in fact, is so important as the kind of artist James was. Mr. Brooks cannot think of a novel simply as a work of art, without social or moral prepossessions. For one who seriously is concerned with the artist he is strangely indifferent to art, and he goes so far as to tell us that "in real life" no one could have thought and felt as Hyacinth Robinson felt in "The Princess Casamassima"—as if that, even if it were true, is at all relevant to the achieved triumph of a character imagined and created.

Mr. Brooks, in fact, does not see that James, unable to saturate himself in the facts of either America or Europe, gave up a bad theory of art (although he always fancied himself holding to it and praised Zola and Bennett and Wells for their achievements in the method of "data," and himself actually gathered data, but of another order, to the last) and let himself "all divinely" soar. (Read the passage in Percy Lubbock's introduction to the "Letters" for the quality with which James associated creativeness.) He created, in brief, when he could no longer report. He created an imaginary world in which political and economic ideas and current morality were notably lacking—but in which the human soul is present in its highest manifestations.

Mr. Brooks complains that James became at the end more interested in the relations between people than in the people themselves, as he complains that James became more interested in organizing his material and in its ultimate "form" than in the material itself. The first is the way of civilization—is not Mr. Brooks himself more interested in the artist's relation to America than in the artist? Does he not know that civilized people exist most completely and intensely in their relations to each other? The second is the way of art, for the artist knows that his material is common property and becomes significant only if it is expressed in appropriate form, which gives it grace and intensity and persuasiveness. It is easier to see this in the plastic arts than in fiction; for James it must be said that his artistic integrity (which Mr. Brooks unsuccessfully impugns) demanded everlasting care of the form in order to take care of his material, to render it. He was always "organizing," but with a definite purpose. And he dealt with objects of almost incalculable delicacy, with the gentlest swayings of our consciousness. To this material he was always close; for this he had to absent him from felicity not for a while but for a lifetime of exile and devotion. GILBERT SELDES

A Russian Miscellany

Fragments from My Diary. By Maxim Gorky. Robert M. McBride and Company. $3.

OVER ten years ago Gorki, having reached the summit of his achievements, began looking backward to the lower depths from which he had come; and he has spent the last decade in retracing his circuitous ascent. As a result we have an autobiography in three volumes ("Childhood," "In the World," "My Universities") that stands out even among the distinguished examples of this type of writing in which the past few years have been so rich. Unfortunately, toward the end of the third volume, which brings the story down to the beginning of the author's literary career, the strong, fine fabric of the earlier work frays out—as though the weaver had not the energy or the interest to finish his task. It is the greater pity that he has failed to do so, since Gorki is indubitably a representative figure of our age, and the complete story of his education would be a significant document. The book under review is in a sense a sequel to the trilogy, and yet it is difficult to [illegible] in the [illegible], because the personality around which the earlier books clung, as flesh clings to bone, is not present here. Nor do these "Fragments" have anything like the coherence of the preceding volumes.

The mind of which this book is the product makes one think of a boy's pocket—full of all manner of oddments, from stale crumbs to newly made slings. Gorki's treasures indicate more curiosity than discrimination. He records everything: an overheard remark, a casual conversation, half-defined thoughts, and stray encounters. And like a thrifty housewife, preserving her cheese-parings and candle-ends, he turns everything to account. But this parsimoniousness is merely one side of a medal, the other [illegible] of which is an acute and ever-vigilant interest in his fellow-creatures.

Some of the specimens exhibited are grouped with at least something like neatness. Thus Gorki assembles a number of queer fellows who are so fascinated by fire that they commit arson, and who are of interest chiefly to the fire department and the criminologist. Gorki's descriptions of fires are touched with an ecstasy that makes one believe that writing about them may have saved him from starting them. In a like fashion he makes an awkward frieze in which some townsmen of Arzamas are presented, each dull sordid figure making its ineffectual gesture of acquiescence or distress. And he strings together a series of studies that add to the gallery of hoboes for whose portraits he is so famous. Some of his characters are exhibited singly, as, for example, a man who becomes a thief in order to defeat his good fortune; a dealer in antiques who believes that his mistress has drawn his soul away and given him the soul of her dead husband, and who is further harassed by a six-legged spider which attends him in order to remind him that he may not dispose of a stranger's soul; a hangman with the fixed idea that he has an air-bubble in his chest which makes him a human balloon; a truck-driver so horrified by a man's power to destroy the life of another that he commits a series of murders in order to demonstrate that power repeatedly to himself. Striking as these sketches are, they are mainly interesting as clinical pictures. It is only occasionally that Gorki draws a character who approaches what we like to think of as the norm. One of the most memorable of these is the Mordvin bear huntress and sorceress who houses the author for a night and whose prayer, which he overhears, he characterizes as "the finest conversation of man with God . . . which I had heard in all my life." The scheme of the book is so free that it can afford hospitality not only to these nameless casuals but also to several celebrities with whom Gorki came into more or less close contact. He gives us his conversation with Alexander Blok on the subject of eternity, and offers brief pointed notes on Tolstoi and Chekhov which appear to have been left over from his earlier reminiscences of these two men. There are also a few Snapshots of the Revolution, of which the note entitled Atheism, Marriage, Dancing is the best. It gives, in a flash, Russia, style 1920.

Gorki concludes his miscellany by quoting William James's hesitating word to the effect that the Russians have probably been called "to astonish the world by something unexpected" and affirming his own faith in the future of Russia: "I think that when this marvelous people has passed through its share of torments and freed itself of all that tortures and confuses the mind, when it begins to work in the full consciousness of that cultural, indeed, that religious importance of labor which joins all the world into one, then it will begin a fairylike, heroic life and in many a way will enlighten a world exhausted by strife and maddened with crime." Inclined as one is to share these sentiments, one must admit that taken in conjunction with much of the book they are decidedly a non sequitur.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

Mangled Evidence

Jean Paul Marat: His Career in England and France Before the Revolution. By Sidney L. Phipson. London: Methuen and Company. 7/6.

IF this be history, then Henry Ford was right. Disregarding the findings of the best biographers of Marat and basing his exposition chiefly on some quotations from various numbers of Notes and Queries, Mr. Phipson, with more industry than discretion, with more ingenuity than care, has revived the old legend of the criminality of Marat before the French Revolution. He is fully aware that all of the charges against Marat have been thoroughly refuted, but with a perversity born of prepossession he insists upon refuting the refutations. By considering spurious all evidence that he dislikes and by accepting evidence that the best biographers have repudiated, he proves his case.

It would be useless and would take much too much space to refute Mr. Phipson's refutation of the refutation of the legend. Perhaps, however, if we examine the origins of this legend we can throw some light not only upon Mr. Phipson's gropings but also upon the developments of legends in general about radicals in enemy countries. In 1793 the Reverend Mr. Huddesford, having nothing more to go by than a similarity of names, identified Jean Paul Marat with a former tutor at Warrington Academy who had in 1776 robbed the Ashmolean Museum and had been sent to prison therefor at the Woolwich Hulks. In the same year a writer in the London Star, having nothing more to go by than the same similarity of names and perhaps, too, a resemblance in person and personality (for the characteristics of the true Marat were by that time universally notorious), associated him not only with the Warrington tutor but also with a tambour artist who had been arrested in Edinburgh for debt in 1786 (when it can be almost convincingly shown that Marat was in France). A certain Mr. Harford, a former student at Warrington of the tutor-convict whom he had again seen at the Woolwich Hulks, with only the similarity of names and perhaps, having by 1792 or 1793 learned of Marat's appearance, a similarity of appearance to adduce, also connected Marat with his former teacher, although he never put his suspicions on paper. In 1792 the servant of one Mr. Ireland, guided certainly by a similarity of appearance and perhaps also by a similarity of names, thought he recognized in Marat of 1792 a bookseller of Bristol who in 1787 had been arrested for debt. Mr. Ireland's servant told Mr. Ireland and he told Mr. Harford. Mr. Harford now merged into one the tutor-convict, the Bristol bookseller, and the French revolutionist. He told a certain Dr. Turner of his discoveries. In 1813 Dr. Turner in a footnote to a history of Warrington Academy said "there is great reason to believe" that the tutor-convict, the Bristol bookseller, and the French revolutionist are one. Mr. Harford also told his son, who in a letter written in 1822 likewise made the trinity one. In 1887 a Mr. Latimer in a history of Bristol, having nothing more than a Bristol tradition, probably derived from Mr. Ireland and Mr. Harford, to go by, united the Bristol bookseller with the French revolutionist. Various historians and biographers have at different times since placed Marat in Warrington Academy, the Ashmolean Museum, the Woolwich Hulks, the Edinburgh tambour-shop and prison, the Bristol bookshop and jail; but nobody, not even Mr. Harford, placed him in all of these predicaments until Mr. Phipson came along. And all the time this Swiss-French villain had been posing as Dr. Marat (I almost said Dr. Jekyll) well enough to fool Chevremont, Bougeart, Bax, Roberts, Stephens, Vellay, Cabanes, De Witt, Brunet, Bowen-Graves, and several others who have made more or less careful studies of his career in England. Imagine what a future Mr. Phipson, a hundred and thirty-five years hence, will be able to say of Trotzky's career in the United States by using the same kind of evidence.

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK

Pictorial Biography

Lives and Times: Four Informal American Biographies. By Meade Minnigerode. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

Casanova in England. By Horace Bleackley. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

AMERICAN social and political history is so filled with absurd phenomena that it should provide an inexhaustible mine of biographical data for the painstaking historian. But such historians should show more depth and a profounder intuition than Mr. Meade Minnigerode reveals in his four essays. In spite of research that appears to have mastered the social and political scene which formed the stage whereon his four frustrated individuals walked, the author has failed to do more than give a rather clever series of pictorializations. This is regrettable, for there was opportunity here for infinite analysis. The wine merchant Stephen Jumel, transformed into a spiritual bankrupt and dispossessed of his wealth by the bedizened adventuress Betsy Bowen, who ended her problematical career as Madame Burr; "General" William Eaton, leader of an opera bouffe campaign against Derne on the Barbary Coast and one who finished life as a dishonest sot offering false testimony against Aaron Burr; Theodosia Burr, a child-prodigy who became mistress of her father's house at twelve and entertained celebrities from Talleyrand to Thayendanegea; and Edmond Charles Genêt, first minister to the United States from the Girondist group in revolutionary France—all these personages are microcosms through whom a startling era makes itself evident. With the expertness of a distinguished journalist Mr. Minnigerode causes these tragic puppets, so bullied and overpowered by a fluctuating time, to pass in colored show before his readers; but they pass at a slight distance as actors in a spectacle-drama, and their internal passions are no more than hinted at.

Even so, it is perceptible that these people were crushed idealists in a sense and that their inward agonies were fierce and long-drawn-out. The story of Jumel, successful as a merchant and climbing steadily higher on the social ladder of the New York of his day, only to be tortured and eventually removed from all his proud estate by an unfortunate misalliance, is not new. Neither are the miniature odysseys of William Eaton and Edmond Charles Genêt, the first disillusioned and left in the lurch by a feeble and timid government and the other stripped of his honors because of his own over-zealousness. So, too, is the story of Theodosia Burr ancient in its implications. If Mr. Minnigerode had pursued his subjects with greater insight he might have fashioned an extremely important addition to the history both of society and of the individual. As journalism, and as journalism only, "Lives and Times" is adequate.

The charge of lack of insight must also be leveled against that amazing rapscallion, Giacomo Casanova. Mr. Bleackley has removed that portion of the "Mémoires" in which Casanova describes his nine months in England (it comes pretty near the end of the twelve-volume edition), carefully annotated it, and offered it in a finely bound volume. As readers of Casanova will know immediately, the story includes the episode with the charming and notorious La Charpillon, who fooled the adventurer to the top of his bent, bled him constantly for money and extravagant presents, and never bestowed a single favor upon him. It was a case of fate setting one rascal to catch another one. Here Casanova is to be found at his best as a narrator. And in the checking up it is surprising to observe how strong a foundation of actuality there is beneath the "Mémoires." Especially is this so in the English portion.

He was never psychological in his deductions, and the host of personages (the greater number fair—according to Casanova—and frail women) who appear in the "Mémoires" are viewed as a picture is viewed—from the outer surface. If he does set down a pertinent and revelatory truth, be sure it is by accident.

Mr. Bleackley has done his work thoroughly, and his identification of the various English persons, noble and otherwise, seems to be quite accurate. He is wrong in one particular, however. He states in a footnote that the Casanova manuscripts and letters, once the property of Count Waldstein at his Castle of Dux, disappeared about the time of the creation of the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia. These papers were merely removed to a museum (in Prague, I believe) and are now available to scholars there.

HERBERT S. GORMAN

Shakespeare and Marlowe

Studies in the First Folio Written for the Shakespeare Association. Oxford University Press. $6.

The Death of Christopher Marlowe. By J. Leslie Hotson. Harvard University Press. $3.

THE harvest of lectures delivered in celebration of the First Folio Tercentenary two years ago has been gathered within the covers of the handsome volume which Sir Israel Gollancz introduces to the world. Sir Israel's introduction—a general survey of the problems suggested by the Folio—is here reprinted from the brochure published by the Worshipful Company of Stationers in honor of the Tercentenary. The article which follows, on Shakespeare's Portraiture, by M. H. Spielmann, is likewise not new, having been printed separately about a year ago. In this lavishly illustrated demonstration Mr. Spielmann (who, as the author of the article on Shakespearean iconography in the Encyclopaedia Britannica and of a somewhat similar essay in the "Book of Homage to Shakespeare," 1916, speaks with authority) re-traverses in greater detail part of the ground already covered by former discussions. His general arguments in favor of the Stratford bust and the Droeshout portrait are familiar. He limits the supposed eighteenth-century restoration of the monument to minor details; and advances arguments in support of the contention that the "Flower portrait," which has often been called "the Droeshout Original," is in reality based upon the engraving on the title-page of the Folio. To Mr. Spielmann's contentions no valid arguments have ever so far been opposed; and this matter of the authenticity of two likenesses and the spuriousness of all others may now be considered as firmly settled as such a question is ever likely to be.

With Mr. Dover Wilson's essay on The Task of Heminge and Condell we come to new matter and are plunged into the "new" bibliographical Shakespearean scholarship. Mr. Wilson raises the four questions which every editor of Shakespeare must try to solve. "What sort of 'copy' was placed at the printers' disposal in 1623? Where did it come from? What is the relation of quarto to folio texts in plays that have survived in both forms? How close does any text, quarto or folio, bring us to Shakespeare's original manuscripts?" He bases his answers upon the "belief in the essential integrity of ordinary human nature which . . . regards a man innocent until he has been proved guilty." That is, like Mr. Pollard before him, he refuses to believe that Heminge and Condell were either knaves hoodwinking the public or fools unable to write an intelligible preface. Shakespeare's old friends and fellows limited their responsibilities to the gathering of the best texts at their command. Where the manuscript acting versions owned by the Globe Theater were available, these were used. For some plays a "good" quarto, based upon the stage-version, was employed. Occasionally an "assembled" text, pieced together from the players' parts with the aid of the theatrical "plot," had to be resorted to. Answering his fourth question, Mr. Wilson, while allowing for certain contingencies, vindicates in essentials the authority of the Folio as on the whole the most reliable text, that is, the nearest to Shakespeare's own manuscripts.

That tireless statistician Sir Sidney Lee contributes A Survey of First Folios in which in summary fashion he brings down to date the census of Folios which he published in 1902. Since that list was compiled many copies have changed hands and in particular a great many have come to this country. One learns with amazement not unmingled with something like indignation that at least thirty-five copies of this most famous of books are in the possession of Mr. H. C. Folger. Mr. W. W. Greg breaks new ground in The First Folio and Its Publishers, in which he attempts to formulate the general practice of the early seventeenth century with regard to publication and in particular to determine the significance of the various forms of imprint. With his suggestive views he reconstructs the preliminary steps which led to the publication of the Folio.

Dr. Hotson's Marlowe discoveries are worthy of the beautiful format in which the Nonesuch Press has, in collaboration with Harvard, published them. As Professor Kittredge remarks in his preface, "seldom is it the good fortune of any scholar . . . to make so remarkable a find" as that which Dr. Hotson now sets on record; while the acumen and diligence with which he followed up his first clue put his discoveries beyond the range of mere happy accidents. To retell his story here would be an offense similar to the divulgence of the conclusion of a detective yarn. Sufficient to say that on the basis of documents of whose authenticity there can be no question he has settled once for all the mysterious and much-debated question of the circumstances of Marlowe's death. He has identified the slayer; discovered the report of the inquest; discovered the Queen's pardon granted the slayer; and indicated with much fulness of detail the relationship which existed between him and his victim. The documents and deductions are alike set forth with admirable clarity and grace. Several excellent facsimiles are provided by way of illustration.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

Books in Brief

My Name Is Legion. By Charles Morgan. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A story that stretches eager fingers toward the thin veils of mysticism, but grasps too often the crude vestments of a thriller instead. Irma Pennell possesses strange spiritual and clairvoyant powers. She moves, a feminine messiah, among the fleshly and godless group of her brother's friends. Murder and madness follow her disturbing sanctity until finally she frees herself from the obsessions of her inner life and achieves happiness in the emotions of a normal woman.

Points of Honor. By Thomas Boyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

One of the baffling questions left by such war chronicles as "Points of Honor" is whether these soldier-authors might not go into battle again if a second holocaust arose during their lives. Despite the passion and agony that tears through each of the tales in this book, they are told in a voice bereft of emotion or expression—facts, simple unadorned episodes of the war. But they smite with utter conviction.

Mr. Godly Beside Himself. By Gerald Bullett. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

After twenty years of monotonous contentment the reputable Mr. Godly suddenly can bear it no longer. One morning he leaves his fat good breakfast and his thin good wife to go adventuring in quest of beauty and romance. These desirable qualities he finds in his stenographer; but she proves to be a fairy, and for two days leads him an iridescent chase through a preposterous country of satire and poetry and mirth. Mr. Godly's middle-aged eyes glimpse enchantment, and the reader glimpses it too.

Mrs. Harter. By E. M. Delafield. Harper and Brothers. $2.

The author of "The Heel of Achilles" can always be counted upon for artistic competence in fiction, and her newest novel maintains that standard of excellence. She sets down a story with economy and grace; "Mrs. Harter" is technically satisfying and continuously interesting in the bargain. The central figure is built up by indirection—"conjectures more than anything"—but the materials are handled in a way which brings out every detail. The novelist works with a soft-focus lens, but the likeness is distinct and unmistakable.

Contributors to This Issue

H. G. ANDREWS is on the staff of the Institute of American Business in New York.

ALBIN E. JOHNSON is a journalist living in Geneva.

GILBERT SELDES, author of "The Seven Lively Arts," contributes a monthly article on motion pictures to The Nation.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY is head of the Slavonic department of the New York Public Library.

SAMUEL C. CHEW is professor of English at Bryn Mawr.

HERBERT S. GORMAN is the author of a recent novel "Gold by Gold."

LOUIS R. GOTTSCHALK is associate professor of history at the University of Louisville.

THEATER

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

International Relations Section

Modern Slavery in Africa

SLAVERY in its cruder form is disappearing; there are in the world today only about 1,000,000 persons in whom somebody claims a salable property right. Modern slavery takes the form of compulsory labor or, as in South Africa, the natives are simply excluded from the skilled trades. A group of Americans interested in such conditions in Africa requested Edward A. Ross, professor of sociology in the University of Wisconsin, and R. Melville Cramer, a New York physician, to investigate the labor conditions of the natives in Portuguese Africa. To make inquiries among the Portuguese officials would have been fruitless, for the law under which labor is requisitioned by the government in these colonies is well known and any inquiries addressed to the officials would have elicited the response that they are proceeding in accordance with the law. Therefore Professor Ross and his colleague visited many villages and took down the actual experiences of a large number of natives. The data were collected between July 19 and September 3, 1924. The following excerpts are drawn from the notebooks of Professor Ross:

In practice forced labor works out as follows. A laborer works for the coffee planter and at the close of his term of service the planter says: "I can't pay you anything for I have deposited the stipulated wage for you with the government; go to such and such an office and you will get your pay." The worker applies there and is told to come around in a couple of months. If he has the temerity to do so, he is threatened with the calaboose and that ends it. It is all a system of barefaced labor stealing. They think that the planter has really paid for their labor, but that the official does them out of it. It is frequently observed that the official comes suddenly into prosperity and this is suspected to be the source of it.

If a private employer wants to retain a worker, he advances the man's tax and the man is unmolested. If, on the other hand, one has worked for a private employer for months, but for any reason leaves that employment, he is liable to be recruited by the government. Past employment affords him no protection. The villagers insist that times are worse for them than they used to be under the king. More unrequited toil is exacted now than a few years ago.

From natives passing our place of entertainment we learn that at K——, forty miles away, the government recruits many natives, and puts them at the disposal of the planters. They work six months for food and 60 escudos ($1.50). Forty escudos are kept back to pay their taxes, so that for their six months' work they net only 20 escudos (half a dollar).

Four years ago a large number who were tax delinquents were sent to San Thomé and have never returned. Since then the forced labor of these people amounts to six months a year. Their wives have to work on the roads, but are not recruited for the plantations. The men are carried off as far as one hundred miles to work on the road, for which they get their food and their tax receipts. When they work on the road near their home they have to furnish their own food. On the plantations some die from being made to work after having been weakened by flogging.

I talked with a man whose two neighbors were taken to work a year on a plantation a few miles out from Malange. They received nothing, not even a tax receipt. Their taxes being unpaid they cannot get a pass. Not having a pass, they cannot venture outside of this district without running the risk of being jailed. . . .

Village No. 4

Fifty villagers are gathered—Ambaquistas. They say that in the time of the monarchy (before 1910), although they were slaves, they were better off and got more for their work. Their lot is getting harder. Things got abruptly worse for them in 1917-1918. The government makes them work, but gives them nothing. They return to find their fields neglected, no crops growing. They would rather be slaves than what they are now. As slaves they have value and are not underfed, but now nobody cares whether they live or die. This government serfdom is more heartless than the old domestic slavery, which was cruel only when the master was of cruel character. Now they are in the iron grasp of a system which makes no allowance for the circumstances of the individual, and ignores the fate of the families of the labor recruits.

When a white man applies to the administrador for workers a soldier is sent with him to the village, who calls out the chief and notifies him that so many men must be forthcoming from that village. When men are taken for distant plantations they are provided with a thin jersey, a pano, and in the cool season a blanket. Two months ago thirty from this area were taken to an unknown destination.

In 1922 twenty from this area were requisitioned to work as carriers between L—— and P——. Their taxes had already been paid. For six months' service they got the equivalent of $1.80. They think that the government gets twelve dollars for every man who works for the planters six months. Somebody keeps most of it so that the laborer gets no pay.

The law contemplates that the laborer shall enter into labor contracts with a free will. These Ambaquistas say that they put their thumb prints on some papers, but do not know what these papers contain and would be flogged should they dare refuse to sign them. The government keeps all these contracts. They are para Ingleza ver, i.e., "for the English to see."

Village No. 8

Interviewing an intelligent man from it, we learn that it has about two hundred inhabitants, of whom sixty pay poll taxes. The village is obliged to maintain six on road work the year around. The elders decide who shall go. Eight have to be kept on the plantations, where they get 50 escudos ($1.25) for three months' work. No pano or blanket is supplied. Their food is a quart of meal a day, which they must cook themselves. This being insufficient, they have to obtain food from home. They work from dark to dark with two short intervals for resting and eating. The work is very hard and the stick is freely used if one straightens up or takes a moment's ease. The overseer is a white man. After working three months some leave without asking for the 50 escudos due them, because those who do are [illegible] work another three months' period. However, this seems sheer imposition, for when they have taken their time cards to the post and asked whether they have to work a second three months the official has said "No." But only those have gone to the post who took no pay. A man may have to put in four [illegible] The planter seizes all manner of pretexts for not "writing" a day that has been worked. He will write on four days a week when six days have been put in, saying "I can't write every day you work, for then your period of service would come too quickly to an end."

All government work yields no pay and carries no rations unless the laborers are sent far from their homes. If the official gives them a shilling or two a month each it is understood as a tip rather than a wage.

An elderly carpenter and early mission convert remembers well when some of the planters had hundreds of slaves. I ask: "Are conditions for your people better than they used to be or worse?" He replies: "Twelve years ago when there was slavery the slaves had all the hardships, while the free Negroes were not badly off. Now we are all slaves. The slaves were better fed than we forced laborers are, for we are not property." There is little effort on the part of the authorities to spread their exactions evenly among the native males. The skilled are retained at unpaid labor much longer than the unskilled. Hence boys shrink from learning carpentry and masonry for fear of being kept longer at unpaid labor. Migration affords no relief to the blacks, for the headman of a village will be jailed when any of its inscribed taxpayers are not produced. The chief will say: "Where is Josia?" "He's moved away." "Well, you find him or someone to take his place. He is on my books and he had no permission to leave." So the headman is jailed until Josia appears. The natives are held in a net of strong mesh.

Conclusions

Inasmuch as we shall be expected to communicate the impressions made upon us in the course of our ten weeks of investigation, we offer the following, which applies particularly to Angola:

1. The labor system—virtually state serfdom—which has grown up in the Portuguese colonies in recent years often claims so much of the natives' time and strength that they are no longer able to give adequate attention to the production of food in their own gardens and fields.

2. There is little evidence that any considerable part of the wages turned over in trust to the officials by the employers of natives hired from the government actually reaches the hands of those to whom it belongs. It appears that the typical thing is for the earnings of these commandeered laborers to be embezzled.

3. The amount of unpaid labor exacted of skilled natives is not infrequently so excessive that the young men see nothing to be gained by their acquiring skill in the missionary schools.

4. Motor roads have been extended far beyond the needs of the colony and the construction of such roads by conscripted, unpaid, unrationed natives—for the most part women—with only the most primitive implements, imposes in some cases an almost crushing burden.

5. There appears to be widespread labor stealing, i.e., the planter arbitrarily refuses to give credit or pay for certain days or half-days of labor which have been rendered him. We heard of no effort made by any official to curb this despicable practice.

6. The official does not appear to be in a strong position with respect to his fellow-nationals, the traders, and the planters, and hence rarely ventures to stand up for the rights of the natives as against the claims of a white man. The blacks feel that the Portuguese are leagued against them and that there is no recourse against the white man's violence and injustice.

7. The native policemen (cipaes), utilized among stranger or enemy tribes, grossly abuse their authority for purposes of lust, spite, or extortion. There is no regular channel provided by which the complaints of the natives thus wronged may be brought to the attention of the officials.

8. The government provides practically nothing in the way of schools, medical care, emergency relief, or justice against the white trader for the people of the villages as recompense for the heavy burden of unrequited toil it lays upon them.

9. The treatment of the natives in Portuguese territory compares so unfavorably with that experienced by the natives in Rhodesia or in Belgian Congo that there is a strong tendency to emigrate across the frontier.

10. In Portuguese East Africa the amount and manner of collection of the hut tax impose severe hardships upon the natives.

Slavery in English Kenya

IN Portuguese Africa records which prove that the natives enter into labor contracts with a free will are kept "for the English to see." Recently Englishmen have been looking into their own records in Kenya. The report of the Parliamentary Commission sent out to East Africa by MacDonald's Government has aroused a great deal of discussion. The following editorial is reprinted from the Manchester Guardian of May 11:

In Kenya, in striking contrast to what has happened in our West African possessions, there has gradually grown up a system, half political half economic, under which the interests of the two and a half million Africans are sacrificed to those of a few thousand European settlers. The root of the evil is the "plantation" system. Large areas of the land have been alienated by the government to white men, the natives in many cases being expropriated. The settlers, having obtained the land, cannot make use of their farms unless somehow or other they can get the natives to work on them for wages. But, for the most part, those native tribes which have been segregated in "reserves" refuse to come out and work on the white man's farm for low wages, unless some form or other of compulsion is applied to them. Under pressure from the settlers the government of Kenya has applied that compulsion by cutting down reserves or harrying tribes from their land, by taxing them until they have to come out and earn wages, by registration and labor ordinances, and by those most subtle and pernicious forms of compulsion which are always open to administrators among backward peoples.

The question which the commissioners had to face was whether this system should be definitely repudiated, not only in word but in fact, or whether it should be condoned and allowed to develop to its only logical conclusion—a semi-servile, landless, discontented population of uneducated Africans bound to work for low wages for a handful of white masters. . . . The only place in the report where facts are really faced is in the supplementary memorandum—in effect a minority report—by Mr. Linfield. This is particularly the case in an admirable paragraph in which Mr. Linfield puts forward the arguments (unaccountably overlooked by his fellow-members) in favor of the alternative to the plantation system. That alternative is that the Africans should be encouraged and helped by the government, which professes to be their trustee, to produce economic crops, for their own food and for export, upon their own land. But as soon as this alternative is proposed you reach the crux of the Kenya problem. The government cannot do this without striking a blow at the plantation system. The labor supply is insufficient, as it is, to meet the settlers' demands, and the more prosperous you make the native in his "reserve" the more impossible would it become to force him out of it to work for wages.

Thus a government which favors the plantation system, instead of, as in West Africa, developing native agriculture, persistently discourages it. For instance, the Giriama tribe, which successfully cultivated grain for export, was so unmercifully harried—the story is told in Dr. Leys's book—that the export of grain has ceased and the place where it was grown is now practically empty of inhabitants. The Masai tribe, which is pastoral and, like the Giriama, has stubbornly refused to see the blessings of wage-earning, has been harried in the same way. For, as Mr. Linfield says, "native tribes which are self-sufficing through cattle-owning are anathema to the contact theory of development." The Kitui Akamba have paid £207,749 in direct taxes alone in ten years, and the only government enterprise in the Kitui reserve has been the putting up of buildings for the tax-collecting staff.

Shortly after the report mentioned above was made public it developed during a debate in the House of Commons that the Government itself had conscripted native labor, in Kenya. The following debate is reprinted from the Manchester Guardian of May 19:

Mr. Snell (Labor—Woolwich) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state whether he has recently sanctioned, or proposes to sanction, under the Kenya Native Authority (Amendment) Ordinance, 1922, or otherwise, the conscription of 4,000 native laborers for work on the Thika-Nyeri railways; and whether such labor is recruited only or mainly in the reserves, thus penalizing laborers in the reserves as compared with laborers for white settlers.

Mr. Amery (Secretary to the Colonies) replied that, in view of the urgency of completing the railway through to Uganda as soon as possible, approval had been given for a compulsory recruitment of labor for railway construction generally up to a maximum of 4,000 at any one time, but there is no present indication that the full power will be used. This labor is recruited in the reserves. It would not be possible to recruit men who are under contract to perform other work for government or other employers.

Captain Eden (Conservative—Warwick) asked how many native laborers were engaged on railway construction.

Mr. Amery replied that the totals were 1,620 compelled and 11,099 voluntary. Work on the Kenya section of the main extension into Uganda has been held up by the non-completion of another section. No figures of laborers employed on the extension were available, but it was known that none were compelled men.

Commander Kenworthy (Labor—Hull). Have I not heard the right hon. gentleman on public platforms denounce the conscription of labor in Russia?

Mr. Amery. I am not aware I have had the privilege of having the hon. member in my audiences. (Laughter.)

Mr. Smith (Labor—Bermondsey). Are you not doing in our colonies what you are afraid to do in England—namely, conscripting labor?

The question was not answered.

In reply to further questions the following statement was made in the House of Commons by the Under Secretary for the Colonies. It is reprinted from the Guardian of May 26.

Mr. Ormsby Gore (Under Secretary for the Colonies) said that the power of calling up labor for government purposes is conferred on native headmen under the Native Authority Ordinance, 1912, as amended in 1922, in accordance with the decision of the then Secretary of State contained in the dispatch published in 1921 as Cmd. 1509. In the selection of laborers efforts are made to choose those able-bodied males who have neither undertaken work for wages outside the reserves nor have shown willingness to produce economic products for export from the land in the reserves.

The period of enlistment is limited by the ordinance to 60 days in any one year, and it appears that for the Uasin-Gishu line the bulk of the labor will only be required for two months in order to hasten the completion of this all-important connection.

The rate of pay for compulsory labor was originally fixed at 14s. a month, with the special railway scale of rations in addition, this rate being 2s. a month less than the current rate for experienced voluntary labor. Since then the labor market has become somewhat easier and the rate for voluntary unskilled labor has fluctuated betwen 16s. and 12s. a month, plus rations. In the ordinance the penalty for disobeying any lawful order given by a headman is on conviction a fine of 150s., or in default of payment two months' imprisonment.

THE WOMANS PRESS
600 Lexington Avenue New York, N. Y.

Good Books to Own

CEREMONIALS OF COMMON DAYS 1.50
By Abbie Graham
It belongs, if not on the same shelf, at any rate, in the same bookcase with Trivia. Its paragraphs have the delicate mental flavor of fine verse.—Christopher Morley.

THE ASCENDING LIFE .75
By Richard Roberts
The secret of Dr. Roberts's translucent style is that he has something new to say and passionately desires to communicate it.—The Survey.

THE STAR-PROMISE 1.50
By Margaret Burton
Brief essays that breathe "assurance that human life shall not long be halted or ever concluded in the desert of despair, but must move to the completion of all that is fragmentary, the revelation of all that is hid."

Vacation Books Sent Post Free
Let us send them after you in one installment or serially throughout the summer. Our service reaches you wherever you may go. Write for our Summer Book Notes.
THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE
25 West 42nd Street, New York

German Books a Specialty
W. BEYER, Inc. Books and Art
Now at 259 5th Avenue
Bet. 28th and 29th Streets New York

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN
By WILHELM BOELSCHE. A brief, simple and clear statement of the case for evolution, including much evidence discovered since Darwin's death. Can be read in two hours. Cloth, illustrated, 60 cents postpaid.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

MT. AIRY (near Croton-on-Hudson) is a community for artists and radicals within commuting distance of New York. It is high, dry and heavily wooded with many beautiful views of the Hudson and easy access to a service of 100 trains daily. Adjoining the village of Croton with shops and stores, it will have a social and communal life all its own. 1-4 acre of land $450 to $600. Cash or terms. (30% sold). Address Harry Kelly, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Chelsea 0432.

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 Per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

accept nothing but
Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
3 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c
Midol
for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The telephone door

More people enter our homes and offices by telephone than in person. Through the telephone door, traveling by wire, comes a stream of people from the outside world on social and business missions. Important agreements or appointments are made, yet the callers remain but a few seconds or minutes and with a "good-bye" are gone. We go out through our telephone doors constantly to ask or give information, buy or sell things, make personal calls and on dozens of other errands.

None of the relations of life is more dependent upon co-operation and mutual consideration than these daily millions of telephone journeys. It is the telephone company's part to furnish the means of calling and to place courteous and intelligent employees at the service of the public. Good service is then assured when there is a full measure of co-operation between users.

Only by mutual care and consideration can everyone enjoy the full pleasures and benefits of calling. Telephone courtesy is for the good of all who use the telephone door.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

MISCELLANEOUS

FOLDER PROPOSING COLONIZATION among undeveloped natural resources in British Columbia, along lines of Industrial Democracy, sent free by The Cooperative Club, P. O. Box 1248, San Francisco, Calif.

"A corner of old Russia in New York"—
THE RUSSIAN INN
48 West 37th St., 'phone Fitzroy 6567
LUNCHEON TEA DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

ANTIOCH ACADEMY, Yellow Springs, Ohio

Two or three children of 12-14 wanted to be received in home of experienced teacher. References exchanged. Address William H. Bridge, Hunter College, New York City.

Wanted—Back issues for [illegible] October, [illegible] for the years 1917-21. State [illegible] and price. Room 901, 30 East 40th Ave., New York.

SUMMER PLACES

YOU'LL GET THE UTMOST FROM YOUR VACATION AT CAMP MILAN
at RHINEBECK, N. Y.

The vacation spot of happiness for adults, in the beautiful Berkshires. Swimming, tennis, boating, horseback riding, excellent food, fine quarters, courteous management. Weekly rates, $32.50. Week-ends, $6.00 per day.

Send for Illustrated Booklet.

CAMP MILAN, Rhinebeck, N. Y
Telephone Clinton Corners 21-F-12.

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

An Adult Camp in the
ADIRONDACK PARADISE
5 miles from Lake George.
Equipped with every known facility for comfort and sports.
Reservations limited to 100.
Rates $27.50 per week
Modern sanitation in each log cabin.
Round Trip New York-Lake George, $12.28

For booklet address camp or phone Longacre 4752.

LENA BARISH REBECCA B. NUDELL

CAMP GREATER UTOPIA
Lackawaxen, Pa.

A VACATION GROUND for GROWN-UPS
In the picturesque Blue Mountains. Facilities for every sport. Rates per wk., $32.50 up to July 24th—$35 thereafter. Rates per day, $6 up to July 24th—$6 thereafter. For further information address Camp Greater Utopia, Lackawaxen, Pa.

WM. J. FERLMAN, N. Y. Office: 32 E. 57th St. Dr. WILL DURANT
Managing Director Tel. [illegible] Associate Director

[illegible] feet higher than Lake George. Tel. 60 F 21
TROUT LAKE CAMP and HOTEL FOR ADULTS
in the Adirondacks between Lake George and Bolton Landing, N. Y.
Our place is 50 feet from the lake with all modern improvements and sport.
Jewish cooking. Rates $25 per week
Mrs. F. Weingarten, Manager. For reservations write to Trout Lake Camp, Diamond Point, N. Y., or Miss S. Fogel, care Drama Book Shop, 29 West 47th Street, N. Y. C.

THE LLOYD, BELLPORT, L. I.
On Great South Bay. Open May 28.
Cool, Comfortable, Charming.
Regular guests and week-end parties.

POSITIONS WANTED

MIDDLE aged college man desirous of engaging in [illegible] literary work, would like position offering a modest salary with part time available for writing. Best of references as to character and reliability. Box 329, care The Nation.

BUSINESS ASSISTANT of proven ability, speaking English, French, German, some Spanish and Italian, offers his services to Importer or Exporter. Box 334, The Nation.

YOUNG writer, resident of N. Y. City, wishes part-time work of intellectual nature to enable him to continue his literary activities. Modest remuneration will suffice. Box 335, care of The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 19, 1925 No. 3137

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 199

EDITORIALS:
A Woman-Made World 201
Slush ..... [illegible]
Our Prejudices ..... [illegible]

RELIGION BECOMES NEWS. By Charles W. Wood ..... [illegible]

THOU SHALT NOT WHISTLE IN GUAM. By Arthur Warner ..... [illegible]

WRITING FOR MONEY. By R. V. Harden ..... [illegible]

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 209

CORRESPONDENCE ..... [illegible]

BOOKS:
Portrait in the Horizontal. By Ruth Fitch Bartlett ..... [illegible]
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren ..... [illegible]
An American Poet. By Edward Sapir 211
The War-Guilt Again. By Frederick Bateman ..... [illegible]
The Reconstruction Negro. By William MacDonald ..... [illegible]
Wandering Thoughts. By Edgar Wind 213
Books in Brief ..... [illegible]

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Mexico's New Oil Law ..... [illegible]
When We Acquired Guam 216

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE KU KLUX KLAN is not dead yet; it can marshal 30,000 Klansmen willing to don a sheet and peaked nightcap and march through the streets of Washington on a sweltering August Saturday. But when the Klan announces its parades in time to sell concessions in advance to the hot-dog vendors, when it charters trains and has itself photographed flaunting the star-spangled banner on the Capitol steps, it ceases to be either a fascinating mystery or a threat to society. It has settled down to be just one more in the long list of shriners, templars, tall cedars, veiled prophets, red eagles, white rats, western bees, blue geese, and other dress-up orders which serve in their solemn way to let loose the repressed play instincts of grown-up men who have forgotten how to play naturally. Gone is the sudden drama of the flaming cross at midnight; gone the passion to regulate other people's lives and habits in picturesque disregard of the law. The Klan is no longer even 100 per cent white, Protestant, and Nordic. Its chiefs confer with "good" Negroes like Marcus Garvey; it denies class, race, or religious prejudice; it buys its klaverns from Loebs and Woolfs and sells to Fabians and Klotzmans. It still thrives and takes in membership fees; but for that matter the National Anti-Horse Thief Association, founded in 1854, still boasts 36,000 members. The Klan has become safe—and uninteresting.

FOR THE FIRST TIME SINCE 1914 Germans are finding it an advantage to be German. Not in Europe, of course, but in far-away China, where the Germans, unlike Britons and Frenchmen and Americans, no longer have special extraterritorial privileges. Like the Chinese and the Russians they are subject to Chinese law. In the Japan Chronicle (Kobe) of July 9 we read:

> Germans in Canton are going around with armbands bearing the character for "German" lest they be mistaken for an unrighteous Briton or Frenchman! A few years ago the Allies were "sicking" the Chinese on the Germans and they gave China every encouragement to deprive them of extraterritorial privileges, concessions, and all the rest of the imperialist paraphernalia. And it seems that after all they have done the Germans a kindness.

Time indeed has its revenges!

THERE ARE ALWAYS ACID TESTS. Clarté, the organ of the French revolutionary intellectuals led by Henri Barbusse, has been using Morocco as a sort of litmus paper to try out French writers. Romain Rolland, of course, joined the protest against the Moroccan War, although warning the Communists that the rise of Asia would one day crush their bolshevism as well as the older imperialism. Charles Vildrac, Georges Duhamel, old Mme Séverine also stood opposed. So did Pierre Hamp and Victor Margueritte, who were not yet among the revoltés in the late war. René Maran, author of "Batouala," thought it an abominable war but "since it has been begun it should be carried on to victory." Victor Basch, Theodore Ruyssen, and Charles Gide were among the pre-war pacifists who found excuses to pack away their pacifism in 1925 as in 1914. Jean de Pierrefeu, Roland Dorgelès, Marc Sangnier, and Henri Guernut signed receipts for Clarté's letter but did not answer it. And after Henri Barbusse's Appeal to Brain Workers had been printed, demanding peace in Morocco, the great army of learning in France signed a counter-blast. A majority of the members of the Academy, of the Academy of Sciences, and of the Academy of Medicine, a host of university professors, artists, writers, and actors gave their names to an Address to the French Troops in Morocco, denying the charge of imperialistic aggression, denouncing Abd-el-Krim as a brigand, and insisting that France had brought peace to Africa. The ninety-three German savants who in 1914 blindly signed their names to the famous whitewash document have their counterpart across the Rhine today. And, for that matter, how many have there been in America to protest against the rape of Haiti?

FRANCE'S TROUBLES MULTIPLY. Marshal Pétain boldly proclaims success in Morocco, but what he calls "success" consists in stemming the Riffian advance, not in throwing back the tribesmen. Meanwhile, across the Mediterranean in Syria, the Druses, another Moslem tribe famous for religious fanaticism and bellicose fervor, have taken the warpath against the French army of occupation, wiping out one detachment of 200 men and capturing the entire convoy of a larger punitive expedition. "French airplanes are dropping tons of explosives upon Druse villages," we read in the New York Times, "killing eighteen men and numerous women, and children." Is that what they call l'œuvre civilisatrice de la France, what the English empire-builders mean by the "white man's burden"? The French are in Syria as conquerors, hated by the Syrians. They are there as a result of secret treaties made during the war, and all the late Allies must share responsibility for their being there. Since "prestige" is at stake, they will not get out—yet; but every day they stay, every Druse or Moroccan they kill, means more ultimate disaster to the West, just as the short-sighted, selfish shilly-shallying of the powers in China is preparing another ghastly harvest. "I accuse the governments of France and England," writes Romain Rolland, "of loosing upon Europe —by stupid politics, by brutal, selfish imperialism, by continual provocations—an immense insurrection of the peoples of Asia and Africa." And he is right.

"REORGANIZATION" is a magic word in Wall Street. It is not enough that a financial firm make handsome commissions on floating new companies. It is not sufficient to foist on a corporation high-salaried officials and high-priced loans. It is also necessary to hover over the corpse of any company that gets into difficulties and take out a big fat bite for "reorganizing" it. Within recent years "reorganization" has been one of our most profitable lines of business, and numerous stockholders, already heavy losers, have been further milked by the specious arguments and sharp practices of the system. We are glad therefore to see the curtain raised on this abuse by J. B. Eastman of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, better known as the "Katy," was recently reorganized by two New York City banking houses. For doing the job they asked $1,614,249.79 for themselves and $750,000 for their lawyers, a total of $2,364,249.79. The Interstate Commerce Commission thought this was too much and cut the bill to $900,000 for the bankers and $600,000 for the lawyers. But Commissioners Eastman, McManamy, and Campbell regarded this sum also as excessive, and the former wrote a vigorous dissenting opinion, part of which is printed in Labor, the organ of the railroad brotherhoods, but which for some reason other newspapers have not featured.

WHEN A MODERN CORPORATION gets into financial difficulties, observes Mr. Eastman, some firm or group of bankers emerges as "reorganization managers" or "protective committees." "At the outset they are largely self-appointed and throughout their existence they are largely self-guided." In the case of the "Katy" the reorganizing bankers formulated a plan for raising $18,420,800 by assessment upon the stockholders. Against this they not only turned in a bill amounting to an eighth of the total but previous to this they had already collected $107,000 for traveling expenses, $153,675 with which to pay a firm of engineers, and $149,000 in commissions as members of the underwriting syndicate. In regard to legal fees Mr. Eastman remarks:

> It was testified in this case that the services of one of the lawyers were worth $500 per day. Men receiving such compensation usually entertain a righteous conviction that it corresponds with intrinsic worth, although, at the same time, they may be incensed that painters or carpenters should assume to demand and be able to exact $15 per day for their services.

In spite of the high price paid, Mr. Eastman does not feel sure that the railroad has benefited greatly through its new birth. Commissioner McManamy is also sharply critical of the new scheme, especially of the issuance of a million shares of no-par-value common stock and of the fact that the voting power resides in this and in 300,000 shares of preferred. He points out that in this way the owners of 650,001 shares of no-par-value common stock have control of the $270,000,000 worth of railroad property.

"LABOR UNIONISM ON THE RAILROAD has passed through three stages. First it was bitterly fought by management. Then it was tolerated. Gradually it is coming to be welcomed by management as a necessary, helpful, and constructive factor in industry." This optimistic declaration was made by Bert N. Jewell, head of the Railway Employees Department of the American Federation of Labor, in opening the first Railroad Labor Institute in the United States, just held at Brookwood Labor College, at Katonah, New York. Presidents and vice-presidents of international brotherhoods and unions in the railroad industry, chairmen of system federations of shop-craft unions on such roads as the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Baltimore and Ohio, and Canadian National, and fifty rank-and-file members of these unions spent a week studying the history of railroad-building, the management and financing of railroads, plans for cooperation between union and management for efficient production, the technique of presenting labor's case, and the complicated factors fixing railroad wages. The institute was a concrete expression of the growing conviction on the part of some of the stronger labor unions that only by a more thorough education of their members and officers can the unions fulfil their role as a necessary and constructive factor in industry. If the miners' union officials had as long-range a vision of their function in the coal business John L. Lewis might not find himself today facing a strike which can only weaken his union. The anthracite bunkers are full, the non-union soft-coal mines are gaining territory every month; Europe is eager to dump surplus coal in America. But John Lewis still stands upon his old tactics.

AT CENSORSHIP every nation gets its innings. "Desire under the Elms" came so close to censorship in this country that the demand for seats increased and the managers profited. England's Lord Chamberlain has put his foot down on the play; and "Desire under the Elms" will not be allowed to corrupt British morals. Mr. Basil Dean, the English producer, may rage, but little more will be heard of it. On both sides of the Atlantic the passion to regulate other people's thoughts and morals is about the same; the difference lies in the method. The English have had a good laugh over our "monkey trial." They should laugh; they would wisely fight such an issue out on Hyde Park corner. But they have suppressed—except when it is given in Italian —Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author." Scotland Yard has also put its ban upon the publishers of "Ulysses." "Kappa" tells in the London Nation of Miss Edna Beasley, who has been haled to Bow Street police station:

Miss Beasley is an American writer, who was charged with neglecting to register under the Aliens Act. The police, however, were obviously not interested in this technical offense. They were interested in securing an order for deportation, on the ground that Miss Beasley had written an improper autobiography, the proofs of which, coming from France, had been stopped in the post. It was explained that her publishers were the firm responsible for Mr. James Joyce's "Ulysses," and that no communications from them are allowed to pass through the English post.

Censorship is an old, old story. Plato wished to delete parts of Homer before allowing the Athenian youth to read it—and certainly he was not the first.

GEORGE GRAY, who has just died at eighty-five, was one of the staunchest opponents of American imperialism in its infant days. In 1897 he voted in the Senate against the annexation of Hawaii, and as a member of the United States Peace Commission at Paris in 1898 he long stood out against his colleagues who insisted upon annexation of the Philippine archipelago. Judge Gray was a profound believer in the importance of arbitral procedure in settling industrial as well as international disputes. Roosevelt made him chairman of the commission which settled the bitter coal strike in 1902; and three presidents named him American member of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague. More than once he served as arbitrator in international disputes. He was a Democrat, but an independent always. In 1896 he refused to follow his party's indorsement of Bryan and free silver; several times his party barely failed to make him its standard-bearer. He would not have brought it Bryan's oratorical power, or Wilson's moral fervor, but he would have given it a solid respect for facts, a decency toward adversaries, and an essential seriousness which American politics need.

A Woman-Made World

ENGLAND has some two millions more women than men. Are they to be spinsters or concubines or casual lovers, or shall they be delicately shoved off the island in the direction of Australia and Canada? Or are they being led, embittered and hopeless, into the ranks of militant feminism? Is feminism the child of puritanism and thwarted sex desires, or of freedom, love, and self-expression? These questions and a host of others—the morals of the young, the effect of birth control, the employment of married women—are being discussed in England with a certain heat and violence. Feminism has been raised to the status of a national issue. People lecture and debate on woman's future; they organize societies to settle unmarried women in the colonies; and they write letters on the "surplus female population" to the London Times. Two recent discussions of feminism have appeared as a part of the Today and Tomorrow Series published by Dutton in this country but largely English in its authorship. One of these, "Lysistrata" by Anthony Ludovici, that lively generalizer, states the case against what he likes to conceive as feminism. Another, "Hypatia" by Dora Russell, who parenthetically (and rather inappropriately) is described on cover and fly-leaf as the Hon. Mrs. Bertrand Russell, states the case for feminism as she knows it.

Mr. Ludovici sees a modern world full of degenerate bodies and flabby minds, of "surplus" women and weak-willed men. He sees an active and admittedly intelligent feminist minority snatching this opportunity to establish a woman-made world, in which puritan virtues will dominate, and the body be despised. He sees a future in which women, the ruling sex, will have abolished natural conception and childbirth, and killed all men but a few poor specimens retained for purposes of breeding; artificial impregnation will be universal and babies will be incubated by chemical processes and fed artificially. The body and its functions will be looked upon with loathing, and love will be unknown or considered a criminal aberration. He sees, as the only alternative to some such sterile and ascetic world, a future in which men will forcibly recreate themselves as physical and mental successes, whom women will gladly admit as their superiors (though women will be similarly regenerated); all the former domestic functions will return from the factory to the home and women will return too—with concubinage to take care of the sorrowful "surplus." Civilization will reconstitute itself in the image of some previous golden age of physical delight and health to which Mr. Ludovici constantly alludes but which he never exactly locates.

In her companion volume Dora Russell also describes a sodden civilization about her, but she envisions a different future. The older feminists, she admits, developed in an atmosphere of hostility to men and to sex. Puritan virtues were accepted by all right-thinking people; the early feminists wanted merely to apply them to men as well as to women. The sex subordination of women at home and the bitter public persecution of women who "sinned" generated rebellion against the "double standard." The feminist seldom questioned the conventional virtues; rather she turned upon men and said "All right, take your virtues; live up to them and see how you like them."

But, says Mrs. Russell, one look about will make it clear that times have changed. Like the older feminists, young women today demand a single standard—but they have adopted a standard of equal experience. Dora Russell believes that feminism will bring about social changes to insure women's chance of health and freedom and intelligent child-bearing—primarily mothers' pensions and birth control; and she, too, urges the regeneration of men, but in the hope of making them adequate as lovers and friends of women.

Neither of these writers cares a rap for conventional religious and moral standards; both demand free play for impulse and bodily desire. Mrs. Russell's most damaging answer to her opponent is her own attitude. If this be feminism, as one of the "younger feminists" sees it, what becomes of Mr. Ludovici's fears? If woman's freedom means, now that a few legal preliminaries are out of the way, the freedom to love without shame, to set up new standards of bodily beauty and strength, to brush aside religious taboos and social restrictions—Mr. Ludovici is left in the lurch. He cannot be expected to join the ranks of these radical young women; and certainly he will not defend their ascetic forebears. He may find among conservatives some support for the "masculine renaissance" he preaches, but his glorification of physical desire and his scorn of all Christian teaching make him a dangerous ally. Mr. Ludovici is the original "old man of the tribe"—but his tribe seems to have got lost.

Slush

TO one familiar with American journalism during the present century the accounts of the death and burial of Mr. Bryan suggest the rise of a new tendency to emotionalize such events, to resort to "fine writing," to make an effort at pathos and "color" which was not permitted under the sounder traditions of reporting which prevailed up to two years ago. We say two years ago because this new technique made its signal and unblushing appearance with the death of President Harding in the summer of 1923. Many who observed and regretted the depths of sentimentalism to which our news dispatches descended at that time thought it was a unique outbreak (due to the fact that in a sense Mr. Harding was a martyr) and would not be repeated. It was repeated six months later upon the death of Mr. Wilson, but there again exceptional circumstances gave some excuse. But what is one to conclude upon seeing in connection with the death of Mr. Bryan the same abandonment of straight news reporting in favor of pulling wide open the vox humana stop and frankly attempting to play on the emotions?

We are not talking now of the tendency to praise editorially at death a man whom a newspaper has damned during his life. That is the old practice of "de mortuis nil nisi bonum." We are considering now not editorials at all but news accounts, which, according to the best traditions of American journalism, should be records of fact, unmixed with propaganda or effort to work upon the feelings of the reader. It would be hard to pick out any worse slush, for instance, than the following paragraph in an Associated Press dispatch sent from San Francisco on August 3, 1923:

> To his widow, Mrs. Harding, the city said au revoir with a compassion unwitnessed here since those sad days of the earthquake and fire, when San Francisco had unassuageable sorrow of her own. . . . The same sun which he [President Harding] saw set behind the Golden Gate in a halo of mist last night from his hotel window tonight burnished for a few brief moments the metal of his bier.

After that from the Associated Press, which prides itself on being uneditorial and unemotional, one was not greatly surprised to read in the New York World of August 9 a Washington dispatch describing Mr. Harding's funeral in which the following paragraph is only a little worse than the average:

> There was all the glory, majesty, and grandeur of death when he lay under the impressive dome of the Capitol, with music swelling in mighty waves and chanting voices hymning the triumph of the soul over the body, while the sculptured and painted forms of Washington, Lincoln, Grant, and those other titans who have made America's history looked down on the new recruit to immortality.

This technique of emotionalizing the passing of a widely known national figure is also to be found in recording various other events which lend themselves to such a treatment and will, unless recognized and stopped, more and more pervade reporting. We suspect its origin lies partly in the war, when hysteria and sentimentalism overwhelmed everything, when propaganda came to be regarded as a regular and legitimate element in the news columns. Combined with that has been the influence of the movies—with their perfervid and nonsensical jargon—and the general movement of the press away from strict presentation of the news and toward that mass of real or alleged entertainment and inspiration known as feature material. Oddly enough the war hysteria in this country did not reach flood tide until well after the Treaty of Versailles was written in 1919. The anti-radical and anti-alien repercussion of the war, for instance, did not arrive in full force until 1920. This slowness of the war madness to develop explains, perhaps, the fact that the passing of Roosevelt, which occurred only a couple of months after the armistice, was chronicled with a restraint in strange contrast to the geyser of maudlin twaddle which drenched us upon the death of President Harding. The account of Roosevelt's burial at Oyster Bay in the New York Tribune of January 9, 1919, is far from a cold setting down of facts. There is a legitimate attempt to reproduce the atmosphere and spirit of the occasion, but the writer does not let it run away with him. A fair sample is the opening paragraph:

> The flag that he loved with a surpassing devotion still lies upon his coffin. About him is the brown earth to which he lived so close in this his own home. Beyond his grave the steel-blue waters of the Sound stretch away and at right and left above his resting-place rise his beloved hills.

While not great literature that is good journalism, in pleasing contrast to the blah which the same newspaper printed five years later, February 7, 1924, when Mr. Wilson was buried:

> With the piercing blast of the bugle, martial and unafraid, it seemed the hardy spirit of Woodrow Wilson was taking flight up and up, swiftly toward the stars to ride down the solitary ages with the ideals for which he spent his life.

In New York City the Times, which more than any other journal is a strictly news newspaper, has offended the least in the tendency to emotionalize and sentimentalize its reporting. The two other morning dailies which have the best news columns, the Herald Tribune and the World, have not been equally fortunate. Glancing through their news columns at the time of the death of Cleveland and of McKinley, for instance, one understands the change in reporting which has taken place.

The World's dispatch from Princeton, New Jersey, describing the burial of Cleveland (printed in the issue of June 27, 1908) opens with the following succinct and sufficient paragraph: "Attended by scenes of solemnity, simple yet profound, Grover Cleveland was laid at rest at sundown today."

It is true that the World of February 7, 1924, carried a dispatch from Washington with an equally simple and somewhat similar beginning to the account of Mr. Wilson's burial: "Without thunder of guns or bugle calls, and with not a word beyond the ever-beautiful Protestant Episcopal funeral service, Woodrow Wilson was laid to rest this afternoon." But the World's restraint at that time was exceptional in the overwhelming flood of crude bathos.

The reporter of twenty-five years ago was primarily a fact gatherer. He was perhaps the best fact gatherer that journalism, here or anywhere, has ever known, but he was not so good a writer as his successor of today. Neither was he so bad a one. The prizes of journalism then went to the successful fact getter; today the best salaries go to the feature writer—the man who can give an amusing or a personal interpretation of an important happening. The star reporter of today aims above all else not to be hackneyed, and this has led to a better-written presentation of lesser events than we used to have, but in the face of high tragedy he lacks, on the one hand, skill to do it justice and, on the other, the restraint not to try which usually characterized the journalist of a quarter of a century ago. When the journalist of that earlier era did try, his very limitations kept him from making such a mess of it. He was sometimes stilted, strained, even ridiculous, but having been mercifully spared from contact with the vocabulary of the movies, he was not lachrymose or maudlin. McKinley died a martyr's death; it stirred the country vastly. But the New York Tribune's account of the funeral in Washington, printed in the issue of September 18, 1901, is to be criticized as hackneyed and cumbersome rather than as sentimental and slushy. The opening paragraph reads:

> The nation of which for more than four years he was the loved head paid the dead President today its last tribute of honor and affection. Through the chosen representatives of its power and sovereignty it discharged the last sad debt of love and reverence due the faithful servant and leader of his people. The chiefs of all the departments and branches of the government gathered at the Capitol to join in the last solemn rites celebrated in his memory, contributing to a ceremony, in itself simple almost to plainness, a significance truly impressive and truly national. In beauty and solemnity that ceremony may have left a certain something still to be desired; for the neglect of forms which democratic habits foster will often revenge itself at unexpected and awkward moments. But what it missed in smoothness and fitness of setting it undeniably atoned for in depth, sincerity, and tenderness of feeling, stamping itself as a tribute not of formal and perfunctory duty but of universal and unstinted affection.

Going back to the assassination of Lincoln we find in contemporary accounts a journalistic style which today seems stiff and pompous, but is not awash with professional tears. This, although probably no other President's death has ever so stirred our people. Incidentally, it is worth recalling that the issue of the New York Tribune which carried the news of Lincoln's assassination (that of April 15, 1865) did not present the information on the first page. The first page was given up to some letters purporting to reveal secrets of the Civil War and to news from Mobile, then a scene of fighting. The shooting of Lincoln was told inside on the editorial page under the heading:

HIGHLY IMPORTANT!
THE PRESIDENT SHOT!
Secretary Seward Attacked.

It is a fair guess that the failure to put the news of Lincoln's assassination on the first page was not due to lack of proper appreciation of it, but to the fact that the dispatch arrived late, after the paper had been made up, and it was not so easy or so customary to make over in those days as in these.

Our Prejudices

"I ADMIRE your political opinions," writes a subscriber of three years' standing, "but I hate and detest your pro-Catholic and race-equality propaganda. You lose subscriptions by it. You lose in the South particularly. Of course you may gain Negro and Catholic readers, but neither is liberal or progressive, and all your writing cannot make them so." The Nation is always losing subscribers who do not like one or another of its ideas and ideals, but it does not modify its opinions according to the circulation manager's mail. To angry cancelations it pays small heed, for the person who resentfully cancels a subscription because he differs with a magazine's views thereby stamps himself as illiberal from the start.

The reader quoted above, however, is the kind of reader we should like to convert. He regards the Catholic church as the enemy of human progress, and says he has always found the Negro ready to "scab" on union men. Doubtless where the Catholic church is in the majority it tends to control education and politics, but in this country, where the Catholics are a small minority, it is often a powerful ally of political liberalism. The Klan and other manifestations of intolerance and bigotry have been an effective demonstration. Through the Dayton trial, for instance, the Catholic attitude was intelligently one of opposition to both sides. The Catholics accept the Bible as the inspired word of God—to be interpreted, however, by the church, not by the state or by the individual. They oppose the Tennessee statute, realizing that if the state can proscribe it can also prescribe what is to be taught to children. The Nation has found among the Catholics effective allies in the struggle for industrial, political, and even religious freedom; and even if that were not so it would continue to protest whenever it found the bars raised against men and women because of their religious beliefs or opinions.

For inter-race justice, too, we shall continue our stand, even though it cost us circulation in the South. We read in Opportunity that an educational survey recently completed in Georgia—40 per cent of whose people are Negroes—recommended a State school appropriation of more than a million dollars, only $122,500 of which was to go for colored children. Sumter County, Georgia, received $29,228 as a State grant for schools last year, and spent $22,8[illegible] of this on its 1,622 white school-children and only $6,400 on the 1,961 dark-skinned children of school age. It has just cut the salaries of all Negro teachers earning more than $25 a month! Does any one wonder, in the face of such inequity, that the Negroes do not stand en masse in the forefront of progress? Does any union man, honestly facing the record—not the resolutions, but the actions—of the big unions toward colored men, wonder that colored men frequently "scab"? The labor unions have never made an aggressive effort to drain the reservoir of potential "scab" workers by organizing the Negro masses, and that fact has cost them defeat more than once. Some day the South itself will awaken to the handicap imposed on it by its own policy of race domination, but until the brave minority which is already making itself felt in most Southern States succeeds in breaking the crust of Southern tradition every national progressive movement will face shipwreck on the rocks of the solid and conservative South.

Religion Becomes News

By CHARLES W. WOOD

A FEW years ago we couldn't have imagined the United States eagerly awaiting the news from some church convention. There wasn't any news in a church convention. The papers, to be sure, covered these affairs, after a fashion, and sometimes gave them complimentary write-ups on the first page; but this was done out of courtesy to certain blocks of subscribers and not with any notion on the editor's part that religion was news.

Any story which involved religion, in those days, was taboo. No matter how carefully it was handled, it was apt to get the paper in trouble. The reporter who "did religion" was trained to turn in a perfectly colorless column of church notices and to avoid even the appearance of human interest.

The break came suddenly, about two years ago. What had happened nobody seemed to know; but the Virgin Birth presently began to run neck and neck with murder and politics for front-page layouts, even in such newspapers as the New York Times. Ever since then religion has been the livest news there is.

A few months ago the country waited eagerly while the Presbyterians, assembled in Columbus, Ohio, actually took a ballot on the Virgin Birth. A little later the Associated Press and all the other news agencies of the nation were covering in World Series, play-by-play fashion an argument in a Tennessee courtroom on the all-important problem of where Cain's wife came from and whether God could have worked by the day before he invented the sun.

Now all eyes are beginning to turn toward New Orleans. The question at issue there is: Can a bishop think? Nobody seems to care particularly how the question is decided. The public isn't partisan; it is just eager for the news. For religion is news today, and no mistake.

A lot of my friends seem to be distressed over the situation. The United States, they tell me, is still pretty largely fundamentalist; and if the people begin to act according to their fundamentalist philosophy, the advance of science will presently be checked. They point to the Tennessee anti-evolution law. If that law is upheld, they fear, it will be followed by others. Presently only Mosaic astronomy can be taught. And Mosaic geography. And what kind of country will it be, they ask, if our children are brought up to believe that the earth is flat? Others, following the lead of the New York World, are fearful of an approaching reunion of church and state—a thoroughly Ku-Kluxed country, with the fundamentalist creed written into the Constitution and all dissenters deprived of their political rights.

Somehow, I don't share their distress. I think it's a good sign, this renewed interest in religion. I think we are miles ahead of where we were when religion was a subject which editors were afraid to mention, which everybody was trying to keep out of politics, which the tactful would even keep out of their general conversation.

During the past fifty years, all fundamentalists will tell you, there has been a steady decline of the religious life throughout America. There were no fundamentalists fifty years ago because practically every church member believed implicitly in the whole fundamentalist doctrine. So did most of the sinners, who looked upon the town infidel quite as superstitiously as did the saints and gave as their own excuse for not being saved that the church was full of hypocrites. The "town infidel," by the way, was anyone who had read Tom Paine or dared to argue right in the minister's face that a good God wouldn't let anybody go to hell. Half the preachers under forty today are quite as atheistic as that.

There were revivals from time to time, but there was no particular revival of orthodoxy. None was needed; for everybody was orthodox to begin with, and the revivalist's task was not to prove that the Bible was true but to frighten his audience into doing something about it.

But the force of these revivals waned, from decade to decade. The last one of any national consequence was that of Moody and Sankey; and that was a tame performance, unmarked by the great spiritual outpourings of former days when hundreds of those "convicted of sin" threw themselves before the mercy seat and writhed in holy agony, while those who "had the blessing" prayed and sang and shouted their hallelujahs.

In the course of time revivals so deteriorated in force that the current revivalist, whose name, if I remember right, was Billy Sunday, had to do all the performing himself, depending for his effects upon a skilful advertising campaign by which the sawdust trail could be sold to leading Rotarians. Billy was just as orthodox as Jonathan Edwards. And undoubtedly he had as many converts. But Jonathan's converts wrestled mightily with the hosts of Satan before they felt themselves plucked like brands from the burning; while Billy's blithely checked their sins outside, marched down the aisle giving three cheers for holiness, learned the first verse and chorus of "Brighten the Corner Where You Are," and doubtless commemorated the incident by sending a picture post card home: "Having a swell time wish you were here X marks the spot where I was washed in the Blood."

Billy, in those days, was news. But religion wasn't. It was his mannerisms, not his message, that made him good copy. If he coined a new nickname for the Holy Ghost it might get a headline, but the fact that half the leading citizens of the town had been rescued from hell wasn't worth two sticks. One old horse rescued from a burning barn was considered a much more important story.

It wasn't that the editors didn't believe in rescue from hell. But there is the subjective belief and the objective belief. We may, and do, act upon both; but the tendency, especially for the past fifty years, in America, has been to compel us to act upon objectively discovered information and to relegate our subjective notions to an ever-lessening jurisdiction over our conduct.

There's a reason for that. For the past fifty years, in America, we have been devoting ourselves to building up a new industrial system. To hang on to an old system does not require much new information. All such a task requires is a tremendous willingness to hang on. But to build a new system—one which nobody ever heard of before—necessitated our learning a lot of things the old Bibles didn't tell us. They might warn us not to muzzle the ox that threshed out the grain, but they were absolutely silent on what to do when the engine wouldn't spark.

This didn't mean that we had to revise our old beliefs. A few of us did, but we didn't really count. The vast majority kept their old beliefs intact, but they didn't use them quite so often. When the plumbing went wrong, they didn't call in a savior; they called in a plumber. No one thought of calling that a conflict between science and religion; but since life is principally made up of what we do, the Old Gospel, while still "believed," began to strike less and less deeply into the emotional life.

The old-timers noticed this and deplored it. They sought for a reason, but not until five or six years ago did they seem to find one. They found it, strangely, not in the heresy of the masses but in the heresies which had crept into the modern Christian pulpit.

The masses, it seems, didn't have to revise their old religious creeds. All the masses had to do was to shove them back somewhere into a far corner of their brains, where they could bring them out at funerals and on special occasions; but the theological students and the professors who taught them, were compelled in the very nature of their jobs to think about religion. It is easy enough to hold conflicting beliefs if you don't have to think about them; but when you have to overhaul them daily you've got to do something about it. So the new theologians revised their ancient creeds. They built them over, in so far as they were able, into religious concepts which seemed applicable to the life that men were living. That religion should be kept out of politics did not appeal to them at all; and to keep it out of business was equivalent to keeping it out of life. So they began to preach a Seven Day Religion, a Social Religion, a "religion to live by, not to die by," a religion which might be harmonized with every new discovery, a religion of deeds not creeds, and a religion of practical human brotherhood rather than a mere mystic formula for the forgiveness of sins.

The new preachers were certainly religious. They were Christians; and they accepted, or they thought they did, the theory of the Atonement. To be sure, they didn't emphasize it; but when Billy Sunday swept through the country most of these new preachers united with their brethren of the old school in welcoming him. His theology might be crude, they said, but was he not bringing thousands into a Christian life?

When, a few years later, the Interchurch World Movement was launched, the old-timers similarly got into that. But never again. In fact, they couldn't wait to give the movement a chance. They wrecked it and got out as soon as they discovered what it was up to—reporting about conditions in the steel industry and all that, instead of bringing souls to Christ.

And while all these merry things were happening religion had not yet become news. Billy was news and so was the Steel Strike Report; but that it would interest the people to have their sacred religious beliefs spread all over the front page where they could look at them objectively—that hadn't occurred to any editor yet.

It was the fundamentalists who brought the change. It was they, not the modernists, who caused the modernists to get a hearing. It was they who called attention to the irreconcilable conflict between this social-service ethics which the "atheistic" modernists were preaching and the good old gospel of redemption through the Blood. It was they who called loudly for the heretics to be put out. And it was they who compelled millions of Americans to overhaul their complete mental stock and ask themselves seriously, for the first time in their lives, Just exactly what do I believe?

That is the best thing, as I see it, that has happened to America in my generation. A belief which is too sacred to be examined is the only dangerous belief I know anything about. We may try to keep it out of politics, out of the papers, and out of our conversation; we may even try to keep it out of our consciousness entirely, but we can't get rid of it by any such methods. We will surely develop what the psychoanalysts call a conflict; and not until the belief comes into consciousness is there any likelihood of the conflict being resolved.

And America, all these years, has suffered from just such a conflict. We have had two sets of beliefs, one objective and practical, the other subjective and utterly unworkable; but just because a belief is unworkable it doesn't follow that we will not try to work it. We will and we do; and until we get out our unworkable belief and examine it, there is little likelihood of our discovering what the trouble is.

Americans believed, for instance, that water expands when it is heated; not because the Scriptures said so but because they checked up on it and found out. Hence, their industrial advance was marvelous. But they also believed that punishment would prevent crime—and their achievements in crime-prevention have been nil. Punishment never did prevent crime, at least in America; but there is little likelihood of our finding it out until that utterly unworkable notion is brought to consciousness and examined as objectively as we would examine a proposition in mechanics. For my part, I would rather have Mosaic geology consciously proclaimed in the public schools than to have Mosaic criminology unconsciously dominating all our social acts. And I would rather have a child told that the earth is flat than to have him scared into thinking that Red, White, and Blue are Jehovah's favorite colors.

America has grown great in so far as it has believed whatever it has found out. It has grown ridiculous in so far as it has believed what it has been told. But the first step in unbelieving these beliefs that make such fools of us is to bring them into consciousness. It was a great day for American progress when religion got into the news.

And it was the fundamentalists, we must remember, who put it there. When the new heresies came storming out of the theological seminaries, few were able to state exactly what they were. Finally, after much soul-searching, the sainted brethren were able to draw up four dogmas, too sacred to be questioned, which, as they saw it, were the four cardinal points of orthodoxy. They were: The literal inspiration of the Scriptures; the Virgin Birth; the Vicarious Atonement; the Second Coming of Christ.

So that was what the fuss was all about. It all looked awful to most of the orthodox until they began to see just what it was. Anybody, it was noted, could believe in all those things and be the biggest skinflint alive. You could never guess from such a layout what his attitude toward human problems might be. Nothing about industrial relations, race relations, or war—nothing about any problem affecting modern life. Could it be that that was all there was to religion? From that day on the people of the United States have been eager to get all the information they could.

That is why their eyes are turning now toward New Orleans. There, far more than in the Scopes trial, the beans will all be spilled. Bishop William Montgomery Brown has raised the ultimate question, and it is up to the House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church to answer him.

The question is: What must a bishop believe in order to remain a bishop in good standing in the church?

Ten years ago the question could hardly have been raised. It was assumed in those days, at least by everybody except the bishops themselves, that a bishop had to accept the whole orthodox formula, beginning with Adam's sin being responsible for all our ills, from war to boils, and ending with whatever anybody could make out of the Book of Revelation.

Bishop Brown, according to the popular understanding, "didn't believe anything." Adam's sin as a cause of war was a complete joke to him; and with Adam's fall out of the way, Christ's redemption couldn't be taken literally at all. He came to the conclusion, in fact, from his study of history, that there was no such historical character as Jesus; and if any literal belief whatever constituted religion, he was completely and undeniably irreligious. Had religion kept out of the news, Bishop Brown's case would have seemed ridiculous.

But religion got into the news and all America has been trying to find out what it actually is. And, little by little, due to the prodding of the fundamentalists, America has been given to understand that religion and theories about religion are two very different things. Religion, we have been told, is not a creed but a life; and the real Christian is he who leads the Christ life of human love and service. But that, according even to his prosecutors, puts Bishop Brown away up in the front rank of leading Christians. It is only his theological opinions to which anybody has objected. It is not what he is but what he thinks.

But what can a bishop think? That is the nut which the House of Bishops has to crack, the court which found him guilty of heresy having utterly dodged the question. They said he didn't believe what they believed, but they wouldn't say what it was. They wouldn't permit themselves, or any other bishops, to be examined.

Perhaps they didn't think it was necessary. But that was a year ago. It has become decidedly necessary since; for religion is in the news and all eyes are turning toward New Orleans. It is the first real showdown. What is the point, if any, beyond which the mind of a churchman must not ask questions? The future of the Protestant Episcopal Church is bound up in the answer, perhaps the future of organized religion in the United States. For if the Protestant Episcopal Church decides that a bishop is at liberty to believe whatever he can find out, the conflict between science and religion may soon be resolved.

Thou Shalt Not Whistle—in Guam

By ARTHUR WARNER

IT has long been my intention, when I become Grand Supreme Dictator of the Universe, to begin the exercise of my authority by issuing an edict which shall read as follows:

> 1. No man shall be allowed to whistle without having spent four years in an accredited conservatory of whistling and having passed a satisfactory test before the Board of Whistling Examiners.
>
> 2. No boy under eighteen, and no woman, shall be allowed to whistle at all.

But I have learned that it is not necessary to become Grand Supreme Dictator of the Universe in order to issue this edict. I need only join the United States navy and be assigned as Governor of Guam. This information I have from a man who is back in this country after several years' residence on the island. He may want to return there some day, and so does not wish to publish his observations under his own name. As my plans for visiting this remote Pacific island are rather more than hazy I am under no such restriction.

The city of Agana contains 8,000 of the 15,000 inhabitants of the island. With some imagination it may be described as the metropolis. Imagine, then, the scope of the following decree, even more sweeping than that of my dreams:

> EXECUTIVE SPECIAL ORDER No. 52
>
> The practice of whistling is an entirely unnecessary and irritating noise which must be discontinued.
>
> It is therefore ordered and decreed that no person shall whistle within the limits of the city of Agana.
>
> The penalty for a violation of this order shall be an executive fine not to exceed five dollars.

Guam, like the Virgin Islands, has been the victim of congressional forgetfulness and indifference, due to its remoteness, its inconsequential population, and its lack of a press to rouse its people or our own. Guam came to us as part of the spoils of the Spanish-American War of 1898. President McKinley, in his instructions for taking over the island (printed in full in the International Relations Section), put it under the "absolute domain" of the Navy Department "until the legislators of the United States shall otherwise provide." Nearly twenty-seven years have slipped away since, but Congress has not yet otherwise provided. President McKinley added in his instructions that > it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the naval administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the island of Guam, by securing to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the inheritance of all free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild way of justice and right for arbitrary rule.

So? Well, maybe; but to date the navy has devoted considerably more energy to maintaining its "absolute domain" than to "substituting the mild way of justice and right for arbitrary rule."

Guam, my informant tells me, is unprotected from attack or capture. Any nation could take it without firing a shot. There are, it is true, several guns on the island, but of a sort found nowhere in the United States except in musical comedy. Yet 700 marines and 100 men of the navy are garrisoned on the island at a cost to the citizens of the United States of $2,000,000 a year.

Under "the mild way of justice and right" established in Guam by the navy the Governor is one of the several czars which, oddly enough, a democracy like the United States has permitted to rule in our distant and helpless possessions with an absolutism and an insolence that probably have no parallel in the colonial administration of any other nation on earth. The Governor of Guam makes the laws, he changes (at will) the laws, he is the law; he is the master of every creature on the island, under the island, and in the waters within three miles of the island. In order that no one man should be bored with playing the despot too long in this out-of-the-way corner of the Pacific, the Governor is changed every eighteen months. There have been as many as six in three years. Every Governor has his hobby. With one it may be roads, with another military pomp, with a third photography. Each Governor may change the laws of his predecessors, and most of them do. It is fun to make laws when taxpayers 5,000 miles away foot the bills, when nobody can make any objection, and when you can sail away after eighteen months sure of another job, no matter what a mess you have made of this one.

"Thou shalt not whistle" is not the only way in which the czars of Guam have violated President McKinley's promise "to protect the natives in their personal rights." Even the legislators of the sovereign State of Tennessee have been outdone, as witness the following:

EXECUTIVE NOTICE 106

The order of March 10, requiring that school-children shall not wear long skirts, is not being observed. Long skirts tend to trail the dust and germs and should not be worn. The skirts of schoolgirls should not reach lower than four inches from the ground.

One Governor, to his credit, issued the following proclamation:

GENERAL ORDER NUMBER 11

1. It is to be regretted that the licentious and lawless conduct of some of the men belonging to this station has made it necessary to issue this order, which is intended to be a reminder that, in assuming control of this island, the government is pledged to fulfil its guaranties of absolute protection of all the rights and privileges of the residents of Guam, in their homes and in their lawful pursuits of life.

2. Attention is hereby called to the fact that the natives of Guam are not "damned dagoes" or "niggers," but they are law-abiding, respectful human beings who have been taken under the protection of the United States government and who are as much entitled to courtesy, respect, and protection of life and liberty in their homes as are the best citizens of New York, Washington, or any other home city.

Fine words. But what do they amount to in the face of such race snobbery and executive nincompoopery as below:

EXECUTIVE GENERAL ORDER NO. 326

1. It is hereby ordered and decreed that on and after October 1, 1919, any white person residing in the island of Guam is forbidden to marry any person whole or part Chamorro or Filipino extraction, and any marriage entered into on or after said date shall be null and void.

2. White persons are those of the Caucasian extraction who have no Chamorro, Filipino, or Negro blood in them.

The police department of the island is in the hands of the Marine Corps. These international policemen are under the direct authority of the Governor. A policeman may enter the home of any resident of the island, without a search warrant. The right of a trial by jury is denied to every one, regardless of his place of birth. The old Spanish penal code, except as modified or aggravated from time to time by the governors, is still in force, and the right hand of a Spanish Inquisition is everywhere visible. There is a native "judge" appointed by the Governor. He has never completed the grammar grades of any school system. Yet Americans and others are brought before him for trial, although he does not pronounce sentence without the approval of the Governor. Should an appeal be granted, the case is tried before a semi-military court. The colonel of the marines is judge of this court, with a naval officer as first assistant judge and a civilian as second assistant. No sentences are given from this court without the Governor's approval.

By gubernatorial whim a large, modern penitentiary has just been completed at a cost of $30,000 or more. The natives were satisfied with the jail they had. They are a docile and peaceable people, not keen about spending any considerable part of their lives behind bars, even to please their Governor, and if they are so unfortunate as to have to go to jail they are not especially concerned to have all the niceties of polite prison life as it has been developed in highly civilized lands. Indeed the natives went so far as to request the Governor to abandon his plan for a prison de luxe, but without effect. Considering that the population of Guam is about 15,000 persons, including children, the cost of the penitentiary was $2 per capita.

Colonial possessions are in many ways so antagonistic to true democracy that we have had to jettison many of our best American traditions since we began to clutch at empire. An instinctive fear of the difficulties and dangers has led us to refuse to admit that we had colonies, to decline to set up any general administration or policy for their care, and to consign them "temporarily" to the mercies of army or navy—our least democratic services. In no way have we made more of a mess of it than in regard to citizenship. This, for instance, is the situation in Guam:

NAVY DEPARTMENT

Washington, D. C.

Court-Martial Order No. 1923

April 30, 1923

Bulletin

Naturalization: Native of Guam.

Held: While a native of Guam owns perpetual allegiance to the United States he is not a citizen thereof nor is he an alien and there are no provisions under which he may become a citizen of the United States by naturalization. (26252-165, JAG, 31 March, 1923.)

EDWIN DENBY,
Secretary of the Navy

Yet Edward Everett Hale once greatly stirred the United States with a book—purely fiction—entitled "The Man Without a Country."

The least Congress should do for Guam is to provide a civilian government, adopt a modern legal system and code of laws, and allot certain areas to the naval establishment beyond which its authority should not go. Industry in Guam has not prospered under naval rule—it doesn't anywhere. Some $125,000 a year is collected from the people in land and personal taxes—and spent, unchecked, by the Governor. Imports are ten times as great as exports. Previous to the American occupation the people lived chiefly on fish and native fruits. We introduced canned salmon, since when the natives have done practically no fishing.

Probably the Spanish regime in Guam was pretty bad; our naval czardom may not be much worse. But was it worth the natives' while to give up the fun of whistling for the privilege of saluting the Stars and Stripes and eating salmon out of a can instead of fish fresh from the ocean?

Writing for Money

By R. V. HARDON

THERE are at least 40,000 persons in the United States who more or less methodically write for money. These 40,000 are the men and women who believe they have within them dormant or active properties which, if editors were not such fools, would quickly bring them to the foreground of the literary world. Why, in one town in Iowa alone, there are 11 potential Mary Roberts Rineharts, 7 James Branch Cabells, 4 almost-Ruby M. Ayerses, and 2 perfectly good Zane Greys, with 118 scattering from Joe Hergesheimers to Joe Blows. Don't lift the eyebrows over Joe Blow. You never heard of him before, but he is the most widely printed fiction author in all America. Of his ilk, more anon.

I am a fiction writer, a working author. I am not one of the 40,000; rather, I am one of a group of about 30 writers whose annual output in the course of a year is the incredible total of more than 2,200 short stories, 400 novelettes, and 150 serial novels, these latter often running to 200,000 words in length each. We are the "Two-Centers."

New York is the heart of the "2-cent fiction" market. There are 23 possible places in which to sell a fiction story which will command the average price of 2 cents a word. Some of the magazines, most of them monthlies or semi-monthlies, occasionally pay as high as 3 cents a word. More often they want to pay 1 cent or 1½ cent a count word.

There are living in New York at this moment 4 men and 2 women writers who actually turn out the bulk of all popular fiction printed in the standard 20-cent and 25-cent magazines published in America. The "high-class" authors who are paid from $500 to $1,800 a story are not capable of writing the sort of short story these magazines require. Obviously, authors who have big names and powerful reputations would not attempt the 2-cent market. But, at that, if they were so disposed, they wouldn't succeed. Writing what is technically called "tripe" is a highly specialized job. And in the cheap magazine field, whose periodical output attains a gross circulation of more than 2,400,000 copies per issue, the demand for the right kind of story is greater than the supply. But it would do no good to tell the 40,000 men and women who are writing for money, and never getting it, anything about this. They couldn't write the material, no matter how hard they tried.

It would be inaccurate to say that the successful writers of the 2-cent fiction field are hack writers. They are not. They are highly specialized mass-production experts.

Ten years ago I was a plain and ordinary newspaper man of thirty. I had never written a word of romance, adventure—nothing in a fiction way. In college I had written poetry, of course, and even attained a slender volume of sentimental sonnets which were just a little bit worse than might have been expected. Ten years ago a new magazine appeared on the market. It had one of these snappy alliterative titles, and in a wild moment I invested 15 cents (the then current price), and read the magazine. I sat down that night and wrote a story which I think was called "Problem X" and sent it to the editor of the new periodical. A check for $20 came galloping back, with demands for more.

That was the beginning of my "career."

I am now one of the most-hardened and perhaps desperate 2-cent writers in New York. There is another fellow who lives a block or two away from me who is a little bit worse; he writes 65,000 to 75,000 words a week, whereas I turn out only 50,000 a week. Pretty soon now, however, I expect to get up to 60,000 words every seven days.

From my first stories ten years ago I gradually became known to the editors of other magazines of the type as a "good snappy sex writer." That is to say, my stories deal with the problem of love and romance. One of my friends is a Western-stuff expert, and he can sit down and in a single day bat out a 25,000-word Wild West serial, in three parts, with excitement and thrills enough to make each individual hair of the reader stand upon its individual end. But my friend who does Westerns is not a good business man and he rarely receives more than one cent a word for his serials. It is his own fault; he ought to be more of a fighter. But he is a mild-mannered chap and the editors, bless their little hearts, beat him down. Nearly all the magazines devoted to Wild West adventure stories are edited by young women, you know.

Every story written in the "2-cent" magazines must follow a formula, a set idea. In the "clean love story" group you must do this: Your heroine may make mistakes and be discovered in indiscretions, but that is O.K. so long as she reforms and is repentant in the end and is punished for her sin. This is absolutely a "must." The heroine can't sob and say she is sorry and then marry the handsome young hero. Ah, not at all. She must be punished first. She must suffer all the torments of the d—d. (By the way, there is only one of the eleven clean-sex-story magazines that will allow you to say damned, although you may allow a character to say "damn.")

The supervising editor of a company which publishes 5 such magazines each month is frequently on the verge of nervous collapse because he hasn't enough stories on hand from month to month to meet his requirements. This in spite of the 40,000 who are writing for money. He has a list of 9 writers who contribute pretty regularly and when the manuscript box is low he calls them one after another.

"I must have about 4,000 words, a nice sweet little story with a naughty flapper heroine in it," he will say. "Let's see. It's Tuesday. Yes, I'll have to have that by Thursday at 12 o'clock. Don't make it a small-town story 'cause I have three of those for this number already. Yeh, you better have her turn out to be a welfare worker or something like that. No, don't skate on the thin ice too close. We are sort of cleaning up, you know. Yep, 2 cents."

Just like ordering the pork chops for tomorrow's dinner.

In the course of a year I sell about 100 short stories averaging 2,800 words in length each; 4 novelettes averaging 15,000 words each; 4 serials averaging 50,000 words each, and several hundred very short items of from 50 to 250 words each which are technically called "fillers." Like most of the "2-cent" authors, I do not employ a literary agent to dispose of my wares. That is, my 2-cent stuff is sent direct to the magazine for which it is intended and which was probably in my mind when I wrote it. About one out of ten is returned to me. Eventually this rejected manuscript may be sold elsewhere. Two of the magazines in which my short stories regularly appear sometimes send back a manuscript with changes suggested, just as a tailor might receive a coat for alteration because it is too tight in the sleeves or wrinkles around the collar. These changes are made at once and the garment, that is to say, the manuscript, goes back to the customer that day.

The manner of such stories must never change. The truth is, I have only three love-story plots to my name. I have written these almost 700 times in ten years. I have had 619 short stories published since 1916 to which I have signed 21 noms de plume; one of the noms attaining sufficient prestige to have been signed to a published book within the past two years. The book sold quite well.

Once in about every six or twelve months my mind slips. It goes back on me. I sit down at my typewriter and, as usual, type down the title: "Oh, Wonderful Girl!" All right. Then I start in to do my stuff. Clean and sexy. Breath-taking at the end of the first 1,800 words, but from then on Mary is proved to be a good girl, after all, only people wouldn't understand her exuberant ways. That's the formula, you see. Well, I get it all done in about an hour and a half—3,000 words, say—and I get up and have a cup of coffee, and wash my hands, and give the story to a female relative to read (Oh, the poor girl, what she's been through you'll never know!), and then it goes away.

But hold! Back it gallops from this magazine and that.

"Gee, this is awful. What's the matter with you today?" This is a comment by one editor who buys 50 stories a year from my gifted typewriter.

"No, very sorry. This will hardly do." Another editor.

"Awful." Another, a rather close friend of mine, who has a magazine that sometimes accepts fairly decent stories.

Then I know that, quite without intention and unconsciously, I have achieved a story that I dare sign with my own name and send to a literary agent who will present it—and quite often even sell it—to a "good" magazine.

Three years ago I wrote a story of my usual "2-cent" length and sent it in sequence to my regular list of magazines. These three magazines rejected it as absolutely impossible, foolish, no good, and out of season. I was very, very annoyed. I deemed it a good story. So I slapped it into an envelope and sent it, without comment, to H. L. Mencken, then editor of the Smart Set, which, in those days, did occasionally publish absolutely first-rate fiction. Yes, Mencken and Nathan bought my despised little story and in the "American Short Story Annual" it drew asterisks as a "story of unusual fidelity and distinction," and over in England it brought a review in a standard literary journal.

Which doesn't prove anything except that the "2-cent" magazines know what they want and know how they want it.

There's a girl living down in a small town in Georgia who was a stenographer five years ago. She had the urge to write. She read the "2-centers" carefully for about three months, and then began to bombard the New York editors with stories of from 4,000 to 5,000 words. She could turn out one every day. She sells an average of 15 short stories every month now, receiving $60 each for them.

There's a man living down in Greenwich Village who is a real artist and capable of writing charming little etchings—little word pictures of human character. He's capable of it, but where would he sell such efforts? There is no market. So he writes fiction stories about middle-aged love and so forth—awful stuff—and earns about $600 a month without the least conscious effort.

There's a bright young man over in Baltimore who writes serials about Broadway Johns and chorus girls. He has three or four of them current at one and the same time, and how he manages them without getting the Coras and the Peggies and the Betties all mixed up in each other's affairs I am at a loss to understand. But he earns about $15,000 a year and is always in demand.

"How do you contrive the color you shoot into 'em?" I asked him one day.

He grinned. "Oh, I stay over here in Baltimore and wonder what Broadway is like."

In the Driftway

IN a rash moment the Drifter yielded, a short time ago, to the importunities of a young female companion and allowed himself to be taken berry-picking. His young friend was only six years old, and for a moment he thought that if she could find amusement thus, he might also. They made their way under barbed wire and over stone walls, through bush and briar, across a brook, and a great distance into the woods. On the way they passed tangles of blackberry vines, the fruit quite green. It augured well, the Drifter mistakenly thought, for the red raspberries. And when they came to the bushes they sought, his prophecy seemed at first to be coming true. The branches were hung thick with round, red berries—at least from a distance. When they got closer, the berries seemed to disappear. And when the pail was actually brought under the branch, and the berries felt the touch of the human hand, they vanished entirely. Some of them slid to the ground and hid coyly in the grass; others turned to green before the very eyes of the Drifter; still others appeared bitten and mangy on close inspection. The sun beat hot on his head, the briars scratched his ankles. He had been picking for perhaps half a day, or so it seemed, when he paused to examine the bottom of his pail, and found it barely covered.

* * * * *

SURREPTITIOUSLY he examined the bucket of his siren companion; by some miracle it was half full, and the young woman, oblivious to sun and scratches, was picking ahead as if she asked nothing more in life. That decided the Drifter. He set his pail on a rock and himself on another, conveniently in the shade. When he had mopped his brow he thoughtfully ate the berries in his pail and, more thoughtfully still, plucked and ate from a bush within arm's reach. The berries were sweet and warm under the sun; they quenched his thirst and soothed his soul. He knew that this was the only way for him to pick berries—as fast as he could eat and no faster. Let persons who were fitted for it imprison them in a tin pail; it was worth incurring the reproaches of the six-year-old to sit in the shade and eat them one by one.

* * * * *

SO it is with apples. To walk in an orchard, freshly mown, with windfalls temptingly underfoot and low branches well within reach, to pick up a likely looking apple, bite into it deeply, regard it with a careful eye, and throw it against a tree, repeating the process ad infinitum: that is the way to proceed with apples. The Drifter has never been inveigled into apple-picking; but he has watched those at work, their feet aching on a ladder rung, hand up baskets, reach them down, pile barrels full, hour after hour in the hot sun. Such industry is not for him. He prefers his apples on the wing, so to speak; the minute the process becomes organized he is seized with a dreadful pain in the back, so that he must lie down in the grass. If persons who can stand that sort of work later make the fruit into pies and apple sauce, he is often able to eat the product. But secretly he prefers the bite and toss method: it avoids the core, it provides an infinite variety of taste, it improves the eye. For him it is the thing that orchards are made for.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Du Ponts and the Press

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: That estimable journeyman essayist and observer-general Mr. Silas Bent reminds me of the Virginia major's son. When somebody asked the major if his son had religion, he replied: "The young whelp is religiously inclined, but hell-bent!"

In his article, Deep Water Runs Still, in the July 8 issue of The Nation Mr. Bent informs his readers that

> In Wilmington, whence must come all official statements of profits and losses, financial and human, from the Du Pont properties, there are three daily newspapers. All of them are owned by the Du Ponts. All the men who work for them depend upon the Du Ponts for a living. The opposition, if any exists, has no voice. The "news instinct" is stifled.

The Wilmington Every Evening, of which I have the honor to be the editor, is constantly displeasing the publicity department of the Du Pont company by printing all the truth it knows about that company.

It probably is true that there is Du Pont money in the Every Evening ownership; but the lease which the publisher, Mr. William F. Metten, has for ten years, beginning in 1921, gives him absolute independence in policy. The result is that we are as independent in our discussions and presentation of news as it is humanly possible to be; and I do not exaggerate when I say that we have been and still are just as independent as The Nation is in its editorial discussions.

Newspaper men so often are accused of being "bought" and "muzzled" that I think it is only fair to do justice to those who honestly are striving to be independent. Indeed, it strikes me that this is the sort of thing The Nation, through its eventful sixty years, has endeavored to encourage in newspaper men; and I might add that I believe such encouragement has aided in a large degree in making them more independent.

Wilmington, Delaware, July 18 WILLIAM J. ROBERTSON, Editor, Every Evening

Why Omit Smedley Butler?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: What the nation really needs at this stage in its history is relief from the Butlers, the several gentlemen to whom may be attributed many of our woes. It was William M. Butler who persuaded the country to keep Coolidge. It was the corporation lawyer, Pierce Butler, who as Supreme Court justice concurred in certain deplorable decisions of that tribunal. Nicholas Murray Butler frequently wearies us with lengthy spoutings in the press intended to convince us that that tory head of Columbia University is a liberal. And now that staunch, rugged fundamentalist of Tennessee, John Washington Butler, comes to the fore as the author of an anti-evolution law that disgraces not only Tennessee but the nation in the eyes of the enlightened world.

Chicago, July 11 THEODORE R. KENISTON

"A Sail"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of Max Eastman's translation of M. Y. Lhermontov's poem A Sail in the July 1 issue of The Nation, allow me, as a lover of Russian literature, to say that it has neither the meter nor the felicity of the original. What is more, it seems that Mr. Eastman uses the personal pronoun "he" for sail, apparently only for the reason that the Russian word for sail, páhroos, happens to be of the masculine gender.

And, to make my criticism constructive, may I offer my own version of the poem, rendered with the meter and rhyme-scheme of the original preserved:

A solitary sail is gleaming
  Upon the ocean's hazy blue;
What has she left in native waters?
  What does she seek in waters new?

The billows play, the wind is whistling,
  The mast, in anguish, bends and creaks;
Alas! from happiness not fleeing
  It is not happiness she seeks.

Below the azure waves are spraying;
  Above, the golden sunshine glows,
But she, rebellious, longs for storms,
  As if in storms there were repose.

New York, June 18 ELBERT AIDLINE-TROMMER

"Young Bob"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My attention has been called to the editorial in The Nation of July 8, entitled Young Bob. The editorial is both wise and timely, and I have no doubt will help bring about unity of action on the part of all Progressives in trying to put Bob in the Senate for at least the unexpired term of his father.

New York, July 20 GILBERT E. ROE

Books

Portrait in the Horizontal

By RUTH FITCH BARTLETT

By apple trees let him be measured,
Not by pines.
He has no spiked ambitions
But inclines
To tangled gestures, leisured,
Leaf-broken lines.

By fields and horizontal places,
Not by hills,
Nor Gothic cities judge him;
He fulfils
The destiny of ponds, behind the races
Of old saw mills.

First Glance

SEVEN new volumes in the Loeb Classical Library (Putnam: $2.50 each) include five which may be recorded as continuations of work already begun. A. T. Murray completes his spirited if somewhat troublesomely archaic translation of the "Iliad"; Harold N. Fowler with "The Statesman" and the "Philebus" and W. R. M. Lamb with the "Ion" carry Plato through a fourth volume; while A. M. Harmon contributes his fourth volume of Lucian, W. R. Paton his fourth of Polybius, and David Magie his second of the "Scriptores Historiae Augustae." The two remaining items, whatever may be the intrinsic importance of their contents, serve to emphasize the peculiar character of the service which the Library is performing. Its chief distinction, that is to say, lies in its scope. It explores the fringe as well as the center of its domain. Thereby it assists, of course, the classical student; but it also leads the layman into regions which he may only have suspected of existing. It is a long way, for instance, from the "Aeneid" to Frontinus, who was water commissioner under Trajan and whose humble treatises on "Stratagems" and "The Aqueducts of Rome" are given here in the versions of Charles E. Bennett and Clemens Herschel. The "De Aquis" is the earliest authority on a fascinating subject, and the curious reader will be grateful for its scrupulous, loving detail. E. C. Marchant's translation of the "Scripta Minora" attributed to Xenophon travels a long way, too, from the center. In a previous volume containing the "Oeconomicus" Mr. Marchant tried his hand at Xenophon the pedagogue; here he concludes the tale with seven treatises on politics, finance, war, horsemanship, and hunting. "On the Art of Horsemanship," by sheer virtue of its affection for facts, is a precious document; and one may like to find an immortal writing such utter prose as this: "To sum up: the horse that is sound in his feet, gentle and fairly speedy, has the will and the strength to stand work, and, above all, is obedient, is the horse that will, as a matter of course, give least trouble and the greatest measure of safety to his rider in warfare."

The limitations of space necessarily imposed upon the various authors of the series Our Debt to Greece and Rome (Marshall Jones: $1.50 each) work now for good and now for ill. John A. Scott's "Homer" seems scarcely to have given him room to turn around in. The same author's book on "The Unity of Homer" a few years ago was as smooth and ample as it was excellent. Here, however, Mr. Scott is hobbled. His very lack of opportunity to develop a few subjects fully forces him to start a great many subjects and nervously abandon them. And there are numerous surprising trivialities, such as the suggestion of a Homeric significance in the middle name of Charles Proteus Steinmetz. Even so, Mr. Scott manages to pay a characteristically passionate tribute to the first of poets; his energy, if not his art, is everywhere notable. Louis E. Lord's "Aristophanes" has fewer deficiencies of form, and Rodolfo Lanciani's "Ancient and Modern Rome" was licensed to be miscellaneous—though hardly to meander, as its picturesque pages, the work of a veteran antiquarian, too frequently do. A decidedly satisfactory member of the series is John Leofric Stocks's "Aristotelianism." A good deal of work had to be done in this case, and Mr. Stocks did it. His serviceable differentiation between Plato and Aristotle, his unpretentious outline of Aristotle's whole thought, and his capable summary of the Aristotelian influence seem to make the book a model for those which are to come after it.

MARK VAN DOREN

An American Poet

Collected Poems of H. D. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

SELDOM does a volume of collected poems present so even, so unchanging a texture as this. The consistency of form is remarkable, and it is a form which is neither more nor less convincing in the latest pieces than it was in "Sea Garden," which manifested a swift and perfect control of free verse such as perhaps no other American poet—or English poet, for that matter—has attained. There is no rhythmic fumbling in H. D.'s work. Monotony there is, but it is the necessary and excellent monotony of waves that tell always the same story and yet never the same. In some of the later poems there is rhyme, even regular stanzaic pattern, as in the beautiful Lethe. These incidental concessions to, or echoes of, the tradition neither contradict nor perfect the prevailing line of the verse. The occasional rhymes are but faint fire-fly illuminations of a form which is already sufficiently well defined as movement, of a delicately modulated speed which is always a little brusque yet always flowing. The clipped, eager cadences of such poems out of "Sea Garden" as The Helmsman:

[illegible]

or The Shrine:

You are useless,
O grave, O beautiful,
the [illegible]
you are useless,

are the same, psychologically if not prosodically, as the exquisitely high-whimsical dance of, say, Holy Satyr, which belongs to the latest volume, the "Heliodora" set:

Most holy Satyr,
like a goat,
with horns and hooves to match thy coat

of russet brown,
I make leaf-circlets and a crown of honey-flowers for thy throat.

There it was the full rush and impact of the wave—breaker and spray; here it is the same wave on the recoil, smoothed and foaming.

This poet is individual—it has been said over and over again—and very beautiful. Is it therefore necessary to say that she is strangely un-American or that she is a Greek, out of time? As for her Hellenism, I find it as little in her work as in the very French hexameters of Racine or in the lush beauties of the completely English Keats. H. D.'s world of content is either a highly personalized sea and rock and overlooked flower or it dissolves into the warmer lineaments of Aegean figures. Each world is symbol and nostalgia. But there is this difference, that the exquisite harshness of the earlier world was a more direct and intuitive expression of the poet's spirit; the later is more carefully discovered, more studiously colonized. For this reason I think there can be little doubt that for those who are more interested in the quick way of the spirit, however remotely it may happen to fall out from the known haunts of expression, than in the rediscovery of ancient and beautiful ways made apt once again for the hungering spirit—for such cultural dissenters "Sea Garden" remains H. D.'s most valuable gift. And this—need one expressly say?—is not to make light of the poems in which she has chosen the more easily recognizable, yet, for her, more devious, symbols.

H. D. is not un-American—far from it. Personal and remote as are her images, there breathes through her work a spirit which it would not be easy to come upon in any other quarter of the globe. The impatience of the rhythms and the voluptuous harshness and bleakness of the sea and shore and woodland images manifest it. Such violent restraint, such a passionate pleasure in the beauty of the denuded scene and the cutting thrust, themselves but inverse symbols of caress, could only develop in a culture that hungers for what it despises. H. D. is of those highly characteristic and most subtly moving American temperaments that long for an emotional wealth of expression, whether in terms of culture or of personal experience, that they cannot wholeheartedly desire—and must not, if they are to be true to themselves.

EDWARD SAPIR

The War-Guilt Again

The Roots and Causes of the War. By John S. Ewart. George H. Doran Company. 2 volumes. $12.50.

THIS is a very important contribution to a widening debate. The author is an eminent Canadian barrister who has given several years to a rich study now revealed in two copiously annotated volumes, and he has distinct opinions. None of the European powers, he is clear, fought for sentiment; on the contrary, each waged a war of its own for territorial gain or greater military security. The conflict is, to him, not one war but a number of wars. His subject he divides into permanent discontents, which he calls roots, and immediate provocations, which he terms causes. The two he discusses quite separately, and at the end of each chapter he formally states his conclusions.

In the present acute controversy over war origins, which side gains support from this work? The "revisionists," undoubtedly. Mr. Ewart, by wholly independent methods, arrives at conclusions strikingly similar to those put forth by the present reviewer some time ago and igorously reinforced by Professor Barnes now; the conclusions, namely, that Austria and Serbia were about equally to blame for a local war, that Russia and France were chiefly to blame for making it general, that Germany tried to call back Austria and pacify Russia, that Grey, condemned as a designer of war by Morel and the early "revisionists," was less designing than vacillating and incompetent.

On the roots, which he deems the more important, the author's research has been deepest; and there he has left little soil unturned. He distinctly includes British trade rivalry with Germany as an ingredient, for he does not palliate British imperialism. The Boer War he cites as an example of that. German imperialism was no worse than its rival, he says, and he attributes but moderate influence to the Nietzsches. Among the principal roots he places the Franco-Prussian War, and the reader, considering the late attempt to blame Germany for that war also, will be grateful for one hundred pages. His conclusion is flatly adverse to the French. As to the Ems affair, Louis Napoleon possessed the real facts through his own ambassador, concealed them, and declared the war.

In the matter of immediate provocations his minuteness is not so great. He should have buttressed this part with more references to Russian and Teutonic memoirs and to the Central European commentators. More ample use, too, should have been made of Paléologue's diary. That of Georges Louis was, of course, not available.

That the Allies were about as well prepared as Germany, that Austria-Hungary did not want war with any other power than Serbia, that she was not sure Russia would intervene, and that Russia had no honest purpose in aiding Serbia are among his conclusions. As to les jours tragiques, as Victor Margueritte sadly calls them, the author does not dwell excessively on the precise hours of telegrams; however, he emphasizes with sufficient distinctness the chain of movements.

Whether Russia had the right to intervene he will not today decide. Here he might have dwelt longer on Russia's intrigues in Serbia, since she could have no right to intervene in a war designed by herself. He had not before him the recent damaging confession of the Serbian Minister, Ljuba Jovanovich, as to the Serbian Cabinet's knowledge that the assassins had left Serbia for Serajevo. However, "Russia either had no right to intervene, or if she had, it was she who by her mobilization against Germany interrupted the negotiations for peaceful solution." It is not clear whether by this he means to imply that Austria would have accepted direct settlement with Russia, a point still doubtful. Yet it is clear that after July 25, as Dobrorolski says, Russia intended nothing less than war.

Germany's military element he concedes, but he is emphatic as to militarism in her neighbors. "Germany did not want a wider, a European war." Would he be influenced now by the recently published telegram of von Moltke, encouraging Austria at the eleventh hour? Probably not, for he has insisted that the German Government, through its civil heads still in control, the Kaiser and Hollweg, was urgently trying to stop Austria, while Viviani, a civil head of France, was slyly telegraphing Russia to go on with her mobilization in a safely secret way. As to Great Britain, she would not permit either France or Belgium to be occupied by Germany, no matter who began the war; but this not out of love for Belgium. Mr. Asquith's recent book he repeatedly rebukes. Germany having offered to respect Belgian neutrality should Great Britain remain neutral, he says that all Grey had to do to save Belgium was to keep Great Britain out of the war. "Grey was not anxious for a war, but he was quite determined that if it came between France and Germany, Great Britain would participate." He has not failed to note Grey's knowledge that France would follow Russia into a war, and he would doubtless censure Sir Edward's recent astonishing confession: "I felt impatient at the suggestion that it was for me to influence or restrain Russia." Strange words these! Sad words, too, when the repudiating Soviets argue now that the French loans to the Imperial Government were spent to create armies for ambitious France on Russian soil.

He accepts the opinion of the Russian Ambassador at London before the war that "Of all the powers France would accept war without great regret." Her desire to recover Alsace-Lorraine he justly describes as fluctuating, and, though a ready irritant at the service of politicians, not continuous. However, he deems this her primary inducement to war. In the Morocco affair he discusses Delcassé's concealing from Germany one treaty while he showed her another and a different one, and he follows but does not depend entirely upon the excellent work by Morel.

This book should be in every public library. It is a mine of invaluable data. FREDERICK BAUSMAN

The Reconstruction Negro

The Negro in South Carolina During the Reconstruction. By Alrutheus Ambush Taylor. Washington: The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History. $2.15.

THIS is the first of a series of volumes, prepared with the aid of funds granted by the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial, in which the history of the Negro in the South during the reconstruction period, and of the free Negro before the Civil War, is to be "definitively" recorded. Undoubtedly there is room for such a study, for the history of the Negro in America, notwithstanding all that has been written on the subject, still offers a rich field for the investigator. The reader of the present volume, however, will not get further than the first page of Mr. Taylor's introduction without discovering that the author has a bone to pick with his predecessors. Hardly anything that has been written of late about the Negro under reconstruction is, according to Mr. Taylor, to be trusted. Certain treatises which he does not name, but which students of the subject may easily identify since they are ascribed to Johns Hopkins and Columbia universities, evoke severe condemnation. "They were written," Mr. Taylor asserts, "to prove that the Negro is not capable of participation in government and to justify the methods of intimidation instituted to overthrow the reconstruction governments of the Southern commonwealths." Many of the writers were partisans interested in "trying to make a case before the world," selecting "such facts as would establish their point of view" and ignoring those to the contrary, and their books are "practically worthless." They further err in magnifying politics at the expense of economics, and in relying upon newspapers and other material "made by the very men who constituted the party of opposition."

These are serious charges. They would constitute, if proved, a deplorable reflection on American historical scholarship and the work of university departments of history. Unfortunately for the reputations of the writers whom he attacks but does not name, Mr. Taylor does not go on to support his allegations by citing, either in text or in footnotes, the offending statements or conclusions; he even omits reference to the meretricious treatises in his bibliography, and proceeds to write a history of the Negro in South Carolina under reconstruction from such sources as he deems worth while, leaving the erring writers who have preceded him to defend themselves as best they may.

The belligerent temper and superior air of the introduction, however, have not prevented Mr. Taylor from writing an extremely important book. He has made industrious use not only of the better-known sources but also of such material as newspapers, church records and histories, school announcements, diaries, letters, travels, and memorials of temporary political bodies which previous writers have somewhat neglected. The narrative, too, has a moderation and an impartiality which contrasts sharply with the tone of the introduction.

Mr. Taylor makes it clear that the Negroes of South Carolina as a whole did not become, at the close of the war, the shiftless, migratory, and quasi-criminal mass that they were widely believed to be. "The exception was the very degraded class of Negroes on the Sea Islands, rivaled only by the 150,000 poor whites of the upper counties in ignorance and excelled by them in crime." The economic situation improved even while the congressional plan of reconstruction, well calculated to embitter the relations between the races, was being carried out, the principal obstacles being the lack of capital, the derangement of prices as well as of agricultural methods, and the transition from the large plantation system to a system of small holdings. "After 1868 there was no serious disturbance of Negro labor until the whites injected politics into the question in 1876." Even the attempt to "revitalize" slavery by resort to vagrancy laws did not check economic recovery and readjustment.

Two chapters on educational and religious work among the Negroes, rich in statistical data not hitherto available in such systematic form, throw light upon the intellectual preparation of the Negro for citizenship and suffrage. Most of the Negro political leaders in the years when Northern adventurers were organizing the Negroes against the whites "were men of fair education," and many "showed adequate knowledge of politics and labored for the progress of the State, as attested by the native whites themselves." The actual frauds perpetrated upon the State by the reconstruction governments, and the part played by the Negroes in connection with them, appear to Mr. Taylor to have been grossly exaggerated. He quotes a contemporary writer in The Nation to the effect that "in the distribution of spoils the poor African gets the gilt and plush, the porcelain spittoons, the barbaric upholstery, while the astuter Caucasian clings to the solider and more durable advantages." The power of the ring was broken under Governor Chamberlain, but when the opposition, led by men like Butler and Gary, ceased to be a reform party and became "a racial-superiority-asserting group determined to eliminate the Negro from politics," the way was prepared for the corrupt careers of Wade Hampton and Tillman and the exclusion of Negroes from voting and office-holding.

A reading of the book leaves the impression that Mr. Taylor, in addition to making a painstaking study of the subject, has given the Negro greater credit for spirit and accomplishment than most writers on the reconstruction period have done, that both the political and the economic relations between the races have been set in a more friendly light, and that the conclusions, in the main at least, are justified by the facts. The broad outlines of events remain, of course, the same, but the additional details which Mr. Taylor is able to present, joined to the social relationships which he points out, at least make the story pleasanter and more hopeful read.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Wandering Thoughts

The Travel Diary of a Philosopher. By Hermann Count Keyserling. Harcourt, Brace and Company. 2 volumes. $10.

THERE is a saying that a thinker feels about traveling as a traveler feels about thinking. Each believes that the other is wasting his time. Count Keyserling purports to be an exception. He has traveled around the world for the sake of philosophizing. But the outcome of his journey was fatal. It confirmed exactly that which it meant to disprove. The thoughts of this wandering philosopher are wandering thoughts.

Despite his avidity for travel Count Keyserling is quite unlike the usual traveler; he is obsessed by philosophy. He studies not the things that he sees but the inner reactions aroused in him by all sorts of reminiscences from previous reading. While he contemplates the life of New York he thinks of St. Ambrose and Marcus Aurelius. In the slaughter-houses of Chicago he recalls Prince Wen Hui's cook, who knew a lot about Taoism. In China the Confucian spirit inspires him to talk about the difference between the Protestant and the Catholic churches. In Ceylon he discovers that the profundity of Leo Tolstoi is due to his limitations. Standing before the tombs of the Indian emperors and generals, he has the hallucination of hearing a Lutheran hymn. His thoughts despise systematic order; they are proud of being sporadic and of being inspired by accidental experiences. "Yesterday I watched some very curious flying fishes which flew up in surprise from the track of our steamer. My soul also produces similar phenomena."

How should one approach such a book in order to do justice to its author? We cannot regard it as a travel account, for the author does not care for facts; he deals merely with their significance, "which exists independently of them." Neither can we regard it as a philosophical thesis, for the author does not care for reasoning; his book is—as he says—a "work of fiction." Can we, then, read it as a novel? It lacks artistic form. The arrangement of the events is not planned; they are told in the same order as they happened. Parts could be added; parts could be omitted.

Count Keyserling is able to justify himself. His novel is formless only because it is intermixed with his thoughts. His thoughts are inconsistent only because they reflect his travels. Count Keyserling is master of that literary technique whereby each form prevents the other from being carried out to perfection. A novel that has no artistic structure, combined with ideas that have no logical coherence, and based on observations that make no claim for accuracy—what shall we call such a book? The reader, "prepared to follow the wanderer through his many moods and transformations," will feel like the melancholy Jaques when he remarked: "The sundry contemplation of my travels wraps me in a most humorous sadness."

"According to his autobiography Count Keyserling used to feel that his thoughts and his writings were ah ad of his own day and that for this reason he would in no way be representative of his age." The editor of the book takes pleasure in stating that in this respect the author was mistaken. And he was, indeed. His writings corresponded to a demand. They favored the irrationalistic tendencies which, a few years ago, bewildered European thought. The mixture which he had brewed was just fit for minds craving intoxication. Moreover, an Oriental vogue came to his aid. People were listening with delight to the songs of Rabindranath Tagore. They soon began to believe that the poet who had succeeded in dissolving their sorrows into a lyrical mood was able to dissolve also the causes of their sorrows. In the farce that was staged for this purpose Count Keyserling played the role of the prophet. He was the chief manager of the episode which, not unbefittingly, has been called the ninety-ninth return of Buddha.

Buddha has now returned to the East. He is sad because his Western audience found his preaching a little too simple. Count Keyserling is also sinking into oblivion. To call him "an outstanding figure of Germany today" is, speaking mildly, a chronological error.

EDGAR WIND

Books in Brief

Legislative Assemblies. By Robert Luce. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

Congressman Luce's second volume on the science of legislation is essentially an exploration of the structure and unofficial habits of legislatures. And it is marked by the same meticulous and minute exploration which made his first volume valuable—though uninforming as to the realities which lie behind the scenes in politics. There is the sam voluminous cumulation of evidence on every point. The work is, indeed, cyclopedic in its arra y of facts; no item in the catalog of legislative problems treated is left without as complete and exhaustive an investigation as is practicable in American and foreign sources. A wide range of problems is considered: the composition of senates, the length and frequency of sessions, qualifications for election, the lobby and various forms of bribery, salaries and expenses, and—most interesting perhaps—"customs, habits, and decorum." The reader will find a vast store of information and, what is more significant, the frank portrayal of the point of view of an extraordinarily able and experienced legislator toward the technique of his task.

Law and Freedom in the School. By George A. Coe. University of Chicago Press. $1.50.

Men and women who might else be moved to read books on education are frequently kept away by the technical verbiage or by an air of pedantic unreality, or sometimes by both. No such hindrances will be met in these thought-packed pages. Though the theme of Mr. Coe's essay sounds pedagogical enough—it is an examination of what the new "project-method" can teach about law and freedom—the reader soon finds himself pondering a problem of vital moment to people everywhere: "What is the best service which a healthy school can render to a sick society?" One cannot but wish that so stimulating a book as Mr. Coe's will reach a wide audience both within the schools and without.

A Gallery. By Philip Guedalla. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Mr. Philip Guedalla seems always to have been seeking the limits of brilliance, and now he has found them. This is a glittering book, as cold as it is shining. Primarily a dealer in personalities in the fields of literature and politics, Mr. Guedalla here turns his pen to Barrie and Kipling; to Bennett, Conrad, Galsworthy, Compton Mackenzie; to "The Seven Sleepers"—Stanley Baldwin, Macdonald, Marquess Curzon, A. Bonar Law, Austen Chamberlain, and the Lords Robert and Hugh Cecil; to "The Seven Lamps of Liberalism"—Lord Rosebery, Lord Morley, Lord Grey, Lord Haldane, Asquith, D. Lloyd George, and Mr. Winston Churchill; and to three "Shadows"—the Empress Eugénie, Marcel Proust, and Lady Palmerston. It is a pleasure to denominate the virtues one finds in these portraits, the quick, nervous movement, the vivid pictorial quality, an enchanting malice, and the rare capacity Mr. Guedalla has of handling heavy topics as though they were light ones. But when he writes of Proust's popularity as "this positively Marcel wave," when he yields without conscience and without discrimination to the temptation to turn a phrase in every other sentence, then he seduces not only his prose style but also his reader.

Who Will Remember. By Margaret Irwin. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

Souls adrift in time, incarnate now in one generation, now in another; a ghost story engrossingly told despite its shopworn mysticism.

THEATER

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Eves. 8:30
Mats. Thursday and Saturday

International Relations Section

Mexico's New Oil Law

MEXICO'S new petroleum law, which will be submitted for the approval of the Congress in September, when that body begins its regular session, was made public on July 20. This was done after President Calles had accepted the law as being, in his estimation, adequately interpretative of the spirit of Article 27 of the Mexican constitution, which provides that "in the nation shall be vested direct ownership of all . . . solid mineral fuels, petroleum, and all hydro-carbons, solid, liquid, or gaseous."

The law gives the President sole and full authority to grant concessions for petroleum exploration and exploitation and to regulate both, it confirms former concessions and leases and titles acquired prior to May 1, 1917, the industry is declared to be a public utility, and in the opening articles reaffirmation is made of the constitutional precept that Mexico exercises direct, permanent ownership of the subsoil. For reasons of space the detailed regulation regarding pipe lines are omitted.

ARTICLE 1. In the nation is vested direct ownership of all natural mixture of hydro-carbons deposited in the subsoil, regardless of their physical condition. The word "petroleum" when used in this law means all natural mixtures of hydrocarbons.

ART. 2. The direct ownership of the nation, referred to in the preceding paragraph, is inalienable and imprescriptible. Operations in the petroleum industry shall be permitted only by the express authorization of the federal executive, conceded within the terms of this law and under the regulations emanating from it.

ART. 3. The petroleum industry is a public utility. For this reason it shall be given precedence over all other exploitations of the surface. The surface shall be occupied or exploited in all cases required by the necessities of the petroleum industry and legal indemnity shall be paid the owner of the surface. By the petroleum industry is meant the discovery, the control, the transportation of pipe lines, and the refining of petroleum.

ART. 4. Mexicans and civil and commercial corporations organized under Mexican laws may obtain petroleum concessions, according to the provisions of this law. In addition to the above requirements, foreigners seeking concessions must previously comply with the requirements of Article 27 of the federal constitution. (With respect to waiving the right to appeal to diplomatic intercession.)

ART. 5. Rights derived from concessions granted in accordance with this law shall not be transferred in whole or part to foreign governments or sovereigns, nor shall they be granted any rights in such concessions, nor become partners or copartners in the same.

ART. 6. All matters connected with the control of the petroleum industry shall be under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government.

ART. 7. Concessions for the exploration for petroleum shall confer upon the holder of the concession the right to execute work which has for its object the discovery of petroleum. These concessions shall be issued by the Secretary of Industry, whose duty it shall be to see that the obligations under the concessions are rigidly complied with, upon the following conditions:

1. During the first three months of the life of the concession the holder shall obtain from the owner of the surface permission to occupy the lands which are required by the concessionaire, and shall enter into contract with the owner of the surface in which shall be stipulated the indemnity to be paid him by the concessionaire. In case it is impossible to come to an arrangement with the surface owner within three months, the concessionaire shall apply to the Secretary of Industry in order that he may obtain an extension of time in which to complete the arrangements with the surface owner.

2. In case the surface owner shall object to the work of exploration, the Secretary of Industry shall act as arbitrator, if the surface owner and the concessionaire agree to his acting in that capacity. Should they not so agree, the question shall be decided by the federal executive, who shall rule as to whether or not the property involved shall be occupied or expropriated in accordance with the necessities of the petroleum industry, providing that a guaranty shall be given by the concessionaire to indemnify the person or persons who shall own or control the surface for whatever damages or prejudices he or they may suffer through the work of exploration.

3. The concessionaire shall render to the Secretary of Industry once every three months a report as to his work under his concession and its results.

4. The Secretary of Industry shall every two years convoke a commission for the purpose of determining the limits of the explored zones in the republic. This commission shall be composed of a representative of the Secretary of Industry, one from the Treasury Department, and a third to be chosen by the petroleum companies. Within the two years following the determination of the limits above mentioned, concessions for exploration outside of these limits shall be designated as having been granted within a "new zone."

5. During the life of a concession and for three months afterward only the holder of a concession (for exploration) can obtain a concession for the exploitation of petroleum discovered by him in the zone named by his concession.

6. Within the first year of the date of the granting of a concession the holder must deposit with the federal treasury a guaranty, proportionate to the importance and the extension of the zone in which he purposes to operate. The amount of this deposit shall be fixed by the Secretary of Industry.

7. Concessions shall be granted for from one to five years, according to the judgment of the Secretary of Industry and to the extent and importance of the zone in which the concession is situated.

8. Providing he has complied with all the requirements of the law, the holder of a concession for exploration shall be given the preference for a new concession in the same zone.

ART. 8. Concessions for exploitation shall give the holder the right to control and dispose of petroleum. These concessions shall be granted by the Secretary of Industry, whose duty it shall be to see that obligations under the concession are rigidly complied with, upon the following conditions:

1. The concessionaire shall arrange with the owner of the surface for the payment to him of indemnities, in the same manner as is prescribed in the preceding article, in order that, once the concession for exploitation has been extended by the Secretary of Industry, the work of exploitation may proceed without delay.

2. Within the zone of exploitation the concessionaire shall have the right to establish all the installations which may be required for the extraction, transportation, and storing of petroleum.

3. Outside of the limits of the zone conceded to the concessionaire he shall have the right to obtain concessions for the laying of pipe lines, to construct roads, and to utilize federal waters under the corresponding laws.

4. Concessions for exploitation in "new zones" shall give to the holders for one year a right to a discount in the production tax, which shall be fixed by the commission referred to in section (4) of the preceding article at the same time at which they fix the limits of the explored zones.

5. The exploitation of a zone conceded under a concession shall not be interrupted for a period longer than six months without justifiable cause, according to the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce.

6. Concessions for exploitation in a zone can only be granted to the holder of a concession for exploration in the same zone.

7. The federal executive shall have the right to regulate the exploitation of wells of petroleum, in order to prevent their being exhausted prematurely.

8. No concession shall be granted for a period in excess of thirty years. At the termination of this period the holder of a concession who has complied with all of his obligations may obtain a new concession for the same zone.

ART. 9. The Secretary of Industry shall grant concessions for [illegible] pipe lines for public and for private use. Public pipe lines shall be used for the transportation of petroleum for [illegible] who may desire to utilize them for that purpose. Private pipe lines shall be used for the transportation of petroleum owned by the holder of the concession for the pipe line. . . .

ART. 10. The Secretary of Industry shall grant concessions for the establishment of refineries and plants for the utilization of natural gas in accordance with the following conditions:

1. These concessions shall be granted to those who are entitled to them, according to the requirements established in Article 4.

2. The concessionaires, in the operation of these concessions, shall be subject to police, health, and safety regulations, in order to safeguard the lives and health of employees, operators, and persons residing in the vicinity.

3. Free importation of materials shall in future be permitted for the construction of all plants for the refining of petroleum or for the utilization of natural gas.

ART. 11. Petroleum concessions on national lands shall be granted in the manner prescribed by this law, and concessionaires shall pay for the use of the surface in accordance with regulations on that point. Concessions shall provide that operations under them shall not interfere with public services.

ART. 12. Concessions delivered by the executive of the nation in accordance with previous laws shall be confirmed without cost, aside from that to which they are subjected by the present law and which shall be the same as those imposed upon concessions granted under this law.

ART. 13. Denunciations (of petroleum lands) made under the decrees of July 31 and August 8 and 12 of 1918 shall comply with the following regulations:

1. When title has not been issued and no opposition to the concession has been offered, the concession shall be granted in accordance with the provisions of this law.

2. If opposition has been offered and the title has not been issued, the controversy shall be decided in accordance with the decrees of July 31 and August 8 and 12 of 1918, and the concession shall be delivered to the person to whom it may be granted in accordance with the provisions of this law.

ART. 14. Petroleum rights granted under previous laws shall be confirmed without cost and by the medium of concessions delivered under this law, as follows:

1. To surface owners and their associates (causahabientes) who began petroleum operations before May 1, 1917.

2. To surface owners and their associates who notified the federal government before May 1, 1917, that they were in possession of lands upon which they designed to carry on exploitation of petroleum.

3. To the assignees of the right of exploitation, by means of contracts entered into before May 1, 1917, who have commenced the work of exploitation before the date of this law.

4. To the holders of concessions for exploitation, under contracts entered into before May 1, 1917, who before that date notified the federal government that they were in possession of lands designed for the exploitation of petroleum.

5. To pipe lines and refineries actually in operation by authorization of the Secretary of Industry.

ART. 15. Confirmation of petroleum rights must be solicited within the period of one year from the date of this law. After this period, if no application for confirmation has been made, the rights involved shall be considered as non-existent and the holders of such rights, the confirmation of which has not been solicited, shall have no claim against the government.

ART. 16. The federal executive shall have the right to designate reserve zones in free lands.

ART. 17. Concessions shall be subject to cancelation for the following reasons: (1) failure to work them regularly in the manner prescribed by law; (2) infraction of Article 5; (3) failure to make the deposit as required by sections (2) and (6) of Article 7.

ART. 18. Infractions of this law and of its regulations, which are not punishable by cancelation of concessions, shall render the concessionaire liable to a fine of from 100 to 500 pesos, to be imposed by the federal executive.

ART. 19. All of the activities of the petroleum industry shall be considered as mercantile and consequently subject to the laws of the commercial code and to the dispositions of the civil code of the federal district.

ART. 20. The federal executive is authorized to issue all of the regulations emanating from this law. . . .

When We Acquired Guam

WHEN the United States took over the island of Guam from Spain at the close of the Spanish-American War the following instructions, referred to in the article Thou Shalt Not Whistle—in Guam on page 206 of this number, were issued by the President:

NAVY DEPARTMENT
WASHINGTON

January 12, 1899

Instructions for the Military Commander of the island of Guam, Ladrones, Pacific Ocean

With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain by their representative-plenipotentiaries at Paris, on the 10th day of December, 1898, and as a result of the victories of the American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the island of Guam are ceded to the United States. In fulfilment of the rights of sovereignty thus acquired, the actual occupation and administration of the island of Guam become immediately necessary.

In performing this duty, the Military Commander of the United States is enjoined to make known to the inhabitants of the island of Guam that, in succeeding to the sovereignty of Spain, in severing the former political relations of the inhabitants, and in establishing a new political power, the authority of the United States is to be exerted for the security of the persons and property of the people of the island and the confirmation of all their private rights and relations. It will be the duty of the military commander to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors but as friends, to protect the natives in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. All persons who, either by active aid or by honest submission, cooperate with the government of the United States to give effect to these beneficent purposes, will receive due reward and support and protection. All others will be brought within the lawful rule we have assumed, with firmness, if need be, but without severity as far as it may be possible.

Within the absolute domain of the naval authority, which necessarily is and must remain supreme in the ceded territory, until the legislators of the United States shall otherwise provide, the municipal laws of the territory, in respect to private rights and property and the repression of crime, are to be considered as continuing in force and to be administered by the ordinary tribunals of civil and municipal government so far as practicable. The operations of the civil and municipal government are to be performed by such officers as may accept the supremacy of the United States by taking oath of allegiance, or by officers chosen as far as may be practicable from the inhabitants of the island.

While the control of all public property and the revenue of state passes with the cession, and while the use and management of all public means of transportation are necessary to the authority of the United States, private property, whether belonging to individuals or corporations, is to be respected except for causes duly established. The taxes and duties, heretofore payable by the inhabitants to the late governor, become payable to the authorities of the United States unless it be seen fit to substitute for them other reasonable rates or modes of contribution to the expenses of the government, whether general or local. If private property be taken for military use, it shall be paid for, when possible, in cash at a fair valuation and when payment in cash is not practicable receipts are to be given.

All ports and places in the island of Guam in the actual possession of the naval forces of the United States will be opened to the commerce of all friendly nations. All goods and wares, not prohibited for military reasons by due announcement of the naval authority, will be admitted upon payment of such duties and other charges as shall be in force at the time of their importation.

Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the naval administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the island of Guam, by securing to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the inheritance of all free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild way of justice and right for arbitrary rule. In the fulfilment of this high mission, supporting the temperate administration of affairs for the greatest good of the governed, there must be sedulously maintained the strong arm of authority, to repress disturbances and to overcome all obstacles to the bestowal of blessings of good and stable government upon the people of the island of Guam under the free flag of the United States.

[Signed] WILLIAM MCKINLEY

[Signed] JOHN D. LONG, Secretary of the Navy

Contributors to This Issue

CHARLES W. WOOD began his career as a locomotive fireman. He won a prize in an essay contest and got a position on a Syracuse paper. For years he was a special writer for the New York Sunday World and later for Collier's Weekly.

ARTHUR WARNER, associate editor of The Nation, has given special study to the island victims of American imperialism. He spent some time in Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands in 1923, and wrote a series of articles about those countries for The Nation.

R. V. HARDON was, for fifteen years, a newspaper man in New York, Chicago, and San Francisco. His present occupation, described in his article, Writing for Money, allows him to spend his summers on Cape Cod and his winters in Europe.

RUTH FITCH BARTLETT is editor of the Junior League Bulletin, and a contributor of articles and poems to the Century Magazine, Books, etc.

EDWARD SAPIR is leaving the staff of the Victoria Memorial Museum in Ottawa to become associate professor of anthropology at the University of Chicago.

FREDERICK BAUSMAN, a former judge, now living in Seattle, Washington, is the author of "Let France Explain."

WILLIAM MACDONALD was an associate editor of The Nation from 1918 to 1920. He has written numerous books on American history and politics.

EDGAR WIND is a German student of philosophy living at present in New York.

WORKERS' EDUCATION IN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES

By MARGARET T. HODGEN

Deals sympathetically with the history, organization and policies of the considerable number of efforts which have been made to enrich the life of the wage-earners, especially of manual workers, during the last hundred years by giving them a cultural education over and above what they have gotten at school. It is a clearly written, excellently documented work. $5.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 5th Ave., N. Y.

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

Libby Castle

Fort Washington Ave at 193d Street New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Children 4-12 Years

School Bus

New Home of Hoffmann School

accept nothing but

Non Depressant non Habit Forming In Convenient Aluminum Boxes At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c 10 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 91 N. Moore Street, New York

Through Silver Bow Canyon on Montana's Continental Divide, prospectors once led pack mules, long ore-trains are now hauled by electric locomotives.

Tons and tons—electrically!

When a railroad wants to save money, what should it do?

"Electrify," answers the Butte, Anaconda & Pacific Railway.

It's not a long road but it's very important. Five million tons of copper ore go over it every year, and—because electricity has lowered its operating costs—there is a saving on every ton.

All apparatus for the electrification of this railway was furnished by the General Electric Company—and this includes electric locomotives, transformers, switchboards, and overhead construction. Power from the Missouri River at Great Falls, Montana, is efficiently furnished by six G-E hydro-electric generators.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

THE EVOLUTION OF MAN

By WILHELM BOELSCHE. A brief, simple and clear statement of the case for evolution, including much evidence discovered since Darwin's death. Can be read in two hours. Cloth, illustrated, 60 cents postpaid.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

MT. AIRY (near Croton-on-Hudson) is a community for artists and writers within commuting distance of New York. It is high, dry and heavily wooded with many beautiful views of the Hudson and easy access to a service of 100 trains daily. Adjoining the village of Croton with shops and stores, it will have a social and communal life all its own. 1-4 acre of land $250 to $400. Cash or terms. (30% sold). Address Harry Kelly, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Chelsea 0432.

MISCELLANEOUS

See page ii for Summer Places

ANTIOCH ACADEMY, Yellow Springs, Ohio

Two or three Children of 12-15 may be boarded in home of experienced educator. References asked and given. Address William H. Bridge, Hunter College, New York City.

FOLDER PROPOSING COLONIZATION of undeveloped natural resources in British Columbia, along lines of Industrial Democracy, sent free by The Cooperative Club, P. O. Box 1248, San Francisco, Calif.

German Books a Specialty

W. BEYER, Inc. Books and Art

Now at 259 5th Avenue

Bet. 28th and 29th Streets. New York

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

One Policy, One System, Universal Service

Study at Home

Become More Efficient

Courses in Mathematics, Economics, Engineering, Languages, Accounting, Secretarial Studies, Civil Service, Law, Medicine, Journalism, Normal Courses leading to either High School or College Credit. Start any time.

The University of Chicago

57 Ellis Hall CHICAGO, ILL.

POSITIONS WANTED

REPORTER—Young man 25 desires position reporting [illegible]. No experience. Wants to start at bottom. Completed two courses in journalism. Box [illegible]

YOUNG woman [illegible] experienced with art and ideas wishes position of unusual interest, preferably one involving foreign travel. Graduate of [illegible] Librarian. Box [illegible] care The Nation.

ANY CHANGE OF ADDRESS

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT

The Nation

20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

In writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1925 No. 3138

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 219

EDITORIALS:

Mr. Mellon's "Tax Relief" 222

Debts and Deception 223

Biography and Brilliance 223

Hints for Swimmers 224

BRITISH CONSTITUTIONALISM AND THE COAL SETTLEMENT. By J. Ramsay MacDonald 225

THE AMERICAN BACKGROUND. By Edgar Lee Masters 226

INDIA AND OPIUM. By Gertrude Marvin Williams 229

A TURKISH DIVORCE. By Louise Bryant 231

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 231

CORRESPONDENCE 233

BOOKS:

The Box. By Marguerite Arnold 235

The Problem of Donne. By Jacob Zeitlin 235

The Atom Explained. By Gerald L. Wendt 236

Fiction of the Revolution. By Dorothy Brewster 237

Paul Bunyan. By J. Frank Dobie 237

William Burnham. By C. Hartley Grattan 238

Back to Rousseau. By F. H. Hankins 238

Catholicism in France. By Charles H. A. Wager 239

Books in Brief 239

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

An Indian on Opium 242

Gandhi on Birth Control 243

Our Marines in Nicaragua 243

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor Literary Editor

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscription and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

"TOO LATE" IS A CRY that dogs the great powers' footsteps in China. On August 5 formal ratifications of the treaties and resolutions adopted by the Washington Conference almost four years ago were finally exchanged. It took the Shanghai strike, and the uprisings and anti-foreign outbreaks all over China, to stir the laggard diplomats into even that petty step. But those documents are mere expressions of good intentions. What will the powers do to put them into effect? Had the conference to discuss permitting China to raise her customs duties been held promptly it might have made an impression in China. It is too late. The Chinese will be satisfied with nothing less than recovery of their lost fiscal autonomy. They do not ask—not yet—to control their own customs administration; they ask merely that the powers abrogate their treaty right to censor any Chinese attempt to revise her obsolete customs schedule. The Peking Government has stated that it will not at this time ask consideration of the other great question raised at Washington: that of extraterritoriality. Peking is willing to postpone that question because it knows that the powers would utilize discussion of it only as a megaphone through which to broadcast stories of chaos in present-day China, and the powers will not insist. Yet any student of history knows that sooner or later China will cast off extraterritoriality as Turkey has cast it off. The only questions are When, and How. Will the powers act voluntarily, or will they wait until China, angered, does it at the cost of blood?

SOME OF THE ALIEN BUSINESS MEN in China want bloodshed. "The evidence grows," Thomas F. Millard says in one of a series of notable dispatches from Shanghai to the New York Times, "that foreign Bourbonism here is willing to see chaos ensue provided this provokes military intervention, thereby indefinitely extending the existing foreign privileges." The British press in China, he says, is particularly aggressive. Mr. Millard sees "a conflict between the American China policy and Bourbonism based upon the historic British and European policies in Asia." Doubtless Washington has a more enlightened intention than London or Paris; but China has precious little reason to distinguish between the two. In practice we are doing England's dirty work for her. Our gunboats turn their guns on Shanghai; our marines police the city; and the enlightened good intentions of Mr. Coolidge in Washington have not yet penetrated British obstruction sufficiently to be visible in the Celestial Empire. The Chinese have a right to be cynical. The legations at Peking investigated the Shanghai shootings at once, and reported more than six weeks ago. Why has the report not been published? Is it because it blames a British police official and an American office-holder?

AN ENGLISH WIT remarked, after studying the Allied project of a "security pact," that whereas the last war was a war to end war, this pact made it plain that the next war would have to be a war to end wars to end war. The French see peace only through a haze of war. They refuse to feel safe without guaranties that other nations are ready to make war to prevent war. And so long as the Franco-British parleys tend simply to clarify and define this conviction of the French they do not move Europe very far along the path to peace. Prolonged sessions at London have resulted, the official communiques tell us, in "complete unanimity." For any conception of the content of that unanimity we have to depend upon leakages to the semi-official journalists. The French correspondents assure us that M. Briand's farewell smile was due to Austen Chamberlain's assent to the French definition of "flagrant aggression on the part of Germany" as "either open preparation for invasion or actual invasion." In either case France would have the right to take immediate defensive measures without consulting England or the League of Nations. In that case the "peace pact," instead of adding to the guaranties incorporated in the Covenant of the League, would reduce them. It would give France a freer hand than ever, and the mutual aspects of the pact, so much discussed a few months ago, would have been totally lost.

CONVERSATIONS between France, England, and Germany are now in order. This appears to be a compromise between the French opposition to discussion with the Germans except in terms of ultimatums and the British desire for a tripartite conference. "Conversations," says M. Briand, "are better than conferences. Conferences and notes are too formal." So the ambassadors and foreign ministers are to converse. That marks a tiny step forward. Notes are irrevocable; once sent, their authors feel obliged to be consistent with them, however time may change their views. In conversations even a statesman, we suppose, may allow himself to be tentative. If these conversations are really joint conversations, in which German suggestions are treated as worthy of the same consideration given to French or British proposals, they may initiate a new era in post-war diplomacy. And the strongest ground for hope that this will be the case is the appearance of the American Ambassador as an apparent participant in the diplomatic conversations. However much one may doubt the usefulness of American participation in formal security parleys, one knows that Mr. Houghton's influence at any gathering will be cast for common sense and mutual confidence and respect.

OUT OF THE RUHR the French troops have marched, but they are still in the Rhineland and they behave there as armies of occupation always do. The following notice, signed by the Gutenberg Society of Mainz and sent to us by a subscriber, is a significant straw:

> The annual ceremony of the Mainz printers at the Gutenberg statue and the illumination of Gutenberg Square on the five hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Gutenberg's birth and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Gutenberg Museum is not authorized by the occupation authorities. The commemoration of the great inventor will, therefore, be included in the special program at the Municipal Theater on Saturday, June 27, at 8 p. m. Similarly the Johannisfest of the printers, which has been celebrated annually in the Stadtpark, cannot take place this year. Furthermore, the illumination of the Rhine bank and of the Mainz bridges, which was to conclude the ceremony on Monday, June 29, 1925, is not permitted. There will be no change in the rest of the program. . . .

EDMUND STINNES, son of Germany's industrial magician, has made a grandstand play which brought him front-page headlines on both sides of the Atlantic. But behind the advertised offer to the workers of stock worth, at par, half a million dollars, is a sordid story of financial intrigue. The elder Stinnes played both ends against the middle through the heartrending years of Germany's collapse. He borrowed money when it was worth something, repaid it when it had dropped to a tenth its former value, bought new enterprises with his borrowed money, paid his workers so late that they lost much of the value of their wages, and forced the employees, on the plea of hard times, to work longer hours. He died a year ago, hailed as an industrial statesman of the first rank. In reality he was primarily a lucky and unscrupulous speculator. Now that the mark has been stabilized the topsy-turvy structure he erected is crashing. A government-sponsored syndicate of banks first lent money to the Stinnes brothers; then, discovering obligations beyond their wildest dreams, refused further advances. The surviving wizard have been endeavoring to persuade the public that they are gullible young men being victimized by unscrupulous banks. But neither they nor their father ever betrayed any hint of a sense of responsibility to public or employees, and the offer to give away a block of stock, title to which was doubtful, was a bit of irresponsible stage-acting. We are glad that the workers had the courage to refuse it. The sudden rise and equally sudden fall of the Stinnes fortunes is an instructive revelation of the unsoundness of modern business "statesmanship."

TAMMANY HALL, having twice foisted the irascible Mr. Hylan on New York City, has tired of its Mayor's incompetence. He has steadfastly fought increases in the subway fares, but taxes have risen, new subways have not been built, and the schools have not kept pace with the hordes of school-children. Mayor Hylan thought that he could defy the bosses in his own party wigwam and demanded renomination, but he reckoned without "Al" Smith. The Governor, having learned by experience the utter incompetence of the city's chief executive, was adamant. Tammany hates a fight within the ranks, but the issue was forced, and the Governor's lieutenant, "Jimmy" Walker, Democratic leader in the State Senate, will run against the Mayor in the Democratic primaries. Walker is as authentic a product of New York City as his chief—a rough-and-tumble, self-educated man with an amazing talent for absorbing complicated figures and a genuine understanding of popular psychology. Besides being the author of that Volkslied "Will You Love Me in December as You Did in May?" he is an effective catch-as-catch-can debater and a capable executive. The Republicans, meanwhile, are having their usual organization rows. We predict the advent of Mayor Walker, but if we had our way we should swing the election to Norman Thomas, whom the Socialist Party has had the wisdom to nominate.

UPHELD BY FEWER than a thousand votes out of a scant total of 40,000, the victory of the proportional representation system of elections in Cleveland at the referendum August 11 was none the less real. Against "P. R.," and for the old charter method of electing city councilmen by individual wards, were arrayed the organization, resources, and leadership of both major political parties. Newton D. Baker, Democratic ex-Secretary of War, publicly opened the campaign against P. R.; "Gus" Hirstius, Republican chief clerk of the election board, carried it on; and petitions for the referendum were circulated by employees of the Board of Elections. The only supporters of P. R. were the independents, with four members of the council. No assault was made on the city-manager plan this year, but it was generally believed that its turn would come next. The election has proved again that Clevelanders prefer thinking for themselves to blindly following the dictates of professional politicians. Last November [illegible] for La Follette.

ITALY UNDER MUSSOLINI is one of the absolutist spots of Europe, and we have had little of a liberal character to record there since the arrival of Fascism. Yet, in one respect at least, Mussolini and his Black Shirts have a tolerance that we in the United States have not yet learned. They clap more people into jail for their political opinions than we do; but they do occasionally let them out. Fascism has now issued its third amnesty decree, this time in honor of the completion of a quarter century's rule by King Victor Emmanuel. Under the new edict it is estimated that some 10,000 persons will be liberated. Meanwhile, according to the lately organized International Labor Defense, 23 South Lincoln Street, Chicago, there are no fewer than 128 persons in American jails because of their opinions or their activity in behalf of the workers' cause. They are there through convictions under the so-called criminal-syndicalism laws that still stand on the statute-books of thirty-five States and have generally been validated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court against Benjamin Gitlow. Our indifference to the national shame of this continuing political persecution is one of the severest indictments which Europe can bring against us. Fascist Italy is sometimes more noble-minded.

THE AMY LOWELL POETRY Traveling Scholarship is something new in literature, and something eminently desirable. Miss Lowell's will provides for an annual fund of $2,000 which shall be bestowed by a committee, consisting of one Harvard professor and two American poets of standing, upon a poet of promise who will engage to absent himself for a year from the continent of North America and practice his art. Most of the terms of the foundation are as liberal as Miss Lowell herself was. She merely indicates, for instance, that in the choice of committees and candidates "preference" should be given to persons "of progressive literary tendencies." On the point of expatriation, however, she seems to have been adamant. Her disinclination to the American scene as such was well known; having been everywhere herself, she put great emphasis upon the value of a knowledge of the earth's surface—and by her will she evidently hoped to extend this knowledge among the writers who should follow her. The scholarship is one of many which the republic needs.

OUR LIBRARIES stand with our schools and our press as the great educators of the public, and one of the big jobs of the libraries is to assist the schools in the training of their pupils. Another, as we pointed out lately, is to make more available the great ocean of information appearing in the press. The American Library Association has a committee on library survey at work at the present time, the result of whose findings will doubtless be to suggest new methods for accomplishing both of these purposes. But how are the libraries to undertake new and better work unless they have the means with which to do it? Even the New York Public Library, one of the most important and largely used in the world, lacks sufficient funds to buy new books or keep in order its present volumes which are said to be declining at the rate of 11,000 a year. The library is asking the city for an appropriation of $253,300 for new books and for a uniform increase of $400 a year in the salaries of employees. Both are needed. A library is of little use to the public without a trained and willing staff in charge. When one realizes that 46 per cent of the staff of the New York Public Library [illegible] $19 to $23.50 a week, there can be no surprise that they are leaving at the rate of 21 per cent a year. A great library deserves more generous and business-like treatment.

THE AUTOMOBILE is inevitably the producer of a vast amount of favoritism and snobbery but of hardly any that is more offensive than that in connection with the granting of a special right of way to certain persons. In New York City the number of cars bearing police-department shields [illegible] traffic regulations and giving them the right of way over all other vehicles—has become such a scandal that it is under investigation. So long as favors are extended at all, there is no controlling them. A New York newspaper recently said that the use of a police-department shield by a certain woman had been questioned but upon inquiry was found to be legitimate because her brother was a surgeon in the police department! The other day a Philadelphia couple obtained a special right of way to dash across the State of New Jersey to the bedside of a dying daughter in Atlantic City. One can sympathize with their haste, but the trip was not only an inconvenience but a danger to everyone else on the route and in all probability could have been accomplished as quickly by train. The public interest justifies a right of way over other vehicles to fire apparatus, ambulances, and probably mail trucks; they should have such a right by law, not by executive favor. No right should exist in the Police Department of New York or any other city to repeal the traffic regulations in favor of a mayor or any other citizen, and no self-respecting mayor or other citizen would accept an exemption which must obviously be exercised to the inconvenience and danger of others.

HOW EASY must be the task of the circulation department of our noble contemporary, the Dearborn Independent! It has only to open its hands and take the subscriptions of all wise and ambitious Ford employees, discreetly prompted by such a circular letter as this to the staff of the new Ford Hospital in Detroit:

FORD MOTOR COMPANY
Detroit, Michigan

In replying refer to DETROIT BRANCH

All statements or agreements contained in this letter are contingent on strikes, accidents, fires, or [illegible] and all contracts are subject to approval by the signature of a duly authorized executive officer of this company. Clerical errors subject to correction.

ALL HENRY FORD HOSPITAL EMPLOYEES

We know that all employees of the Henry Ford Hospital will be glad to subscribe for the Dearborn Independent, for by so doing you will be receiving the best up-to-the minute articles and editorials at the lowest possible price, and will also be lending your cooperation in reaching the mark of 1,000,000 subscribers, which has been set for this year.

Mr. Beelby will be at the pay office all day Monday, July 20, to receive your subscriptions.

Make Henry Ford Hospital 100 per cent.

OF ENGLAND'S many curious organizations for accomplishing remarkable objects none has ever appealed to us more than the Large Black Pig Society. The King himself, we understand, is its president, but that is an inconsequential consideration beside the society's name. We are glad to report to Americans a problem which is agitating the society: to wit, the best way of marking the animals for whose good and welfare it exists. "It is quite simple," says a spokesman for the society, "to tattoo white pigs," but, as the Manchester Guardian puts it, "where is the ink, and where are the instruments to apply it, which will show up so unmistakably against a hide which (as visitors to agricultural shows may remember) resembles so closely a well-blacked stove slightly covered with sparse whiskers?" This, we feel, is a problem in solid realities beside which the continuance of the coal industry and the dole to the unemployed become evanescent bubbles. Some of our readers, we hope, will help the Large Black Pig Society with suggestions for the best way of marking "a somber expanse of perambulating pork."

Mr. Mellon's "Tax Relief"

A WELL-INFORMED Washington correspondent outlines the Treasury's plan for tax reduction as follows: (1) Reduce the basic normal tax from 6 per cent to 5 per cent; (2) reduce the surtax to a maximum of 20 per cent; (3) abolish the federal estate tax; (4) reduce the present 12½ per cent corporation income tax if prospective revenue justifies, but not by graduating the tax downward on the basis of total income. The idea of a graduated tax on corporations, this correspondent states, is contrary to the Administration policy of encouraging the transaction of business in large units. If the American position is to be maintained in the vigorous competition for world trade, Mr. Mellon believes, business must not be disturbed by inefficient attempts to encourage small business and competition.

We do not vouch for the correctness of this information; the Treasury may change its ground again before Congress meets. In principle, however, each new position of Mr. Mellon is just the same as his old one, only more so. For more than four years now he has been shaping federal taxation according to a perfectly definite theory; changes have been due only to political exigencies.

Bluntly stated his theory is this: So far as possible the rich should be freed from heavy taxation, so that they may accumulate more capital and thus employ the poor, who will then have work and the ability to pay taxes. More suavely: Free business from taxation so that it may accumulate capital, cause prosperity, and employ labor; then taxes will come from somewhere. It is a pleasant theory held comfortably by the everyday business man. In fact, judging from the tons of incense burned by the newspapers before Mr. Mellon's shrine, and from the verdict in last November's election, we gather that it is held explicitly or implicitly by a large majority of our fellow-citizens. With our usual cantankerousness, we must dissent.

Consider a part of what Mr. Mellon has already accomplished. The excess-profits taxes of unlamented memory have disappeared, spurlos versenkt. The surtaxes on big incomes have fallen from 65 per cent to 40 per cent, and Mr. Mellon almost committed hara-kiri a year ago because they were not lowered to the sacred figure of 25 per cent. By a neat provision of the law of 1921 capital gains were taxed only 12½ per cent; but taxpayers were allowed to deduct capital losses in toto from their taxable income. Under this benign provision the 3,066 richest taxpayers (who had each paid on $100,000 or more in 1916) had up to 1923 deducted $610,000,000 from their taxable income for losses. This manifestly enabled them to save a tidy sum out of taxes and thus preserve it to the "productive capital" of this great country. We will not rehearse Mr. Mellon's exploits further. Suffice it to say that wherever this second Alexander Hamilton has seen a chance to take taxation off the business man and the wealthy citizen, he has done so.

But what has this financial wizard done with the tariff, a tax which, so far as it is actually effective, comes out of the pocket of the miserable and ubiquitous ultimate consumer in the form of higher prices for both the imported and the domestic product, be it honest woolen clothing or aluminum saucepans? Has Mr. Mellon wept for him? Not so. Your consumers of saucepans do not furnish that "spirit of business adventure" which according to Mr. Mellon has given our fair land "the foremost position in the world." They do not add to the capital on which our civilization rises. So our tariff has gone up and up, and Br'er Mellon he ain't say nuffin'; while all proposals for reduction, thanks to the marvelous "flexible" provisions that we now enjoy, sleep safely in the files of a "scientific" tariff commission, benevolently watched over by the former secretary of the Home Market Club. Meanwhile capital beneficently accumulates.

What next? Rapid payment of the war debt, while money is still comparatively cheap? Mr. Mellon seems to think it would be well to leave something for the next generation to pay. Instead of paying the war debt now, he wants to reduce taxes again, and accumulate capital. How? Let us repeat his masterly program: First, by reducing the normal income tax from 6 per cent to 5 per cent (which sounds well, but affects nobody with less than $8,000 of taxable income); second, by scaling the surtax from a maximum of 40 per cent to one of 20 per cent (it was to be an absolutely "scientific" 25 per cent, determined by immutable economic laws, during those long months when Horatio Mellon stood at the bridge last year); third, by abolishing the estate tax, which now takes productive capital from the children of perfectly good dead capitalists to squander it in paying off government debts; and finally, by reducing the 12½ per cent corporation tax, so that our corporations may add their profits to capital instead of wasting them in taxes!

We do not complain of Mr. Mellon's principle, nor do we charge that he adopted it simply to feather his own already well-feathered nest. On the contrary, we think he honestly believes this principle to be "for the good of the country," whatever that may mean. We do not repine, either, because our fellow-Americans agree with Mr. Mellon instead of with us. "If they like that sort of thing, that's just the sort of thing they like." We only point out that Mr. Mellon's scheme is based on an archaic political economy that was buried in the same grave with McCulloch and James Mill and Nassau Senior, only to be resurrected by that large body of contemporary business economists who wish to be dispensed from the necessity of thinking. Most governments had to abandon such a basis of taxation long ago. The United States is so egregiously rich that it can still without disaster continue to lug along this dead weight of outworn economic and social ideas, still practice the good old motto: "Every man for himself, and the devil take the hindmost." If one searches thoughtfully the teachings of modern economic science, however, he finds them supporting rather a canon of taxation made familiar in England by the Labor Party: "The surplus wealth for the common good." We who oppose Mr. Mellon's business philosophy may be fighting a losing battle for the time being, but at any rate we will not be intimidated by the beating of his big bass drum, the blaring and blahing of the press saxophones, and the shrill tooting of the economic piccolos that assume to pipe for business. We know too well that there are always good reasons why somebody else should pay the taxes.

Debts and Deception

THE terms finally agreed upon between this country and Belgium for the settlement of the latter's debt to our government will constitute one of the most significant steps in post-war finance. The sum involved is only about one-tenth as large as Great Britain's debt to us but the principle will probably be used in settling the French and Italian obligations as well. For Europe the settlement will be more important than that with Great Britain because it will affect a group of nations whose finances are in a condition so precarious that any change in them is reflected throughout the Continent.

The great difference between the British debt settlement and what may be called the Belgian-French-Italian negotiations is that Great Britain was known to be solvent and capable of paying substantially in full, while the other European Allies would, if they were business corporations, long since have been obliged to go into bankruptcy; intelligent students of finance do not expect them ever to pay their debts to the United States in full, nor even to settle their internal obligations without tremendous losses to those who lent to them when their currencies were at or near their gold parity.

Intelligent students of finance know these things, we say, but politicians and newspaper editors in this country have been unwilling to admit them publicly, and the American people have been allowed to form a fixed and general belief that our European government debtors can—and therefore ought to—pay their debts to us in full and with interest. The Administration in Washington—both under Harding and until lately under Coolidge—has been the chief propagandist of this theory, although it is now veering around to a more realistic attitude. The insistence that there can be no cancelation is apparently to be abandoned, although in so discreet a manner that the man in the street will not recognize it. We are going to compromise our claims and accept what we can get, although it will be done behind a mass of technical words and figures intended to conceal the facts from the average citizen.

Even with Great Britain the terms of our agreement do not provide for settlement in full—in spite of the sixty-two years over which payments are spread—although the notion has been conveyed that the British have bound themselves to pay to the last penny. The fact is that for the first ten years Great Britain is paying interest at 3 per cent, and after that will pay 3½ per cent, while we are still paying an average of nearly 4¼ per cent on the war bonds out of which we borrowed money to lend to Europe. In a study of our debt agreements made so far—those with Great Britain, Hungary, Finland, Lithuania, and Poland—the National Industrial Conference Board says:

> The rate of interest on the funded foreign debt, averaged over the entire period, is 3.42 per cent, or approximately three-fourths of 1 per cent under the prevailing rate of interest now paid by the United States Government on its own obligations. It must be remembered, however, that there is included in the funded debt the amount of interest that had accumulated and remained unpaid at the time of funding and that this unpaid interest is now itself bearing interest, the operation thus partaking of the nature of compound interest to a limited degree. . . .
>
> If it is assumed that the United States will not be able to refund its maturing war obligations during the British funding period on the basis of a yield lower than 4¼ per cent, the total cost of the British funding agreement to the American people may be set at $1,581,000,000, or a sacrifice of 34.4 per cent of the new principal involved.

The National Industrial Conference Board adds that the loss will not, in fact, be quite so high, since there is every prospect that we shall be able to renew our loans at somewhat less than 4¼ per cent.

We are not attacking the official change in front whereby our European debtors are to be allowed to pay what they can in place of the previous inflexible American policy which demanded everything and got nothing. On the contrary, The Nation proposed soon after the armistice that all our foreign debt be canceled in return for a decent European policy, which would have involved corresponding reductions in the German indemnities. Had this been done the financial collapse of Germany and the near-financial breakdown of France might have been averted.

Only we think Mr. Coolidge should not be allowed to fool our people into believing they are getting a hundred cents on the dollar when in fact they are accepting only a promise of such fraction of that sum as our debtors choose to tender.

Biography and Brilliance

WE are becoming so accustomed to the brief and "pertinent" biography, and so familiar with the claim that it has supplanted for all time to come its older and longer brother, that we are likely—if we do not look about us—to consider the art of Boswell, for instance, to be dead. We hear that Mr. Strachey has changed everything; that the future, indeed, belongs to his kind of biographical essay. And it would be difficult to exaggerate the value of a technique which consists in selection and selection only—the assumption being, naturally, that the details are picked by a mind which possesses a point of view. This technique has given us Mr. Strachey in England and Mr. Bradford in America, not to speak of their many engaging followers. For that matter it gave our ancestors Plutarch—one, too, who possessed a point of view, though it was considerably more pious than that which we relish in the somewhat cynical essayists of the twentieth century. Merely so far as technique goes, there is little or no difference between Plutarch and Mr. Strachey. One hunted for facts which should prove that the actions of men—Alcibiades, Fabius—have a moral significance; the other hunts for facts which shall demonstrate all motives—in General Gordon, in Prince Albert—to partake of the madness which is inherent in human energy. Both condescended to their subjects, and both were brilliant men.

But we have only to look about us to be reminded that the long biography still lives and flourishes. Against Mr. Strachey in England must be counted Henry Festing Jones, and along with Mr. Bradford in America there are Horace Traubel, Albert Bigelow Paine, and Archibald Henderson. These—to name no others—amply carry on the tradition of Boswell, of Eckermann, and of Masson. They serve also as reminders that the art of biography need not consist in selection only, or indeed in selection at all. What conceivable thing, for instance, did Mr. Jones leave out of his life of Samuel Butler? What chance remark of the aging Walt Whitman seemed insignificant to Mr. Traubel? Where did Mr. Paine ever trim Mark Twain? And what that Mr. Henderson could find out about Bernard Shaw did he suppress? They put everything in, whether it was picturesque or not; and the result in each case was something grandly picturesque after all. The point of view was not there, and yet it was there—in us, perhaps, after we had finished with our reading. The only piety in the biographers was the piety which they felt toward their heroes, and their only cynicism was that with which they might wave away criticism of those heroes. There is something, if not much, in the theory that the best biography is the longest; there is reason behind the attitude which refuses to deny greatness to a life of a great man—however shapeless it may be—if only it present endless evidence of that greatness. It is no anomaly that the most famous of biographies in English is also the most utterly without form or visible art.

Boswell's "Johnson" has likewise—at least since Macaulay—enjoyed the reputation of being a great book written accidentally by a small, trivial, and stupid man. It happens to be no longer possible to cherish that delusion wholly, or at all. Yet the paradox involved is an important one. Brilliance is no necessary ingredient in a biographer. Indeed, if he be operating on a large scale, brilliance will get in his way and be a nuisance. His game is big, and he may not stop at every tree in order to try the edge of his weapon—and incidentally to show how neatly he can carve his initials. He must still pursue, and when he has come close it will not matter so much that he is forced to hack many times with an inadequate instrument.

So it was with Boswell, and so it is with Mr. Henderson and Mr. Paine—to confine the matter to two of our contemporaries who have practiced upon subjects in themselves particularly brilliant. To say that Mr. Henderson is less brilliant than Mr. Shaw is to say nothing interesting. It is more interesting to observe that the man who has stayed longest by Shaw, and has published the most facts about him, is singularly unequipped to understand him—let alone match him in malice or wit. There was little in Mr. Henderson's recent volume of dialogues with "G. B. S." to indicate that the pains he had formerly taken to lay bare the sources of the man's thought had not been wasted. He could see that Shaw was witty, but not that he was wise; and he himself, in the act of composing an invaluable sequel to his biography of fourteen years ago, was neither. As for Mr. Paine, who has reared three lasting monuments to Mark Twain in the "Life," the "Letters," and the "Autobiography," there is sufficient evidence of his quality in this passage from the "Autobiography":

> I started to say, a while ago, that when I made that discovery of the difference between "news" and "history" thirty-nine years ago, I conceived the idea of a magazine, to be called the Back Number and to contain nothing but ancient news; narratives culled from moldy old newspapers and moldy old books; narratives set down by eye-witnesses at the time that the episodes happened. . . . Mr. Paine, you and I will start that magazine, and try the experiment, if you are willing to select the ancient news from old books and newspapers and do the rest of the editorial work. Are you willing?
>
> Mr. Paine. I should be very willing, when we get time to undertake it.
>
> Very well, then we will, by and by, make that experiment.

Hints for Swimmers

In spite of its growing popularity as a summer sport, swimming the English Channel is not unmitigated fun. The water is cold—colder, Gertrude Ederle says, than the water off the Maine coast. Darkness is sure to begin or end one's swim—darkness that leaves one alone, surrounded by unfriendly reaches of black and choppy waves. It was darkness that defeated Mlle Sion the other day. All her strength and courage left her as the night shut her in, and she gave up two miles from the English shore when she was swimming bravely, an hour ahead of the best time ever made by a man. And the Channel is full of large, uneven billows. Some swimmers are doubtless steadier and more seaworthy than others, but the best of them, though they be "round in the counter and bluff in the bow," as the old chantey says, are likely to pitch and roll in a heavy Channel chop. Also there are jellyfish. Burgess, the second man to swim the Channel, was stung by jellyfish 100 times in the course of his crossing. And most of the swimmers suffer from cramps.

But if one decides to take up this sport there are compensations: Sullivan, who made the swim in 1923, lost twenty pounds in the process. An elaborate technique has been developed for overcoming the difficulties involved. Specially mixed greases cover the body to keep it warm; goggles prevent the salt from stinging the eyes; balanced rations keep the swimmer strong on the way; musical programs warm his spirits. Tirabocchi, the Argentine who swam the Channel in the amazing time of 16 hours and 33 minutes two years ago, favors jazz as a musical diet. He found himself enlivened and encouraged by syncopated music timed to his stroke. Burgess is more conservative: he swims to old French ballads. In fact, when he landed after his final successful trip (he had tried and failed thirteen times) and went temporarily insane on the beach, fifteen minutes of French ballads quite restored his exhausted nerves. But Gertrude Ederle's coach, Mr. Wolfe, has a different musical theory. He is himself a noted Channel swimmer who has developed his technique from years of not quite successful efforts to get across. Mr. Wolfe favors bagpipes. He has used them throughout day-long grueling cross-Channel swims. Working in relays the pipers skirl and shriek courage and strength into weary limbs. The tunes are carefully devised to fit the emergency. To help him battle a buffeting cross-current the bagpipes play "I Love a Lassie," repeating it as long as the struggle lasts. During meal-times, which come around every half hour in the Channel, the pipes play "Leave but a Kiss Within the Cup"—possibly to fortify the swimmer against any impulse to ask for wine. Gertrude Ederle's youthful indifference to the value of this variety of musical stimulation has been one of the causes of the irritation of her veteran coach.

As for food, the experts are at war. Some say that Miss Harrison failed because she was a vegetarian and lived on a diet which could not provide sufficient strength. Gertrude Ederle, the buxom daughter of a successful butcher, should fare better. Her regular habits are carnivorous, although she swims on a light diet of beef tea, grapes, and chocolate. A report that she would nibble pork chops and steaks on the way across must have been issued by some packer's press agent.

British Constitutionalism and the Coal Settlement

J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

London, August 3

I AM writing on a day when the country breathes freely because the dispute in the coal trade has been prevented at the very last minute from reaching a disastrous crisis, and when, at the same time, there is a gripping doubt at our hearts about the price, in cash and psychology, which we shall have to pay. Up to yesterday afternoon the deadlock was complete. The Government, through Mr. Baldwin, had said its last word, and it was that it would give no subsidies; the owners had said theirs, which was the notices posted up for weeks at the pits and coming into operation in less than thirty hours; the men had said theirs, which was that they would not accept the owners' terms and regretted that the Government had no proposals to make except that the miners should accept lower wages and longer hours. Somewhere between eight and nine in the evening the Government was to announce to the House of Commons that negotiations had broken down and that a lockout of the miners was inevitable. Just before that hour fleet-winged whispers went round the House that, as the result of a prolonged meeting of the Cabinet, the Government had yielded to the demands for a subsidy, made by the coal owners primarily, as a condition for the withdrawal of their notices, and had requested both sides to meet the Prime Minister at ten o'clock that evening. Of the result of the meeting there could be no doubt. There would be peace—at any rate for a time. Now it is announced that that time is to be nine months during which the conditions of the trade and its problems are to be the subject of a thorough inquiry by a commission.

Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin

As I have said, the country is mingling trembling with its satisfaction, and well it may, for the circumstances attending this dispute and its settlement are ominous. It arose from a condition of things which of itself was a deadlock. The economic and industrial results of a war fought blindly by unscrupulous propaganda and upon purely military consideration fundamentally changed the relations of British coal production to continental coal production, and developments in the use of oil dealt further heavy blows at the staggering industry. Profits fell, and over large areas of the coal-field did not exist. The usual demand for a reduction in the cost of production followed, and this, to the mind of a body of owners, each working his own pits and having no idea of comprehensive organization, is the same thing as a reduction in wages and an extension of hours. But the miners were not disposed without a fight to go back to an eight-hour day, and they were living upon incomes that were already down to bare living level. For at least twelve months this coming clash was apparent, and before leaving office the Labor Government began preparations for dealing with it. The new Government did nothing, but, as a spectator, saw the clouds gather, and remained in this position till the notices were posted and both sides took up their fighting positions.

The first note of battle sounded by the owners was shrill and selfish. Profits had to be secured first and wages afterward. Two things followed. The whole labor forces came together. Never has such unity been known in the trade-union movement. Every union made the miners' position its own because it felt that if this challenge were successful it would be repeated all along the line and thrown at every trade in turn. The other thing was that public sympathy was with the men. Then the Government acted and pitiably mishandled the problem. It had lost the weeks and months when intervention might have been effective. It included no one with a personality strong enough to battle with the leaders on either side, no one trusted or respected by them; it had no well-thought-out plan. In the end, the only thing that could happen did happen. As in the decaying days of the Roman Empire victorious invaders had to be bought off, so peace had now to be purchased by spending taxpayers' money.

Had the lockout taken place the industries of our country would have been paralyzed within a week. The railways would have been involved from the first hour; the other sections of the transport trades would have followed quickly; gas and electrical works were included in the trade-union scheme of united action. When one visualizes all that that means, and takes into account the passions and tempers that would have been stirred up and the reactions that would have followed, it is seen how very near the country would have been brought to revolutionary conditions. The prospect was undoubtedly appalling, and those sections which believe that governments only yield to force and that direct action against society—that is, the revolutionary method—offers great prospects for improvement in working-class conditions naturally feel that they have scored a fine triumph. They are now able to say that a threat of direct action wrung £10,000,000 from the taxpayers. They overlook the fact that as striking as trade-union unity was the unity of public opinion. The House of Commons and the country were not disposed to restore the coal trade by reducing the mining population to a state of sweated labor, and would not have tolerated a defeat of the miners; but the mishandling of the Government obscured this fact and handed over the honors of war to those who may be inclined to toy with revolution.

Thus has a peace, worth almost any price, been purchased at a riskily high one and with coin that if put into common circulation will ruin the state. The poverty and industrial unsettlement that the war and the Versailles peace have brought upon Great Britain have put, and are still to put, the ingrained constitutional and democratic habits of our people to a severe test. Constitutionalism has to justify itself by its results and not only by its logic or its philosophy, and if even in appearance political methods and action are to march in the wake of demonstrations of force, the most constitutional and rational of all the nations will hesitate as to how the flow of progress is to be continued. Fairy tales about the idyllic conditions of Russia, and the rouged and powdered reports of untrained and credulous investigators, fall like seed upon ground well prepared by distress, falling standards, unemployment, and the reactionary policy of a Tory Government, but when to that is added the nourishing rain of what appears to be a surrender to threats the damage must be assessed as being high. The real danger of reaction in the world at the present moment is that it is blind to gathering storms, that it deals with them only when they are entering upon their last phase, and that then it is either so stiff that it challenges right and ranges itself among the powers that doom themselves to destruction by their own folly, or that when sobered at the last moment it cannot do the right thing without appearing to surrender not to justice but to force. That is the history of all revolutions.

For the British Government to have allowed a conflict in the coal industry at the present moment, and in view of the nature of the owners' demands, would have brought upon it the censure of the nation, but its eleventh-hour recognition of the situation and the way it has mishandled its task has undoubtedly strengthened and encouraged, not only legitimate trade unionism, but those subversive elements in the community which it is the duty of everyone who believes in ordered progress to combat. We have peace in the coal-fields for the time being, but the difficulties of trying to convince an impatient and hard-pressed people of the wisdom of democratic methods have been sadly increased. Truly an interesting chapter in the revolutionary effects of reactionary governments.

The American Background*

By EDGAR LEE MASTERS

TO show that artists have lived in America, and that they live here now, disposes of the question in its categorical form. Poe lived in New York when it had a population of about 200,000 people, and when the literary market was about what it is in Omaha today, or worse; because modern communication brings Omaha within fifteen hours of New York, and so puts it not greatly farther from the magazine counters than Fordham was in 1840. Whitman lived in America contemporaneously with Poe, and many years after Poe's death; and he managed to sing his songs in spite of hostile publishers who aggravated the poverty which more or less crippled him, and in spite of the onslaughts of the reigning New England school, chiefly Lowell—James Russell, I mean. Emerson lived in America and fared famously while using rebellion against puritanism and orthodoxy as his material. His nature took to plain living and high thinking, and that is a course well adapted to the generally frugal circumstances of the artist's life. Longfellow lived in America and wrote of America, not deeply but by name and place and token. Hawthorne lived in America and wrote of the part of America where he was born and where he grew to maturity. So the list might be amplified with the names of Cooper, Mark Twain, and many others; and artists are living in America today who have done their work in America and of America, and who will do as good or better things in days to come. We have had musicians like MacDowell, and sculptors like St.-Gaudens, who lived and wrought in this land of corn and beef.

Is it asked, then, whether the names of these men are as great as certain names of England? Granting that these men accomplished their course here, might they not have done so better in England, France, Germany, or Italy? Is it not true that some of those countries, by virtue of their more settled life, their greater respect for the artist and his work, and their greater exemption from noise and strife and materialism, are better places to work? To answer these questions requires the careful consideration of many things. But merely by way of suggestion it may be said that if an artist is American to the core, and sticks to the thing he knows and learned with the milk that nourished him, he will lose himself or his material or both in a foreign environment; and next, which is part of the same matter, he will be deprived there of the native irritants which make him not English or French but American. When I hear American novels and poetry compared to English novels and poetry and disparaged in the comparison, as if there were one standard and we had to conform to it or fall below grade, I am inclined to lose patience. We can be receptive to whatever comes from abroad, and at the same time stand by our own. An audience which keeps its face turned eastward may to some extent influence American writers to look eastward too, and it is perhaps remarkable that the American author has not taken his cue from foreign countries more than he has. I should like to see the game reversed a little. For example, it remains for some American dramatist to put Cromwell in a play and in doing so to twist the history, sentimentalize the material, and capture London. I mention these things because the life of the American artist is conditioned by a multitude of factors like this, which bear upon his creative life fully as much as the general problem of financing himself—of which they are, indeed, a part—and fully as much as the turbulence and materialism of the country.

The handicaps upon creative life in America are the sources of our peculiar note, of our individuality, and of our success. This country is our fate, and we cannot escape it. For myself I think it probable that America will yet produce one of the most powerful and distinctive literatures of the world; I share the enthusiasm of Walt Whitman upon this subject and have done so since I began to think and write. When that great apostle of the American epic shout passed from the world I wrote and published an ode which reflected this very conviction; and I retain it still,

* This is the fifth of a series of articles by American writers of the first rank, answering in the light of their personal experience the question: Can a literary artist function freely in the United States? Articles by Willa Cather, Eugene O'Neill, and Floyd Dell will follow. Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, and Zona Gale have [illegible] in spite of the fact that I see many ways in which our civilization may succumb to the despotism of lard. If we can better our work only by getting away from what we know and are, I see no possibilities of originality or greatness. Just as soon as the Greeks wandered to Alexandria and Italy, and there planted their Athenian culture and began to write, they passed into pale imitations of Plato and into the lesser strains of poetry. An exodus with us might have a better fate, leading to something unique in the combination of Americanism with more cultured growths; but it would not be American. I repeat: for good or evil we are fixed in this place and in this time, and we must make the best of it.

At the time that the "Spoon River Anthology" was published, and up to the time that I published "Domesday Book," I was maintaining a law office in Chicago, in the district called the Loop, amid sounds and sights and smoky air which to visitors seemed horrible but which to me did not seem so. On the contrary, I was habitually thrilled by the psychical cyclone of that place, constantly teased to record in verse the stories of the men who had built the city, the careers of the colorful and unique characters who furnished material day by day for the newspaper paragraphers. I wrote the "Spoon River Anthology" in my law office on slack Saturday afternoons, between telephone calls and the interruptions of calling clients. And when I came to the composition of "Domesday Book" I rented a small room in a tower overlooking the waterfront and Michigan Avenue from which I could see the boats and the gulls and hear the whir of the thousands passing on the pavement a hundred feet below me; and these surroundings stirred my thinking and imagining. They were my background and my material, and my irritants, and so my creative life. I was often asked by visitors from the East, from England and elsewhere, how I could work in such a city of noise, confusion, hate, strife, quarrels, violence; and I habitually answered that I thrived upon all this. I was falsely quoted and requoted as having said that I hated Chicago; I never said it. I did hate these things at times, when they wearied me—as whom would they not? But at the same time I said that they stirred me into expression. Well, surely not the expression of the Ode to the Skylark, or of the Grecian Urn—but what of it? Here is the point: it is in no sense necessary that we shall write what has been written before, or express new phases of the conditions out of which the work of Shelley and Keats came. It is only important that we shall portray in our own way what is our own, and to do this the American writer can live here and must live here.

There are parts of America in the great cities, as well as in the illiterate belts, that are repressive and dull to the last degree. The Baptists, the anti-evolutionists, the Protestant reformers and revivalists, the prohibitionists, in so far as they are articulate, which is far enough, make America peculiarly ridiculous and intolerable. And I can sympathize with any creative mind which does not want to live among them; but at the same time it is possible for a writer to arise among them and celebrate them in sarcastic song, for the delight of the world and for his own immortality. In thinking of other times and other places it is well to rid oneself of the hallucinations incident to the disease called nextplaceitis, and really to visualize the conditions under which such men, for example, as Burns and Voltaire lived. One reads the life of Burns with uncomprehending mind who does not fully realize the tortures and difficulties with which he was beset in that Presbyterian community—a poet to be sure, but so much the worse for him since he was an unsuccessful farmer and a man too fond of Sowter Johnnie and the wine cup. And the greatness of Voltaire consisted as much in the humor with which he could escape arrest by placing his house between the boundaries of France and Switzerland, so that he could dodge out of the back door into Switzerland or out of the front door into France, as it did in the genius with which he pickled in saltpeter the prohibitionists and the clergymen of his day. Of course, this was not the calm art of Goethe; but Voltaire was working out his own material; and being a man of courage and originality he could do nothing else. Even so with us, whatever be the place or the task.

There are all sorts of ways of remaining an American and drawing upon its material and at the same time avoiding the vitiated and pernicious air of its worst quarters. There are country places and retreats in the great cities like Chicago, New York, and San Francisco; better still, there are the growing centers of this immense land where because of the youth of the people and the freshness of the environment there is that love of liberty which so much conduces to the creative life. I recently returned from a long tour of the country for the purpose, in the main, of getting it into my vision and understanding; and the experience renewed that enthusiasm of my first days with Walt Whitman, and of the ode to which I have referred, for this country's possibilities in every realm of art. In Texas, for example, I seemed in the presence of so much vitality, so much interest in beauty and truth, that I could understand better than ever the present sterility of New England—as if it had expressed itself and then become as out of date as its soil. What may not come out of a State with a background as old as that of New England itself, close to the constantly discovered records and myths of the ancient Aztecs and the Mayas; and on her own soil looking back to Mexico, then to Houston, Crockett, and Bowie, then to the days of the Confederacy, and finally to a present wherein her cities are bursting with life and rioting in prosperity? Who that wants to write would go away from Texas in order to live beautifully and write beautiful things in southern France or in London? And one passes from this State to the desert, the mouse-gray mountains, and the level valleys between; to the desert cities where the old gambling hall has given way to the observatory and the bandit retreat in the mountains to the biological laboratory; where all sorts of dreamers and scientists and scholars live under a crystal sky and feel not that there is nothing to write about.

So with California, with San Francisco chiefly, that city whose houses seem like doves perched on cliffs above the gold and purple of the ocean. Who will join hands with George Sterling to sing that city, which is not Rome, and needs no Horace, but which has beauty not beneath Rome and a story colorful enough for any hand! In 1847 all this land was waste, it was desert; and Webster, who impressed himself so mightily upon his time, and had so much to do with the political creed of Lincoln, saw the whole territory west of Missouri as a worthless desert—did all he could to prevent our acquiring it. When the Mormons were trekking across the West in search of a haven beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, the war with Mexico came on; and the Mormons were pressed into service in that war, thereby winning for the United States the very land to which the Mormons were marching in order to get away from the government. When they arrived in Utah the American eagle, having preceded them, was perching on the peaks of the Wasatchs. But they stayed and built Salt Lake City, and made the valley of the lake a vast expanse of wheat and grass, of flowers and fruit. Coming out of New England—for there both Joseph Smith and Brigham Young were born—how was it that they built a theater at once, laid at once the cornerstone of the present temple, and began to cultivate music and dancing so that today the city is excelled by none in America for intelligence and the love of art. For myself, if I were cribbed and confined in some village of Tennessee I should go to Salt Lake City rather than to Sussex or Normandy.

Manifestly there is more in America to write about than any one has touched upon. Is there opportunity to write it? Is there the native gift to write it? Is there the right critical atmosphere? Whatever undermines a writer's vitality cripples his work. And of crippling things poverty is the worst. The spiritual effect of poverty is disastrous, though to a point it may stimulate. Beyond that it brings discouragement, with a lowered self-confidence and self-esteem. I believe that much good talent is snuffed out by the economic struggle; but I am not sure that it is more so here than in other countries, either now or in times past. It is perhaps true that since the scale of living is not so high in other countries as it is here, and the earnings of writers therefore higher, poverty here does bear harder upon artists than it does elsewhere. In any case I plead for an adjustment of these conditions. I should like to see rich people turn from hospitals and churches, from the sick and from the mendicant, to the well and the strong—the builders of America—and give them a lift. And I should like to see good work become as profitable as sensational work is; for our country is being civilized by those whose devotion and whose labors are not even respectably compensated—at least not until after many years of sacrifice.

In order that artists may do their best work in America I should like to see the critical tone deepened and heightened. It is nothing peculiar to America, nor to this day, that the gentle art of reviewing is complicated with every sort of commercial tangle, every sort of literary politics and propaganda. The strong man will survive against any sort of opposition, almost. But suppose that the constant and stupid dispraise of Dreiser, or before him of Whitman, had broken down that self-esteem and self-confidence which is the capital of any performer, whether he be a prize-fighter or a poet, and at the same time had deprived him of the means of life so that he could not physically bear the battle. Would America not have suffered one of the greatest possible losses? Justice and truth are a nation's divining wands, without which she can neither discover treasures nor keep them.

Poets and creative writers, whether they consciously mean to do so or not, are, in fact, engaged in the work of elevating the scale of feeling and acting, of increasing the sum of things which is called civilization. The satirist exposes absurdity and falsehood and attempts to shame them; the singer transmits the exalted moods which he has extracted from the world of society and nature about him in spite of the materialism with which they are burdened. The novelist portrays passion, ambition, cruelty, and hate as well as devotion, sacrifice, and love, in order that others may see what he has seen. All workers with pen or brush or chisel are logicians of the most delicate and exact methods, if they are really artists; beside them the reasoners in principles of law and statecraft and ethics are athletic logic-choppers.

Working in the midst of this scene called American, writers are bound to reflect what they see and feel, just as they are nourished by it, or irritated into expression on it, or pained by its spectacle. In a word, they are the products of the civilization from which they come; and even where they revolt from it they portray the thing which is rejected. One of the very best illustrations of this is Emerson; for in repudiating puritanism he stated the obverse of that culture in terms of intellectual freedom from its restraints and superstitions.

Now, though I have said that an artist can live in America, I am compelled to record that I do not think highly of the civilization of America, or indeed of civilization anywhere in the world. Confining myself to America, I must say that it is difficult to define its moral standards when I consider its politics and its laws. Shouting the Declaration and the Constitution, we have committed grand larceny right and left in taking the Philippines and Porto Rico, in defining our attitude toward China, and in taxing without representation remote possessions in order to keep unharmed a thieving tariff. Our whole national life is one of falsehood, dishonesty, and hypocrisy. Monopolies control the means of life, and are specially armed by law to do so; and this bears doubly hard upon the thinkers whose minds are preoccupied with thinking for the race instead of getting something for themselves. Business is a form of larceny, and property is robbery. The railroads do practically what they choose; oil and coal and steel and sugar rule the domain—not thought, not beauty, not justice. We as a nation of merchants have made much of the common-law rule that the purchaser must beware what the seller sells—not that the seller must beware what he sells, and for what he sells it.

All this life of lying, swindling, and pretending is coupled with the loudest psalm-singing in the world, with the most bitter theological persecution in the world. The Rockefellers and their kind may fairly be said to be the rulers of the land—together with the beneficiaries of the commercial imperialism which they have created. And they are active in the trivial morality of prohibition and in the enforcement of laws made for them! They would not abolish the tariff or enforce the anti-trust act or enforce the amendments having to do with freedom of speech, the press, religion, and the equal protection of the laws. The churches, which feed upon the provender of the age, profit by the supremacies of the hour, showing by their daily activities that their motive is hate, not love; for they are in bitter quarrels with each other over such idiotic things as the form of baptism, and whether all are saved or only the elect; and whether there is a bodily or only a spiritual resurrection; and whether the Jewish reformer Jesus was born of a virgin or came into life as others have come. In a word the churches today are what they were when Jesus denounced them, and told their elders and preachers that the harlots and publicans would enter the kingdom of heaven before they would. And this is our culture and our civilization. This is the culture against which the seers and the poets must make their fight, even while they live in its midst, and deny themselves, and find themselves hobbled and destroyed sometimes by its tyrannies. For the game of the church, the fundamentalists, the mercantile regime, is one of boycott; it is to starve out, to drive out, all who assail the existing order.

To test out this culture, this civilization, let us see how the community, the state, or the nation reacts to a given circumstance. Does it prefer to see a dominant figure kept up or brought down? Does it resent in the name of justice an injustice done to an individual, provided the career of that individual is a luscious sacrifice to the local theology? Will it drape its morality with the confiscated robes of a persecuted character? Will its products spurn the cliques and the factions that care nothing for the organic laws? Will it stand up courageously and truthfully for anything important and just? It will by exception, but not generally. And as to poetry, as to the product of the artist, what does it do? I have no complaint in my own case to make whatever, for my books of poems have been handsomely treated; but in spite of all this self-exalted talk by the 113,000,000 people of this land, how many care about poetry or care whether a poet lives or dies? On the average, a book of poems by a poet of established reputation will not sell 20,000 copies or 10,000 copies or 5,000 copies but generally 1,500 copies or less. What is the matter? Where is this idealistic and spiritual nation? What is our civilization? Is it to be appraised in the light of the fact that the autobiography of a prize-fighter or a book of ephemeral short stories outsells a book of poems by a competent poet? Necessarily this must be the case. To lift the land from such a state is the work of the dreamers and the singers; when man is farther up the hill, this age will look in its spiritual life and reactions as the wooden plow and the hand flail look now to us.

India and Opium

By GERTRUDE MARVIN WILLIAMS

Calcutta, July 2

TWO thousand three hundred men and women were counted entering one of Calcutta's many government-licensed opium shops in a single day. There are 6,394 opium shops in India selling directly to the consumer, under British government control.

I visited a shop one block from the center of Chowringhee, Calcutta's Fifth Avenue. It was a darkish slit in the wall, just wide enough for a person to squeeze in past a person coming out, but it reached back indefinitely into the darkness. At the edge of the twilight zone crouched a naked sadhu or religious fakir. His long hair, matted with filth and the sacred ashes of cow-dung, hung in ropes about his neck. Streaks of white ash and red paint across his forehead symbolized the god he worships. He wore a rosary of large, brown beads, a small loin cloth tied around his waist with a cord. He was singing hymns in a minor, off-the tune quaver, and he held out a brass begging bowl. He would sit there until enough pice and annas had dropped into his bowl to buy his daily opium. And because of the traditional respect for holy men the Indians would allow him to stay. I have seen a sadhu in every opium shop I have visited, both in the cities and in the villages.

Squatting on a counter, behind a small, iron-barred window, sat a man rolling cubes of sticky, brown opium in a green leaf, and wrapping them, with a deft turn of the wrist, in a bit of newspaper. Beside him sat a man taking in a steady stream of one-anna pieces (two cents) in change for the bits of opium.

The line of men waiting to push into the shop was of all sorts: coolies wearing a dingy loin cloth and a dirty turban wound around their heads; dignified Babus—men of the clerical and upper class in fresh white dhotis and tunics of fine linen.

Two cents buys six and three-quarter grains of opium. A friendly man of about fifty who was leaving the shop told me that when he began using it four years ago two cents' worth lasted three days, two doses each day. Now he takes that amount in one day, a dose in the morning on an empty stomach and another at the end of the day's work when he begins to feel fagged again. He illustrated how he tosses it into his mouth and downs it with a swallow of tea. He was amused by my questioning, and wanted to know if I was going to buy some. He solemnly warned me that four cents' worth would kill a beginner. Old addicts, however, take as much as a rupee's worth (35 cents) at a time. Defenders of the licensing system make a great point of the fact that the shop is only permitted to sell a limited amount to any one customer. On inquiry at the shop, however, I found that the limit is one tola, 188 grains, and the customer may buy this amount every day. Also, there is nothing to prevent him making the rounds of the shops, or returning to the same shop five minutes later.

The League of Nations Health Committee, after careful calculation, has instituted an index figure for normal medical consumption of opium: 12 pounds per 10,000 of the population for all purposes. The villages of India average about this figure, but in the cities consumption jumps shockingly. Calcutta uses 288 pounds per 10,000, which is exactly twenty-four times the index rate. The provinces of Burma and Assam also show an alarming situation. In Rangoon the consumption is 216; in Mergui 286; for the whole of Burma, rural districts and all, the average is 56. The Assam consumption is 104 for the entire province.

India is the greatest opium-producing country in the world. The gross revenue from opium alone in 1921-1922 was $4,500,000. Opium used in India is sold by the government at cost to the provincial governments, which reap the profit individually. The government profit on opium as a whole is about 90 per cent.

The British Government policy regarding opium is frankly based on the findings of the Royal Commission of 1893. This commission reported that they found "no evidence of extensive moral and physical degradation from the use of opium." This much the defenders of government policy quote, but they neglect to finish the paragraph, which reads: "The whole effect of opium as medically considered must be worked out later in detail, upon a careful collation of a large mass of evidence before the commission." This medical investigation was never made.

A minority report by Henry Wilson, M.P., criticized, among other things, the interpretation of the evidence presented. He pointed out that the Indian witnesses who were in favor of the use of opium were the wealthy landlords; those who opposed were journalists, lawyers, teachers, and Indian doctors. This suggests that even in 1893 there was an audible body of Indian opinion opposed to the imperial opium policy.

Dr. S. K. Datta, of the Calcutta Y. M. C. A., in a speech against opium in the National Legislative Assembly in Delhi last March, analyzed the Royal Commission of thirty years ago, and pointed out that the investigation was concerned almost exclusively with the effects of a change of policy on the revenues. It was a financial commission. Only incidentally, and as a fifth heading, did it give an opinion on the absence of "extensive moral and physical degradation" with the qualifications already quoted. Yet on the day following Dr. Datta's speech Sir Basil Blackett, financial member of the Viceroy's Council, rising to present the Government's reply, said: "Now the policy of the Government of India in regard to opium consumption in India is still based on the findings of the Royal Commission of 1893. That commission went very thoroughly into the question of opium consumption in India." And he proceeded to quote the usual sentence about physical and moral degradation, omitting, as usual, the qualifying clause.

Analysis of the vote is even more significant. The original motion had been to eliminate any allowance for the Opium Department from this year's budget, the government demand being $6,000,000. Such a step was recognized as too drastic, and during the debate it was agreed to withdraw this motion in favor of a reduction of $33 on the budget. Reduction of $33 in a grant of six millions is the merest oratorical gesture. It was only intended to symbolize a frown of displeasure on the legislative brow. Yet every Englishman in the Chamber voted against this mild and empty motion, as did the four Indian members who have been knighted, and seven wearing titles of Khan Bahadur and Rai Bahadur. On the other side every man who voted for the motion was an Indian, and most of them were Swarajists and plain Misters, or Babus, as they call them over here. It is incidents such as this which make "the white man's burden" an ironic joke.

In a country where 93 per cent of the people are illiterate, including more than 98 per cent of the women, one may not expect to find bodies like our Woman's Christian Temperance Union making organized campaigns against the drug traffic. But half a hundred Indian social-reform organizations have, for years, been adopting resolutions in favor of the prohibition of liquor and drugs. Four years ago Mr. Gandhi carried on such a successful campaign against opium in Assam that in the following year consumption dropped 42 per cent in some localities, and 60 per cent in one district. The Swaraj Party has consistently opposed the government opium policy, but its efforts have usually been obstructed. During the Congress campaign against opium in Assam the licensed shops were picketed by Congress volunteers. The government retaliated by sending over 1,000 of these pickets to jail, on the charge that they were non-cooperators, and the sentences ran as high as one year.

Indians resent the implications of the British argument that they know how to use opium. Practically all modern states have some form of Dangerous Drugs Act. The British Parliament has recently increased the penalty for possessing opium and the smoking implements from six months' imprisonment to ten years' penal servitude. In India the British legislator waxes eloquent against depriving the poor cultivator of his rights. Mr. W. A. Cosgrave, I. C. S., lives in and represents Assam, where Indian tea coolies use as high as 474 pounds per 10,000 (normal rate 12 pounds). In the Delhi debate already quoted he asked:

> Why should the poor cultivator, living in a malarious tract, be deprived of his dose of opium at the end of his day's work? He can get only two tolas of opium at a time, and he frequently has to go twenty miles to get that two tolas. Why should he not have his dose of opium as much as a rich member of the Legislative Assembly enjoys his glass of wine, or perhaps even two at Maidens Hotel, or the Raisina? [A tola contains 188 grains. A dose of twelve grains means suicide for the average person, so a supply of 376 grains seems adequate for one day.]

One of the most serious phases of India's opium problem is the drugging of babies. The women who work in the mills of Bombay and Calcutta give their babies opium in the morning so that they will sleep all day and not interrupt their mothers at work by crying to be nursed. The women in the villages who work in the fields dope their babies before they go so that they will not waken and cry in their absence. There are estimated to be over 50,000,000 in India who never are able to satisfy their hunger. Poor women of this class who have not enough milk to nurse their babies give them opium to stop their crying from hunger.

Dr. Mistri, a woman doctor holding a government appointment on the Bombay side, estimates that 90 per cent of Hindu children and 75 per cent of Mohammedan are kept continuously drugged from birth until they are two years old. A physician in the Central Provinces estimates that 90 per cent of the babies in his district are doped. In a recent speech Lady Wilson, wife of the Governor of Bombay, quoted doctors and social workers who, "knowing the facts," had told her that 98 per cent of the mothers working in the cotton mills of Bombay dope their babies regularly before they go to work, and as a result the infant mortality of Bombay had run to the appalling figure of 666 per thousand.

Indians also resent what they consider to be the Government's generally evasive attitude in regard to opium. They resent the fact that in Assam, where the opium evil is the most acute of any province in India, the Government has shown itself not only indifferent to the situation but obstructive. As far back as 1921 the Assam legislature passed a resolution providing for progressive limitation of the use of opium by registration of all present users and refusal to sell to new users. Such a system was successfully introduced in Burma thirty years ago, when the situation became acute. The resolution was passed by a majority of 26 to 13, and all the votes in favor of the resolution were, as usual, Indian—with the exception of one European doctor. Three years later, in 1924, Sir W. Read announced in Legislative Council, "I want to correct one misunderstanding. We never definitely undertook to reduce by 10 per cent each year . . ." and nothing has been done.

Against this background it is interesting to read quotations in the press from Earl Winterton's speech before the House of Commons last winter. Earl Winterton, who is Under Secretary of State for India, stated that the view of the Government of India, "based on the findings of the Royal Commission of 1893," is "that centuries of experience had taught the people of India discretion in the use of prepared opium, which was, for the most part, without injurious consequences."

A Turkish Divorce

By LOUISE BRYANT

THE Pasha has divorced his wife. Kemal has sent Latife Hanoum back to her father's home in Smyrna, from which he plucked her abruptly four years ago when his victorious army drove the last of the Greeks into the sea. Thus ends a romance which promised once to alter the history of the Near East, killed presumably by the slow poison which has been fatal to so many romances—childlessness.

When Kemal married Latife, Turkey was at his feet. He had accomplished the impossible. In a defeated, exhausted, starving, devastated country, by the strength of his own will he had created an army which annihilated the Greek invaders and shamed their British supporters. There was a Sultan-Caliph in Constantinople, but he was the symbol of defeat and disgrace, and Kemal was the symbol of rebirth and victory. He was the hero of Islam.

The Sultan, moreover, had not merely opposed the Kemalist revolt with all the moral force at his command as Caliph of Islam but had sent his troops against the Kemalists and set a price on Kemal's head. It was, therefore, a foregone conclusion that the Sultan would be deposed. But Kemal was not content with the mere deposition of the Sultan. He abolished the Sultanate, established a republic, divorced church and state, and permitted the heir to the throne to assume only the title of Caliph. It was commonly believed in Turkey at the time that this was but the first of a series of acts which would end in Kemal assuming the Sultanate, as Louis Napoleon's early political moves had ended in his assumption of the title of Emperor. And when Kemal married Latife, the beginning of a new dynasty seemed imminent. She was the daughter of the richest man in Turkey, a Smyrna merchant, and he was expected to supply the one thing Kemal needed: money.

Kemal's subsequent acts strengthened the impression that he intended some day to assume the Sultanate. He established a government which possessed certain outward forms of a democratic republic but was in reality a dictatorship. He was President of the Republic, with vast civil powers. He was commander-in-chief of the army. He was, in addition, president of the single chamber of the Grand National Assembly, and president of the only political party which existed in that Assembly. His will was law, and he began to behave in a manner consistent with the best traditions of the most autocratic of the sultans. He endured no opposition or advice from even his closest friends and supporters. One by one the able, courageous patriots who had helped him to drive out the Greeks were pushed out of the Government. Raouf Bey, Ali Fuad Pasha, Kaizim Karabekir Pasha, Refet Pasha, all the men of independent character and ability who had surrounded him, were replaced by men utterly subject to his will. Of distinguished figures Ismet Pasha and Fethi Bey alone remained. Kemal alternated them in the post of prime minister and they carried out his orders. Thereupon he began to take the expected steps against the House of Osman. He hedged the Caliph with restrictions until the spiritual head of Islam was practically a prisoner in the palace of Dolma Bagtche. Then he dismissed the Caliph altogether, exiled him, and at the same time exiled all other members of the House of Osman. Men, women, and children, all were bundled over the Turkish border. The stage seemed set for a Kemalist dynasty. But there was no dynasty in sight. Latife was childless.

In the Western world rivers of ink have been spilled describing the beauty, talents, courage, intelligence, progressivism, and charm of Latife. Few such rivers have run in Turkey. For Latife is not the bravest, most beautiful, most intelligent, and most charming of Turkish women. She is the richest. She is a woman of strong will, independent character, little beauty or charm, ambitious, dictatorial, jealous. She at once caused the disappearance from Angora of Halide Edib Hanoum, who had fought through the war at Kemal's side. And she showed a distinct aversion to the utilization, politically or educationally, of the hundreds of extremely able and self-sacrificing women who compose the Turkish upper class. She was, in fact, distinctly hostile to them. And naturally hostile, for she is a middle-class merchant's daughter. There is a snobbery in Turkey, a rather magnificent snobbery, a snobbery which permits the beys to be intimate friends of their boatmen or gardeners, to sip coffee or smoke a cigarette with a soldier, but does not permit social intercourse with those who live by trade and barter, whether millionaires or pawnbrokers. For centuries traffic with goods and money has been the business of Greeks, Armenians, and Jews. The upper class and the lower class in Turkey respect and honor each other; they join in despising the business man. Latife therefore knew quite well that though she might occupy the Sultana's apartments in the palace of Dolma Bagtche she could never enter a Bosphorus drawing-room.

Kemal knew the same thing. Kemal perhaps did not care, much. He had lived roughly all his life, taking his pleasures after the manner of a soldier or a sailor on leave. He was fond of a rather wild evening now and then. After the advent of Latife there were no more wild evenings. The two lived in the closest domesticity in Angora. A six-room house was their home—a small space in which to confine two temperaments so wilful. Too small a space, evidently.

The dismissal of Latife means nothing to the women of Turkey. She was never a leader of the women's movement of her country. Such a movement exists. It asked her direct cooperation. She refused. Nezieh Hanoum of Constantinople is perhaps the outstanding leader of the movement, and Halide Edib Hanoum is its brightest star. But in the old houses of Stambul and in the Yalis on the banks of the Bosphorus there are hundreds of magnificent women, like Madame Ferouk Bey, who are as completely women of the world as any to be found in London or Paris or New York—brilliant women, superbly educated, tolerant and progressive. They hope to achieve woman suffrage before many years have passed, but the greater part of their time and all their money are at present being utilized in caring for the hundreds of thousands of orphans and refugees who are starving in Turkey today. They have had a lonely fight to save the lives of the sufferers. The Near East Relief rushed to rescue the Greeks who had left Turkey under the exchange of populations, but no one helped the Turks. The Near East unhappily collects its funds by propaganda urging Christians to save fellow-Christians from the horrible Turks, and its expenditures for the aid of Turks have been negligible. Therefore the Turkish women, who need the aid of a Hoover, battle alone to save their children. The infant mortality in Turkey at present is over 60 per cent. Forty per cent of the returned refugees died during the first year, mostly from starvation. Such conditions do not leave women much time to think about suffrage.

Speculations as to Kemal's future actions are idle. He is still President of the Turkish Republic, but an opposition party, led by Raouf Bey, now confronts him in the Assembly. He has done his best, but he is not a constructive statesman, and his natural and inevitable mistakes have deprived him of his aura of greatness. He will always remain the savior of Turkey in her darkest hour, but he is no longer the half-god which he was three years ago. The possibility that he might now assume the Sultanate seems infinitely remote. His star has passed its zenith. To found a dynasty one must have a family, and he suspects, perhaps [illegible] not altogether Latife's fault.

In the Driftway

ALTHOUGH there are times when the Drifter, like every other person, finds himself thoroughly dissatisfied with his job, for the most part he regards the occupations of others with a distinctly superior air. He has caught himself wishing he could go out and tap maple trees in the February woods and busy himself with the making of sugar; but this is usually in July, when the thought of rising on a cold, snowy morning is pleasant and vague; in February, on the other hand, the thought of hay-making in July is comforting. These periods of envy are rare and have more to do with the weather than with any real dislike of his ordinary life. Most of the time he is content; occasionally he is raised to a pitch of horror by the contemplation of a job that is not his.

* * * *

HE read the other day, for example, of an official taster, whose task it was to taste, without swallowing, samples of the culinary art. For more than seven hours this unhappy man was kept at his work; he took two rest periods when he sucked lemons to restore his palate; otherwise he swallowed nothing, but merely rolled the morsels of food around on his tongue. Corned beef and cabbage, fricassee of chicken, hash, fillet of sole, each repeated ad nauseam, came before the taster and were judged. At the end of his ordeal he complained that although he was unable to eat a bite of any kind of food, he was much hungrier than when he started. The Drifter would like to nominate this man for a Carnegie medal for heroism. How different his job was from the earlier position of taster to a great lord; then a generous portion of the dish was served up to the sampler, enough to kill him if by any chance a careless cook had dropped poison in the plate. But the present [illegible] compared with the sound and healthful ones. Many a time the taster must have been able to smack his lips and rub his stomach before passing the dish on to his master; if at last he frothed at the mouth and rolled under the table it was only after a great row of noble dishes, stretching over a number of days, had contributed to his happiness. And even in dying, he had the consolation of having saved his master's life.

* * * *

IN Atlantic City an occupation has been unearthed which appeals to the Drifter's imagination more than does tasting, in any of its forms. Circulars captured by the unsympathetic police set forth the goods and powers of a Voodoo doctor in restoring the happiness of his patients. Black Cat's Ankle Dust could be had for $500; Black Cat's Wishbone for $1,000; King Solomon's Marrow, being scarce, also brought $1,000; Easy Life Powder, strangely enough, sold for the modest price of $100; Tying Down Goods, guaranteed to keep the affections of a husband or wife, cost only $50; Chasing Away Goods, also $50, was efficacious in eliminating undesirable suitors; and for $15 could be obtained what the Drifter has often longed for—Boss Fix Powders, not designed, as the name might indicate, to do away with an employer permanently, but to make him happy and content with the work of his employee. Here is an occupation so far superior to the unpleasant one of tasting that the Drifter has considered exchanging his own for it. There is only one disadvantage: it seems to conflict with the law, and in all his years of drifting he has never yet been put in jail as a result of his manner of earning a livelihood.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Birthday Greetings

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am a Negro, born August 9, 1858—an ex-slave. Your late grandfather, William Lloyd Garrison, advocated absolute freedom of the Negro slaves in the United States. Freedom came to the Negro slaves in the United States, and you in company with others have advocated absolute justice for the emancipated slave and his descendants.

I am taking this medium to thank you for the good things you have said through your columns of The Nation during the past sixty years. I beg you to continue to advocate justice for the Negro, and all other races of men.

Raleigh, North Carolina, July 12 T. L. McCOY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I [illegible] a loyal supporter of The Nation for a number of years. Though I do not always agree with its opinions I invariably respect its courage and (to me this is quite as important) admire its manner. Nothing, I feel, is more needed in America than an energetic and fearless minority organ, for an intelligent minority is the salt of a democracy. So here is a [illegible]

Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania, July 11 HELEN GLASGOW

[illegible] Three papers which I want as well as [illegible], and these are the Saturday Review, Punch, and The Nation.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The sixtieth anniversary Nation has just been delivered, and I have had time to read some and nibble at all the "stories," but I cannot resist the urge to send at once my [illegible]

What a record, and what an issue! Worthy inheritor of great forebears. And I was touched by the modesty of your gallant dear mother. She's a light-bearer! And I am proud to know that she is, always has been, and ever will be, gracious and charming in all her purposeful days and gracious allegiance. It costs a good deal to have character, but it's worth it—whether the price is paid by people or papers.

Westport, Connecticut, June 27 LILLIAN D. WALD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Let me congratulate you on the sixtieth anniversary number, full of history, wisdom, and fun. As I turn from reading it an old story rises from the depth of forgetfulness, with its mighty lines: "Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him."

Pittsburgh, June 30 BAYARD H. CHRISTY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is amazing and gratifying to meet a sixty-year old possessing such freshness of youth, energy, and intrepidity. In this sad time when the country of free thought and opinion is to be induced to return to mental middle age, it is a real comfort to know that freedom of the word has such a fearless and efficacious champion.

The Nation is the bearer of valuable suggestions and information every week; for the newspaper I manage [Der Abend] it is the source of most important information about the political, social, and mental life in the United States.

Vienna, July 16 CARL COLBERT

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: [By cable] CONGRATULATIONS SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY NATION WORLD'S BEST WEEKLY.

Paris, July 4 WILLIAM J. ROBINSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: If you go on, as in these last years, we shall all feel that European radicalism can look to America for a help which will not fail.

London, July 13 H. J. LASKI

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It warmed my heart to see in the sixtieth anniversary issue of The Nation your tender tribute to the memory of the editors and collaborators who builded well and made The Nation what it is today.

But my heart sank when I missed the name of one who introduced me to The Nation in 1883, one year after I came to the United States. He was so modest and humble that notwithstanding his weekly contributions to the pages of The Nation, which began with the first issue in 1865 and continued uninterruptedly until the very week he died in 1888, his name never appeared under his writings—not once. I refer to Michael Heilprin.

Denver, Colorado, July 1 C. D. SPIWAK

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I heartily congratulate you on the sixtieth anniversary of The Nation.

It is a great service to the people. More power to your right arm!

New York, July 16 ABRAM I. ELKUS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On this, the sixtieth anniversary of The Nation, the members of the Johnson C. Smith University Club of New York City, an organization of over one hundred Negro college men, in deep respect and profound gratitude, tender to you as editor our sincerest thanks for your years of useful service in the cause of all humanity.

New York, July 11 J. EGERT ALLEN,
President

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is for my own pleasure and satisfaction that I send you a few lines of congratulation on the occasion of the sixtieth anniversary of your glorious paper. "Long may it wave!"

Your page on the immortal La Follette is a grand testimonial to one who belonged to the noble company of those "who spoke the truth to their own hurt."

Georgetown, Delaware, July 4 SARAH S. RICHARDSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR:

Truth is a sword
Forged in the forge of Justice.

May these words of a great leader of democracy, Johann Jacoby, be your humble subscriber's greeting on your sixtieth anniversary.

Justice, figuratively speaking, is blind, but the judge administering it must be open-eyed, broad-minded, unprejudiced. Your publication has always endeavored to promote these principles.

Palo Alto, California, July 1 E. SCHWARZSCHILD

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation's ecstatic birthday jubilee reminds one of that celebrated metaphorical description of the Bride of Christ: one foot planted firmly on the Rock of Ages, the other pointed heavenward. Gee! You do hate yourself! May not your readers hope that by the time you are seventy you will take all these hoary aeons more as a matter of course?

This self-congratulatory effusiveness puts a crimp into the enthusiasm of your admirers. How can we add, even in our thoughts, to what you have already said about yourself? You shame our wildest praise. Thank God, the regular contributions were not crowded off your pages.

May you have many happy returns, but not so darn happy.

St. Louis, July 1 G. H. BISHOP

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You are publishing a very inspiring magazine; may you enjoy prosperity during the next sixty years. I hope to read the hundred and twentieth anniversary number and all between now and then.

Paxton, Indiana, July 2 HUDSON S. DAILEY

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I, as a niece who was exceedingly fond of her uncle, tell you how much touched Mr. Pollak's family were to find him included among those to whom the sixtieth anniversary number of The Nation is dedicated? There is nothing, I am sure, that could have proved a greater source of pride to him than to have his memory linked with that of the men whom he so greatly honored, and whose achievements as editors of The Nation he held to have been of such long service to his country.

New York, July 13 ADA LOVEMAN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Congratulations on the sixtieth birthday issue! I am the pleased recipient of a Christmas present of The Nation for this year. Long life!

Manchester, Vermont, July 2 S. N. BEHRMAN

P. S.—Say a word for the animals, won't you? This earth doesn't belong to us alone!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I don't need to tell you how great an esteem I feel for the courage and the energy you have displayed for so many years. We Germans especially have every reason to be thankful to you for the strenuous fight you have fought in our behalf since the war, and I certainly do agree with every word Count Kessler says in his message for the anniversary issue.

Washington, June 29 MAX JORDAN,
Washington correspondent, Berliner Tageblatt

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Magazines like The Nation, especially sixtieth anniversary numbers, are indeed an intellectual delight and moral treat. It gives me great pleasure to increase its circulation and aid in killing the shams of war and so-called patriotism, among the biggest dehumanizing forces in the world.

St. Charles, Missouri, July 5 W. C. Fuhr, Editor, Banner-News

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is surprising to notice how many congratulations on The Nation's sixtieth birthday have come from Southern newspapers. The State of Columbia, South Carolina, paints a terrific portrait of a pacifist paper:

> The New York Nation . . . celebrates the sixtieth anniversary of as notable a fighting career as has ever fallen to the lot of any man or journal of America. It clambered over the gunwales of existence with knife in teeth, a pistol in each hand, and muttering dark curses on tyrannies and oppressions and lies through its matted beard. It was sired by Mars and damned by Roosevelt. . . . It was the first skirmish line of pioneers, or the shock troops that smashed the center of the foe and opened gateways and long trails to freedom. . . . Whether one joined in these ululant and berserker frays, or held aloof and watched the swayings of the fight, one shared in the savage joy of the clanging battle. The Nation "carried the fight" into the very heart of things, and considered immeasurable or innumerable odds merely as conferring a greater opportunity for glory and spoil. It had the instincts of a Bedouin or a Bayard for choosing the underdog in the fight, and the zeal of a Coligny or a "Stonewall" Jackson for dying for lost causes that are immortal.

Atlanta, July 22 M. T.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Republican of this city observes that you do not accept the slogan of Decatur. On the contrary: "The Nation says: 'My Country, she is so apt to be wrong that I had better take a whirl at her every now and then, and leave to some nit wit the task of defending her.'"

Fresno, California, July 1 W. A.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I first knew The Nation in Mr. Godkin's regime, and met him personally a few times when I was a post-graduate student at Cambridge many years ago.

I have not subscribed for The Nation because I see it at two clubs where I find it most convenient to do my periodical reading. When I retire to my tusculum I shall be on your list.

Boston, June 29 Victor S. Clark,
Editor, The Living Age

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Please accept my warmest congratulations on the excellent sixtieth anniversary number of The Nation. I may be somewhat prejudiced by the kind word which you printed in regard to the Independent, but after making due allowance for that prejudice, both Mr. Danielson and I feel that this particular issue is extraordinarily good.

Boston, July 1 Christian A. Herter

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Big Stick, a Jewish humorous weekly of this city, salutes you with a poem the last verse of which follows:

אלע אין יעבעג יעהר די „ניישאן",
נאר פריש איז זי[illegible]ן ווינג נאך:
עס שרעקט מאדאם רעפובליק זיך
פאר „ניישאן'ס" שארפען צינג נאך

New York, July 1 T. H.

Morality and Clothes

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Anent Clothes, in the July 15 Nation, might not a definition of morality be: "Morality consists in preventing others from doing what we ourselves will do if we can?"

Seattle, July 15 C. E. Payne

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is curious that Mr. Byington's lengthy discussion on Clothes and the lack of them carefully refrains from pointing out that it is not what one wears but how one wears it that makes clothes appear moral or immoral. The objection against lack of clothes is based on the apparent fact that a large number of women reduce their coverings to a minimum not for health or comfort but for show—exactly as the display of nakedness on the stage, which Mr. Carroll defended as art, may be art but is not born of any desire to serve art but entirely on the desire to coin nakedness into cash. Perhaps a continuation of present modes of the street and the theater would result in the acceptance of new standards, but the chances are the new modes will not last long enough. Civilization thrives in climates which require coverings most of the year, and this fact alone will prevent any reversion to the modes of the jungle. This is not a question of morals but of good sense, a quality in which a good many modern writers appear to be lacking, because it happens to be the fashion also to show as little reverence for the experience of mankind as for the most obvious necessities of good taste.

El Paso, Texas, July 15 Edward D. Tittmann

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Steven Byington may be interested to learn, in connection with Clothes, that recently a two-year-old baby was arrested by the "scientific police" of Berkeley, our university town, because said baby had escaped from his front garden while taking a sun bath in nature's own, and strolled down the street clad only in his shoes. A tremendous agitation, with newspaper scareheads, ensued, and the scandalized neighbors tried (in vain) to force the baby's mother not to allow sun baths in the future. A stronger lock on the garden gate was the only result, but three Sacramento mothers felt it necessary to secure police permission before they followed the same procedure with their babies.

San Francisco, July 21 Miriam Allen de Ford

Falstaff and His "Green Fields"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of July 29 there is a letter signed M. T. L. Gannett which ascribes to George Riddle the suggestion that when Falstaff, on his deathbed, spoke of "green fields" he was really repeating the twenty-third Psalm. My impression is that it was not Mr. Riddle but another Shakespearean reader, Mr. Locke Richardson, who first made this suggestion. At all events, I heard him say so. It has occurred to me that the suggestion is strengthened if we take the Folio reading: "a table of green fields," which is always called nonsense, and which Theobald emended, to be also a confused rendering from the hostess of "Thou preparest a table."

[illegible] City, Michigan, July 27 Wm. Lyon Phelps

Speaking of Shanghai

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In re Shanghai, this sentence from Macaulay's "Lord Clive" bombs the mind: "With all the vices inseparable from the domination of race over race."

Seattle, July 24 Arthur Rarig

Books

The Box

By MARGUERITE ARNOLD

A dozen times she washed her hands
And moved, frail-pink, across the hall,
And sat combing her pale-gold hair,
And sat staring against the wall.

Outside the sea would roar its blue
Against the plumeless white of her.
Along the sill a tawny cat
Would lie, and daintily stretch and purr.

Her eyes were green as icebergs are.
Carved she was of a marble shaft;
Pearly she was, with the luster gone.
She combed her hair, and she was daft.

And when her sister's child came home,
Crying out beyond the stair,
A look came on of a wild-cat thing
Brought to bay in a jungle lair.

A jade-green box, milky with light,
She loved to hold. A day she sits,
The child laughs out, she gets her up
And hurls it, and laughs at the sorry bits.

The child not hers; the box a well
Of the empty loves and the clapperless bell;
And of what sad reckoning she was born
Only a father and mother can tell.

The Problem of Donne

John Donne. A Study in Discord. By Hugh I'Anson Fausset. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

A Study of the Prose Works of John Donne. By Evelyn M. Simpson. Oxford University Press. $5.

THESE two studies, very different in their approach and in their scope, contribute to the satisfaction of a rapidly growing interest. Mrs. Simpson's investigation is cast in the traditional academic mold and possesses in a high degree the virtues of its kind. It contains a careful bibliographical description as well as a summary of the contents of Donne's various prose writings, which in view of their scarcity is a very useful thing to have. But it does more than that. It supplies a careful biographical sketch which corrects in certain important details statements made by Gosse and offers a critical analysis of Donne as man of letters, as theologian, and as thinker. A feature of additional importance is the printing of thirty-two letters and one sermon not hitherto published, so that the book becomes in every way indispensable to a student of Donne.

Mr. Fausset's book is an interpretation of the personality of Donne and provides much livelier reading than Mrs. Simpson's. The writer is one of those critics who care a great deal more about the meaning of facts than about the facts themselves. It might not be unfair to say that the facts matter scarcely at all to his vision of the truth. At any rate he does not seem to have taken excessive pains to make sure that his information was correct. He read Gosse's Life and let it go at that. Gosse, for instance, was much troubled by the discovery of evidence that Donne, in his anxiety to gain favor with the Earl of Somerset, had played a conspicuous and unworthy part in the divorce proceedings of the notorious Lady Essex, the poisoner of Sir Thomas Overbury. Now it turns out that the Donne who figures so prominently in the scandalous annulment proceedings was not the future Dean of St. Paul's but a Dr. Daniel Donne, Dean of Arches; a fact which could have been ascertained by consulting an authority no more recondite than the Dictionary of National Biography. Mr. Fausset, however, declares simply and roundly that the divorce was obtained largely through Donne's subtle advocacy. In another instance Gosse attempts, by an arbitrary arrangement of the Elegies, to trace the story of Donne's passion for a married woman. It is a fair enough procedure, as he permits us to follow the line of his reasoning and to lend or withhold belief according to our judgment. But the reader of Mr. Fausset's book does not receive the least inkling of there being anything hypothetical in the narrative. The stages in the affair are recounted as if all its circumstances were based on the most solidly authenticated proofs, and Donne's violent poetic language is made the basis of a severe censure of his conduct. In smaller matters, too, there appears this fondness for dramatic simplification. Whereas Gosse mentions but properly brands as foolish a legend concerning the death of Elizabeth Drury, the young girl in whose memory Donne composed the Anatomy of the World, Mr. Fausset repeats it in such a way as to suggest that it has some color of truth—doubtless because it sounds more interesting. So much for the soundness of Mr. Fausset's scholarship. Now for his critical insight.

It is clear that the writer of this book belongs to that modern school of biographers whose object it is to find the simple solution of all human enigmas, to tear asunder the intricate folds of a man's heart and expose its palpitating mystery to naked view. The attraction of Donne for such an anatomist must have been irresistible. No life has been more puzzling to the mere student of literature. It is a story of energies at first freely and recklessly indulged, then subjugated by the severe moral discipline of a hostile fate, and at last finding complete satisfaction in working fruitfully upon masses of men. Such a statement, it is true, tends to excessive simplification. In his new sphere Donne was not that incarnation of flawless sanctity whom Izaak Walton has lovingly portrayed. Aside from native faults of temper there was doubtless a certain decay of character, resulting from nearly twenty years of poverty and dependence, which accounts for actions that do not seem fitting in a self-forgetful servant of God. Besides, the Dean of St. Paul's was likely by his own utterances to give an exaggerated notion of the vitality of his old worldly passions. The ordinary critic would be ready to recognize the imperfections in Donne and read in them the evidence of the incompleteness to which man is doomed in his efforts to override the flesh; but such a reading would seem quaintly old-fashioned to Mr. Fausset.

What Mr. Fausset himself very simply sees in Donne's activity as a preacher is evidence of the persistence of all the sensual cravings of his youth, of a mind crippled and distorted by the frustration of desire, of a life whose consummation was bitterness and defeat. He tells us that Donne's confessions of sin leave no doubt that he still had "an intense craving for physical indulgence which he could not harmonize by any doctrine of 'grace' or exorcize by religious formulas," that he loved God "with the same baffled sensuality, though he called it a 'holy amorousness,' with which he had loved his mistresses," that "his fear of hell was the exact complement of his disgusted satiety"; in short, that "he was as sensual in his later asceticism as in his earlier indulgence." He finds the strongest arguments for his thesis in the dramatic circumstances attending the delivery of Donne's last sermon, in his preparations for death, and the planning of his own monument. Looking at the countenance chiseled in that monument, he reads the history of "a mind and a body forever at warfare, of senses tormented by greed and weariness, and a soul strangled with self-disgust, of one forever defeated and forever unconquerable."

We are grateful to Mr. Fausset for his good taste in studiously avoiding the jargon of psychoanalysis. His book is easy to read, and if regarded as a work of creative imagination it is an admirable piece of writing. It makes the rough places in Donne's character extremely plain and the high places rather low. There are intellectual puzzles in Donne even more baffling than the moral, and these Mr. Fausset hardly touches on. That Donne, who was steeped in medieval theology and preached the literal truth of every detail in the Old Testament, should have thrilled responsively to the discoveries of Galileo is in itself strange enough, and is rendered still stranger when we recall that the most conspicuous scientific mind in England, that of Bacon, completely ignored these discoveries. The age of the Renaissance teems with such contradictions. Some critics make allowance for the subtlety and complexity of certain human beings or painfully seek explanations in a study of the multiple and diverse phenomena which occur in a period of intellectual fermentation. But to Mr. Fausset all this no doubt would appear irrelevant. He is clearly convinced that the science of Dr. Freud supplies the pass-key wherewith every mystery of human nature may be unlocked.

JACOB ZEITLIN

The Atom Explained

Atoms and Rays. By Sir Oliver Lodge. George H. Doran Company. $3.

Chemistry and Atomic Structure. By J. D. Main Smith. D. Van Nostrand Company. $3.75.

The A B C of Atoms. By Bertrand Russell. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Atoms and Electrons. By J. W. N. Sullivan. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

Recent Developments in Atomic Theory. By Leo Graetz. Translated by Guy Barr. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

IT was only eight years ago that the word subatomic was first generally applied to the numerous phenomena which involve material units smaller than the atom. These include radioactivity, gaseous ionization, electronics, X-rays, spectroscopy, positive rays, isotopes and atomic structure, and probably also photochemistry and even crystal structure. It was then, as now, the forefront of research. But a part was physics and part was chemistry. The knowledge was divided among two groups of men who saw the subject from two different points of view—the chemists looking at matter and the physicists looking at energy. This list of books is representative of the dozen or more published within the year which are not so much accounts of really new work as they are correlations of the discoveries in various fields related to the fundamental problem of the structure of matter and of energy. There is here no real distinction between chemistry and physics or between matter and energy. Basically they merge and neither is comprehensible without the other. The science of hylonomy—if I may suggest a new name—the study of matter in its essence, energy-matter, underlies all other sciences. Each of these books is an introduction to it.

None of the authors has himself contributed research to this science, with the possible exception of Sir Oliver Lodge. His prepossession with the ether has produced invaluable knowledge, but Einstein and the quantum theory have necessitated a complete revision of this fundamental concept and that is yet to come. As atomic structure has displaced relativity in popular discussion, so, no doubt, the ether is next in line. But for the purposes of the present book it is a handicap to interpolate an ether a billion times more dense than water and endowed with contradictory properties that will soon be restated in terms of more modern knowledge. Sir Oliver, properly, speaks for the ether and ingeniously tries to give it a place in the newer scheme of things. But it belongs with metapsychics in the realm of the unknown, and the average reader would fare better were it omitted. Further than this one cannot criticize the distinguished author. His wide vision and paternal speech make reading easy. It is a book, however, for the technical man who uses algebra and is not afraid to study.

Bertrand Russell's book is happy reading for everyone who thinks. He omits all mathematics and most details but gives a lucid picture of the trend of thought in this subject. He attempts no proofs but does give an excellent picture of the type of experiment and the nature of the reasoning employed.

Mr. Sullivan addresses the same audience but in textbook style. His book is a good one to keep on the desk for use in an argument. It is crowded with facts and with the conclusions of today. It also omits all mathematics and experiments, but it is informative rather than educating or interesting. Undigested facts do not satisfy. If science has anything to contribute to civilization it is a manner of thought, an insistence on understanding. But if that be obtained elsewhere this book gives an excellent record of our knowledge.

The six lectures by Professor Graetz are well-constructed summaries of as many topics. He goes to the bottom of each in scholarly fashion and has produced a book which will serve for either the chemist or the physicist who is interested in the subject but does not know the contributory evidence from the other science. Its pace is slightly too swift for the layman.

Dr. Main Smith has just missed a conspicuous achievement. He has rewritten theoretical chemistry from the point of view of today's atomic structure, and has examined the old theories critically in this light. His first ten chapters, three-fourths of the book, however, are merely a skilful restatement of the old material, including all the awkward gropings after the concept of atoms and molecules and the apologetic conclusion that matter "acts as if" it were atomic in structure. In several excellent chapters on modern physics we then discover that atoms really do exist, and the chemical generalizations are reexamined. These last chapters are excellent. But this historical presentation seems unfortunate. It is pity enough that chemists for a century could not grasp the atom as a fact. That time is now gone and the study of chemistry no longer begins with the law of multiple proportions and formula weights. Logically it begins with cathode rays and electrons and radioactivity—with atomic physics, in short. With physics to prove that the atom is a fact and to map roughly its constitution, chemistry can discard half of the round-about nineteenth-century logic and can start bravely with the atom. Dr. Smith's book would have charmed a wide public if he had had more courage, and it would have brought much nearer the day when chemistry can be presented to beginners as a deduction from a few fundamental concepts. The chapters on Alfred Werner's stereochemical work are particularly good and would alone justify the study of the book by chemists.

And who reads these books? Not those who have specialized in the subject or advanced students in college, for they require the exhaustive treatment of original articles in scientific journals. Not the college undergraduate, for there are few professors who can recast their ancient teaching into the new forms; the reviewer knows of no college in which electricity is taught to beginners as a matter of electrons—everywhere it is still Ben Franklin's positive and negative two-fluid flow. And, of course, not the man in the street. There remain those who "had a course" in chemistry or in physics years ago. Scientific writers are attempting to bring such persons up to date, and any of these books will do the trick. A shower of books on the atom, coming so soon after a similar interest in Einstein and relativity, is a symptom that is keenly encouraging to those who hope that civilization can use science for more than a provider of fool-proof material contraptions.

GERALD L. WENDT

Fiction of the Revolution

The Ninth of November. By Bernhard Kellermann. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

We. By Eugene Zamiatin. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Stella Defiant. By Clare Sheridan. Greenberg, Publisher. $2.

THE first of these novels pictures the Germany of 1918 breaking up under the strain of war and misery. The second imagines a society, a thousand years in the future, cracking dangerously under the strain of peace and standardized happiness. The third presents a young woman with copper hair in silhouette against revolutionary post-war backgrounds. This Stella cannot be taken seriously. She is seeking truth and freedom. What she finds is less abstract: an Irishman and an Englishman, her husbands in succession; a prime minister in pajamas; a syphilitic Russian refugee artist in Berlin, a sadist, who loves her and beats her ("I'm syphilitic," he says. "What's that?" she asked); a White Russian and a Red one; a thinly disguised Mussolini, savagely amorous; and a chaste and philosophical Turk who has a fez and a prayer-rug, and a home on the shores of the Sea of Marmora, with Byzantine columns against which Stella poses like a Lord Leighton virgin in Greek draperies. The Turk provides her with a philosophy and a baby. This demi-Turkish baby, with its blue almond-shaped eyes, she believes to be a reincarnation of her English-Irish infant, killed in the Irish revolution. Stella feels that her true home is in Russia, and tries hard to secure a visa. But in the end she decides to remain in Stambul, and tattoos her almond-eyed baby on his black birth-mark with the red hammer and sickle of the Soviets, dedicating him to the search for truth and justice.

The only point of contact between "Stella" and "The Ninth of November" is the red flag, symbol of an ill-defined hope of freedom. Young Ackermann, the idealist, who dreams of brotherhood and peace and love, sees the red flag floating from the Russian embassy in Berlin, and hails this light from the East, this dawn of a new day. The granite-faced General von Hecht-Babenberg sees it, too, and is stricken with fear. And we read about it now and think of the recent election of Hindenburg. In the effort to give a comprehensive picture of the miserable Germany at the close of the war, Kellermann has focused on the general, his household and connections, and on a host of minor figures who never become deeply interesting or fully convincing. And yet it is a powerful book in its way. Berlin itself takes on a kind of life that compensates for the lack of interest in the individuals. The reviewer recalls an [illegible] Berlin at the height of its wretchedness. There was a [illegible]less uprising, a ferment, in a working-class quarter. From the top of a long, unlighted, narrow street an armored police truck, playing a search-light, bore down on the massed crowds in the square below. The light picked out of the darkness here a group huddled in a doorway, there heads at a window, here dodging, running figures. [illegible] police. It is this search-light effect Kellermann achieves. One felt no hope as one watched these Berlin rioters; they were so purposeless and so miserable. And with that experience in mind, it is difficult to close the book with any enthusiasm for the vague promise of revolution embodied in soldiers and the mob who stream through the streets of Berlin on the Ninth of November. Above the roar of the city, the spirit of the revolutionary idealist proclaims: "Arise! set out on thy path. Already a red light is dawning in the Eastern heavens. From thence comes the light."

The young Russian author of "We," whose book, the translator assures us, would be so unpopular in the East of the red light that it has had to be published first in a translation in a foreign country, would be very skeptical about the dawn of freedom. In his satirical vision of the future, all the revolutions are over and all the wars; the United State controls the earth. And the State is building a cosmic airship to go forth into space and bring a mathematically faultless happiness to the beings on other planets, who are perhaps still in the primitive state of freedom. The builder of this ship gives us his broken records, in a vivid, syncopated style. He is a devout admirer of the United State and all its institutions: its unanimous elections; its houses of glass—with the redeeming feature of curtains for the rigidly controlled hours of intercourse—"perhaps the strange opaque dwellings of the ancients were responsible for their pitiful cellish psychology"; its street membranes to record every whisper for the benefit of the Guardians; its Maternal Norms, for propagation; and its Table of the Hours that prescribed each movement throughout the day. Under the influence of a rebellious spirit, a woman, this engineer develops the disease of a soul, and is almost drawn into a revolt against the Well-doer and the Guardians. He becomes obsessed with the problem of the square root of minus one—this, a symbol of the independent creative personality that refuses to be standardized. He begins to live in two worlds. One is that where, in the morning, at long glass tables, globe-like heads are busy chewing slowly, silently, in unison, to the beat of the metronome; or where later the uniformed citizens pace up and down the street, four abreast, to the music of the March of the United State. The other world is an increasingly fantastic one of dreams and strange disturbing passions of jealousy and love and freedom. And instead of a correct and strictly mathematical poem in honor of the United State, he finds he is writing a fantastic novel. The engineer and others are saved for the United State when the Guardians discover the seat of fancy in a little nervous knot in the brain, and operate on the citizens—so that at last the road to 100 per cent happiness lies [illegible].

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Paul Bunyan

Paul Bunyan. By Esther Shephard. Seattle: The McNeil Press. $2.50.

Tall Timber. By James Stevens. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

QUITE contrary to my desire I can maintain no abiding enthusiasm for the exploits of Paul Bunyan as they are [illegible] by these two "historians." Paul Bunyan is the apotheosis of American tall tale-telling, but sheer exaggeration, even if it is "real American," becomes at length tiresome. [illegible] were kept constantly employed hauling away the prunestones [illegible] childishness becomes wearisome.

In himself Paul Bunyan is an American creation destined perhaps in America to outlive literature. [illegible] of this country he has but one peer—Uncle Remus. But Uncle Remus came from an older and simpler race, and he has had but one recorder, who was also a creator. Paul Bunyan is the creation of industrial dominancy—America itself; his contributors have logged from Maine to the Pacific. His potency has passed into various other mythical Americans of superhuman strength: Tony Beaver in West Virginia, Pecos Bill of the trans-Pecos West, Strap Buckner in South Texas, perhaps Mr. Percy MacKaye's "Mountain Munchausen" of Kentucky, and now Kemp Morgan of the oil fields, whither, according to some "roughnecks," Paul has also gone—for all authorities agree that the degenerate logging camps of the present know him only by hearsay. These satellites, however, but aggrandize their original.

In treating the great hero the methods of Mrs. Shephard and Mr. Stevens differ radically, and there are surprisingly few duplications of event. Mrs. Shephard has recorded the yarns "substantially as the men in the camps tell them." Her only "liberties," to quote her own words, "have been to arrange the stories in the form of a continuous narrative." They are all put in the mouth of one old logger, a grave mourner of the past, who knew Paul himself and scores of the cooks, lumberjacks, and traders he dealt with. The naturalness of his vernacular is a remarkable achievement.

Content with having the loggers talk naturally, Mrs. Shephard makes no comment, essays no philosophy. Mr. Stevens, on the other hand, assumes the liberties of a judicial novelist, frequently putting his own dull ideas into the mouths of his characters, even of the great Paul himself. In his concluding chapters he introduces a long-drawn-out satire which is utterly foreign to the bunkhouse yarn and is destructive to the spirit of the book. In gusto, in amplitude, and in recognition of the large and benevolent nature of Paul Bunyan Mr. Stevens is, nevertheless, superior to Mrs. Shephard. He develops the characters of Paul's men with skilful realism. His account of The Black Duck Dinner is unique in American literature. The Sourdough Drive is excellent fun; the description of The Old Home Camp, with its peace and plenty, and the exposition of bunkhouse balladry and tale-telling in Shanty Boy are large and full of the freedom that always characterizes prosperous camps of well-fed men where no women or ideas come. In the end, according to Mr. Stevens, it is ideas and women, together with population and Ford machinery, that destroy the power of Paul Bunyan and the wholesomeness of logging.

J. Frank Dobie

William Burnham

The Normal Mind. An Introduction to Mental Hygiene and the Hygiene of School Instruction. By William H. Burnham. D. Appleton and Company. $3.50.

AMONG those whom G. Stanley Hall gathered about him none was greater than W. H. Burnham, now the last of the giants at Clark University. Those who sat in his classes earlier will picture him, perhaps, as a young man; but to me he will always be an old and, what is rarer, a very wise man. Old, of course, in body only, for in mind he was young, fortified as he was by the ideal of his "great teacher, chief, and friend, G. Stanley Hall, for whose sympathy, stimulus, and inspiration it would be futile to attempt an adequate expression of indebtedness." What he had from Dr. Hall he made a part of himself and passed on to his students. It is impossible to forget the slight, quick-moving figure, white haired and bearded, whose flickering smile and high-pitched voice were so deliciously his own. And it is impossible to forget what that voice said to you as you sat in the classroom. The references to those who became teachers "with the help of God and an A. B. degree," and the inimitable story of George Washington Brown and Thomas Jefferson Brown, students of his in a country school long years before, one of whom was a low-grade moron and the other a high-grade imbecile—these things (they appear in the book!) he gave to his students along with a bewildering flood of information ranging from the teaching methods of Buddha to the latest experiments of American, English, French, German, Austrian, and Russian psychologists and physiologists (see his bibliographies here). For he never allowed his learning to fall into a hard pattern, to become sterile by repetition year after year; he was too deeply a participant in Dr. Hall's ideal of diligent, disinterested inquiry, fortified by gusto for learning and living and made possible by resiliency of mind.

If his personality must forever be the possession of his students and colleagues, he has poured his mind into this book, and given it to all who care to read. The early chapters are devoted to an examination, explanation, and evaluation of the conditioned reflex concept, and are followed by discussions of the school task, mental attitudes, suggestion and education, inhibition, association, and discipline. The essential characteristic of the normal mind he finds to be integration, and he conceives of education not so much as a scheme for filling the mind as a process for the cultivation of attitudes. One striking thing about the book is the fact that while it is the product of Dr. Burnham's long years of labor he constantly warns the reader against accepting the conclusions as dogmas. Much of his data is tentative. His utilization of psychoanalysis, for example, is admirably cautious and discriminating.

The essentials of mental hygiene Dr. Burnham states to be a task, a plan, and freedom, and these he expands into a résumé of the subject under the following heads: (1) Attention to the present situation, (2) orderly association, (3) mental work, (4) alternation of work and rest, (5) normal reaction to feeling, (6) an active attitude, (7) control, (8) confidence, (9) normal social relations, (10) adjustment, (11) a normal sense of dependence, (12) the scientific attitude. These captions, baldly stated, but faintly reflect the wealth of meaning the discussions pack into them. A thoroughgoing, widespread comprehension of his attitude in all its implications would make it impossible for him to say in the future that "a conventional failure is more desirable in our schools than a troublesome success."

To summarize the book is an impossibility. All one can do is to hope that it falls quickly into the hands of all intelligent and conscientious teachers. I hope it falls into the hands of all overconscientious teachers as well. "Possibly," as Dr. Burnham remarks slyly, "some morons are in the teaching profession." They, of course, will not appreciate the book. But those who can appreciate it will find that it is without doubt one of the major contributions to mental hygiene and pedagogy in recent years. And that mythical creature, the general reader, will find it vastly profitable as well.

C. Hartley Grattan

Back to Rousseau

Instinct. A Study in Social Psychology. By L. L. Bernard. Henry Holt and Company. $3.60.

THE profoundest problem in political, educational, and social philosophy is to determine the relative importance of hereditary and environmental factors in individual and social behavior. The pendulum of respectable opinion swings from one extreme to the other. In the views of the eighteenth-century rationalists human nature was not only inherently good but infinitely pliable. In Rousseau's view it was corrupted by the vile and tyrannizing institutions which cunning and evil-minded men had set over it. Helvétius built upon the doctrines of the innate equality of all men and the unlimited potency of the social milieu a beautiful faith in the infinite perfectibility of man. A considerable reaction against this utopianism was begun by Malthus and enormously furthered by Darwin. Since then the conflict between the intellectualists and the instinctivists has sharpened and deepened. Latterly the intellectualist view has lost steadily.

But another vigorous reaction is under way, this time to a viewpoint reminiscent of Rousseau and Helvétius. Human nature is again pictured as indefinitely and readily modifiable, and the reasons for the social ills of persons and classes are found in bad laws and corrupt institutions rather than in inherent human weaknesses. Mr. Bernard's book is by all odds the best and most complete statement of the new view.

Instinct, Mr. Bernard seems to say, must logically be defined as the unlearned but definite response of an inherited structure to a particular stimulus. But if one eliminate those simple neuro-muscular reactions best called reflexes, there are no real instincts. What one observes is the indefiniteness and plasticity of responses. Under the influence of the psycho-social environment every type of reaction becomes overlaid with habit to such an extent that it is the latter and not any reaction determined by hereditary structure which is important in psychological and sociological theorizing. Through the plasticity of his habit-forming capacities man can acquire modes of behavior which adjust his activities to a wide range of varied situations. Fixed structure with a reaction determined by hereditary factors would narrowly circumscribe the range of adaptive adjustments. If some of man's more vegetative and purely organic physiological reactions are thus restricted, not so his higher mental processes. Indeed, brain anatomy reveals "the existence of unconnected synapses in large numbers in the human cerebral cortex." Under the stimulus of the psycho-social environment which man has created this plastic structure is gradually built up into an elaborate network of neural connections performing the actions, thinking the thoughts, and feeling the emotions adapted to the social-psychological medium which has shaped it. In consequence, the autonomic apparatus —vegetative and reproductive—which clearly dominates the behavior of animals comes, in the case of man, under the domination of the higher control centers, the latter being fashioned in their behavior patterns by the psycho-social medium.

All of which and much more is interestingly elaborated with acute intelligence by Mr. Bernard. His survey and criticism of the current usage of the term instinct is a genuinely valuable contribution. His exposure of the superficiality and the extravagances of those instinctivists who find a definite inherited instinct behind nearly everything that man does is a wholesome corrective for a lot of loose thinking. But when one has finished with his exposition one is far from sure just where one has arrived. One ought to feel that instincts have now been finished off for good and all; yet Mr. Bernard continues to talk about them as realities to the end. He criticizes many classifications of them, but he seems unable to give a fresh classification or even to clarify our understanding of the fundamental drives in the human mechanism. He consistently adheres throughout to the contention that, if the instincts are to be phylogenetically derived, they must include a definite structure inherited according to Mendelian rules and specifically responsive to specific stimuli. This would effectively eliminate all such complex and coordinated activities as play, food, and sex, leaving only elemental reflexes that lack the necessary coordination until the fore-brain has got its cue from the psycho-social environment. The universalities of human behavior, regardless of time and place, are thus declared to be due to the universalities of social environment.

Mr. Bernard, in brief, reduces human nature to a few unimportant reflexes plus a mass of nebulous and unshaped nerve tissues out of which society makes whatever personality it pleases. It is an absurd conclusion. It is eighteenth-century utopianism all over again. It is a rejection of the whole contribution of biological evolution in order to join hands with the discredited rationalists of a pre-scientific age. No doubt science can do much for better habit formation, but so definite are the limits set by inherent tendencies that when we have done our best by a completed science of educational psychology human nature will be found to be much the same. If we do not call the inherited tendencies by the terms instinct and capacity we must find some other names for them; but they will not be changed by giving them new names. Meanwhile, it is folly to deny them altogether.

F. H. HANKINS

The New School
for Social Research

Purpose: To seek an unbiased understanding of the existing order, its genesis, growth and present working, as well as of those exigent circumstances which are working for its revision.

Registration begins September 28
School Year begins October 5

MORRIS R. COHEN—Problems of Contemporary Philosophy.
Tuesdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HORACE M. KALLEN—Dominant Ideals of Western Civilization.
Tuesdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN — Psychological Problems of Social Reconstruction.
Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene. Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

BERNARD GLUECK—Conduct and Its Disorders. Mondays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

ARTHUR F. PAYNE—Technique of Vocational Guidance. Fridays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

WILLIAM I. THOMAS — Psychological Foundations of Behavior.
Thursdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

A. A. GOLDENWEISER—Neo-Evolutionism: A Theory of Social Change.
Wednesdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

ALFRED J. LOTKA—The Statistical Study of Social Phenomena. Fridays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY—The Forecasting of Business and Investment Conditions. Tuesdays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

BENJAMIN M. ANDERSON, JR.—Money and Banking. Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—The Labor Movement in the National Life. Mondays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

LEONORA O'REILLY—Problems and Progress of Labor. Wednesdays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

H. W. L. DANA—Contemporary Literature, 1900-1925. Fridays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

STARK YOUNG—The Theatrical Season, 1925-26. Thursdays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

LEWIS MUMFORD—Architecture in American Civilization. Fridays, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

JOSEPH W. KRUTCH AND OTHERS—American Writers. Saturdays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

Tuition for each course, $20; special rate of $12 for ...

465 West Twenty-third Street, - New York City

Catholicism in France

The Catholic Reaction in France. By Denis Gwynn. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

MR. GWYNN makes no extravagant claims. He admits that the "reaction" in favor of Catholicism now visible in France is largely political in tendency, though a mark of piety. Of thirty-four million nominal Catholics in the country—Paris and Alsace-Lorraine are not included in these figures—only about ten million practice their religion; sixteen or seventeen million conform more or less, while seven or eight million are definitely hostile. Nevertheless, if we consider the vicissitudes through which France has passed during the last twenty years this is not a bad showing. It proves that loyalty to their traditional faith is less easy to eradicate among the French people than foreigners have supposed. Catholics are always forgetting that France produced Pascal and Fénelon as well as Voltaire and the Encyclopedists; they remember Lamennais, but forget Lacordaire.

This tendency to return to the faith and practice of the fathers was, of course, greatly strengthened by the war, though Mr. Gwynn insists that it showed itself before the beginning of the century. But naturally the heroism and democracy which the French clergy displayed on the battlefield did much to remove anti-clerical prejudice, and the fact that so many officers of high rank—Foch, Pau, Castelnau, Maud'huy, Mangin, Gouraud, Lyautey, not to mention the idolized Guynemer—openly practiced their religion had an immense effect upon public opinion. The result was that at the end of the war the seminaries began to be filled with candidates for the priesthood, although the stipend of the ordinary parish priest amounts to less than five dollars a month, a sum small enough, as Mr. Gwynn remarks, "to deter all but the most saintly." There were also evidences of change in the official mind. It was Briand who brought in the bill restoring relations with the Vatican in 1921—Briand, who had drafted the Law of Separation sixteen years earlier. Jonnart, who had voted for it, became the new representative at the Curia. Clemenceau himself bore witness more than once to the admirable conduct of the priesthood in the field. The government began, in 1921, to take part in the celebration of the festival of Ste. Jeanne d'Arc, though up to the year 1912 to celebrate her feast was a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment. It is of course true that French Catholics have sometimes kept rather disreputable political company. Rightly or wrongly, as Mr. Gwynn confesses, the church is associated in the minds of many Frenchmen with the royalist cause, or at any rate is credited with a very lukewarm affection for the republic; and the religious propaganda of M. Charles Maurras and l'Action Française has done much to confirm that association. The fact that M. Maurras, though himself a skeptic, regards the church as his natural ally in his crusade against democracy is even now an effective weapon in the hands of the church's enemies and may become, Mr. Gwynn admits, more effective in the future.

Mr. Gwynn devotes a good many pages to an interesting account, well fortified with statistics, of the efforts the church is making to strengthen her position: important committees whose function it is to supply Catholic news to the press; Catholic trade unions formed to keep labor, as far as possible, within the fold; newspapers of immense circulation, admirably organized and edited, that virtually monopolize certain areas in the interest of Catholicism. But the Catholic schools are naturally the chief instrument of religious teaching. Though Catholics are taxed for the upkeep of the state schools, they send their children very largely to their own. One-fifth of all the children now attending the primary schools are in these privately maintained institutions. As to secondary education, there are as many pupils in the Catholic schools as in all the government schools put together. "Such," says Mr. Gwynn, "is the actual state of affairs ten years after the teaching orders were banished from France."

The church is probably the only force strong enough to resist the drift at present toward depopulation. Her position on this subject is well known, and it is illustrated by the fact that those parts of the country in which religion has lost ground are precisely those threatened with loss of population. This relation is so marked that the government has itself undertaken to transfer colonies of devout Breton peasants to depopulated agricultural regions. So the "Iceland Fisherman" is becoming a missionary of the domestic virtues, and the wilderness and the solitary place are expected to be glad for him.

Francis Hackett

Books in Brief

The Story of Women. By W. L. George. Harper and Brothers. $2.

Mr. George's understanding of women, his specialty in novels, magazines, and newspapers, has become a commercialized vice. If only he makes no money out of this, perhaps the feminists will be rid of a crude exploiter. There is something oily about his patronage, something hack in this jungle of generalizations, that is sure to annoy an honest modern woman. Better a gentleman tory any day, with whatever sincere antagonisms to power in females.

With Pencilbrush and Chisel: The Life of an Artist. By Emil Fuchs. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $7.50.

Emil Fuchs is an Austrian portrait painter and sculptor, now residing in America, who has spent most of his life serving royalty and fashionable society with conventional and facile talents. His book is a chronicle of his relationships with famous patrons and fellow-artists. In his narrative Mr. Fuchs fails to make his personages very vital, although he gossips glibly about them through 147 pages of a very large, heavy, and elaborately illustrated volume. As a record of a highly successful achievement in "making a go" of art it will meet the approval of every chamber of commerce and rotary club in the country.

A History of Sculpture. By George Henry Chase and Chandler R. Post. Harper and Brothers. $4.75.

This very comprehensive and highly condensed handbook is the latest addition to Harper's Fine Art Series, which now has in preparation a "History of Painting." The "History of Sculpture" is a lucid and exceedingly well-planned survey, largely concerned with the art of the Occident, although Oriental sculpture in various countries is briefly treated. Each section of the volume is provided with a rich bibliography. The authors perform a valuable service in that they never fail to show how the art of a particular period or country is the expression of the history and traditions of the epoch. The student using the work as a text will find the chapter and section summaries particularly helpful. The cuts are numerous, but unfortunately many of them are too small to be of real service in furthering appreciation or understanding. The book, however, is unquestionably authoritative and the best handbook of its kind to date.

Our Governmental Machine. By Schuyler C. Wallace. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Rarely does there come from the press so readable an introduction to the problem of the organization of government, or one so full of information and sound discussion. A vivid and popular account of our government, informed by contact with the realities as well as the shibboleths of politics, and touched with the humor inhering in the political scene, it is an altogether admirable and successful attempt to make the mechanics of government intelligible.

The Oxford Book of Russian Verse. Chosen by the Hon. Maurice Baring. Oxford University Press. $2.85.

The selections contained in this anthology are given in the original Russian. The volume, which includes excerpts from long dramatic and narrative compositions as well as short lyrics, opens with a portion of Derzhavin's ode, God, the only piece representative of the age of the great Catherine, and concludes with the magnificent if retrograde poem Holy Russia, by Voloshin, the sole strictly contemporary figure who finds a place here. The Hon. Maurice Baring is as stand-pat in his aesthetics as he appears to be in his politics. His taste runs to the facile, the pretty, the sentimental. He assigns more space to the forgotten confectioner of sweetmeats, Nadson, than to Tyutchev, who belongs with the few truly great poets of the language; and he gives three pieces by a poetaster like Sluchevsky to one by so sound and vivid a writer as Bunin. The treatment accorded the symbolist school, which blossomed out richly toward the close of the century, is particularly unsatisfactory. For one thing you must look in vain for a glimpse of Vyacheslav Ivanov and Sologub. This sin of omission would be approximated if an English anthology of nineteenth-century poetry were to lack Swinburne and Yeats, or if a French collection for the same period were to ignore Baudelaire and Verlaine. The notes, which are from the pen of Prince D. S. Mirsky, offer interesting odds and ends of biography, chronology, bibliography, and critical comment.

Moon Harvest. By Giuseppe Cautela. The Dial Press. $2.

Poetic simplicity—sometimes exalted and occasionally exaggerated—is the dominant note in this love story of an Italian immigrant. The author appears to have drawn reflectively from memories of himself in that role; his novel has, in consequence, an engaging quality of immediacy. It is an excursion in sentiment, but not the canned sentiment of the popular magazine.

Wild Asses. By James G. Dunton. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

Here is another attempt to translate higher education into lower terms—the newest addition to the campus carouse school of fiction. With a college in the background and a bottle of synthetic gin in the foreground, almost anyone can turn out these so-called studies of the post-war generation. How much longer will budding novelists cling to their hip-pocket hysteria?

Professor. By Stanley Johnson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

Satirical in an academic sort of way, and yet tentatively sympathetic, Mr. Johnson in his novel fails to strike either note with authority. Touches of exaggeration creep into his serious moments; when he tries to be light he grows heavier. Possibly the feeble emotional character of the central figure has communicated itself to the narrative; it has about as much sparkle as the surface of a rain-barrel.

Day of Atonement. By Louis Golding. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

A fine, flexible prose and a story of swift, somber intensity are here fused in a novel of notable richness. The narrative is steeped in the traditions of the Jewish race; it reflects a grasp and a responsive sympathy which are far from superficial in values.

The Little Dark Man. By Ernest Poole. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Mr. Poole picked up much good ore in Russia, and continues to turn it to good advantage. These sketches—some light and some somber—supplement the collections entitled "The Village," and "The Dark People." They invite the reader to an understanding of the Russian peasant through the wide-open door of folk-lore.

The Political Parties of Today. By Arthur N. Holcombe. Harper and Brothers. $3.

With the death of La Follette there will be many attempts to evaluate historically the movement that he led. None of these are likely to be more successful than is Mr. Holcombe's, although his account closes shortly before the election of 1924. His book is truly noteworthy as a brilliant first attempt to base political history upon inductive statistical analyses of the social forces underlying political history. He concludes that far from being "empty bottles," as it is customary to assume, parties in the past have focused conflicts of interest between sections—interests that in the main are economic. The book will shatter some cherished illusions of political liberals. On the other hand it will support a belief in the continued existence of ground for the alignment between "progressive" and capitalistic groups within the existing parties—an alignment that La Follette did so much to clarify.

The Evolution of American Political Parties. By Edgar E. Robinson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

The political party is regarded by Mr. Robinson as primarily an organization rather than a segment of the electorate. Parties in this sense have "dominated American politics since 1830, no matter who won the election." His book will have much value as a systematic historical résumé of changes in party organization and control from the colonial period onward.

Lady Anne Barnard at the Cape of Good Hope. By Dorothea Fairbridge. Oxford University Press. $10.

A series of spirited and readable letters from a gifted Englishwoman, written from South Africa at the close of the eighteenth century, filled out by the editor with many unnecessary and tiresome details of intricate relationships and deservedly forgotten intrigues. Lady Anne herself gives an interesting picture of life at the Cape and of the petty maneuvering of small politicians there. The text is illuminated by many of her own drawings, which show her a competent and witty artist as well as letter writer.

Stories and Essays by Mrs. Havelock Ellis. With prefaces by different hands and notes by Havelock Ellis. Berkeley Heights, New Jersey: Published privately by the Free Spirit Press. 2 volumes. $3.20.

Literary remains of a gifted and interesting woman. The stories and essays gathered here are secondary in importance to the volumes published by Mrs. Ellis during her lifetime, but they are welcome as being her last word on love and the free life. The essays deal briefly with Edward Carpenter, Havelock Ellis, James Hinton, Oscar Wilde, Ellen Key, Olive Schreiner, and Frederik Van Eeden. There are several photographs of the author and her husband.

THEATER

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE 45th St. W. of B'way. Evs. 8:30. Mats. Thursday and Saturday.

International Relations Section

An Indian on Opium

THE following address was delivered in the Council of State of India on March 5 by Sir D. Sarvadhikary, who, as a member of the Liberal Party, is opposed to the policies of the Swarajists and favors collaboration with the Government. His remarks form an interesting commentary on statements of Gertrude Marvin Williams in her article, India and Opium, on page 229 of this issue, regarding the attitude toward the opium question of various sections of Indian opinion.

I have no wish today in this resolution which I have the honor to bring forward to challenge the whole of the opium policy of the Government of India. Indeed, in certain respects it is unchallengeable and beneficial. Rather I wish to deal with our special question, namely, the restriction of the actual consumption of Indian opium to the medical needs of the population. The representative of the Indian Government, Mr. Campbell, at the world conference at Geneva last November, made a reservation on behalf of this Government. He objected that the Government of India could not consent to restrict the cultivation of opium to medical and scientific requirements because in India the drug could not thus be medically restricted without great hardship to the people. It is that statement alone that I now challenge.

The argument which Mr. Campbell used was concisely given in Lord Hardinge's government dispatch of 1911, which has since become the locus classicus of the Government of India on this subject. The passage is so important that I shall venture to quote from it at some length. It reads as follows:

> The prohibition of opium-eating in India we regard as impossible, and any attempt at it as fraught with the most serious consequences to the people and Government. We take our stand unhesitatingly on the conclusion of the Royal Commission, which reported in 1895 that the opium habit as a vice scarcely exists in India; that opium is used in India extensively for non-medical and quasi-medical purposes; that the non-medical uses are so interwoven with the medical uses that it could not be possible to draw a line of distinction between them; that it is unnecessary that the growth of the poppy and the sale of opium in British India should be prohibited except for medical purposes. Whatever may be the case in other countries, centuries of inherited experience has taught the people of India discretion in the use of the drug and its misuse is a negligible feature in Indian life.

The long argument which I have quoted has recently been made the groundwork of the defense of the Government of India policy in a pamphlet issued from the India Office in 1921 called "The Truth About Opium."

Let me try to explain why I believe the Royal Commission of 1893 and the Government of India dispatch of 1911 and the India Office pamphlet of 1921 to be all out of date and to need an overhauling and a drastic revision, if progress in opium reform is to be effective.

First of all, India itself is passing through an industrial revolution over large areas, and the commission report of 1895 hardly deals at all with the new drug evils that have arisen through the increased consumption of opium in industrial centers.

Secondly, the evidence given before the Royal Commission in 1894-1895 appears to have been incomplete concerning certain parts of India about which we have now much more up-to-date information. We find, for instance, no serious attempt made after it to deal with the evils of opium smoking as well as of excessive opium eating in Assam.

Thirdly, a very great deal of scientific evidence has been collected since the Royal Commission sat. A much more serious medical view is generally taken today about the harm of opium eating. The old contrast between opium smoking and opium eating could hardly be maintained today.

Fourthly, the whole opium question has become in recent years an international question of the very first importance. Lord Robert Cecil is sent out to Geneva. Three cabinet meetings, we are told, have met at Whitehall to deal with it. All this is quite new since 1895. The Indian Government cannot afford to stand aside and treat the subject any longer as only a domestic concern. It is hardly too much to say that America's entry into the League of Nations and the peace of the world have indirectly depended on its solution.

For all these reasons, I would ask whether the time has not come for a revision of the whole subject in the light of new information and new events. The question to be asked is whether the Government of India's policy cannot come one step nearer to the point which we all have in view, viz., the restriction of the sale of opium in India to medical requirements of the population. We may not be able to reach that point by means of a Dangerous Drugs Act as yet, in the same way as it has already been reached in Japan and the West. But it may be possible to attain such a close approximation that the actual average consumption of opium per head in India is not greatly in excess of the medical index figure laid down by the League of Nations, viz., 6 seers per 10,000 people.*

Let me come to actual facts. There are certain black spots today on the opium map of India. If these were cleared away the general consumption would not be much in excess of the medical index figure of 6 seers per 10,000 people that I have mentioned.

The most important of these black spots is that area of Assam, in the Assam Valley, peopled by the Assamese race, Sibsaga, Nowgong, Lakhimpur, and Durrang. The excess is here so great that it comes up to nearly an average of 150 seers per 10,000 instead of 6 seers. A very large proportion of this opium is smoked and not eaten. Assam has the extremely bad record of one district with a consumption of 237 seers per 10,000.

We next come to another black spot in a modern industrial area, namely, the city of Calcutta. Here the opium consumption has reached the alarming figure of 143.6 seers per 10,000 instead of 6 seers. The opium shops are all in the slums, and it is the slum population that is still further demoralized.

A third abuse is in Burma, where the rate of consumption is still very high. I believe that the strange anomaly still exists that while opium smoking is forbidden to the Burmese race it is permitted to the immigrant Chinese. The figure in Rangoon is 110 and Mergui 147.

Figures like these will not stand comparison with the League of Nations index figure of 6 seers per 10,000. The effect of such black spots in the opium map is all the more deplorable because the map is white or nearly white over very large areas indeed—the consumption falling even below the League of Nations' figure.

Two things appear to me to result from what I have said: (1) It is not impossible to bring the internal consumption of opium in India much lower down with great benefit to the people: indeed it may be possible to bring it within respectable distance of the League of Nations index figure; (2) If this is to be done effectively, a working committee must be appointed, which must not think of politics or parties or revenue or official red tape and routine but must only consider the good of the people of India and the welfare of mankind.

---

*The League of Nations figure of 600 milligrams equals 6 seers per 10,000 population. 1 seer equals 2 pounds.

To such a committee also, when it has done its work in India itself faithfully and well, I would also intrust the revision of the export traffic in opium from India, in which we are all thankful to see a marked decline in the past two years. For it has to be acknowledged to our shame that almost every ounce of Indian opium exported is immediately prepared by the importing Government for smoking purposes. We cannot forget that more than twelve years ago we were one of the contracting powers at the Hague Convention which solemnly signed article 7 [agreeing] that we would prohibit the export of prepared opium and that if we could not do so immediately we would do so as soon as possible. I trust that no one here will bring forward the quibble that the Indian opium exported to the Far East is prepared for smoking out there and not in India. Such a quibble in a humanitarian issue would be utterly unworthy of a great nation such as ours. . . .

When the working committee which I propose has got steadily to work to reduce the consumption of India, which stands at about 12 seers per 10,000, to something near to the League of Nations figure, when we have reduced the 237 seers in Assam district to normal and the 143.6 seers of Calcutta city to normal, then we shall have the right and the duty to cry halt to the export of Indian opium to the Straits Settlements, where the consumption of opium for smoking purposes is over 1,000 seers per 10,000 of the population and where between one-third and one-half of the revenue of the colony is paid for out of the receipts from Indian opium smoked in opium dens under a Straits Settlements government monopoly. Indeed it may even be possible in course of time to reduce the export of Indian opium as well as our internal consumption to within some reasonable distance of the League of Nations index and thus at last stand before the whole world with absolutely clean hands.

Gandhi on Birth Control

SANITY on the subject of birth control seems to be gaining ground in the West—especially in England. The Bishop of Birmingham openly declares himself in favor of birth control. A more hesitating admission was made by the British National Council of Public Morals; its report, The Ethics of Birth Control, states that the use of contraceptives is probably "the lesser of two evils." Although the Labor Party has been reticent on the subject, the Birmingham Labor Conference carried a resolution recently declaring that qualified doctors should be authorized to give information about birth control. In India, on the other hand, Gandhi has declared himself in opposition. The following statement is reprinted from the Hindustan Times of March 17:

It is not without the greatest hesitation and reluctance that I approach this subject. The question of using artificial methods for birth control has been referred to me by correspondents ever since my return to India. Though I have answered them personally, I have never hitherto dealt with the subject publicly. My attention was drawn to the subject, now thirty-five years ago, when I was a student in England. There was then a hot controversy raging between a priest who would not countenance anything but natural means and a doctor who advocated artificial means. It was at that early time in my life that I became, after leanings for a brief period toward artificial means, a convinced opponent of them. I now observe that in some Hindi papers the methods are described in a revoltingly open manner which shocks one's sense of decency. I observe, too, that one writer does not hesitate to cite my name as among the supporters of artificial methods of birth control. I cannot recall a single occasion when I spoke or wrote in favor of such methods. I have seen also two illustrious names having been used in support. I hesitate to publish them without reference to their owners.

There can be no two opinions about the necessity of birth control. But the only method handed down from ages past is self-control or Brahmacharya. It is an infallible sovereign remedy doing good to those who practice it. And medical men will earn the gratitude of mankind, if instead of devising artificial means of birth control they will find out the means of self-control. The union is meant not for pleasure but for bringing forth progeny. And union is a crime when the desire for progeny is absent.

Artificial methods are like putting a premium upon vice. They make man and woman reckless. And respectability that is being given to the methods must hasten the dissolution of the restraints that public opinion puts upon one. Adoption of artificial methods must result in imbecility and nervous prostration. The remedy will be found to be worse than the disease. It is wrong and immoral to seek to escape the consequences of one's acts. It is good for a person who overeats to have an ache and a fast. It is bad for him to indulge his appetite and then escape the consequence by taking tonics or other medicine. It is still worse for a person to indulge in his animal passions and escape the consequences of his acts. Nature is relentless and will have full revenge for any such violation of her laws. Moral results can only be produced by moral restraints. All other restraints defeat the very purpose for which they are intended. The reasoning underlying the use of artificial methods is that indulgence is a necessity of life. Nothing can be more fallacious. Let those who are eager to see the births regulated explore the lawful means devised by the ancients and try to find out how they can be revived. An enormous amount of spade-work lies in front of them. Early marriages are a fruitful source of adding to the population. The present mode of life has also a great deal to do with the evil of unchecked procreation. If these causes are investigated and dealt with society will be morally elevated. If they are ignored by impatient zealots and if artificial methods become the order of the day, nothing but moral degradation can be the result. A society that has already become enervated through a variety of causes will become still further enervated by the adoption of artificial methods. Those men, therefore, who are lightheartedly advocating artificial methods cannot do better than study the subject afresh, stay their injurious activity, and popularize Bramacharya both for the married and the unmarried. That is the only noble and straight method of birth control.

Our Marines in Nicaragua

THE NATION of August 12, in discussing editorially the withdrawal of our marines from Nicaragua (page 180), quoted in brief a comment by the Nicaraguan correspondent of the Diario Latino of San Salvador to the effect that the newly organized constabulary would be a perpetuation of control by the United States in an even more objectionable form. The article is reproduced below at greater length:

For more than thirteen years Nicaraguan territory has been violated by the presence of a detachment of United States marines, thanks to the political ambitions of the Conservative governments that have succeeded to power since 1912. Unscrupulous in their methods of keeping the family in power, and well aware that there hung over them not only the weight of their political crimes but the watchfulness of a people thirsting for justice, the Chamorros, using the most futile pretexts, brought in these Yankee troops that are an insult to national honor and dignity.

The United States, powerful and great, amuses itself by developing in the South American countries a crude policy of extortion and piracy, force and violence. And it has fallen upon unhappy Nicaragua like a sea monster in the darkness of a cave, spreading its thousands of tentacles over her fertile body. And she, poor thing, defenseless and alone, has met with disaster in spite of all the canons of international law, in violation of all codes of justice, and in an age of much ranting about democracy. But this United States is not the same nation that brought to life the two great leaders that stand out bright stars in a vast black sky—Washington and Lincoln. No; the United States of today embodies the filibustering spirit of Walker, hungry for gold and glory and easy conquests. More artful are the men of today, who lurk in hiding and delight in living prey. Wilson dons an apostolic halo to call the attention of the world to his new doctrines, his image grows at the proper moment like a symbol, and the weak nations grow confident and hope; but Wilson was Walker all over again, insidious, deceptive, and cruel, with smooth ways, while his conquering claws were tearing open new wounds and bringing darkness and destruction.

Since the treaty was signed there has been no one to authorize the presence of United States troops in Nicaragua. This, then, is an aggressive and arbitrary act without legal justification or political sanction. Nevertheless, since the Chamorros needed it, and since these soldiers guaranteed their remaining in power, which would otherwise have been impossible owing to their unpopularity and immorality, these forces have not moved from the Campo de Marte, thereby branding the country with the ugly mark of its shame.

More than two-thirds of the Nicaraguan population, without distinction of political affiliations, condemn this abuse of sovereignty by the Chamorros. Because, as is natural and logical, the people, awake to the situation and ready to defend their rights, hate the Yankees, who come like conquerors to flay our country, which, despite its territorial limitations, has great wealth, culture, and intellectual development.

Tragic in the history of Nicaragua are the pages of mourning which these pitiless birds of prey have left in their wake. And it is necessary, in spite of everything, to study these pages in order that Latin America may know the disaster which the United States, in a period of Wilsonian law, brought on this tiny section of the great Spanish-speaking continent. We must uncover our wounds, we must point out these seats of infection in our autonomous life, and we must shout out our grief so that all may hear us, so that no one will fail to listen to us. Then there will come a day, in the dim future, shining with glorious liberty, justice, and strength, when the weak nations now groaning under the iron heel of the Yankee will be free, great, and powerful again. And it is toward this day, shrouded in the mysteries of the future, that this cry of ours goes out, and may it be echoed in all Latin hearts like a blazing watchword before the advance of the Northern conquerors upon the young America. . . .

It may be that the marines will leave the Campo de Marte, but [illegible] has in various ways trampled upon the dignity and autonomy of the Filipinos [illegible] to reach the country, according to a statement made to President Solorzano by the United States chargé d'affaires.

The new form of Yankee intervention in Nicaragua, as we have so often repeated, is the constabulary, only now it is to be more offensive, in that it will be more direct, less disguised, and highly insulting. From now on the government will have no control of the army, nothing to do with firearms, nothing to say about any of these matters. The only man who can make and unmake the military forces of Nicaragua at will is to be Mr. Carter, officer in the active service of the United States army, and consequently subject only to the superior officers in his country. This is the principal accomplishment of President Dr. Carlos Solorzano in his first five months of office, and one which will place his name on the pages of history under the just wrath of his people.

Contributors to This Issue

RAMSAY MACDONALD was the first Labor Prime Minister of England.

EDGAR LEE MASTERS is the author of "A Spoon River Anthology" and other verse and novels.

GERTRUDE MARVIN WILLIAMS is now in India.

LOUISE BRYANT, author of "Six Red Months in Russia" and "Mirrors of Moscow," saw much of Turkish leaders while serving as staff correspondent of the International News Service in Turkey from 1922 to 1924.

MARGUERITE ARNOLD lives in New York and contributes verse to current periodicals.

JACOB ZEITLIN is professor of English at the University of Illinois.

GERALD L. WENDT is head of the department of chemistry at Pennsylvania State College and discoverer of the ozone form of hydrogen. He wrote the article Decomposing the Atom in The Nation for May 10, 1922.

DOROTHY BREWSTER, instructor in English at Columbia University, will be remembered for her article Lenin and the Prize Pig, published in The Nation soon after her return from Russia in 1923.

J. FRANK DOBIE is the editor of "Legends of Texas."

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is an essayist in American literature, living at Salem, Massachusetts.

F. H. HANKINS is professor of sociology at Smith College.

CHARLES H. A. WAGER is professor of English literature at Oberlin College.

The "Low Down" On Coal

"THE MINERS' FIGHT FOR AMERICAN STANDARDS"

The Most Interesting Coal Book Ever Published.

Postpaid $2.00

The Dell Publishing Company

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1925 No. 3139

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 245
EDITORIALS:
Can Brides Cook? 247
Facing Our World 248
Literary Illusions 248
Sir Adam Beck and His Job 249
BEHIND THIS PROHIBITION. By Leonard Cline 250
MASQUERADE. By Helene Mullins 251
KRIM FACES EUROPE. By M. M. Knight 252
THE INTERNATIONAL PH.D.'S. By Paul Hutchinson 253
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 255
CORRESPONDENCE 255
BOOKS:
Mr. Pope. By Allen Tate 258
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 258
The Long Story of Oxford. By William MacDonald 258
Concerning Crime. By Winthrop D. Lane 259
The Earliest Feminists. By Dora W. Kirchwey 260
Woman's Work. By Babette Deutsch 260
Books in Brief 261
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Horthy or Bethlen? By Emery Déri 262

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

A CONFERENCE to discuss Chinese questions has been called to meet at Johns Hopkins University September 17-20. It was high time. People in this country are not awake to the significance of the struggle in China. The committee sponsoring this conference is a catholic one; it includes representatives of the banks composing the Chinese consortium, of the British-American Tobacco Company, of the missionaries, of the universities, of the press. We know that the individuals responsible for its organization see the flaming line that divides right from wrong in this Chinese matter. But will the conference express their spirit, or will the international Ph.D.'s with their technicalities and hesitations and meticulous pedantries capture it and deaden it, as they seem to have captured the Institute of Pacific Relations (described by Mr. Hutchinson on page 253) and the Williamstown Institute?

ONE OF THE GREATEST STRIKES IN HISTORY is fighting its inchoate way to victory in China. A London dispatch to the New York Times estimates the loss to British firms in Hongkong at billions of pounds sterling; the Associated Press puts the daily losses at "several hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling." At Shanghai the Japanese employers of 50,000 Chinese workmen have virtually surrendered, granting recognition of the union, financial aid to needy strikers, disarming of the foremen, and $5,000 reparation to injured strikers and their families. This Japanese strike lies at the root of the trouble with the British, but while the Japanese have yielded the British remain rock-faced. The students whom the British police slaughtered on May 30 were protesting against the shooting of a single workman in the Japanese strike, and the nation-wide demand for abrogation of the special privileges enjoyed by foreigners in China had its immediate origin in that conflict. The Chinese are right in blaming the British today; no other nation has been so stiffly arrogant. It was the British Foreign Office which forbade publication of the results of the diplomatic investigation inculpating British officials for the Shanghai murders; it is British diplomacy which has hamstrung every effort of the Washington Government to take effective steps for the relief of China since this trouble broke into flames. No wonder the Chinese boycott British goods; no wonder the dockmen refuse to unload British vessels and that the Canton Government refuses to accept goods transshipped in British Hongkong.

BRITISH MERCHANTS IN CHINA are reported to be urging their Government to intervene effectively—they mean with military force—to stop this wicked injury to British business. It is, they say, a violation of their treaty-guaranteed equal position. The Chinese, these merchants say, understand only force; any concession will be regarded as a weakness. That is the old, old story which has led the colonial powers into so many disasters. The French in China seem to know better, as a story from Shanghai illustrates. Shanghai is, administratively, three cities: the International Concession, ruled mainly by the British; the French Concession; and the native city. When July 4 came this year—Empire Day for the British and Independence Day for the Americans—the Anglo-Saxons, fearing the native agitation, omitted their usual celebrations. Bastille Day followed on July 14. The Anglo-Saxons were alarmed when they heard that the French intended no such precautions. They packed their half of the Avenue Edouard VII, which is the boundary between the two concessions, with armed and uniformed police and volunteers. When a torchlight Chinese parade filed up the French half of the street, not a French policeman was in sight. But there was no outbreak of any kind. Naturally the French are more popular in Shanghai than the British, and more so than the Americans, whose gunboats still command the river-front.

NEW YORK CITY, on a recent Sunday, saw, unheralded, one of those nationalist meetings which make it so fascinating a microcosm of the peoples of the earth and their interests. This time it was a Chinese meeting in the Chinese Theatre, formerly the Teatro Caruso—a big and very bad picture of Caruso frescoed on the wall of the lobby mingling oddly with Chinese signs and gay banners. The meeting was called under the auspices of the National Party —followers of Dr. Sun Yat-Sen—to listen to the report of a committee appointed to raise and distribute funds for the Chinese strikers. The little Chinese community, it appeared, had raised $62,000 in American money. The student reporting for the committee explained in detail how it was raised and how it was spent. Other students distributed a forty-eight-page magazine. They had run off 5,000 copies on a mimeograph, having first cut the Chinese characters on a stencil by hand. The audience listened courteously to a speech in English by Provost Edmunds of Johns Hopkins University, formerly president of Canton Christian College. Dr. Edmunds spoke as a friend of China, personally known to many of the students in the audience. He was frank in criticizing the foreign powers, but earnestly advised China to go slow in abolishing extraterritoriality. His audience listened courteously but unsympathetically. No section of Chinese opinion can now be satisfied by such a program of gradual reform. The massacre at Shanghai has made it too late. As Thomas F. Millard, a veteran student of China, put it in the New York Times: "If I read the international and Chinese political signs aright, rendition of every kind of foreign territorial political position and special privilege cannot be postponed more than a few years."

THE BELGIAN DEBT AGREEMENT, as we said last week in an editorial written before the terms of the settlement were announced, constitutes a new policy with regard to our European government debtors. It is an abandonment of our precious contention that the debts must be paid in full, with interest, in favor of a willingness to settle these obligations according to "capacity to pay." Interest on the pre-armistice debt of $171,780,000 has been renounced, and the principal is to be paid in instalments extending over sixty-two years. The post-armistice debt of $246,000,000 is also to be liquidated in sixty-two years. Interest is called for on this, but it will be nominal for the first ten years and after that 3½ per cent, amounting in all to $310,050,500. Assuming that the agreement will be carried out in its entirety as now written, and considering the industrial and financial conditions of Belgium, the United States has put the screws on hard. On the other hand, the actual payments that Belgium will be called upon to make for the first few years are small. For the first year, for instance, only $3,840,000 is called for, which is a little less than 1 per cent on the total principal of $417,780,000— an amount upon which we ourselves are paying nearly 4¼ per cent.

THE WORST ASPECT of the agreement is that it is contrived—and purposely—with a view to deceiving the public in both Belgium and the United States. Our Debt Commission has avoided making a clear analysis of the arrangement for home consumption, having deluged the public instead with a mass of statistics intended to convey the impression that Belgium is paying virtually in full. This is done because our public has been misled in regard to the finances of European countries; it is demanding its pound of flesh from nations that cannot afford to pay it. What is more, as Pierrepont B. Noyes, formerly American Commissioner in the Rhineland, recently said, we cannot afford to make them try to pay it. The Republican Administration, having been largely responsible for the wrong attitude of the public in regard to European debts, now thinks it necessary—in order that Washington may save its face—to delude the people further in regard to the settlement. In Belgium the situation is apparently as bad. There the people are opposed to laying any considerable burden upon themselves in order to repay a debt for which they think they should not be held responsible. The demand for a settlement comes from bankers and business men who accept the virtual fiat of the American Government that no private loans are to be granted by our financial institutions in countries which have not arranged to pay their public debt to the United States. Thus in Belgium the Government is trying to persuade the people that they are getting off almost scot-free, while in America the Administration is endeavoring to make the public think that it is collecting virtually in full. Neither is true. Such deception is harmful all around.

ONE REMARKABLE FEATURE of the case is the calm acceptance by the public on both sides of the water of this avowed and intimate alliance between Wall Street and Uncle Sam. It works both ways: The bankers refuse to lend money at all until a bargain is closed with the Washington Administration, and Washington agrees to accept low interest in order to make it possible for the bankers to lend at high rates. In any case the bankers gain and the taxpayers lose. The procedure reminds one of the scandalous treatment of the Russian debts in the closing days of the Wilson Administration. The Treasury, upon the insistence of the State Department, authorized payment, out of funds under its control, of interest on the loan made to the Czar's Government by a Wall Street syndicate, while making no effort whatever to collect interest on the debt owing to our Government.

DETROIT'S MUNICIPALLY OWNED street railways have been the subject lately of some widely circulated newspaper articles indicating that the city enterprise is losing money, that it has a deficit of more than $3,000,000, and that the bond issue of $5,000,000, which was voted in 1923, has been largely exhausted. Believing these statements to be the propaganda of private interests desirous of holding their monopoly in the utilities field, the Public Ownership League of America wrote to Edward W. Bemis, Professor Henry E. Riggs, of the University of Michigan, and others for data. After receiving this information the league announces that the auditor for the street-railway lines now admits that there is no deficit and that the system is making money; the net earnings for May, the last month for which the finances have been analyzed, were $61,285.71. Instead of selling $3,500,000 worth of the authorized bonds, the railway invested surplus earnings in extensions and improvements. If the remainder of the authorized bond issue were sold, it would be enough to pay off the $2,571,286.28 in short-term loans, while still leaving nearly $1,000,000 for claims that may be successfully prosecuted against the railway.

MORRIS SIGMAN, president of the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, says that the opposition forces in the organization are Communists taking orders from Moscow, bent upon destroying the union. The opposition say that they are for the most part not Communists but are members of the rank and file bent upon democratizing and saving the union. The other day, in open defiance of their international officers, some 12,000 protestants walked out of their shops in New York City on a two-hour recess and gathered in mass meetings to denounce the "Sigman machine." When Mr. Sigman minimizes such mass protests or ascribes them to the influence of a few agitators he falls into the same error as do those persons who attribute the Chinese strikes to the machinations of Moscow. At most agitators take advantage of a state of discontent which any wise leader should himself recognize and deal with. Morris Sigman is a decent, honest labor leader flanked on one side by a ruthless machine and a rigid, undemocratic system of government, and on the other by a large, ably led rebellion. If he is as eager as he says he is to overthrow the abuses in the union, he should long ago have attempted to use this opposition in his fight against the machine; many a statesman has allowed himself to be pushed where he could not have dared to move alone. But Sigman chose the weaker course. He talked of reform; and ousted from office men who were fighting for it. Their tactics may have been disruptive and some of their aims unwise; but nothing could have been lost by using them as a club against reactionary office-holders.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF THE NAME of Huebsch from the list of American publishers is cause for regret among those who during the past ten years have enjoyed the spectacle presented by half a dozen young houses which more or less made over the book business in New York. Mr. Huebsch is by no means out of the game, since he has merged with the Viking Press and presumably will carry on under a new roof. But in the world of publishing names have more than a perfunctory importance, and the name of Huebsch was in every way a good one. Not many books issued from the firm during its comparatively brief existence, but they were usually distinguished; and the impression was current—and justified—that Mr. Huebsch himself, a man of taste and literary intelligence, had personally approved them. If the firm had done nothing more than publish the Freeman, create Sherwood Anderson, and translate Hauptmann it would have done enough. It did more in that it came to stand for methods and ideals which were anything but commercial, to perpetuate a type of publishing all too rare in any age. There is every reason why the Viking Press should be congratulated upon its new partner.

VICTOR F. LAWSON, who has just died in Chicago in his seventy-fifth year, was a genuine newspaperman—and in the widest sense of the word. He was not a politician who owned a newspaper to further his public career or a business man who ran one merely to make money. Neither was he limited either to the editorial or the business side of journalism. He had his first lessons on a newspaper which his father owned, and in 1876 became with Melville E. Stone (later head of the Associated Press) joint owner of the Chicago Daily News, the first successful one-cent paper in the Middle West. One difficulty in selling such a paper at the time was a lack of pennies, a handicap which Mr. Lawson overcame by importing a carload of them. Eventually Mr. Lawson bought out Mr. Stone, and by hard work and high ideals made of the Daily News one of the great newspapers of the country, almost the greatest in the evening field today. In addition to close attention to local and national affairs, the Daily News has developed a foreign service hardly surpassed in this country. A morning edition was started a good many years ago, known as the Chicago Record. It was an excellent journal, but Mr. Lawson decided that a man could not direct both a morning and an evening newspaper without favoring one or the other. So he sold the Record in order to concentrate on the Daily News. Munseys and Hearsts buy and sell newspapers for profit or politics. Mr. Lawson was a newspaperman.

Can Brides Cook?

CAN brides cook? The United Restaurant Owners' Association of New York puts the question gravely, then proceeds to answer it—as if it were announcing an important discovery—in the negative. The association has been conducting a competition to obtain the best home recipes for various American dishes; no contestant born later than 1900, and no bride of a year or less standing, reached even the semi-finals.

Can brides cook? Of course they can't. No one in the least familiar with cookery—or brides—needs any demonstration on that point. Fifty per cent of our American humor is based on this simple and indisputable fact. We can recall scarcely a woman under forty who is a tip-top, all-around cook, although many show budding genius and occasional bursts of genuine achievement before then. In fact, few women fairly get into their stride as cooks before they are fifty, and they don't reach their ultimate excellence until sixty years or more of accumulated experience has taught their palates and trained their hands and ripened their knowledge—until, in short, they reach the grandmother class.

How could it be otherwise? Art is long. Supreme genius sometimes flowers early, but generally fulness of skill and saturation of knowledge come only after laborious years. And if that be true of art in general, how much more must it be true of cooking—the art preeminent, the art beyond art, the art which reveals (not conceals) art, the art which makes women goddesses and men gluttons. Cooks, like wine, acquire mellowness, character, and quality by the processes of the years. Besides, cooking is a labor of love. When people tell you how hard it is to hire a good cook, they speak truer than they know. It isn't simply hard; it's impossible. Good cooks don't work for wages. If anyone is so blessed as to acquire—and retain—a good cook, it's because that cook loves cooking and hasn't any better outlet. Good cooking requires a human objective. There must be somebody to cook for. The United Restaurant Owners' Association says that 35 per cent of its competitors confessed that they learned to cook after they were married. That means that 65 per cent of them either can't cook—despite their assumptions—or can't tell the truth. The dutiful daughter may prepare a tempting salad for father; the affectionate sister may bake a sumptuous cake for brother; but it is not until she has cooked for a tired husband, for sick children, for ravenous boys, for expectant guests that she becomes a master of the art—what the French call a cordon bleu.

And that's why brides can't cook. It isn't the fault of the much-abused younger generation. No younger generation has ever known how to cook. Grandmother's fond illusion that at twenty she was an excellent cook, so much better than granddaughter Peggy or Dorothy or Katherine, is mostly a—well, a fond illusion. Leave it to her; she has few enough others.

But brides, although not yet cooks, are on their way, and, praise be to heaven, many arrive. If not, they are likely to become widows, grass or otherwise. Worse still, they may have to submit their digestions to the far from tender mercies of the United Restaurant Owners.

Can brides cook? Ask Dad; he knows—though maybe he doesn't dare tell.

Facing Our World

RAMSAY MACDONALD voiced in the last issue of The Nation the fears aroused in moderate British Labor leaders by Mr. Baldwin's capitulation in the face of a threatened general strike. "The mishandling of the Government," he says, "handed over the honors of war to those who may be inclined to toy with revolution. . . . We have peace in the coal-fields for the time being, but the difficulties of trying to convince an impatient and hard-pressed people of the wisdom of democratic methods have been sadly increased."

We honor the former Labor Prime Minister for his scruples; but we think he overdoes his doubts. A wistful odor of eighteenth-century political philosophy seems to pervade his fear for constitutionalism. It is not simply that this is a pragmatic age, paying scant attention to moral principles which do not obviously work to moral ends; it is also an age which, while still worshiping traditionally in the church of political democracy, has transformed its gospel. Men who are shocked at expressed doubts of the efficacy of democracy nevertheless express in action their complete if unconscious lack of faith. The long struggle for political enfranchisement has been won; but its fruits seem meager. Economic and financial forces somehow manage to determine the course of history despite the best efforts of the people at the polls.

What is the "will of the people" in a world of newspapers owned by millionaire capitalists? What is the people's will in a country where a few bankers and a few employers can spread the alarm that if X is elected business will be bad, factories will close, and the workers go without jobs? Again and again economic forces intrude their powerful fingers and defeat or direct this "popular will" upon which we once so trustingly relied. Usually the intrusion passes unnoticed; sometimes—particularly when Labor happens to be the economic force—it is observed and resented. That was the case when the railroad unions forced the passage of the Adamson law in our own country; that was the case the other day when the trade unions of England, by their threat of a general strike, forced a Conservative Government to take radical action.

More and more the geographic basis of our political system has proved itself inadequate to express the deepest-felt interests of the people. They have resorted to such means as are available. As economic interests are more important to them than geographic they have grouped themselves—without the slightest thought of its effect upon constitutionalism—in economic organizations: chambers of commerce, associations of sugar refiners, railroads, dye manufacturers, publishers, water-power interests, coal producers, shoe manufacturers. These, sometimes illegitimately, as often legitimately, have maintained their agents—their lobbyists—in Washington and London, in the national and State capitals. The producing classes—the laborers and farmers—have been last to do this and have often worked clumsily. But they are increasingly using their one weapon—organized economic power—to fill in the gaps left by political democracy. And in so doing they are vaguely aware that they are following a path well marked by the feet of capital.

It may be that constitutional historians will look back upon the growing importance of economic and professional organizations and the parallel decline of parliamentarism as the most significant development of our era. Here and there it is already reflected in the political structure. The Soviet system, of course, is frankly based upon occupational representation; and the Reichswirtschaftsrat, or industrial parliament, which has a somewhat ambiguous place in Germany's post-revolutionary structure, is an attempt to find a place for economic representation without upsetting the traditional political organization. Conservative business men in France urge an upper house of parliament in which the industries would have direct representation. In the United States William S. U'Ren has urged such a scheme.

We are, in fact, discovering that under the reign of capital political democracy, unless it can provide direct expression of the economic groupings which the age has forced upon us, is futile. Power eludes the people under our present system, and we are still groping to find the most effective method of expressing the new age. Some anxiously scan the sky, fearful of signs of revolution; others begin to realize that while the old forms subsist intact a revolutionary shift of power has taken place without our knowing it—and the avowed revolutionaries have had nothing to do with it. Men have mastered coal and iron, diverted the waterfalls, harnessed the unseen currents of the air, but the industries they have created have mastered them. The kings who control finance, and through it industry, are more powerful than any king, premier, or president of a mere political state, and in their realm democracy is still a revolutionary word.

In this country the ruling school of politicians admits defeat and crassly proclaims an era of free play for the industrial barons. When labor cares to defy these powers, as in the British coal crisis, the political state must needs totter, so weak is it compared with these new forces. A vast task, calling for economic even more than political statesmanship, lies ahead of us, and the world needs for it statesmen of new proportions, combining the cool audacity of Stanley Baldwin in facing an immediate fact with the long vision for which Ramsay MacDonald has been noted.

Literary Delusions

THE world at large entertains as many false notions concerning the poet or the novelist as it does concerning the business man, the lawyer, or the soldier. To the world at large there is such a thing, for instance, as a business man—a man who is peculiarly that and nothing else. He sits at a certain kind of desk, his head is filled exclusively with certain kinds of ideas, and there are certain kinds of error which it is automatically impossible for him to commit. Now any intelligent and honest man who happens to concern himself with business knows that it is only part of him which does so, that he is by no means infallible as a forecaster of economic events, that he is not in any case John Doe. Likewise a lawyer who is not a victim of the perennial romance about his profession recognizes that he exists somewhere outside of the picture—that there are times when he, like any mortal man, is helpless before a problem. The soldier is not invariably brave, or cowardly, or fickle, or homesick, or ignorant, or erect. And a poet or a novelist is not always inspired.

Indeed, a first-rate man of letters is likely to deny that he was ever, so far as he can remember, definitely inspired. He wishes that he might have been, and he may wish that he were now; but the whole process of writing is for him somehow confused. There are the ideas, the images, the themes which come to him suddenly out of nowhere—by inspiration, if one likes. But there are also the hours spent in laborious search for similar treasures—hours, perhaps, rewarded in the end by something richer than anything which ever arrived by chance. He probably ceased long ago to wait for inspiration; having learned that the stuff of an artist is in him, he is willing to dig for it, and he is never fearful lest the effort be destructive of frail, hidden things. The stuff of art is not frail, even though it be hidden so deep that it is found only by the greatest luck and persistence. So the writer marches to his desk every morning at a congenial hour, whether he feels fit or not.

He both controls his sources, then, and does not control them. The lay notion that they control him is as far from the simple truth as the contrary notion—often cherished in the same mind—that he advances in the precise path that his will and his character have chosen. He may be proud enough of the virtue involved in his pertinacity, in his capacity for punishment; he is not so sure that an artistic triumph is a triumph of moral character. The layman will suppose, for instance, that an author always means what he says in his books. Sincerity, by this token, is an attribute of genius—and the unwary reviewer will burden any writer whom he likes with the one virtue which that writer has never clearly experienced. For sincerity is a deadly virtue, as Oscar Wilde implied when he remarked that all bad poetry springs from genuine emotion. The singer or the story-teller will insist that his problem has been not to mean what he says but to say what he means. He begins, of course, with something which he thinks he wants to say; only fools begin with nothing at all. But almost invariably, if he is a hunter trained to follow the fox wherever it may speed, he finds himself turning suddenly in the middle of the woods and darting after an entirely fresh scent. It is as undesirable as it is impossible to be doggedly faithful to a program conceived in cold blood. And though the product—the poem or the tale—may appear to be something that was planned as an expression of its maker's inmost soul (indeed, too, it may be that), it was as likely as not a revelation to the person who smiled and put his name to it. He has not said what he meant; he has said something better.

So far as he is aware he may not believe it at all. Psychology is saying just now that his lack of awareness is immaterial, that his deepest self does believe it. And such is doubtless the situation. But there is an equal amount of at least poetic truth in the old dictum that poets are liars. The particular glow of satisfaction which comes over an artist who has happily completed a piece arises in his own conscious mind, it would seem, from a conviction that he has delivered a good lie. If to readers it be truth, so much the better—or worse—for them. To him, if he is a poet, the effect achieved will be worlds away from what he had intended; the rhymes will sing a weirdly unexpected song. If he is a novelist, he will reflect—only too vainly perhaps—upon the manner in which the original of his hero grew into this wayward stranger as he went. How will it be in the next book? He guesses; he does not know.

Sir Adam Beck and His Job

SIR ADAM BECK is dead. Canada, to quote the Toronto Globe, has lost "the greatest constructive mind in the public life of the country." The world has lost a most versatile and successful advocate, builder, and administrator of a publicly owned superpower system in any nation.

Sir Adam Beck's life story was, in part, the life story of dozens of successful self-made men. But with this difference. He used his extraordinary executive ability not primarily to build up his personal fortune or to obtain paternalistic control over his fellows but to create effective machinery for the public ownership and operation of an immense utility. The head of the commission which built the greatest hydro-electric power plant in the world and organized a system of distribution in which 386 local governments were partners with the Province of Ontario was not an engineer but a manufacturer, originally in a small way, of wood-veneer and cigar boxes. The brilliant and slashing advocate of public ownership, the target of incessant attacks by private power interests, was not a labor man or a socialist but for years sat in the provincial parliament as a Conservative. The master of a complex administrative enterprise was to the end of his days an enthusiastic sportsman, famous on two continents for the horses which he exhibited.

The great interest which made Sir Adam Beck's life of significance to the whole world began in 1903. As a manufacturer in London, Ontario, he became convinced that the industrial development of his province was jeopardized by its dependence upon coal from the United States, where production was often tied up by great strikes. Hydro-electric power was the obvious substitute, and observation and experience soon persuaded him that it could not be left with safety to the control of private capitalists—British, Canadian, and American. In two decades he succeeded in harnessing Niagara for the service of the Province, and brought power not merely to manufacturing plants and city dwellers but to farmers and housewives in rural districts.

Necessity made Sir Adam not merely a brilliant executive but an extraordinarily able controversialist. One of his last acts was a crushing reply to the attack on the Ontario system sponsored by our Smithsonian Institution. The American press, which had given much space to the attack, was almost wholly silent concerning the reply.

One of the best tributes to the success of Sir Adam Beck's work was unconsciously given by Arthur Williams, vice-president of the New York Edison Company. In a recent discussion he sought, not very successfully, to prove the superiority of private ownership of superpower to the Canadian plan. He gave away his own case, however, when he admitted: "Sir Adam Beck and his associates—I entertain great respect for them all—have done a fine piece of work in Canada. Apparently the government had to do it because no one would persuade the owners of private money up there to take the same risk." [Italics ours.] Well, the government took the risk and won out. We do not believe that Sir Adam Beck's death will change victory into defeat. The tradition of public service which he helped to establish is too firmly founded in the political consciousness of his fellow-citizens. The finest tribute Ontario can pay to Sir Adam Beck will be to carry on.

Behind This Prohibition

By LEONARD CLINE

WE were a group of some fifteen, one noon five years ago in one of the great cities of the Middle West, at an exclusive suburban club for luncheon. One of us was a woman, Miss Simpson, an angular spinster of much local political importance; and one of us, our host, was the Mayor —a most genial, lovable big fellow with a frank smile and a handshake that gave you his whole city. We stood together, fourteen men and a woman, just outside the dining-room, and thither a waiter brought us a tray containing fifteen glasses, filled.

I am not a prohibitionist. To me a highball on occasion is a delectable thing; and these glasses were irresistible. I glanced at the countenances of my companions and I perceived that they, too, were melting with smiles; and my spirit went out to those good fellows. The Mayor raised his glass. So did we all—except the woman.

"But . . . Mister Mayor," she faltered, "I trust that there . . . there isn't anything in this?"

Never in my life have I seen a public official so magnificently rise to the occasion. With a glance he absolved Miss Simpson. His bow broke her heart, his thoughtful shake of the head laid her most clinging doubt, his gesture was pontifical. "My dear Miss Simpson," he said, "I am the Mayor of Blank. Do you think that I would permit any such violation of the law in my presence?"

A moment's hush, and then the Mayor once more raised his glass. So did we all, and so at last did Miss Simpson. And we drank that highball down right there, three good fingers of excellent bourbon with enough ginger ale to temper the tang; and we went contentedly in to lunch, where we were served grapefruit sweetened with sherry, and where from time to time we would find newly filled glasses at our elbows. It was a delightful collation. Only one thing tended to disturb us. Miss Simpson's apologies to the Mayor became a little obstreperous by the time we reached the camembert.

In the course of a decade as a newspaper man I have associated on convivial occasions with one or two governors, a half dozen United States senators, with mayors, congressmen, police chiefs and sheriffs, army and navy officers; not an extraordinary list, but one rather outside the experience of the ordinary private citizen. And so when an official comes out in the press with a declaration regarding the drought in his own bailiwick I think of a hundred occasions when the very custodians of the public weal themselves have teetered bibulously to a coma even as I watched them.

The most recent declaration of the sort is ascribed to Police Commissioner Enright in a dispatch from Halifax, Nova Scotia. "Open selling of liquor in restaurants and hotels is a thing of the past," Commissioner Enright told the good Nova Scotians. "Only one saloon is in operation now where a thousand used to flourish. . . . There are fewer open violations in New York than in other cities of the United States."

This, we may assume, was accepted by Mr. Enright's auditors at Halifax as an official statement from a man who knew more about illicit liquor traffic in New York than any mere person of the streets. The prohibitionists in Canada will take comfort from Mr. Enright's words and redouble their efforts to bring about in their own province the utopian condition of affairs he describes. And yet if one were to start from Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street at six o'clock any evening, one could go north or south or east or west and sniff a highball in fifteen minutes.

It is not my intention to ascribe to Mr. Enright any deliberate misstatement of things. I have absolutely no evidence upon which any such charge could be made. But when he proclaims New York as dry as that he shows an ignorance of things quite amazing in one whose business it is to know. There are, in fact, numerous hotels where a nod to a waiter will profit a man, and I have yet to stay at any hotel, in New York or elsewhere, where the bell-boys are as ignorant as is Mr. Enright. Nine taxi-drivers out of ten can, if properly solicited, take one around an adjacent corner to rum. And it is easier now, in almost any city, to get a drink between midnight and dawn than it used to be before the Volstead Act.

Most police chiefs whom I have met are more in touch with the actual situation than is Mr. Enright; indeed, in a strange town one often has recourse to policemen or sheriff to lead one to a good bar. I have seen, in an open saloon in Detroit, seven policemen at once drinking together. There were five of them, in full uniform, one evening in a St. Louis saloon; and I have seen in open saloons in New York any number of policemen whose familiarity with the situation seems to be far in advance of their chief's.

And sheriffs! Across my memory staggers a round dozen of them, winking and furtive, and I follow them into the jail and there am offered anything from bourbon to Virginia corn whiskey. There is, for instance, Sheriff Weems, who probably still holds office—and a very effective sheriff he is, to be sure—in a populous county of an Atlantic coast State. Into Weems's shrievalty I went one time to investigate for my newspaper the condition in respect to rum. I arrived at the county seat at ten o'clock, dropped my bag at the hotel, and hurried to the jail. Mrs. Weems invited me to step into the parlor.

A minute later Weems entered. He was all cordiality. He pumped my hand for a brief minute and dragged me away with him, without giving me a chance to say who I was and what I wanted. A company of four or five cronies, including the star pitcher of the local ball team, was seated around the dining-room table, hot in a discussion of their town's chance for the pennant. Eager not to miss this absorbing dispute the Sheriff pulled a chair to the table for me and silenced me with a tall glass such as the others were cherishing—a concoction of corn whiskey, soda, sugar, and lemon juice. Presently the conversation lagged for a moment and the Sheriff turned to me.

"Well, now, young feller," he said, "what can I do for you? Who did you say you was?"

"Why," I replied, "I'm from the Sun, and I'm down here to investigate the liquor situation."

Poor Weems! He looked like Belgium invaded. Dismay rocked the cathedrals of the Weemsian soul. I hastened to assure him. I was merely seeking information. Doubtless he could help me no little. He did. He gave me an exhaustive survey of the situation. At two o'clock in the morning, pocketing my notes, I accompanied Sheriff Weems to the basement of the jail, where, barrel on barrel, reposed his private stock.

"There!" he declared, with an eloquent gesture. "Try anythin' y'wanna. Pro'bishun? Sure, I'll tell ya all y'wanna know about pro'bishun. Yer a good fella. Try anythin' y'wanna."

In recounting these memoirs of American officialdom under prohibition I am taking pains to disguise names and places. I have even lied. I have glossed over much, for we Americans are pained by unvarnished reality. The actual episodes here recorded were certainly more ribald than my accounts of them. Indeed, it would be quite impossible for me to tell all that led up to that dinner at which Judge Lipke of the Superior Court, a man whose augustness on the bench had long since given him an exalted position in the local uplift movement, was our merriest spirit. It was proposed, however, when all flasks had been emptied, that we drive to a roadhouse to replenish them. We started in two cars, one of them Judge Lipke's, with himself at the wheel. Beside him sat a well-known criminal lawyer. In the rear were myself and a tradesman.

Who drove the other car I cannot now recall, but he paid little attention to us following him, and, when we stopped one time for cigarettes, disappeared up the avenue. Judge Lipke was feeling extraordinarily released that night. Light-heartedly he vowed he would overtake the other car or die in the attempt. He stepped on her.

"Aw, Judge!" gasped the tradesman at my side. His cry was lost in the roar of the motor. I likewise raised my voice in dismal foreboding. Judge Lipke turned to gaze derisively upon us, while the car swerved giddily from side to side of the road. "Whatsa matter with you guys?" said Judge Lipke. "Listen, I never had an accident in my life. Jest watch me!" He turned to the lawyer. "Let's play we're on the Indianapolis Speedway," he suggested. "You be mechanician."

Terror relaxed its clutch on my heart. It was all over and I knew it. I indulged my last moments in the delightful spectacle of Judge Lipke of the Superior Court playing Indianapolis Speedway on an unfrequented mud road, unlighted and with no warning signals for the tourist, across a section of Middle Western prairie. At last it happened. The speedway came to an abrupt end in another road cutting it at right angles. There was no hope of making the turn. Judge Lipke didn't try. He braced his legs against the brakes, gripped the wheel tight, shut his eyes, and plunged straight ahead. We took a six-foot ditch on the fly, plowed ten yards through underbrush, and came to a stop—what there was left of Judge Lipke's car—in another trench.

Judge Lipke leaned forward and put his face through the windshield, suffering some rather severe cuts. His friend the attorney sprang out of his seat and filliped sprawling through the night like a minor Orion, landing in a clump of bushes. The tradesman and myself found ourselves in the front seat. It was the tradesman who woke me. "Aw, Judge!" he was moaning. "Aw, Judge!"

If my memory does not betray me there were two judges of the higher courts present on another rollicking night in the office of Mayor Kahn, in one of our great cities. Mayor Kahn used to keep his official supply of liquor in a vault along with many of the city records, and thither he would repair with visiting dignitaries for furtive refreshment. A little group of statesmen would huddle together in the gloom of that vault, lit by one electric bulb hanging from a lofty ceiling, to swig their rye stealthily from paper cups. It was an illuminating commentary on democratic government under prohibition.

On the evening in question Governor Boggs was a distinguished guest, a number of other eminent Republicans assembled, and Mayor Kahn became reckless. He brought the bottles into the mayoral suite and the night grew Roman. Never shall I forget Governor Boggs and a callow newspaper man dancing round and round in each other's arms, until the latter stumbled over a cuspidor and both went to the floor. There were two judges of the higher courts among the most enthusiastic spectators of Governor Boggs's frolic that night.

No, these are not exceptional incidents. They are selected, of course, because they seemed to have certain amusing qualities that lend themselves to brief recital; but they are selected from a long sequence of memories. As a newspaperman I have had drinks thrust on me in official buildings at Washington; federal, State, county, and municipal functionaries have brandished their bottles at me; I have even been offered Scotch in the studies of clergymen. And as often as I read some statement regarding the effectiveness of prohibition enforcement in the United States I think of this procession of potvaliant officials and leaders of moral opinion which reels hilariously across my memory. I think of Mayor Blank contributing to the delinquency of the sexagenarian spinster Miss Simpson, or of haughty Judge Lipke playing Indianapolis Speedway on an unlighted mud road, or of august Governor Boggs dancing with the drunken reporter. One might be sad over such a spectacle, if it were not such a monstrous burlesque.

Masquerade

By HELENE MULLINS

Because her hair, like somber curtains, swung
Against her smooth pale cheeks; because her eyes,
Like tired flowers, drooped beneath the wise
And melancholy phrases of his tongue;
Because she stood before him like a proud
And insolent young tree no storm might bend,
He loved her, and he called himself her friend,
And where he went, his praise of her was loud.

She was a mystery, with her swinging hair,
Her tired eyes, and her soft insolence;
He did not realize the diffidence
With which she wore the mask that made her fair,
And how she dreaded the approaching hour
When masks must be removed, and he would see
The squalor of her spirit's poverty,
And pass her by like any faded flower.

Krim Faces Europe

By M. M. KNIGHT

Fez, August 1

BACK of the indescribable fury of the present contest in northern Morocco are two main sets of rationalizations. Each is perfectly logical in itself. Reasoned out separately, each cause is perfectly "just." Yet in the actual situation there are innumerable facts which cannot be harmonized with either.

To the French press in Morocco Abd-el-Krim is a rebel against the ineffable majesty of the Sultan. "Peace?" exclaims one front-page insert in La Presse Marocaine. "It can be brought about only by the submission of Abd-el-Krim to the Sultan of Morocco!" In a recent issue of Le Nord Marocain, Deputy Leon Barety explains at length how completely within their rights the French were in occupying the Ouergha Valley. The treaties of 1904 and 1912 left the boundary between the respective zones of France and Spain rather vague, but France reserved the right to "pacify" the tribes between the bend of the river and the Ouezzan country. Considering the richness of the region, sometimes called "the granary of Fez," it seems strange to Deputy Barety that it was not occupied sooner. This omission was corrected in three weeks during the spring of 1924. To be sure, it was foreseen that the Riffians might object. "It is said," admits the Deputy, "that a natural law pushes the Riffians toward this region, their mountains being richer in minerals than in cereals." Yet the responsibility for the war which followed the occupation does not rest with France, he asserts in a final emphatic statement. France was "called by the tribes" into this valley, "as fertile as it is beautiful."

The logic of all this is clear to a patriotic member of the French economic vanguard in Morocco. France has acted within her treaty rights and supported the "sovereignty" of His Majesty the Sultan; her armed forces have "delivered the weak from a long oppression and brought nothing but blessings." There can be no doubt about the blessings in the mind of Deputy Barety's average reader. Is it not the privilege of any Arab with thirty francs to ride from Rabat to Fez in a limousine bus? Any thinking person can see that buses are quicker, and therefore better, than camels and donkeys. Since there were no such modern conveniences before the French came, it is plain without further argument that there would not have been any had the French stayed away. Given French parentage and a supple mind I might be unable to separate the fact of my sitting here in safety (as far as I know) under an electric light, with a fountain splashing among the potted palms in the tiled courtyard just beyond my window, from the complete machinery of the Protectorate as it actually exists.

Abd-el-Krim is not entirely skeptical about these material blessings. Certainly he is not blind to the penetrating force of our economic order. For instance, he uses French-made cannon, captured from the Spaniards, to knock down blockhouses which might otherwise stand indefinitely. Some features of our system he knows to be inevitable, and he is too shrewd a man, too well educated in the European sense, to oppose them. Being a Moslem and a Moroccan, however, he dislikes to take his French civilization straight. The idea of a Sultan who is only a glove on a foreign and infidel hand infuriates him.

Be it remembered that the mountain tribes of the Riff and the Atlas have never known "sovereignty" of the sort they now feel creeping upon them. They were never really Romanized. The Vandals only skirted the edges of their country, on their way to richer and riper prizes further east. So it was with the Arabs, moving in the opposite direction. The Sultans of Morocco, even in the great days of the empire, governed these tribes only in a nominal way. The Portuguese and Spanish were too busy making their fortunes overseas to do more than hold a few ports along the Moroccan coast. England had to give up Tangier in 1684, having held it less than a quarter of a century. The mole there today is greatly inferior to the one the English destroyed at great pains. What is this "sovereignty" against which Krim and his tribesmen are "rebels"? To them it is a European invention, existing only as a hope in the minds of the French and Spanish. Under the guise of "reestablishing" something which never existed, these rank outsiders mean to bring Morocco to their feet and her wealth into their pockets.

From Ulk (Berlin)

"Permit me to acquaint you with the blessings of civilization."

"Thanks; and permit me to pay you back."

Abd-el-Krim's reasoning is clear enough. A sultan who owes his throne to the infidels, and acts as a mere lieutenant under their orders, is no sultan at all in the historic sense. It is bad enough for him to claim the privileges of a sultan, though perhaps not a matter to fight over; but when he goes further, claiming things for himself, and for the infidels and foreigners who exercise power through him, to which even a true sultan would not be entitled, it is not to be tolerated. Krim scoffs at any "treaty rights" of France and Spain to toss boundary stones to and fro in a Moorish country. On what do such rights rest but force? Why, then, were not the French immediately ejected when they invaded the Ouergha Valley in 1924? Why did Krim temporize, and even make tentative moves toward negotiation? Because, he says, he was not quite through with the Spaniards, and did not want a bloody war if it could be avoided. The moment his hands were free, he first warned the French that their advance was an act of war if persisted in, and then attacked them.

Is there any middle ground of "truth" and "justice" between these two logical but apparently irreconcilable views of the case; or are both correct, and force the only arbiter? The French say Krim could have avoided war by not opposing their occupation of the disputed territory. Krim retorts that France could have avoided war even more easily by refraining from advancing her lines. To this, the French answer that Krim, puffed up by his victories over the Spanish and his capture of Raisuli, was getting ready to attack them anyway—that their only protection was an offensive-defensive. There are cynical people who say frankly that the real reason why first the Spanish and then the French avoided negotiation is that they mistook the other route for a shorter and easier one. No one who has seen this bitter warfare, or has any idea of its cost in every way, can doubt that somebody blundered. For one thing, Islam is awake as it has not been for fifty years, and the time has gone by when a handful of Europeans can hold a Mohammedan country. For another, Krim is not a Raisuli, and nobody has had any luck at buying him.

After all that has happened to French prestige, the average Frenchman resident in Morocco sees only one palatable solution: to crush the Riffians at whatever cost. Perhaps he overestimates the moral damage which must somehow be salvaged and repaired. As a rule, he admits the difficulty of getting French regiments sent here. Those men have parents and relatives with political influence. Then there is the enormous cost of a war to the bitter end in a wild country. Moreover, such a conquest would profit the Spaniards far more than it would the French, as most of the Riffian lands are in the Spanish zone.

Here is the real rub, after all: the relations between France and Spain. Save Tangier, which is international, Spain has all the good port sites in the North. Moreover, the Spanish Rio de Oro, between Morocco and Senegal, blocks France's way to a real consolidation of her empire in West Africa. One French paper here in Morocco has been harping on the theme that France defended her African empire on the Rhine, and must now protect her Rhine frontier by means of her African empire. That view brings up the enormous question of French man-power for war, to solve which a long and stony road is yet to be traveled, with Spanish toll gates at every mile.

Is Spain, then, the villain in the piece? On the contrary, though it has received poor and insufficient publicity outside, she has a perfectly logical case. Being a weak country, served by poor diplomats, she got rather cheated in the scramble for Morocco, considering the age and strength of her claims. When England and France made their agreement in 1904—which turned out later to have secret stipulations—it was understood that France must pay off Spain. This she proceeded to do very cheaply, on the basis of an old secret agreement of 1902. The Spaniards were wild with grief and rage when they discovered that they could have had much more by asking for it. Their later disasters were due both to their industrial backwardness and to the difficulty of organizing, or even pacifying, such a country. Moreover, it is very likely that the French authorities were easy-going and careless about the arms traffic. Whether or not it was originally the fault of the French that Krim got so good a start, the fact remains that France is now suffering terribly because of material which the Riffians were able to capture from the Spanish.

There are few places in the world where the "civilized" methods of making war give so little advantage. Artillery shells are of small use against a scattered and hidden enemy. Expensive airplane bombs are comparatively useless for similar reasons, and it is particularly difficult to fly in a dry mountain country, with few landing places and the air full of "bumps." Of course, there remains poison gas. The one question which I have been asked oftener than any other concerns America's attitude toward the use of asphyxiants on the Riffian tribesmen.

The International Ph.D.'s

By PAUL HUTCHINSON

THERE were three dramatic moments during the initial session of the Institute of Pacific Relations held last month in Honolulu. The first came after L. T. Chen, of the Chinese group, had told the story of the recent Shanghai riots at a general forum. Chen is a national Y. M. C. A. secretary in China. Urbane, rotund, accustomed to getting along with foreigners as well as his own countrymen, he is anything but the type from whom to expect explosive talk. Yet he exploded.

It happened this way. He had reported the riots in much the terms now familiar to the readers of this paper. And he came out where all Chinese inevitably do come out these days—at the treaties. There is the foreign tariff control, and there is extraterritoriality. These monstrous invasions of China's sovereignty have been seized by the foreigners at the point of the gun. Now China is determined to get rid of them, at the price of international disorder, if necessary.

No sooner had Chen finished than the international Ph.D.'s were on their feet. The Institute of Pacific Relations was full of international Ph.D.'s. They sympathized with China. In fact, they sympathized with everybody. They hoped that there would soon be an end to extraterritoriality and foreign tariff control and all similar abominations. They indorsed the entire list of Chinese demands—in principle. But—did not China understand that the Washington Conference had disposed of all these matters? And that the other nations had been waiting palpitant for four years, listening for China to say that she would be willing to have them do away with these injustices? And that really the other nations could do nothing until China herself had cleared the way?

Then Chen stood up again. Quiet Chen; rotund Chen; urbane Chen. And this is what he said:

> I quite understand that you do not intend to give up your unjust privileges in China if you can help it. After you have insisted that we treat you as demi-gods for almost a century, you do not like to be asked to step down on the plane of ordinary mortals. But let me tell you this: those unequal treaties have got to go! Turkey got rid of her capitulations. China has seen how she did it. China knows now how to obtain attention from the other nations. The Shanghai riots were only the first whisper of what is to come. The day of the foreign demi-god in my country is over.

Thus Chen, and he a Y. M. C. A. secretary.

Our second dramatic moment at Honolulu came when Chester Rowell had finished trying to explain to the Oriental why America must close her doors in order to save her soul. He is a liberal of the Bull Moose variety. He is rumored to have received a million dollars for his Fresno Republican a few years ago, but he remains a liberal. Rowell can explain anything on earth—the Abrams diagnosing machine; relativity; Hiram Johnson. At the moment he was explaining to the institute the high moral principle that really underlies the present American immigration act. The white and yellow races cannot mix physically while popular psychology remains what it is, ran the explanation. When nations which cannot mix are brought together one is bound to impose its will on the other. That leads to caste. The only possible outcome if Orientals keep coming into the United States will be a caste system. That would mean an end of all normal social contacts—such as the Institute of Pacific Relations. It would become as impossible for a white man to sit in ordinary intercourse with a yellow man as it now is to do so with a black man. Hence, to keep on terms of decency with the yellow man, the white man must shut him out.

The man who stood up this time was Mr. Yusuke Tsurumi. Mr. Tsurumi, like Mr. Chen, is urbane. He has a baron for a father-in-law. He has been persona grata on the carefully sterilized program at Williamstown. He even figures occasionally in the pages of the Saturday Evening Post. He has been presenting the Japanese case in the United States for more than a year. Not, you will again notice, the kind of man from whom fireworks might be expected.

"Mr. Rowell," asked Mr. Tsurumi, "is this American psychology which you have described permanent or temporary?"

"It will last for at least this generation and the next," said Mr. Rowell.

"Is this aversion to other races true of all the whites, or is it a peculiarity of the Anglo-Saxons?" the Japanese persisted.

"I can only speak with certainty of the Anglo-Saxons," Mr. Rowell answered, "but I suspect it is true of all. It grows out of the fear of intermarriage."

Then this demand: "Can I quote you?"

"Anywhere," said Mr. Rowell.

One more moment to remember from the first session of the institute. A different kind of Japanese produced this touch of drama. His name is Zumoto. He stands about five feet two inches high; his English diction is faultless, although it comes a bit slowly; his face consists of two parts, a pair of brown eyes full of hidden lights and a white beard which has grown just a bit longer than Horace Greeley's ever did, both combining to make a character who might have stepped out of a Japanese edition of Dickens. The chairman, President Wilbur of Stanford, had introduced him to this general audience on this particular evening as "the wise old man of the institute." The audience had applauded as though it believed the title deserved.

Here again was no firebrand. Mr. Zumoto is a Japanese liberal. For years he edited the Herald of Asia, that conspicuous liberal weekly in Tokio which was one of the most regrettable of the casualties of the earthquake. He has worked hard to reduce Japan's army and to tone down her navalism. He did more than his bit to get the Japanese troops out of Siberia. He believes in peace with America, and works for it unceasingly. He is no longer young; the smooth way is the natural way for him. But this is what he said:

> The more I study the international situation in the Pacific the clearer becomes my vision that America is par excellence THE problem before the peoples of this great ocean. On any of the problems in which these Pacific nations are vitally interested—whether economic or financial, political or spiritual—the discussions at our round tables have shown that sooner or later we strike the ground rock of American viewpoints and American policies. Our further progress in our efforts for satisfactory solutions of these problems, therefore, depends altogether upon America.

That was the mood in which not only Japan but all the Orient went away from Honolulu. Peace in the Pacific? It's up to the United States.

This Institute of Pacific Relations came into being in a queer way. Nobody yet has been able to trace the development so as to explain why certain changes took place. It seems to have started with the conviction of a few men in Hawaii that there are other ways to approach the problems of peace in the Pacific than by the building of Singapore bases or the holding of Hawaiian grand maneuvers. Then the Y. M. C. A. took it up and began to build the structure of an international convention at Honolulu, the Pacific crossroads. Then the idea grew too big for the Y. M. C. A., with the result that various informal groups were formed in the countries about the Pacific to raise delegations in any manner they pleased to attend this first session. More than a hundred active members found their way to Honolulu for the first two weeks in July.

The queer ways in which the institute developed left their marks on the various national groups. The best men in the Chinese group, for example, bore the Y. M. C. A. stamp, although they also stood as representatives of the reform elements in the social and political life of their country. Japan, on the other hand, showed almost no marks of such an origin, but abounded in professors from imperial universities. New Zealand split, with a part of its delegation such as might have been sent to a Y. M. C. A. convention, a part ready for a gathering of international lawyers, a part from the political life of the Dominion. A curiously differentiated total group thus developed, but one not ill adapted to giving the informal cross-section of thought which the institute was seeking.

The American group was perhaps the most oddly assorted of all. It could not function as a group, because it was made up of individuals whose avenues of approach differed totally. Informally, the Americans came to divide themselves into the "hard-boiled" and the "soft-boiled." There were a few of the four-minute variety in between, but it was not hard to see in which of the main classifications most of the Americans belonged.

The hardest of the hard-boiled were those who had, or thought they had, intimations of the thoughts, desires, and intents of the State Department at Washington. Chester Rowell told the institute that American policy in the Pacific has been under a specialized bureaucratic control, and that, with the public now awakening to the importance of that area, the day of a democratic Pacific policy has come. At Honolulu the hard-boiled were the members who were trying to convince the rest that everything done during the bureaucratic era has been good, and that the only wise policy for the new democratic era is to continue the policies of the past. For the kind of people whose minds work that way, "Don't embarrass the State Department!" is the vital slogan.

This first session of the institute did not accomplish much beyond dragging into the daylight the issues that really threaten the peace of the Pacific, showing on how meager a basis of actual knowledge most of the Pacific policies of all the nations are based, and placing its benediction on the proposal for future gatherings which may, perhaps, be devoted to finding the ways whereby public opinion in the countries bordering the Pacific may be rectified toward mutual respect and understanding. It is to be hoped for the future of the institute that there may be no more attempts at holding general sessions without the presence of members from Russia. The session this year was badly handicapped in this respect. There can be no good reason why the formulas of state departments should inflict such an unnecessary unreality on this informal gathering. If it seems wise to conduct official affairs as though no such country as Russia existed, so be it. But civilians, acting purely as individuals, might as well not try to discover the basic facts in the Pacific situation if they must leave Russia out of account.

In the Driftway

CERTAIN persons, of whom the Drifter is not one, seem to be vastly concerned about present-day morals. They gasp when they walk the streets and observe their fellowmen and women; they shudder at the goings on among the young; they roll their eyes at what they see added to a woman's face and subtracted from the rest of her person; they declare that the world is rapidly sliding down a greased path to eternal and horrifying damnation. To them the Drifter can recommend a book he has been reading; they might use it as their bible and quote it on every occasion, for it fits the situation remarkably well. Take, for example, the following as a description of the modern woman:

> They are well-dressed, fond of taking it easy, and commonly leave the care of household matters and drudgery to their servants. . . . In all banquets and feasts they are shown the greatest honor; they are placed at the upper end of the table, where they are first served. . . . All the rest of their time they employ in walking and riding, in playing at cards or otherwise, conversing with their equals . . . and their neighbors and making merry with them . . . and all this with the permission and knowledge of their husbands. . . .

THIS was not intended, however, as a picture of the twentieth-century female irresponsible. It was written by a worthy Dutchman of Englishwomen in the sixteenth century. At the same time Erasmus was urging a friend to make a journey to England where he would find > . . . girls with Angels' faces, and so kind and obliging. . . . Besides there is a custom here never to be sufficiently commended. Whenever you come, you are received with a kiss by all; when you take your leave, you are dismissed with kisses; when you return, kisses are repeated. . . . Should they meet you anywhere, kisses in abundance; in fine, wherever you move, there is nothing but kisses.

If a philosopher and a man of letters could write so ardently of what in these modern days is more vaguely termed "petting"—but then possibly Erasmus had not had a careful mother. If he approved of Englishwomen and their ways there were those who did not. A certain Puritan gentleman named Stubbes was much more disturbed. Why, he asked the ladies, did they want "to chaunge their natural face for a painted face, which thou hast made thyself? If thou beest faire, why paintest thou thyself? . . . and if thou be not faire, why doost thou hypocrittically desire to seeme faire?" He, with Thomas Nash, bemoaned the "aged mothers" with "their cheeks sugar-candied and cherry blusht so sweetly," and with "nosegays of yeolow haire on their furious foreheads." These remarks have, somehow, a familiar ring.

* * * * *

IT was evident that these ladies had minds of their own, for it is not on record that the Stubbeses or the Nashes made them mend their ways. And the Drifter is glad, for the honor of the male sex, to record that at least one gentleman gave them credit for intellect as well as beauty. Sir Anthony Cooke, who was not only a famous scholar but tutor to Edward VI, brought up his daughters to believe that "sexes as well as souls are equal in capacity." What he taught the royal pupil he taught his daughters also, and the lessons included Greek and Latin and other things which females are supposed to find difficult. Whether it was because of this early training that later he found himself grandfather of Sir Robert Cecil and Francis Bacon the Drifter would not attempt to say for certain. He offers these quotations and the book they were taken from* for what they are worth and invites his readers to make their own deductions according to their prejudices.

THE DRIFTER

* "Society Women of Shakespeare's Time." By Violet A. Wilson. E. P. Dutton and Company.

Loony

A Modern Movie

by Robert L. Wolf

in next week's issue of The Nation

Correspondence

Class Justice in Germany

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of June 3 Mr. Louis Fischer says that "Hitler spent six months in a palace prison and was then released."

I was in prison at Sandberg a.S. thirteen months in all. A special decree on April 1, 1924, deprived me of all previous privileges. All privileges theretofore granted the prisoner were either abridged or wiped out. Count Arco was still benefited by these alleviations.

Uffing, June 28 ADOLF HITLER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the face of appalling difficulties the sound core of the German people has been working for years to restore honest government, to revive generally those virtues which we Americans at home regard as the sine qua non for every orderly, self-respecting commonwealth. Encouraging progress has been made despite bitter opposition, on the one hand, from war-profiteers and certain groups of financial and industrial interests whose idea of liberty is the liberty to make money in any way they please; on the other hand, against the opposition of those interesting persons who, ignorant of political history and psychology, believe it possible to establish a government which shall not be, in their jargon, a "class government."

Such progress has been made also in the face of a continuing aspersion by most of the American press of the deeds and motives of those that achieved it. In this campaign Germany has been measured with false measures and with double standards.

A striking instance of all this is Louis Fischer's article from Berlin in The Nation of June 3. Once more E. J. Gumbel and his "painfully exact and detailed book" about "Four Years of Political Murder" are wheeled up into position to discredit the present efficient and honest government of Germany. Four weeks after Mr. Fischer wrote, the philosophical faculty of the University of Heidelberg, to which Gumbel belongs, attested of him, with but a single dissenting vote, that his personality gives the impression of "a pronounced demagogic nature," and that "in his political activities not the slightest trace of scientific qualities is to be found. On the contrary, along with a very low intellectual niveau objectively and stylistically, a complete lack of objectivity is his most prominent characteristic." I note in passing that despite this bitter condemnation it was decided that the principle of academic liberty required that Gumbel retain his post—an example that ought to shame most American university authorities.

Mr. Fischer complains that the leaders of the Munich soviet regime were more severely punished than the leaders of the Kapp Putsch. Does he know nothing about the brutal butcheries carried out by and at the orders of these men in cold blood, and that the only victims of the Kapp Putsch fell under circumstances which, even if they had been committed by a private individual, would, under Germany's humane penal code, make of them merely manslaughter in low degree, punishable with very light sentences? I would rather go through a dozen Putsche from the Right than one from the Left.

"The German republic has never proclaimed a general amnesty," complains Mr. Fischer, and while he wrote the draft of an amnesty bill was under consideration. And when did the American republic proclaim a general amnesty? "In republican Germany political prisoners receive no privileged treatment." What sort of treatment do they receive in republican America?

I have never belonged, except for a very brief period in 1918, to the great and ungoodly company of anti-bolshevist liars. The Russian experiment interests me, although I regard it as preposterous, and I would like to see it worked out, but I object to basing attacks on Germany on bolshevist sources and on caricatures from the Pravda. Let us have fair play.

Berlin, June 23 S. MILES BOUTON

[The Nation has received several letters protesting against Mr. Fischer's Class Justice in Germany. Most of them, we believe, derive from a too intense loyalty. Germany has been maligned; ergo, all criticism is unjustified. A similar psychology reigns among some of the friends of Soviet Russia. We believe that Mr. Fischer's allegations—excepting one or two minor errors—withstand criticism. In particular we should like to pay our tribute to E. J. Gumbel, to whom both Messrs. Bouton and Fischer refer. We are familiar with his work and with the contemptible action of his colleagues on the Heidelberg faculty. They did not attempt to disprove his charges; and they felt forced to admit that "he believes in his cause, pacifism, and in his mission. Passionately and full of hate he opposes whatever appears to him as force, nationalism, or promotion of a future war. Where this idealism is concerned, he has courage—not only the courage to say what he thinks but the courage to risk his life." Yet for political reasons these professors—as irrationally as the famous ninety-three of 1914—called Gumbel an unscientific demagogue. In so doing they were a disgrace to Germany and to scholarship.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Do the People Realize?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The two main purposes of Wall Street are to put securities up to unreasonably high prices and unload them on the public and then to regain these securities at the lowest possible prices. At the present time the public are the holders of more of Wall Street's wares than ever before. This is always the case when stocks are selling at high prices. The heavy speculation of the past few months has been in public utility and railroad stocks. Great super-power systems are in the making, to the end that eventually there will be few but enormous corporations supplying electric power to the public.

The moving factor in this linking into a few super-power systems all of the present public utilities is the Electric Bond and Share Company, the stock of which was recently distributed share for share to the stockholders of the General Electric Company. This means that the ownership of Electric Bond and Share is still with the stockholders of the General Electric, which is the dominating influence in this whole super-power undertaking. This is the reason why General Electric stock is selling, including the Electric Bond and Share gift, at around $325 per share—at a time when the company is showing earnings of only about $20 and paying dividends of only $13 per share.

Two recent incidents may be cited as showing the inflated prices which are being paid for existing public-utility companies. It is these inflated values which should be of vital interest to the people, for it will be on overcapitalization of these inflated values that the various State public-utility commissions will be asked to base rates for current that the people will have to pay, and the rates asked for will have to be high enough to show large earnings on the capital supposed to be invested.

The report was published a few days ago that Stone and Webster had purchased the Gould controlling interest in the Virginia Railway and Power Company, presumably acting, as far as the power property is concerned, for the Electric Bond and Share Company. The price paid was not stated, but it is generally understood to have been not far from $140 per share. This for a stock which before the rumors of this consolidation were started had never sold above $75 per share and whose average selling price had been around $40. By the time this stock's equivalent is passed on to the public the price will be at least $200 per share. It is on just such inflated values that rates will be applied for, thus making the cost of electric current higher than it ought to be.

The other incident is the acquisition by the Electric Power and Light Company (a corporation under the supervision of the Electric Bond and Share Company) of the Utah Securities Corporation, which owned the Utah Power and Light Company. The payment for each share of the Utah Securities Company stock was $10 in cash and four shares of the common stock of the Electric Power and Light Company. At the time of the announcement of this offer Utah Securities was selling around $70 per share. The highest previous price that this stock ever sold at was $46 in 1924, and in 1923 this stock sold as low as $14 per share. The common stock of Electric Power and Light was on this announcement selling around $17 per share. Subsequently Utah Securities sold at $157 per share and Electric Power and Light at $37.

Wall Street knows that nothing inflames the public and makes them buy stocks as does merger talk, and the above is a typical example of unloading on the public securities at high prices. Thus the public utilities are starting on the same career the railroads have followed for thirty years, and are playing into the hands of the Wall Street bankers.

The St. Paul receivership is the direct result of the Wall Street bankers' pyramiding methods of financing. Whenever a railroad had to bring out a refunding bond through some Wall Street banking house there was an 8 to 12 per cent loss. Take a refunding operation. A new bond is offered to take up the maturing bond. These new bonds are offered to the public at prices ranging from $92 to $96 per $100 of bond. Out of these prices the bankers collect their commission of $3 to $5. Thus the railroad company receives a net amount of $88 to $92, and assumes therefor an obligation to pay $100.

This refunding process is repeated until the railroad is staggering under a capital structure that it is impossible to pay interest on. If this vicious method is continued sooner or later every railroad of the country will have to go through receivership just as they have been doing for the past thirty years, and this is mainly due to the financing methods of the Wall Street bankers. It is on a receivership and consequent reorganization of a railroad that these Wall Street bankers clean up millions from a railroad they have already milked dry on refunding operations.

Take such comparatively recent examples as the Wabash and Missouri Pacific. When these railroads broke under the load of pyramided refunding operations their respective stocks were selling for a few dollars per share. These two roads were reorganized, their capital structure scaled down, and the stockholders assessed. Now these stocks, counting the assessment, are selling at double and treble the receivership prices and the public are again buying them.

When the St. Paul stocks were recently selling at their lowest price of $3.50 per share for the common and $7 for the preferred, it was stated that the big Wall Street banks were the buyers. Of course they were. Who else would buy them? These bankers know what they are going to do with the St. Paul. It will be just the same as they have been doing with railroad receiverships for the past generation.

The result of all these Wall Street methods of financing is terrific overcapitalization, and it is on such inflated capital that rates are applied for which the public will have to pay.

These Wall Street bankers are a clever lot. At present they are passing on to the public these securities—these already inflated securities—at high prices, in this way hoping the public, being the temporary owners of these corporations who will be seeking rates from the public utility commissions, will be favorable to high rates and the contemplated mergers and consolidations.

When all the mergers have been completed, and all the noise and excitement about them have passed, these Wall Street bankers will take back unto themselves these same securities at prices $30 to $100 per share less.

Springfield, Massachusetts, July 10 E. L. THOMPSON

Stephen Jumel and Betsy Bowen

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your criticism of "Lives and Times," by Meade Minnigerode, in the August 12 issue of The Nation, I feel a guilty sense of personal responsibility for an injustice to the "bedizened adventuress Betsy Bowen" in the matter of the disposition by Stephen Jumel of his wealth, which is a reflection of my uncharitable attitude toward the lady in my book, "Jumel Mansion," Houghton Mifflin, 1916, from which Mr. Minnigerode drew for his facts.

The transfer of the titles on Washington Heights, under a power of attorney given by Stephen Jumel for another purpose, was not to dispossess him of his property but to forestall the French heirs, in case of his death—with or without a will—from stepping in to inherit. Her attorney in the transfers was Alexander Hamilton, 2d, who was one of the parties named in the deeds, and was not consciously a party to any legal wrongdoing. In 1834, when the transfers were completed, his client had married again and the name of "Alexander Hamilton" appears on the deed with that of "Eliza B. Burr, wife of Aaron Burr."

In January, 1834, Aaron Burr was a social and not a legal adviser of the lady, or perhaps by that time he was no adviser at all. Like many a husband before and since he got on more smoothly with his fiancée than with his wife.

New York, August 8 WILLIAM HENRY SHELTON,
Curator, Jumel Mansion

The Science League's Purpose

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his excellent and timely article in The Nation of July 22, Mr. Rollin Lynde Harte says: "We have a Science League in America to fight its 'monkey bills.' But we have as yet failed to combat its underlying policy by founding a League to Maintain the Separation of Church and State."

This statement is somewhat in error, since the Science League of America itself has for one of its objects (Constitution, Sec. 2, Art. 3) "to combat any attempt, under whatever guise, to reunite church and state." Since the founding of the Science League last September we have mailed circulars to more than 40,000 educators, publicists, scientists, editors, and other molders of public opinion, calling attention to the attempt of the fundamentalists to override the letter and spirit of national and State constitutions relative to complete separation of church and state.

San Francisco, July 25 MAYNARD SHIPLEY,
President, Science League of America

Your Winter Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by desirable landlords and tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. Y. W. P., The Nation.

Books

Mr. Pope

By ALLEN TATE

When Alexander Pope strolled in the city,
Strict was the glint of pearl and gold sedans;
Ladies leaned out—more out of fear than pity,
And Pope's tight back was rather a goat's than man's.

Often one thinks the urn should have more bones
Than skeletons provide for speedy dust;
The urn gets hollow, cobwebs brittle as stones
Weave to the funeral shell a frivolous rust.

And he who dribbled couplets like a snake
Coiled to a lithe precision in the sun
Is missing. The jar is empty; you may break
It only to find that Mr. Pope is gone.

What requisitions of a verity
Prompted the rage and wit between his teeth
One cannot say. Around a crooked tree
A moral climbs whose name should be a wreath.

First Glance

THERE seems to be significance in the fact that seventeen of the fifty-six tales which Mr. Galsworthy has collected into "Caravan" (Scribner: $2.50) close with a death. In each case, of course, the death is perfectly handled; and had Swithin Forsyte, for instance, been the only person in the book to die the suspicion might have arisen in no reader's mind that Mr. Galsworthy is particularly fond of last breaths. But it now appears that he is, and the cause, furthermore, appears to have a connection with the spirit in which he approaches his art. He devotes a sentence to that art in his preface: "As the untaught spider spins his delicate rose-window and assures it against wind and rain by sheer adjustment—not a thread too many or too few—so let us writers of short tales try to spin out of our own instinct and vision the round and threaded marvel." This sentence, which is almost too well written, helps to explain how one can be cloyed by seven hundred and fifty pages of flawless story-telling, how one can begin to feel not so much that something is being told as that something is being spun. Instead of lives and times one gets round and threaded marvels. Hence, perhaps, Mr. Galsworthy's predilection for death-beds. Wishing to spin well, he chooses for his final thread the darkest thread of all. It makes an admirable border—one into which all previous patches of gold or azure shade—and leaves no doubt that an end of some kind has been altogether achieved.

Any reader of "Indian Summer of a Forsyte" will remember the bit of thistledown which palpitated more and more feebly upon Jolyon's mustache until it lay motionless at last. A great touch, one doubtless said. Yet a number of such touches in "Caravan," coming so closely together, awake the fear that in drawing the death of his most likable character Mr. Galsworthy added one small drop too much of the tincture of artifice. It is a wine-glass which tells, or seems to tell, that Swithin Forsyte is dead: "Slowly in the glass a last bubble rose and burst." The last thought of Sir Arthur Hirries, in "Timber," "drifted out like his cigar smoke into the sleet." And over the grave of Pasiance Pearse, in "A Man of Devon," there is the scent of fallen leaves.

All of this is not to say that Mr. Galsworthy's fiction is without the substance of life. Life in some terms is always with him, for he is as honest as he is clever. It is only to point out that in an author's repetitions lie the clues to his limitations. Mr. Galsworthy's vision—to come to more important matters—is limited to three phenomena, which with a velvet monotony he has repeated throughout his novels and his tales. There is the fact for him of the man who, faced more or less suddenly with the insufficiency of the world, must stand rooted in his own despair, must be henceforth a dumb if sensitive observer of discrepancies, anomalies, and injustices which he at least is never to resolve. He is everywhere in Mr. Galsworthy. There is the second fact of the woman—June Forsyte is an instance, but there are many others, and they are remarkably alike—who solves the riddle by ignoring it and being only beautiful, soft, and darkly, inexplicably passionate. There is the third fact of the fleshly old gentleman—Sylvanus Heythorp, Old Jolyon Forsyte—who asks no questions and offers no answers, but eats or drinks or loves his life to a positive, if sometimes brutal, conclusion. Beyond these Mr. Galsworthy has not gone, nor perhaps has needed to go. Since they are the things he can say best, he has said them often. Has he said them too often? "Caravan" is unique among his books in suggesting that he has.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Long Story of Oxford

A History of the University of Oxford. By Charles Edward Mallet. Vol. I. The Mediaeval University and the Colleges Founded in the Middle Ages. Vol. II. The Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Longmans, Green and Company. $15.

THIS is the first instalment of what promises to be, at least for a long time to come, the definitive history of Oxford University and its colleges. The two volumes now published bring the story down to about the time of the accession of William III, in 1689; a third and final volume will cover the remaining interval until the World War. The treatment of the subject presents a peculiar difficulty, as Mr. Mallet points out. in the fact that while the history of the university, as distinct from that of the colleges, is both a separate and a continuous topic, it is not one in whose treatment the colleges can be ignored; at the same time that the history of any one of the colleges, if traced separately over any considerable period, is likely to run ahead of the corresponding history of the university. Mr. Mallet has risked the latter disadvantage as the lesser of the two evils, and it must be said that he has succeeded in giving a marked impression of unity to events which in themselves offer much that is diverse. To say that the work is a monument of learning is to use a hackneyed phrase, but the exhaustive research and massive documentation which Mr. Mallet's pages display go far beyond the modest claims of the preface, and give to his volumes a high place among recent products of British historical scholarship.

Mr. Mallet suggests, as one reason for undertaking the work, that the history of the university has been, until comparatively recent years, somewhat neglected. Something of the neglect is doubtless due to the elaborate difficulty of the subject, but it is nevertheless remarkable because the history of Oxford and its colleges is, after all, a cross-section of the history of England and its people. Without being, in the American use of the term, a state institution, this most famous of the world's seats of learning has not failed to be affected, deeply more often than superficially, it would seem, by every great political, religious, or intellectual experience that has hindered, distracted, or set forward the English nation. What Mr. Mallett has written, accordingly—and written, it should be said, with much charm of style as well as with veritable prodigality of detail—has both particular and general interest. From the twilight years of origins, when the medieval idea of a university was developing, corporate character emerging, and the content and method of intellectual life irregularly taking shape, on through the coming of the friars and the dominance of the Schoolmen; then the founding of the earliest colleges, University, Balliol, and Merton; the curious evolution of academic organization, teaching methods, and student life; the later Schoolmen of the fourteenth century and the newer colleges of Exeter, Oriel, Lincoln, and All Souls': all this was little more than the ordered intellectual side of a national history which witnessed at the same time the consolidation of the monarchy, the constitutional development of Parliament, the expansion of trade and wealth, and the military and diplomatic struggles for a place of European leadership.

So it was, too, after the Middle Ages had been left behind. The period of the Tudors and the Protestant revolt both found and made Oxford a storm-center in politics and theology, those two great British intellectual interests not yet wholly separated; but it also saw the addition of Corpus Christi, Brasenose, Trinity, and other colleges to the educational group and a broadening of the Oxford intellectual influence. Before the Civil War submerged the university the Bodleian Library and various lesser colleges and halls had been established, to share with the older foundations in the checkered experiences of recovery and enlargement under the later Stuarts. Tell the story as one may, it is the story of England, all of which Oxford saw and an integral part of which it may throughout claim to have been.

There is no space to linger over the long list of scholars who were identified with Oxford during the five centuries and more of which these volumes treat. Roger Bacon easily tops the period of the friars, as does Wycliffe that of the Schoolmen. The reign of Henry VII brought the awakening of Greek studies under Grocyn, Linacre, and Colet, and the wider humanism of which Thomas More and Erasmus were the most distinguished Oxford exponents. Wolsey, Pole, Cranmer, and Laud combined statecraft with learning, while to Wolsey is to be credited a large work of building and reorganization. To the life and times of Anthony Wood, whose labors in the preservation of Oxford history have made him immortal notwithstanding the ill-will that clouded his end, Mr. Mallet devotes an entire chapter.

No more then than now, however, was Oxford a place where everybody was absorbed in learning or practiced seriousness as a habit, and the reader who cares less for the story of political or theological controversy or the evolution of schemes of studies than for the history of manners and customs will find special interest in the chapters in which Mr. Mallet describes the academic life of the university and the ways of teachers and students. One gathers that Oxford and its colleges had often quite as much concern with the world, the flesh, and the devil as with things of the mind or the state. Lawlessness, hard drinking, fights of town and gown, and easy morals were evils which elaborate regulations struggled meticulously to check; tutors, professors, and fellows needed prodding to keep them at their work, and attempts to enforce conversation in Latin, Greek, or Hebrew met with only qualified success. There is much to remind one of present-day educational procedure in the repeated tinkering of the courses of study and the efforts to engraft upon the time-honored foundation of classics, mathematics, and philosophy subjects which even then seemed modern "sides." Here, again, Oxford was England in little. It was not and could not be a place apart. Its fortunes were tied to the fortunes of the state, and as men lived outside the gates, so students lived within them or about them. It is to Mr. Mallet's credit that, with all his painstaking elucidation of details, he has shown us Oxford in its setting at this point as at others.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Concerning Crime

Vultures of the Dark. By Richard E. Enright. Brentano's. $2.
Murder and Its Motives. By F. Tennyson Jesse. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.
Keys to Crookdom. By George C. Henderson. D. Appleton and Company. $3.
Reformatory Reform. By Isaac G. Briggs. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

THESE books make a dish gruesome enough for any appetite. From the sprightly incidents of Mr. Enright's detective story (Mr. Enright is the Commissioner of Police of New York City) one steps down into the caverns of murder and an analysis of its motives. From this one branches out into the passages leading to all crookdom, and finally ends up in a reformatory to which criminals are sent after they have been caught by the police. We thus range over a wide field. The journey would be more entertaining if the books were better.

It is Commissioner Enright's daily job to throw a scare into the criminals of New York City. He also herds pedestrians on street corners until traffic lights change color. As an adventuring author he takes rank at once with the most distinguished prose writers of Mayor Hylan's cabinet. In that select company, whose leader gave to the world the phrase "art artists," he sits proudly. Who cannot feel the "needle-pointed downpour of sheeted rain" both pricking his own timid cheeks and, at the same time, comfortably swathing him in its folds? Fifth Avenue is graphically pictured as "stretching its lancelike length in mirrored sheen." But the heavy-browed guardian of New York City's safety outdoes himself when he describes a patrolman making his nightly rounds "lest some bird of prey find crevice or cranny into which to insert the thin, fine edge of an incipient felony." To such English there is no resistance. Mr. Enright has a surprising fertility in inventing scenes, and the story is not a flagrant eulogy of the New York Police Department. But it could have been written by a smart reporter for the Hearst newspapers, and it does not add to the fame of a capturer of criminals in a great city.

"Murder and Its Motives" is a wholly different kind of book. It is an attempt to delve into the secret processes of the murderer's mind. Miss Jesse classifies the motives that impel the murderer. She finds that there are six categories: murder for gain, murder for revenge, murder for elimination, murder from jealousy, murder from lust of killing, and murder from conviction. These exhaust the list, she says, though two or more may overlap in the same act of killing. Having established these classifications, she proceeds to give gory examples of each. The only trouble is that her book purports to be a profound explanation of the psychology of murder. She really seems to think that her classifications are psychological explanations, revelations of the ways in which murderers are brought to the point of murder. Nothing could be farther from the truth. To say that a man committed murder from jealousy, or that he did so for gain, is no adequate explanation of his act. All of us have pangs of jealousy and all of us desire gain. But not all of us kill other people on these accounts; we express our impulses in other ways. Murder, like all crime, is the result of a more or less complex personality reacting to a particular set of circumstances. Take William Palmer. He killed several children and a few men and women in his time. Miss Jesse says he did this in order to gain money or to avoid losing it. But what was there about William Palmer that made him take human life in order to do what other men do by other means? Miss Jesse does not face this question. Upon the origins of Palmer's desire for gain, upon his miserliness of nature, fondness for gambling, and general slovenliness her account sheds no light. She has no materials for delving into his childhood and so she cannot explain the processes by which he became what he was; without these, an attempt to explain his adult conduct is not very successful. Miss Jesse has much to learn from the students of mental behavior. She has attempted to set down a series of psychological clinical notes, and what she has succeeded in doing is to furnish material for several rattling detective stories.

"Keys to Crookdom" is a hodge-podge of meaningless anecdotes about burglars, forgers, swindlers, safe-crackers, murderers, arsonists, automobile thieves, and all other kinds of criminals. Classifications of offenders on the basis of specific anti-social acts which they commit have little meaning. It is not uninteresting to learn that in criminals' argot a "moll-buzzer" is an offender who gets caught by talking to a woman. But what is to be thought of a book which contains this statement: "In the United States are 1,748,000 definite mental defectives"? The author would seem to be the combination of clairvoyant and alienist that the world has been waiting for.

"Reformatory Reform" is cut from different cloth. This is the best book of the four; and it is written by an ex-prisoner! Mr. Briggs was sent to a reformatory at the tender age of fifteen. He describes the daily routine of his prison existence, the companions he met there, the reformatory keepers, and the methods employed to make the boys into better men. The adverse criticism, in Mr. Briggs's book as in other descriptions of reformatory methods, is not so much of the harshness of the procedure used as of its stupidity. It does no good. It pays no attention to the cause of wrongdoing, so that when the prisoners come out of jail they come out, many of them, ready to resume their old lives.

WINTHROP D. LANE

The Earliest Feminists

Colonial Women of Affairs. By Elizabeth Anthony Dexter. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THERE must be few to whom the picture here given of the colonial woman in her public activities will not come with a shock of surprise. We have, of course, long been aware of the importance of the domestic role that in a pioneering age devolved upon this woman; she not only shared her husband's toil of clearing the land and running the farm but also "carried on," as the author expresses it, "an appalling list of household industries, making clothes for the family out of wool or flax which she had raised, spun, dyed, and woven, brewing, baking, cooking, dipping, rearing, and . . . educating a baker's dozen of children." What we were not prepared for was the fact that the contingencies as well as the tone and temper of pioneer life lured or thrust these efficient women into a wide range of commercial and social enterprises which they pursued with equal success and in many cases with marked distinction.

The feminist of today will find her prototype among these early forebears of ours in practically every business and profession then open to men. To be sure, excessive devotion to things of the mind was deplored. This is instanced in the case of the wife of the governor of Connecticut; Governor Winthrop of Massachusetts wrote of her that "she had fallen into a sad infirmity—the loss of her understanding and reason by occasion of giving herself wholly to writing and reading; whereas if she had not gone out of her way to meddle with such things as are proper for men, whose minds are stronger, etc., she had kept her wits." Women not only were tavern-keepers, shopkeepers, school dames, artificers of every sort, nurses, and midwives (the last quite to the exclusion of the male practitioner for a long period); they were successful as organizers of new colonizing movements and proprietors of vast estates. Not infrequently a woman fell heir to her husband's business and carried it on admirably after his death. Some became distinguished printers and newspaper proprietors. Among these last, in 1735, was Widow Anne Franklin, Benjamin Franklin's sister-in-law, who with her two capable daughters continued her husband's business of "printer to the Colony of Rhode Island."

It is interesting to note instances in which women were the first to engage in important outside activities: Mistress Cornelia De Peyster's widowed granddaughter, a young business woman, ordered the first sidewalk in New York laid in front of her offices—the novelty attracting visitors from far and near. The first packet line between Europe and America was established by the widow De Vries of Staten Island; this so prospered that she became one of the richest women of Manhattan. A young Southern girl, Eliza Lucas, left for long periods by her military father in charge of his large plantation, perfected after patient experimentation the process of raising indigo. After her marriage this same energetic young woman developed a mid-eighteenth-century Montessori method of instructing her young son which, though later he called it "sad stuff," was extraordinarily prophetic of modern methods.

These few instances, selected from the many recorded here, confirm Dr. Dexter's conclusion that colonial women carried on their work—such work as it fell to their lot to do—"in a legal and social atmosphere of almost entire freedom." Perhaps we need not hesitate to grant her contention that the freedom which women enjoy today may be largely due to "the respect by society and the self-respect which the working women of an earlier day quietly and unconsciously won for themselves."

DORA W. KIRCHWEY

Woman's Work

Once in a Blue Moon. By Marion Strobel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.75.

Mirrors. By Margaret Tod Ritter. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

OF these two versifiers Miss Strobel is the less feeble. Even she, however, has little to show save a phrase here, a metaphor there, a helpless intention nearly everywhere. In either case one finds woman's work, in the invidious sense of the words. A limited horizon, a wistful moodiness, posing self-pity, unimaginative melodrama mark both volumes. Where thought is absent one looks for technical excellence, but neither Miss Strobel's free cadences nor Miss Ritter's endless sonnets are composed with notable skill.

The best of Miss Strobel's work is in such a pretty phrase as ". . . and the sun Falls in little sprays, to be picked by anyone." One or two of her lyrics to her baby suggest faintly the humorous charm of Mrs. Kilmer's poems about children. But even here she is capable of such pink ineptitudes as:

> How can I sing you a song?
> O my dear! O my sweet!
>
> How sing—with your hand upon
> My breast? O my dearest!

Words which a mother might conceivably mutter to her infant, but which should be reserved for that limited audience. The most finished of these pieces is Eight Months Old:

> Eight months ago, when you were born,
> You were a tiny thing and light.
> I was afraid to touch you much,
> Or hold you very tight.
>
> And then quite suddenly you grew
> Fast as a little willow sprig,
> And I was reassured—within
> My arms you felt so big.
>
> But oh, today you laughed at me,
> And stood alone and did not fall!
> And oh, I am afraid again—
> You are so small—so small.

Miss Ritter, though occasionally making a whimsical pirouette, prefers the grand manner, life with a capital L, beauty with a capital B, and the simulacra of anguish which are not infrequently fashioned by girls inexperienced in pain. Her opening sonnet is the least hysterical, as it is also the most evocative and quotable thing in the book:

> Deep-bosomed, stalwart-limbed, superbly made,
> Unconscious of her power and her grace,
> Accustomed to the blowzy wind's embrace,
> Magnificent, unlettered, unafraid,
> She guides her course past interlacing streams
> Striding the fields behind her ancient plow,
> Or halts beneath some blossoming, frail bough
> To rest her beast and give herself to dreams.
> Her eyes survey the road, the moor, the peat,
> With wide, untroubled gaze; she plays no part,
> No joys rise up to suffocate her heart
> Because a smile falls lightly at her feet.
> To one who comes for her at dusk, perchance,
> She lifts a brief, intoxicated glance.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

Books in Brief

The Little Karoo. By Pauline Smith, with an introduction by Arnold Bennett. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Pauline Smith's simple but highly developed physical awareness gives these stories of the Little Karoo their remarkable faithfulness to external reality. She sees with such simplicity that her people, drawn entirely from the outside, seem to be inside out. She never intrudes, never even enters a room where a character lies sleeping, but stands apart too aloof to pause to enjoy personally the rose on a china cup or a little hand mirror rimmed with tiny shells. Her characters are the religious Dutch peasants of South Africa and she has given them such life that, to the reader, they have absolute permanence.

Young Mrs. Cruse. By Viola Meynell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

These stories, most of them of love, are subtly felt and formed, delicate and ironical. The characterization of both complex and simple women is presented by a method of implication which suggests the rich fulness of novels rather than stories. The result is satisfying—artistically and emotionally—with the exception of one short tale whose mechanics are not concealed with the skill of the others.

The Turn of a Day. By C. A. Dawson Scott. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

The story of Pamela Kerthewy, a Cornish peasant, and the two men who love her is a tragedy which takes place in twenty-four hours. The experiences related might easily have covered a period of twenty-four years. The brilliance and skill of handling which subjects the characters too obviously to the author's desire make the complete acceptance of the book impossible. One wonders why a novel which is so excellent in many ways is not better. But the beautiful Cornish dialect compensates for much and gives a rich, raw pigment to the book which blends with the countryside, with the fertile hills, the sound of a harsh brush on the hearth, and animals breathing in the darkness.

The Counterplot. By Hope Mirrlees. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

Miss Mirrlees, who is as urbane as Sir Thomas Browne or Huysmans, writes as beautifully as Pater; and the rarefied world that she weaves like a canopy over the discordant, unrelated, irrelevant lives below has the imperishable fragrance of Pater's prose.

Der Gute Weg. Roman. Von Otto Flake. Berlin: S. Fischer Verlag.

The Wilhelm Meister brand of novel. Almost solid dialogue, and this dialogue little but puzzled philosophizing. The Lehr- and Wanderjahre of Flake's restless Dutch hero lead through half a dozen love affairs and end with an intriguing disappearance. The Good Way, we learn, is the way of the heart, but we learn also that conscience only warns, never offers positive counsel; and since man cannot live by Thou Shalt Not's alone, he seems condemned to grope in darkness. But the strange book has flashes of illuminating epigram, vivid glimpses of post-war Germany, and a general tone of dejected earnestness which is appealing. It constitutes a really remarkable study of German mentality. . . . "Georg fand selbst, dass die Bücher, die sie in Deutschland schrieben, ihm nicht wohl taten; sie redeten darin unaufhörlich vom Geist, and dieser Geist war das Gegenteil von Tat oder er schrie nach ihr wie eine brünstige Stute nach dem Hengst."

THEATER

SIEGFRIED
UFA'S Great Music Photo Drama Based on the Norse Saga and Wagner's Ring Operas Begins
A Limited Engagement
A Symphonic Orchestra of 60 Musicians from the Metropolitan Opera Co. Will Play a Special Score Compiled From Wagner's Immortal Music
JOSIAH ZURO, Conducting
CENTURY, 62nd Street and Central Park West.
SEATS NOW, ALL RESERVED
TWICE DAILY, 2:30-8:30 1000 SEATS 50c BEST SEATS $2.20

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE 466 Grand St.
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

ARTHUR HOPKINS presents
"WHAT PRICE GLORY"
A new Play by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings
PLYMOUTH THEATRE

International Relations Section

Horthy or Bethlen?

By EMERY DÉRI

ONE freezing February evening in 1920 the editor of the Social Democratic newspaper Népszava, Mr. Béla Somogyi, and one of his associates, Mr. Béla Bacsó, were kidnapped in the heart of the Hungarian capital. In a military automobile they were rushed to a country place about fifteen miles from Budapest, where they were murdered and their bodies thrown into the Danube River. In the long series of political murders during the last few years there has been none more dreadful than this. The murderers stabbed their victims to death, tore out their eyes, and mutilated the bodies before throwing them into the river. The crime startled the entire civilized world; organized labor ordered a boycott against Hungary, and even the Hungarian newspapers, though working under the pressure of a terrorist censorship, demanded the punishment of the persons involved. But the official investigation of the case stopped suddenly and the murderers have never been placed on trial.

The details of this case were not revealed until last May when a member of the Hungarian Parliament, Edmund Beniczky, who had been Minister of the Interior and supreme chief of police at the time the murder was committed, insisted on telling his story to a military court in Budapest. While these shattering exposures were being made Count Bethlen, the Prime Minister, was in Geneva describing to the Council of the League of Nations the wonderful progress Hungary had made toward social and financial recovery. Beniczky testified that the murder of Béla Somogyi was committed on the direct command of Admiral Horthy; never before had the head of a European country been accused publicly and under oath of being the instigator of murder. Although the deep antagonism between the Hapsburgist Beniczky and Admiral Horthy is evident, there could be no doubt as to the truth of his accusations. He told all the details of the murder, published all the evidence, named prominent witnesses, who did not deny any of his charges. He not only named the five murderers, but related how his efforts to bring them to arrest were balked by Admiral Horthy himself. He testified that the Admiral on various occasions had given orders to his officers not to execute the political prisoners on the spot they were arrested but to bring them to his headquarters and "finish them there, giving him an opportunity to indulge his lust." He testified that the Chief of the Budapest Police reported to him that Horthy's headquarters managed the escape of the murderers. He testified that one of Horthy's Pretorians visited him in his office and advised him to keep his hands off the Somogyi case. There was a secret society, he was told, so powerful that they would murder even the Minister if he should try to bring the murderers to trial.

When Beniczky's bomb was thrown into the summer calm of political life in Hungary, when the head of the State had publicly been accused of being an accomplice of murderers, everyone expected the immediate return of the Prime Minister to Budapest. The chief of his Cabinet wired desperately to Geneva asking Count Bethlen to return and meanwhile to give instructions what to do. But the Hungarian Premier was not disturbed; nor did he leave Geneva to face the singular political situation created by Beniczky's exposures. When he left Budapest he knew that Beniczky would testify, he even knew the details of Beniczky's story. Weeks before, when the clash between the supporters of the Hapsburgs and friends of Horthy had become violent and the opposition made a new issue of the old Somogyi case, Mr. Beniczky proposed in the Parliament to reveal all he knew concerning this murder if he were released from his oath of office. Count Bethlen remained silent to this proposal. The parliamentary opposition tried in vain to force him into granting Beniczky's request: finally the release from his oath and the permission to testify came—on the day Count Bethlen took his leave for Geneva. Count Bethlen had read the documents marked "most confidential" concerning the Somogyi case, in the Ministry of Interior, so he knew almost word for word the story Beniczky would tell before the military court; and he knew, too, that Beniczky was not as anxious to have the murderers arrested as he was to make Horthy's position impossible and to force his resignation. So it was almost certain that Beniczky would give his story to the papers. Count Bethlen knew all about it in advance, and when Beniczky's story was published in the Legitimist daily, when everything was in an uproar and everybody was convinced that the last hour of Horthy's Regency had struck—the Hungarian Premier sat quietly in his suite at the Hotel Beaurivage in Geneva. He smilingly sipped his coffee when his secretaries brought him the latest telegrams from Budapest urging his return—and he remained. A deadly fight was going on between Horthy and the opposition, a fight with possibilities of revolutionary outbreaks from Right and Left; and Count Bethlen did not lift a finger to intervene in the situation.

In the absence of the Prime Minister all parties and factions decided to fight out their last battle. All the hidden political forces were lined up in new formations. The issue was no longer the murder of Béla Somogyi. There were new issues, more exciting, more important: Horthy or Hapsburg, Horthy or a new Regent in the Royal Palace. The opposition demanded the investigation of Beniczky's charges by a special committee composed of members of Parliament; this would have meant the political death of Admiral Horthy. The Legitimists of the Governmental Party, who are numerous, sympathized with Beniczky, but in the absence of Bethlen they could not decide on anything. The Liberals and Socialists led attacks of unprecedented violence against the Government; Parliament was in an uproar. Horthy raged and demanded satisfaction. In the Royal Palace, now occupied by the Admiral, long conferences were held. For a day it seemed that Horthy's position was impossible and a few saw a new Regent—perhaps Count Bethlen—in the Royal Palace.

But in the twenty-four hours that followed things took a new turn—unexpected, dramatic, improbable, impossible in any country pretending to preserve even the appearance of being ruled by a constitutional government. The first step the Government took was the confiscation of the newspaper which printed Beniczky's story. A few hours later the Government suspended further publication of the same paper. As a result of the secret conferences the plan of sending out a parliamentary commission to investigate Beniczky's charges was dropped. The murderers named by Beniczky were not arrested; but the police, on order of the Government, arrested the chief witness in the case, Beniczky himself, who has been indicted for "high treason and maligning Regent Horthy"—despite the law which explicitly prohibits the arrest of any member of Parliament without special legislative permission. Admiral Horthy triumphed; it was his way of solving political problems. It was certainly the easiest way—to arrest the man who testified under oath before a duly constituted tribunal that he knew the perpetrators of a murder, and to suppress a newspaper which had been bold enough to print that testimony.

So the storm was over. Admiral Horthy saved Hungary again by preventing it from getting rid of him. Though the situation was still tense, the fight was ended. And now, having closed his negotiations in Geneva, having testified before the League of Nations that law and the constitution rule a peaceful Hungary, Count Bethlen again appeared on the political scene. Refraining from any comment on the case, he came back from Geneva. He said that he had had to conclude those negotiations of international importance which he had started. He might, perhaps, have returned earlier and left unsolved the international problems of Europe had there been a chance for pushing Admiral Horthy aside. But as it was, he came back after the storm, smiling, reserved. The Count immediately held conferences with the leaders of the parties. First he saw those who wished the monarchy to be restored but with no Hapsburg on the throne, the so-called "free electors." Bethlen gave them to understand that Beniczky's testimony was an attack on them, led by the followers of the Hapsburgs. He gave them to understand also that they should shield Horthy, for while he was Regent the question of the restoration of the monarchy could not be taken up. It would not be opportune to bring Horthy to a fall until they knew who was to be his successor. The "free electors" went off satisfied and Bethlen started negotiations with the "Camelots du Roi," the Hapsburg-Legitimists. Bethlen rebuked them for "spoiling everything." Why, the "swimming master," the "sailor"—as they call the Admiral-Regent among themselves—would have resigned in short time, without this provocation by Beniczky. What do you want? he asked them. Do you want the swimming master to mobilize his Pretorian troops? Why not wait until he is replaced by a man who is a Legitimist himself and wants merely to hold the place for young Otto? Count Bethlen told them about certain secret conferences at Geneva in regard to the possibility of Otto's coming back. All he demanded was that they keep quiet. Not to make trouble for a short time. And, of course, to drop Beniczky—that troublemaker who could not keep his mouth shut. The Legitimists understood everything and went off equally satisfied.

So nothing happened in Hungary. Count Bethlen dismissed the Parliament for a vacation, which it well deserved. He was magnanimous: he permitted the publication of the suspended paper, under a new name, of course. The investigation in the Somogyi case was closed. None of the murderers was molested; if you go to Budapest you may meet any of them taking a nice, healthy afternoon walk on the "Corso." Peace and order in Hungary are restored by the statesmanship of Count Bethlen. The Council of the League of Nations is satisfied. Mr. Jeremiah Smith, Financial High Commissioner, is satisfied. Horthy is satisfied. Everybody is satisfied, with the exception of that man Beniczky, who is still in prison, dropped by his party, deserted by those who applauded him most. He is probably not quite satisfied. But he will get out—not only out of prison but out of the country, out of Europe, far away to America, where he has already sent his wife. And when he is here and has forgotten about Horthy and Bethlen, he, too, will be satisfied.

But there remain some people who are not satisfied with Count Bethlen's clever manipulations—the people of Hungary—the masses. About seven and a half million of them within the borders of the country and three million outside of it. They are dissatisfied. The toiling millions, paying unheard-of heavy taxes to satisfy Mr. Smith; the silent millions without a right to vote; the millions with an amazing total of suicides. They feel dissatisfied. But they are not asked for their opinion; and they have to keep their mouths shut even on sunny Sunday afternoons when they happen to be in the cemetery of Budapest and are permitted to see the grave of poor Béla Somogyi, tangled with green.

Contributors to This Issue

LEONARD CLINE contributed the article on Michigan to The Nation's series These United States. His first novel, "God Head," will be published this fall.

M. M. KNIGHT, now in Morocco as observer and correspondent at the front, has been assistant professor of history at Columbia University, specializing in French colonial government.

PAUL HUTCHINSON is managing editor of the Christian Century.

ALLEN TATE is a poet and essayist of Tennessee, now living in New York.

EMERY DÉRI is a Hungarian newspaperman who is now editor of a Hungarian weekly in New York.

DUTTON'S LATEST BOOKS of special interest to readers of The Nation

Workers' Education in England and the United States
By MARGARET T. HODGEN. Price $5.00

Economic Conditions in India
By P. PADMANABHA PILLAI, member of the Economic and Financial Section, League of Nations Secretariat, Geneva.
Price $5.00

Prairie Fires (A novel)
By LORNA DOONE BEERS. Price $2.00
"Just, convincing and an absorbing story."

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

Exchange
Sell
Buy

Something odd, rare; useful, ornamental. Try the classified section of The Nation. Your advertisement will be read by men and women of divers tastes, means and appreciation. For rates address Dept. E. S. B., The Nation.

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

Libby Castle
Fort Washington Ave.
at 193d Street
New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Children 4-12 Years

School Bus

New Home of Hoffmann School

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

CHERRY LAWN SCHOOL

A Country School for City Children begins its 11th year Sept. 23, 1925.
Ideally located at DARIEN, Conn., 37 miles from N. Y.
There are twenty-seven acres of woods, pond and stream, farm and playground. Healthy out-of-door life for normal boys and girls—sleeping porches, individual instruction, mainly in the open air, home-grown food. Cheerful home atmosphere. Self government. Applied arts, music, dramatics, etc. University trained teachers. Endorsed by prominent educators.
Grade IV to College Entrance. Tuition and Board Based on Cost.
Dr. FRED GOLDFRANK, Director

The Autobiography of MOTHER JONES

Edited by Mary Field Parton, with introduction by CLARENCE DARROW.

A vivid story of the life of the most picturesque figure in the labor movement of the United States. Cloth, illustrated, $1.50 postpaid. Just published.

Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 E. Ohio St., Chicago.

¼ Acre—and Freedom!

artists' and writers' community, within commuting distance of New York. High, dry, and some wooded land, overlooking Hudson.

¼ acre $250 to $400, on easy terms.
About a third available land sold.

Mt. Airy at Harmon-on-Hudson
Address Harry Kelly, 70-5th Ave., N. Y.

REAL HARRIS HOMESPUNS

Direct from the Makers at Manufacturer's Price
Suit Lengths Cut to Order. Price $2.00 Per Yard. Postage Paid
NEWALL, 150 Stornoway, Scotland. Write for patterns stating shades desired

SUMMER PLACES

YOU'LL GET THE UTMOST FROM YOUR VACATION AT

CAMP MILAN

at RHINEBECK, N. Y.

The vacation spot of happiness for adults, in the beautiful Berkshires. Swimming, tennis, boating, horseback riding, excellent food, fine quarters, courteous management. Weekly rates, $32.50. Week-ends, $6.00 per day.

Send for Illustrated Booklet.

CAMP MILAN, Rhinebeck, N. Y.
Telephone Clinton Corners 21-F-12.

An Adult Camp in the
ADIRONDACK PARADISE

5 miles from Lake George.

Equipped with every known facility for comfort and sports.

Reservations limited to 100.

Rates $27.50 per week

Modern sanitation in each log cabin.

Round Trip New York-Lake George, $12.25

Note: Reservations booked to September 8th
Camp remains open until October

LENA BARISH REBECCA B. NUDELL

CAMP GREATER UTOPIA

Lackawaxen, Pa.

A VACATION GROUND for GROWN-UPS

In the picturesque Blue Mountains. Facilities for every sport. Rates per week, $35. Rates per day, $6. For further information address Camp Greater Utopia, Lackawaxen, Pa.

WM. J. PERLMAN, Managing Director — Dr. WM. J. DURANT, Associate Director

"THE CAVENDISH"

Is Successfully Solving Household Troubles.

Especially large elegantly furnished master rooms. Excellent Cuisine.—Refined Service.—2½ acres of wooded grounds overlooking the Bay. Swimming Pool.—Billiards.—Tennis.—Ice Skating.

40 MINUTES FROM PENNSYLVANIA STATION. 99 TRAINS DAILY.

Reasonable All Year Rates.
Tel. Far Rockaway 4472.

1424 Kensington Gardens. Far Rockaway, Long Island, N. Y.

THE LLOYD, BELLPORT, L. I.

On Great South Bay. Open May 20

Cool, Comfortable, Charming.

Regular guests and week-end parties.

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG French woman, with eight years' teaching experience in American colleges, wishes to give instruction to advanced students in exchange for room and board. Must be in Chicago. References. Box 339, care of The Nation.

YOUNG WOMAN, university graduate, age 28, six years' experience as personal director, and employment manager for publishing and manufacturing concerns, desires executive connection. Capable of supervising employment, recreation, industrial education, cafeteria, etc. Box No. 345, care The Nation.

INTELLIGENT YOUNG LADY, well read, experienced elementary teacher, seeks position as companion, secretary or governess. Good experience, imaginative, interested in people, wishes interesting work in Chicago. Box No. 341, care The Nation.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

FOR RENT

CORNER APARTMENT, Park view, antique furniture, all modern conveniences, 5 rooms. Rent Sept. to May, $125 monthly. Phone Caledonia 7349, or write Box No. 344, care The Nation.

TO RENT, Greenwich Village—A large studio room, with private bath and kitchen. $65 per month. Call between 6 and 8 P. M. 232 West 14th St. Mrs. Punshon.

MISCELLANEOUS

DESIRABLE property, situated in one of the most beautiful sections of the Catskills, and suitable for the development of a boys' camp, open to anyone desiring to make connections. Those interested please communicate with T. Berg, Fleischmann Mansion, Fleischmann's, N. Y.

I WISH TO BUY two-family house for my own use in desirable neighborhood. Write full details. I will act quickly if offer is attractive. Box No. 346, care The Nation.

FOLDER PROPOSING COLONIZATION among undeveloped natural resources in British Columbia, along lines of Industrial Democracy, sent free by The Cooperative Club, P. O. Box 1248, San Francisco, Calif.

German Books a Specialty

W. BEYER, Inc. Books and Art

Now at 259 5th Avenue
Bet. 28th and 29th Streets. New York

The Nation's
Student Worker Contest
Closes October 15. All manuscripts must be received before that date. Write for information to THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1925 No. 3140

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 265
EDITORIALS:
Transatlantic Criticism 267
A Letter to the Miners' Chief 268
Philosophers or Fools? 269
Standing in the Need of Prayer 269
LOONY: A MODERN MOVIE. By Robert L. Wolf 270
FRANCE'S DANGEROUS ADVENTURE. By Robert Dell 277
ALCAEUS TO THE TENTH MUSE. By Margaret Tod Ritter 278
CRUDE SUGAR; REFINED POLITICS. By Fritz Kunz 279
A NIGHT IN MEXICO. By Witter Bynner 280
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 280
CORRESPONDENCE 281
BOOKS:
Decoration for a Girl's Room. By Horace Gregory 283
Mr. Massingham. By J. A. Hobson 283
Lincolniana. By Luther E. Robinson 283
Donald Ogden Stewart. By Johan J. Smertenko 284
The New Ownership. By Henry Raymond Mussey 285
The Ethics of Politics. By W. Y. Elliott 285
Ambition in Love's Clothing. By Roy Temple House 286
Books in Brief 287
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Law and Order in Japan. By Harry F. Ward 289

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

WHEN JUDGES FALL OUT, who shall decide? There are advantages as well as handicaps in the scattered authority of our courts. In New York City Justice Thomas W. Churchill of the State Supreme Court recently granted an outrageous injunction forbidding members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers from picketing within ten blocks of the building of the International Tailoring Company, a firm at Twelfth Street and Fourth Avenue. As most of the clothing industry of the city is within that area, the injunction virtually outlawed all activity by the union, however peaceable and no matter against whom directed. When, therefore, a strike was declared against the J. L. Taylor Company, in the same building as the injunction-protected firm, the union disregarded the sweeping order of the court and placed pickets on duty. They were promptly arrested on complaint of the International Tailoring Company and brought before Justice Aaron J. Levy, another judge of the State Supreme Court, for punishment. Justice Levy did not attack his fellow-judge's injunction as such—that would not have been etiquette—but in effect he expressed his vigorous disapproval of it. He held that the pickets had a right to demonstrate against their former employer and were not interfering with the International Tailoring Company. He added that the attempt to send the men to jail was a "high-handed proceeding." It was all of that. And Justice Churchill's action in granting, without hearings, his sweeping injunction made the State court an ally of the high-handed employer.

THE CHIEF RESULT of the Anglo-French debt agreement—and doubtless the chief intention—is to put the Administration in Washington in a corner from which it can hardly extricate itself. The arrangement is to liquidate France's debt to England of £623,000,000 by sixty-two annual payments of £12,500,000 (about $60,000,000). In fact this means that France will not repay the principal at all but will give Great Britain 2 per cent on it for sixty-two years and then call it off. Behind this there is a joker (or a joke on us) to the effect that the settlement is conditional on France's obtaining similar terms in adjusting her debt to the United States, which with interest amounts to more than $4,000,000,000. If France agrees to repay America on a more liberal basis, then Great Britain insists that the payments to her must be revised upward accordingly. Thus Uncle Sam is left to fall in line or pose before all the world as a Shylock. In consequence there is a burst of ill-concealed spleen in Swampscott and Washington and brave talk that the Administration will make its own terms with France. It will do nothing of the kind. For after all France holds the purse strings, not the United States. We have no way of collecting a single sou that France does not deliver voluntarily, and few Frenchmen regard the debt to us as morally valid. Mr. Coolidge can threaten reprisals through refusing private loans, but in the end he will take what he can get, although he will endeavor—perhaps successfully—to make our people think he is getting what he wants.

COLUMN-LONG COMMUNIQUÉS from the Moroccan front are suddenly blossoming in the American newspapers. The New York Times heads a front-page column "French Overcome Fierce Resistance of Riffian Rebels." Careful study of the dispatch reveals that the French army, 150,000 strong, has succeeded in advancing three miles on a fifteen-mile front against Abd-el-Krim's forces. But the French are advancing, and sometimes the dispatches tell how. Their army is preceded by aeroplanes, which count it victory when they bomb a Riff warrior's wife and children; when they take a village they demand the surrender of all its flocks and herds, failing which ten of the local chiefs are put to death. When a hostile tribe submits, a friendly tribe is turned loose to pillage as it will. It is rotten business, this warfare of the civilized French against the Africans. Thus far the French have been able to use their subject peoples—Algerians, subjugated Moroccans, Senegalese—to do the bulk of their fighting for them; but Abd-el-Krim is forcing them to use their own white-skinned boys on the front. And when casualty lists begin to dribble homeward there may, as Mr. Dell suggests elsewhere in this issue, be a new revulsion in France.

"AUTONOMY" SUCH AS PAINLEVÉ OFFERED the Riffians is an empty phrase in this age of empire. The Riffians knew that, and so did the canny Mannesmann brothers. That German firm lost its valuable mining concessions in French Morocco—by confiscation—after the war, but it retained valuable properties in what the statesmen called the Spanish zone. In that zone, where Abd-el-Krim now has his headquarters, the Spanish never ruled except on paper; but the Mannesmanns evidently feared that the French might go further. They have sold their concessions to an Anglo-American banking group, frankly avowing that they were selling for fear that if the Riff territory were conquered by the French their property might be confiscated. And thus the booty which was one of the driving forces in French hostility to Abd-el-Krim has eluded the Gallic concession-hunters. The sale of the Mannesmann concessions, however, is not likely to affect French policy. Prestige is at stake, and governments have before this sacrificed as many men as are in the entire French Moroccan army for little but prestige.

THE VIRGIN ISLANDS have a new Governor, Captain Martin E. Trench, United States Navy. He is the sixth governor that the islands have had in the eight years since we bought them of Denmark. Captain Philip Williams, whom Captain Trench succeeds, was probably neither better nor worse than his predecessors. One of his last official acts was to get in a squabble with the Colonial Council of St. Croix over his appointments to that body, in consequence of which he dissolved it, thus taking away from the people of St. Croix such slender rights of representative government as the council possessed. We know nothing of Captain Trench, the new executive, but we have no hope that he will be able to end the political dissatisfaction and industrial depression which have developed since America took hold. What the Virgin Islands need is not a new governor—of whom they have already had too many—but a new government. It is impossible for any man to succeed so long as he comes as a representative of a war-making branch of our government and applies naval discipline to a people previously accustomed to a representative civil administration. How much longer are American citizens going to see all our traditions of democracy violated in our overseas possessions before they demand that Congress shall supersede naval autocracy in the Virgin Islands, Guam, and Samoa with civilian governments and a fair measure of popular rights?

BANKERS ARE SO FOND of posing as public benefactors, of assuring their clients of disinterested advice in regard to investments, that they owe it to their business reputations not to be caught in swindles as barefaced as selling gold bricks or the practices of a transatlantic card sharper. Besides, such practices are relatively dangerous and not sufficiently lucrative to assist materially in piling up the exorbitant profits to which bankers are accustomed. Hence it is with a jolt that we learn of a transaction by officers of the Gotham National Bank, a supposedly reputable institution of New York City with an imposing building on Columbus Circle overlooking Central Park. (Since the transaction in question the bank has been acquired by and now constitutes a branch of a prominent trust company.) In 1923 Miles R. Martin came to New York City from the Southwest with between $15,000 to $25,000 which he desired to invest. A friend gave him a letter of introduction to Charles H. Banning, assistant vice-president of the Gotham National Bank. The latter and Henry E. Lockwood, a "special representative" of the bank, advised Martin to lend $15,000 to a construction company which they said had been investigated by the bank and had ample resources as security. Martin took the plunge. But the company failed to live up to its promises, and he demanded the return of his money. He received about a third of it, and then sued the bank, Banning, Lockwood, the construction company, and the latter's owner for the remainder. Martin charged that previous to his visit to the bank the latter had lent money to the company, that the note had been protested for non-payment, and that later the bank was repaid out of his (Martin's) $15,000.

SUCH CHARGES AGAINST A BANK, an institution which poses as a disinterested benefactor of the public and its clients, are not nice. Unfortunately they appear to be true. At least Justice Faber of the New York Supreme Court has just rendered a decision holding the bank liable along with the other defendants for the return to Martin of the two-thirds of his loan which he failed to get back from the construction company. The records of the notes of the latter, filed in the bank, showed its financial weakness, says the judge, yet the loan was recommended. The decision is rendered in the restrained language usual to the bench, but it bares to the core a disreputable swindle by a supposedly reputable financial institution. Justice Faber says:

> The note of $2,450 owing to the bank and past due was uncollectable, and the bank stood in a position to lose that amount. It would have lost it had not the plaintiff advanced $15,000 on the fraudulent representations of Banning and Lockwood. . . .
>
> It is incredible that the plaintiff would loan $15,000 without some assurance from Banning and Lockwood that such a loan would be amply secured.
>
> Having reached the conclusion that the defendants, Banning and Lockwood, did knowingly make the false statements complained of, there is presented the question as to the bank's liability for the acts of Banning and Lockwood.
>
> We have here the defendant bank profiting by the fraud of its agents. It failed to repudiate them and refused to make restitution when the fraud was brought to its attention.

All the defendants, concludes the Court, "participated in the fraud and are equally liable."

A SENSELESS, CASUAL ACCIDENT swept out of existence two important representatives of the new Russia when Isaiah J. Hoorgin and Efraim M. Skliansky were drowned the other day at Long Lake, in the Adirondacks. Mr. Skliansky was head of the Moscow Textile Corporation and had just arrived from Russia to purchase machinery for several government factories in the Moscow district. He was only 32 years old but was already a widely experienced administrator and, as Assistant War Minister, had acted for several years as Trotzky's chief lieutenant in the organization and direction of the Red Army. Mr. Hoorgin was chairman of the board of directors of the Amtorg Corporation, which acts as purchasing agent of the Soviet Government. He was the highest Soviet official in the United States and the nearest approach to an ambassador permitted by our present relations with Russia. A mathematician and a professor of astronomy by choice and training, he knew how to adapt himself to any job, from that of housing commissioner in Kiev to that of commercial representative in the United States, where he had already built up Russian-American trade to better than the pre-war level. Personally he was a vivid, keen, and ironic individual, with a most amazing zest for life. Very few of the American business men with whom he came in contact could match his business and executive ability, and his outside absorptions ranged from the Einstein theory to poetry and the latest popular song. He had more than an amateur's interest in the new experiments in the stage and motion picture, and at the time of his death was himself engaged in a project for converting two well-known literary classics into motion-picture material.

THE PRESENT CAMPAIGN AGAINST CRIME is marked by the very spirit of violence that it aims to check. It would "stamp out" crime—make laws stricter, sentences more severe, detection and punishment more swift and certain. And crime would continue unchecked. Dean Roscoe Pound, of the Harvard Law School, in a recent issue of the Boston Herald, discussed the present "crime wave" with a skepticism designed to check the enthusiasm of alarmed and noisy reformers. We do not even know the extent of crime in America, says Dean Pound. Our statistics are largely unclassified and incomplete and certainly impossible of comparison with the crime figures of European cities. We tackle the question of crime without considering the social situations which breed lawlessness. We are laboring under a system of criminal justice devised for a "rural, pioneer, agricultural America" which takes little account of the social convulsions involved in a change to an urban industrial civilization. Dean Pound advocates an endowment for scientific research into the whole question of crime and its causes; and he questions the value of all "hysterical crusades." Lawlessness and the attempt to check lawlessness by strong-arm methods are parts of the same social disease.

RICHARD KANE has offered $5,000 a year, to the first university which shall claim it, to endow a chair of motion-picture technique. Whether his press agent or his disinterested zeal for the welfare of the movies prompted the offer there is no doubt that far-reaching advances in the films are at hand. The intensification of business activity in the producing field is a reflection of this condition, just as the rise of the newer publishing houses went step by step with the contemporary awakening in American letters. The movie is one field of art where what is good may also be what is popular. Its technique precludes subtleties and its subject matter is necessarily simple—humor, pathos, melodrama, burlesque. Its chief difficulty is that of the pre-Elizabethan stage—the performers have developed faster than the authors, and in consequence there has been nothing to perform but second-rate material developed for the movie, or second-hand material adapted from other media. Exceptions like "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" and "The Last Laugh," have been, in the language of the trade, financial "flops" in the United States, and have discouraged producers from proceeding further in that direction. But "Caligari" and "The Last Laugh" failed not because of their merits but their defects—"The Last Laugh" was poetic but thin, and "Caligari" embodied technical experiments which did not satisfy even its originators. Writing for the movies, in any genuine creative sense, is a new art. In France Romain Rolland has written a "Revolt of the Machines," in Germany Ivan Goll a "Chapliniade." Robert Wolf's scenario, printed in this issue, is a pioneer American effort in the same field.

Transatlantic Criticism

THE mental habit most firmly fixed in the average London literary hack is the habit—so the complaint is frequently heard in New York—of slurring a new American book because it is American. The run of British reviewers undoubtedly delight in digging us. Their clichés for the purpose are as numerous as they are old, as contemptuous as they are convenient. The doctoral dissertation, of course, is easy prey; but poems are greeted with incredulity, novels with tolerance, and books which develop ideas with the reservation that, after all, the ideas come out of America. An eyebrow is lifted on most occasions at the language of the misguided author; "some curious feats of style" are noted, or some vernacular is set down as jargon. All in all, it might be guessed that an American book is the simplest of all books for an anonymous Fleet Street reviewer to dispose of. For he is heir to a whole century of condescension. It is roughly a hundred years since Sydney Smith asked his famous question: "Who reads an American book?" And hundreds of journalists since his day have testified that they cannot do so with pleasure.

Such an attitude is probably inevitable in a mother of many colonies—or, more generally yet, in any country that is old. If London condescends to New York, New York condescends—when she dares—to Chicago; and doubtless Chicago condescends to Omaha. It is a matter of age. It is also a matter of East and West. West is synonymous around the world with Youth. India, China, and Japan know how to be incredulous toward all Europe, and London cannot be taken too seriously in Bagdad or Benares. So is the contrary attitude of New York toward London inevitable, probably, in a literary capital which is conscious of its youth—particularly when there is an older capital which writes the same language. For New York has its attitude also. Americans are sensitive, as they have been for a century. They are quite too eager to make grandiose comparisons, to match achievement with promise, to nurse a national vanity already too great in other fields. There is the American hack, too, who sniffs at an English novel and intimates that had it not been thrust out of England it would never have come this far. There is the native commonplace that we must look at home for our literature. There is the pathetic talk about the Great American Novel. Eventually, it may be, the American reviewer will find it altogether easy to dismiss any British book with the effortless observation that it is British.

And what does the great world of readers do about all this? Nothing. Dickens continues to be devoured by thousands of Americans who never stop to think that he was an Englishman, or perhaps do not know it. Shakespeare is never identified by innocent persons with John Bull. Hardy is received without a qualm. Mark Twain, Whitman, Hawthorne, Poe, Jack London, and Upton Sinclair cross the ocean and are not protested against by Britons who are still ignorant of the fact that certain men and women read books for pay. The squabble seems to be confined among the lesser critics after all. The great critics disregard it; the great creative writers are generous to one another—witness Baudelaire and Poe, Scott and Irving, Symonds and Whitman, Tolstoi and Thoreau, Carlyle and Emerson. The public quite rightly leaves the hacks to play as they like with their rubber stamps.

A Letter to the Miners' Chief

CHRIST J. GOLDEN,

President, District 9, United Mine Workers of America; Chairman, Anthracite Miners' Scale Committee, Shamokin, Pa.

DEAR MR. GOLDEN:

You are one of the high officials of the United Mine Workers of America. You joined your colleagues in calling a strike in the anthracite districts on September 1. You are also, as we happen to know, a man of warm heart, good sense, sound judgment.

Now what, precisely, are you planning for the coal industry? You have enormous power, actual and potential, covering the most important single resource in contemporary civilization. Without coal, industry becomes meaningless; and without anthracite, New England tends to slide into the Arctic Circle. And not to lighten your burden, you have the day-by-day welfare of 155,000 anthracite miners, and, indirectly, of half a million bituminous workers, in your keeping. But the broad outline of your policy and that of your colleagues is difficult to discover.

What is happening today in anthracite happened in 1917, 1920, 1922, and 1923. With the beginning of the war in 1917 bituminous as well as anthracite coal rushed up to panic prices. The public howled. (By and large, howling marks the limit of consumer intelligence, Mr. Golden.) The Fuel Administration was established, and for two years ran coal as it ought to be run. The miners had a proud share in that. The Fuel Administration determined requirements, and adapted production to them. It met requirements from the nearest mine, and thus saved untold competitive crosshauling. The consumer's howls died in his throat, and to the best of our knowledge the miners were more steadily at work and better satisfied than at any period before or since. Which shows that, technically and humanly, the efficient control of the coal industry does not transcend the boundaries of human intelligence. It took war psychology to prove that it could be done, but obviously it can be done.

In 1920 came normalcy. (Again we stand uncovered before the solemnity and beauty of that word.) Normalcy! The war control of fuel was lifted; the price of bituminous soared skyward, reaching an altitude hitherto unknown in human affairs; operators, jobbers, retailers joined in an orgy of profiteering. The public again roared and howled. Then along came the panic of 1921 and prices dropped into the cellar. The public lapsed into silence. In 1922 prices climbed again. A coal commission was appointed. It issued reports—good reports. And while the reports were tumbling from the presses, the operators and jobbers were trebling their margins. And now in 1925 stove coal, with a fifty-cent boost, leads the way upward again.

The United Mine Workers are not to blame for all this; there have been many other forces at work. But your responsibility becomes increasingly grave. As we said before, your policy is a little difficult to locate. So far as we can discover it at all it seems to be "he-man stuff." That may be good in the movies, but it has cost you a drop from 60 per cent union production in the soft-coal fields to 40 per cent in a few months' time, with utter disorganization in the Northern fields. Meanwhile substitutes for hard coal are on the verge of disorganizing the anthracite fields. The recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to freight rates on those same substitutes will not help you. The use of bituminous as a substitute will further the overdevelopment of an industry already 50 per cent overdeveloped.

We realize that the anthracite strike will group the thirty-six idle days that the industry now requires in each year, and thus make the vacation more agreeable; and that the strike may operate to bankrupt a number of marginal mines, thus forcing down some fantastic royalty rates. But, after all, these are small benefits as measured against the premium on substitutes, overdevelopment, public ill-will, and the return to the old program of sweeping round in circles. There is nothing in this strike to keep a mad dance from growing even madder.

And so, Mr. Golden, what do you propose to do to help out coal? We know very well that it is easy enough for editors to tell you what you ought to do when, if they had in a year the concrete problems which you have to meet and decide in a day, they would go stark mad. We cannot tell you just what your policy should be. But we have one or two general suggestions which may not be out of place.

To begin with, do you know what the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America have done in the past few years? Once organized, they dropped the "he-man stuff"; they have moved a long way toward actually operating their industry. They know the exact financial condition every month of every employer, and with these facts in hand their strategy is not to club every head they see, but to go easy with those firms which are weak and only curb those which are strong. In exchange for helping to set up and maintain production standards in the shops, they have taken out in wages and in unemployment benefits about all the industry can stand and keep healthy. Theirs is not a policy of Stand and deliver; they ask: How much can we get and keep the ship seaworthy? They have made themselves, to a large degree, responsible for a more efficient conduct of their industry, and in return they have steadier work, better pay, and happier relations with their employers. Perhaps there is something in it, even for coal.

Again, there is the proved tangible performance of the Fuel Administration. We cannot get those two years out of our heads. Production was geared to requirements on a balanced-load basis. Is there any other way in heaven or earth whereby, technically, coal can at once keep its miners busy and serve its public at a reasonable cost? This means a budget and some sort of centralized regulation—governmental or otherwise. If nobody else steps forward the operators may do it themselves. They launched a billion-dollar soft-coal consolidation the other day. Somehow we would not particularly care to be a miner if and when the operators do all the coordinating themselves.

Finally, it seems to us that the Coal Commission made a worth-while suggestion as to anthracite wages. An earnings pool, a reasonable return on capital, and a division of the surplus. The British arrangement gives 83 per cent of such surplus to the miners and 17 per cent to the operators. There may be an idea there. If ever there were a natural monopoly which belongs in public rather than in private hands it seems to us that it is the unmined reserve of anthracite in that tiny square in Pennsylvania.

Philosophers or Fools?

BY a cruel coincidence the faith in certain quarters that the future of civilization depends upon an educated public opinion comes at the same time with the conviction in other quarters that public opinion will be the last of all things to rely on when the race between culture and catastrophe grows really desperate. Optimists, remembering how little voice the people had, for instance, in determining the terms of the late peace, persist in the belief that once the diplomats and arch-capitalists are out of the way the sailing will be easy. Their belief is founded on the assumption that the will of the human race by and large is to see justice and intelligence prevail, and of course they assume also that the race will recognize justice and intelligence. Leave the public to itself, they say, and it will work for the supreme good of humanity.

"Little enough the herd cares for that," cries a man as wise as Havelock Ellis. And in his use of that fourth word lies all the difference between two points of view. Doubtless it is an issue as old as the world, this issue as to whether we shall say "public" or "herd." But the debate has been particularly pointed during the past century or more, when, parallel with the great stream of liberal thought which has flowed unceasingly from the springs of political faith, there has run an equally powerful stream of cynical speculation upon the mob. The disagreement between John Stuart Mill, who according to Carlyle proceeded to write books on the theory that England was populated by philosophers, and Carlyle, who according to Mill wrote even more books to prove that it was populated by fools, is classic. But the disagreement has persisted, and it is perhaps particularly alive today.

That the cynics are growing in number may or may not be a result of the war; at any rate they are asserting with fresh and engaging eloquence that the popular mind, left to itself, does not advance enlightenment. And they would seem to be justified by the war stampede, the Ku Klux Klan, the fundamentalists, and the anti-evolutionists. Yet it is well to remember that in these four instances (among many others) the popular mind has not been left to itself. It is, in fact, never left to itself. There was a patriotic press to befuddle it eight years ago; the Klan has leaders today; the original fundamentalists were officials of a church; and there was Mr. Bryan.

It is well to remember also that there is Mr. Darrow; and it is permissible to hope for more of his kind who will be courageous enough to face the crowd and plead the cause of reason. That cause, of course, must win its ultimate victory in the individual mind. The public may be educated to hate war; it is for each soul in its own loneliness to discover what shall be loved. A philosopher is one who loves wisdom, and a fool is doubtless one who loves demagogues. There seems to be no good reason for supposing that the people—in the absence of demagogues—will forever despise wisdom, or ever wholly cherish it.

Standing in the Need of Prayer

It's me, it's me, O Lord,
Standing in the need of prayer;
It's me, it's me, O Lord,
Standing in the need of prayer.

THUS sang the old-time Negro. But today, according to the light of the union coal miners of Oklahoma, it is strike-breakers who most especially are standing in the need of prayer. And the union men to the number of about a thousand who recently walked out of five mines rather than accept the 1917 wage scale with open-shop conditions, contrived that those who tried to break the strike should have prayer in abundance. The old-fashioned religion is having its innings in Okmulgee.

Every day when the strike-breakers quit work they found the road leading from their mine lined with union men with their wives and children. The first gesture of the pickets, armed with American flags, was to sing "The Star Spangled Banner." Followed a hymn or so. Then, all baring their heads, one of the union men lifted his voice:

> Lord, let no harm come to these men. Hold up the mountain-sides that no rocks may fall upon them. But, Lord, let Thy light shine upon them and show them the blessings of unionism and the sin of depriving union men and their wives and families of their daily bread.

After the prayer came individual appeal.

"God save your soul, Jim Pocatelli."

"God bless you, Tom Murphy."

As usual, tactics of non-resistance proved more efficacious than violence. Strike-breakers were weaned away from their jobs at such a rate that the mine owners had to appeal to the strong arm of the law to help them. The compliant sheriff of Okmulgee County issued a proclamation against prayer meetings and "religious procedure" by the picketing miners. Two unionists disregarded the sheriff's fiat and were obliged to conclude their prayer meeting in the county jail. A judge as compliant as the sheriff decided that the twain had been guilty of unlawful assemblage and held them for trial in October.

As a further means of suppressing non-resistance and counteracting the subtle power of prayer the Governor of Oklahoma sent State troops to the mines. The soldiers were met with equally gentle but disturbing tactics. In their presence the picketing miners were seized with a frenzy of patriotism having its outlet in a continual singing of "The Star Spangled Banner," which compelled privates to jump to attention and officers to stand stiffly at salute.

Governor Trapp (who recently failed by only a few votes of impeachment because of his activity in helping Seminole County to dispose of bonds through his own bonding agency) has upheld the suppression of "religious procedure" by the union miners, declaring it to be intimidation under the guise of worship. But according to the Oklahoma Leader he has had a hard time keeping the people of the State, who are fundamentalist, from seeing the strike from the strikers' viewpoint as a result of the union miners' tactics. It is all right, the people believe, to jail pickets, but to imprison evangelists is another matter altogether.

Loony*

A Modern Movie

By ROBERT L. WOLF

Drawings by Louis Lozowick

Part I

Sub-Title: THE END OF A PERFECT DAY

SCENE 1. The ground floor of an immense factory. The ceiling is supported by large round iron columns, the nearest in the right center, and thence stretching back in an indefinite row. Around each of the columns, about two feet higher than a man's head, is pasted a large rectangular white poster, reading in three lines:

LOONY GAS

THE GAS

WHAT IS

To the left of the columns is a long row of large machines, one behind each interval between the columns. The machines look something like immense Mergenthaler linotype machines—they evidently go down through the concrete floor, and are each equipped with two large arms, one reaching forward, the other back, that clank up and down, not together, but successively, in a perfectly regular rhythm. With each clank down of the forward arm, a large-sized drum of gasoline rolls from the machine, rolls forward with great rapidity over the floor, out an open door on the extreme right (one for each machine), and down a plank runway. The whole right side of the factory is practically open, except for the stanchions between the doors, but not too much light comes in. To the left and rear, the factory apparently extends back indefinitely. At each machine is a man in a soiled white cotton undershirt (shoulder sleeves) and soiled loose blue-jean pants. All the men have high cheekbones and thin cheeks—each works in a practically identical rhythm, bending forward and down (to the right rear of the set), with a mop of waste in one hand, to oil a part of the machine and pull a lever for each drum that comes up and out. The drums come at the rate of thirty to the minute, which means that each man bends and straightens thirty times to the minute, and each arm of each machine rises and falls thirty times. The rhythms are almost identical but not quite. On the nearer head of each drum is printed in large square white capitals, LOONY GAS—this goes round and round as the drum goes forward, and of course can not be read. The general impression is of the maximum noise and dizziness.

SCENE 2. Close-up of the head of a barrel, the camera stationary with reference to the barrel. We see the barrel swung out and down by the large forward arm. Instantly machine, floor, and workers start going round and round the head of the barrel, and disappearing left, the barrel also moving very slowly across the picture from left to right. The large white capitals LOONY GAS on the head of the barrel are the only thing in the picture not rotating. Gradually the camera becomes independent of the barrel; the barrel commences to rotate, the walls and floor slow up—and this section of the scene ends with the building in normal position, while the barrel shoots with inconceivable rapidity to the right out of the doorway.

* Copyright, 1925, by Robert L. Wolf. All motion-picture and dramatic rights reserved.

The camera shifts back to command a full view of the factory. In a station like a steel cage in the center of the ceiling (not particularly visible in Scene 1) sits a foreman, leaning out over the edge in all directions to shout his orders. The camera slowly moving takes in one of the barrel-machines almost under the foreman's cage. The workman in charge stops for a minute to scratch his head. The machine continues working. Instantly the foreman leans out over the side of his cage—

SCENE 3. Close-up of the foreman's megaphone. The camera shifts back with maximum rapidity to the workman, who jerks his hand from his head and gets to work at feverish speed. To the right, through one of the open doorways, comes a line of ten or fifteen workmen in wide trousers and short blacksmiths' aprons. A barrel shoots over them and rolls them all out flat.

SCENE 4. Close-up of the rolled-out workmen. They have no thickness; they lie flat like pancakes.

SCENE 5. Close-up of the foreman's megaphone.

Caption: "ARE YOU DOWNHEARTED?"

SCENE 6. Close-up of the pancaked workmen. They leap to their feet and shout up to the foreman:

Caption: "NO!"

SCENE 7. Approximately the same as Scene 1. The camera slowly turns to take in a full sweep of the factory, then it slowly rises. The tops of the machines appear, the foreman, the tops of the pillars, a slice of the floor above comes into view, as the factory floor goes down out of sight. The floor above is a wilderness of bookkeepers, each seated on a tall four-legged stool, each at a slanting table, at work on a huge ledger.

SCENE 8. Close-up of a page of a ledger, with a bookkeeper's hand writing on it. Headed: THE LOONY CONSOLIDATED GAS COMPANY. SALES. The camera shifts around to take in his face. Still writing, his mouth opens in a slow and capacious yawn. The camera comes closer, so that the yawn occupies the entire picture.

SCENE 9. Same as Scene 7. The bookkeepers' floor. The camera slowly rises through this floor, takes in a wilderness of green-shaded lamps hanging on cords from the ceiling, a section of the floor above, the floor above, stops. The floor above is filled in all directions with stenographers, each with a typewriter at a little typewriter table, each with a pencil and shorthand notebook beside her, each chewing gum, each with bobbed hair. The camera stops for a moment or two. There is no individual action to the typists, except that every once in a while one or another of them leans over to puzzle out a word, and scratches with the point of her pencil in her hair. The camera moves slowly up through this floor to the floor above. Here are mechanical draftsmen, at flat pine drawing tables, with large T-squares and sheets of paper. The camera moves up. On the floor above are P. B. X. telephone operators, each with a little ear-phone on her head. Above this are men and women clerks at office-desks. Above this office partitions with Private on the doors and office boys in the corridors. The camera's flight upwards becomes a dizzy rush. Floor after floor passes, each occupied, but finally so fast they can not be seen. The camera halts at the directors' room.

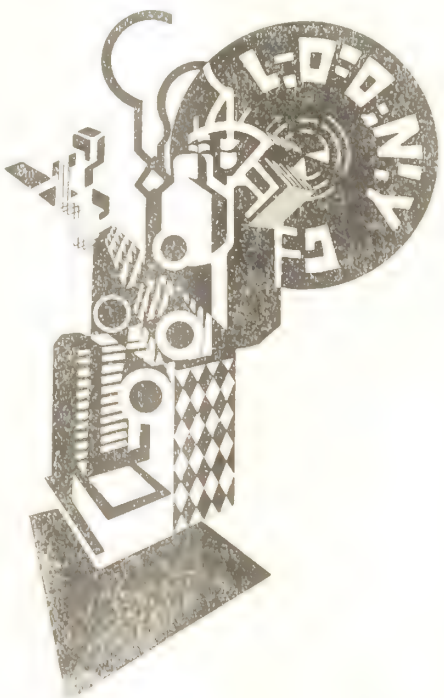
The directors' room is the only one of these rooms that does not extend indefinitely in all directions. An enormous oval mahogany table fills the center. A large picture of Calvin Coolidge adorns the rear wall. There is a mahogany ticker in the corner, and a tall basket for ticker-tape. Fifteen directors, all uniformly plump, portly, well-shaved, and rubicund, are standing or sitting around in various postures. One is reading the ticker-tape. One is standing with his hands behind his back admiring the portrait of President Coolidge. Most of them are sitting with their feet on the table, reading business letters, reports, or the financial page of the paper.

The camera slowly rises. This is the top of the building. There is a conical roof. On top is a flagstaff, and a whistle. This is very high up—nothing can be seen but gulls, and the tops of other buildings.

SCENE 10. Close-up. The whistle blows, with a jet of white steam. Instantly the camera sinks down. The directors take their feet off the table with a bang. On the floor below office managers put off their black silk coats and put on their street coats. On the floor below clerks close their desks. The camera sinks with a rush. The office boys, the telephone operators, the clerks are all going home. The camera stops at Scene 8. The yawn is still going. The bookkeeper closes his mouth with a snap—all the bookkeepers get up and close their ledgers.

SCENE 11. The factory on the floor below. The machines go more and more slowly, and gradually stop. The workmen wipe their hands with waste. They get down their coats, and file out of the factory.

SCENE 12. The outside of the building. An imposing white stone skyscraper, which goes indefinitely up. In the left foreground are the factory doors, out of which come the workmen. In the center, rear, is the office entrance. Above the entrance is LOONY CONSOLIDATED GAS COMPANY in raised stone letters. The directors file sleekly out of the office entrance. The workmen, bunched in the left foreground, snatch off hats and caps and stand in attitudes of deepest respect. Fifteen landaulets, each with the back open, each with a highly dressed director's wife in the rear seat, pull up at the curb one after another with absurd rapidity, and take away the directors.



SCENE 13. We follow a file of workmen through the streets. Empty factory buildings slide by, each square, made of stone, unlighted. The workmen come to a tenement house. This is made of concrete, in perfectly plain rectangular lines. It is merely a nest of square cells. The workmen file in through a square doorway.

SCENE 14. The model tenement house, with the front removed. Nightfall. An indefinite number of small square rooms, up, down, in all directions, each whitewashed, with one light lit, each containing a man, a woman, and two children. On the right-hand wall of each room is a large white enameled wash-tub, instead of a sink, with a cold water tap over it. To the left-center, rear, is an unpainted kitchen table. There are four chairs, and a long framed motto toward the center of each rear wall. Each room is seen from a semi-diagonal position, extending back toward the left rear. At least twenty or thirty can be seen in the picture. As the scene opens, each woman (but not in rhythm) is setting the table. She fills four glasses with water from the tap, and cuts four slices of bread from a loaf on the table. During the scene all the men come in, the ones on the lower floors and toward the center first.

SCENE 15. Close-up of a room. The framed motto is seen to be WE LOVE OUR DIRECTORS. A man, a thin woman, and two thin children sit down at the table, and start drinking their water and eating their bread.

Sub-Title: BUT IN THE MEANTIME—

SCENE 16. Dusk but not dark. A tall, somewhat thin, plain front office-building in another part of the city. Two large moving vans drive rapidly up. Out of each moving van jump pairs of energetic men, seize plain oak office-desks, and carry them upside down into the building. Each man is well-shaven, about forty, with high cheek-bones and spare cheeks, dressed neatly but very plainly in a pepper-and-salt gray suit. Most of them wear close-cropped mustaches. Four desks go into the building, two men to each desk.

SCENE 17. Same as Scene 15. The room in the model tenement, but from a different angle. The table can still be seen, but not the wash-tub. Against the left-hand wall is a narrow bed with the two children asleep. Against the rear wall is another bed, the man and woman on their knees before it, saying their prayers. They are each in long white nightgowns. That of the woman covers her entirely—the man's feet stick out of his toward the audience. A fly lights on one foot, and without moving otherwise he twitches one great toe. IRIS-OUT on the fly.

SCENE 18. Same as Scene 16. Other three desks go up. The fifteenth man carries a large plain-framed picture under his arm.

SCENE 19. Close-up of the picture. It is seen to be a photograph of these fifteen men, with a brass label: CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE BOL(sh—!)EVIK PARTY.

SCENE 20. Close-up of the label. The camera slowly spells it out. At (sh—!) is a double exposure—a pair of lips and a finger over them, seen faint.

SCENE 21. Same as Scene 18. The second van pulls up to the curb. Office boys pile out, each in blue serge trousers, vests, and shirt-sleeves, each carrying a very large wooden box full of paper, typewriters, writing materials, etc., which can be seen sticking up from the open top. The office boys disappear into the building.

SCENE 22. The tenement house, same view as Scene 14, but without the front wall removed. In each direction stretch the lighted windows of the tenements. It is dark, and men and women in night-clothes can be seen moving through the windows. One after another the lights wink out and the building darkens. The camera moves very rapidly through the dark streets, unlighted buildings rushing by, and halts in front of a row of imposing residences. These are ablaze with lights, which go out one after another as the scene continues. An automobile drives rapidly up to one of them, and deposits a director and his wife in evening clothes. The last lights gradually go out and leave the row in darkness. The camera rushes rapidly through unlighted streets, and halts before the office-building of Scene 16. The camera moves up past unlighted windows, and stops opposite a floor high up on the building. Lights flash on, a window is thrown up, and a man leans out and busily commences to nail up a huge lighted electric sign reading:

CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE BOLSHEVIK PARTY

Part II

Sub-Title: THE GREAT GAS STRIKE

SCENE 23. Same as Scene 1. The factory in full blast. Workmen working, barrels rolling. Through the open door in the right foreground comes flying a folded newspaper. It lands at the feet of the nearest workman. The camera moves closer. The workman pays no attention, but continues stooping and rising in rhythm with his machine. After a space of time so long that he seems not to have noticed it, the workman gradually twists his head around so that he can keep one eye on the foreman, and without looking at the newspaper, opens it in successive dabs as he continues tending his machine.

SCENE 24. Close-up. The paper unfolding, and the workman's hand coming in and out of the picture as he dabs at it. The paper gets completely unfolded, and the hand no longer appears. It lies open on the floor, front page showing, name of the journal, THE BOLSHEVIK, and across the top a big headline: WHY DO YOU DO IT? After a few moments the workman's head appears, bending toward the paper with each stoop as he tends the machine. His face registers amazement and avid interest, and each successive stoop brings him nearer and nearer the headline until he almost touches it with his nose. The camera slowly backs away, and as it does so the workman slowly twists his head to get a view of the foreman instead of the paper.

An oiler carrying a small oil can with a very long nose comes up to this machine and starts oiling it. The oiler stands with his back to the first workman, but only a foot or so away. The first workman cups his mouth with his left hand and shouts into the oiler's ear each time he straightens up, but there is too much noise for the oiler to notice.

SCENE 25. Close-up. The oiler's face—left side—stolid, intent on his business. The first workman's head comes and goes, still fruitlessly trying to attract the oiler's attention. Finally on one downward stoop he butts the oiler between the shoulders. The oiler's face instantly turns around, much startled; he sees the first workman's pointing finger, and notices the paper on the floor. The camera follows his head down. Twisting like a contortionist, he continues oiling while he brings his face to within a few inches of the floor. The paper and its headlines again comes into view, this time with the oiler looking at it, registering the same avid interest. The camera shifts upward to take in the rest of the factory. Similar papers come flying in through other open doors. The workmen, without stopping work, try to open them in every conceivable way—with their hands, their feet. The rain of folded papers becomes a deluge. They fill the air. The foreman stands up in his platform, shouting, gesticulating. The men are out of hand—they keep the machines running, but openly devour the papers. The papers without piling up on the floor fill the air so thickly that the scene is blotted out in whiteness.

SCENE 26. Bolshevik headquarters. A square room high up in an office-building, large enough to hold some fifteen desks. The desks are placed irregularly about, but all either parallel or at right angles. Each is a plain, flat-top, oak office-desk, with three drawers down each side and short legs beneath. The walls of the room are lined solid with stacks of newspapers; no windows can be seen, and only one door. At each desk sits a member of the Central Executive Committee, actively pounding a typewriter. Office boys are continually passing and repassing in the space between the desks; each boy carries on his arms a two-foot stack of folded newspapers. They enter by the door on the right and walk out through the left front of the picture, boys with their arms loaded continually passing both ways in every space between the desks.

SCENE 27. Outside the headquarters—same building as Scene 16. Moving van after moving van backs up to the curb, is filled with newspapers, and drives off at incredible speed.

SCENE 28. The factory, same as Scene 25. Order has been restored. Boys with long-handled brushes, like street-cleaners' brushes, are everywhere brushing up the floor. They have brushed the papers into a long line toward the right. Occasionally a single paper flies in, but it is instantly swept up with the rest. Through a door, as in Scene 3, but not the same door, comes a line of workmen, almost but not precisely as in Scene 3. A barrel rolls over them and rolls them out flat.

SCENE 29. Close-up of the foreman's megaphone. He leans and shouts, as in Scene 5:

Caption: "ARE YOU DOWNHEARTED?"

SCENE 30. Close-up of the rolled-out workmen. They get up and consult.

Caption: "WELL . . .

SCENE 31. Same as Scene 30. The workmen still consulting. They turn and shout to the foreman:

Caption: "NOT JUST YET!"

SCENE 32. Inside the foreman's cage, built like a train dispatcher's box. It is made chiefly of steel slats, like a fire-escape, but is solid enough to hold a chair, and in front of the foreman (to the right rear of the set) a telephone and a shelf. At his left, right, and in back, the sides of the cage go up only waist-high. He leans out an ugly mug first in one direction, then in another, shaking his head and scowling. On the shelf in front of him is a cuckoo clock, old fashioned, the only thing in the whole room not modern and machine-made, with a silver plate TO JOHN, FROM THE BOYS. The camera shifts so as to concentrate on the clock. In the immediate background is a large sign, LOONY GAS. The cuckoo comes out of the clock. The camera shifts slowly so as to include the foreman as well as the clock. The cuckoo comes out again. The foreman nods slightly, counting. The cuckoo comes out twelve times—it is twelve o'clock. The foreman pulls a rope in the left rear.

SCENE 33. Close-up of the hand pulling the rope. The camera follows the rope up—the successive floors rush by so fast they can scarcely be seen, to the top of the building. The rope is attached to the whistle. The whistle opens—a jet of white steam comes out.

SCENE 34. Bird's-eye view of the top of the city. Millions of similar roofs and whistles and flagstaffs like this one, with the whistles all blowing.

SCENE 35. Same as Scene 33. The camera follows the rope down—the floors rush by in an indistinguishable blur, but slow up as the lower ones are reached. The stenographers have all closed their notebooks. Each one takes out a little square pasteboard lunchbox. The bookkeepers get up from their stools and stretch. On the factory floor the machines slow down and stop, the barrels also stopping, some of them halfway across the floor; the workmen get out tin lunch pails. They eat standing or sitting irregularly about—newsboys come into the building. Several of the workmen buy papers.

SCENE 36. Close-up of three workmen standing reading a paper over each other's shoulders. As they face toward the audience, the picture shows the back of the paper. On the back is a half-page ad: LOONY GAS IS GOOD GAS. While they are reading, a smaller newspaper, doubled, slowly, very slowly, slides out from between the pages of the larger sheet. The workmen pay no attention—they apparently have not noticed. As more and more of the smaller sheet appears, it is seen to be a copy of the BOLSHEVIK. It slides out folded edge down. When it has almost slid free, the workman on the left of the picture, still without giving it any apparent attention, slowly lifts his right foot, hooks it into the fold of the paper, brings the paper up and around and secures it behind his back.

After a moment the camera follows the paper around. View of the men's backs, of the larger paper over their shoulders. The man holding the BOLSHEVIK slowly slips it into his other hand, brings it forward, and suddenly inserts it over the other paper.

SCENE 37. Close-up of the three faces, half-front, reading the capitalist paper. Two of them registering extreme apathy, the third extreme concentration. As the BOLSHEVIK is inserted, the two apathetic faces jerk with surprise, mouths shut—they snap into registering avid interest. The camera shifts slightly so as to take in the headlines of the BOLSHEVIK. Headline:

STRIKE!

WHILE THE IRON IS HOT

SCENE 38. A long line of similar groups of threes stretching indefinitely back to the left rear, each standing in front of their machines, each similarly absorbed in a small paper held inside a big one. Suddenly one of the workmen breaks ranks, he starts waving his arms about, he turns to face the line, he is evidently making a speech. The camera comes closer. The line coagulates to form a mob. They urge him up on one of the barrels. He climbs on one of the barrels, not up-ending it, still leaving it on its side.

SCENE 39. Close-up of the workman talking and gesticulating.

SCENE 40. Same as Scene 32. Inside of the foreman's cage. The foreman comes back into it from lunch. He shakes his fist toward the mob.

SCENE 41. View of the mob from the foreman's cage. Wild excitement. The mob is massed on one side of the speaker only, between him and the machines.

SCENE 42. Same as Scene 40. The foreman pulls the rope for the whistle.

SCENE 43. Same as Scene 33. The camera follows the rope in a blur of speed to the top of the building. The steam comes out of the whistle. It blows.

SCENE 44. The factory floor. The machines commence to move. The barrels that had stopped for lunch halfway across the floor commence to roll.

SCENE 45. The speaker speaking to the mob. The barrel on which he stands commences to roll along with the other barrels. He keeps his balance on it, treading it. The barrel rolls faster. The speaker gesticulates faster. The mob follows him up, keeping step. The speaker slips off, and they all rush toward the door.

Suddenly they all stop.

SCENE 46. Close-up. A policeman's STOP—GO traffic sign, the round disk swinging to STOP.

SCENE 47. The traffic sign, full view. Beside it, just in front of the doorway, stands a young man giving an illustrated magic-lantern lecture, a black slouch hat under his elbow, a gavel in his hand. He wears a clerical collar. With his left hand he indicates the magic-lantern screen, a great white screen above him on the wall of the factory. As he indicates it, flashes on—

SCENE 48. Still. A garland of branches, like a sugary picture post card. In the midst two doves with ribbons around their necks, the one CAPITAL, the other LABOR, and beneath a legend:

BIRDS IN THEIR LITTLE NESTS AGREE

SCENE 49. The mob. They stand gaping open-mouthed.

SCENE 50. Same as Scene 48. The birds in their little nest agreeing. FADE OUT AND BACK TO SCENE 51. Same as Scene 47. The young man speaking as before. He concludes, makes a sweeping bow, takes up the traffic sign, tucks it under his arm, and exits out the door.

SCENE 52. The mob. They turn their individual and collective backs and troop back to work.

SCENE 53. Same as Scene 1. The factory in perfect order. The machines all going, the workmen working. This routine continues for some minutes. Presently along the floor in the foreground, from the direction of a door, comes a peculiar worm-like caterpillar, dragging its thread behind it. It approaches the leg of the nearest workman.

Sub-Title: THE TURNING WORM

SCENE 54. Close-up of the caterpillar, a perfectly real caterpillar. As it moves it lifts and waves its forepart, and occasionally it twists clean over, so that its body rotates as it goes forward like a screw. It comes to the workman's foot. It reaches up and jerks at the bottom of his trousers. No result. It jerks again.

SCENE 55. View of the workman working. He has not noticed the worm.

SCENE 56. Same as Scene 54. The worm jerks again.

SCENE 57. The workman notices, looks down, sees the worm. The camera follows his head down. The worm gives him some information. The workman listens—nods his head. He reaches for the cocoon thread the worm has been dragging, and commences to haul it in.

SCENE 58. The workman hauling it in. The thread is gathered in a great pile at his feet. He still hauls it in. Presently, sliding along the floor attached to the end of the thread comes a copy of the BOLSHEVIK. The workman picks it up.

SCENE 59. Close-up of the BOLSHEVIK. Headline:

THE WORM HAS TURNED!

SCENE 60. Instantly the entire line of workmen is seen, each with a similar tangle of piled thread beside him, each waving a similar paper in his hand, but the headline is STRIKE! Pandemonium. Some of the workmen rush from the factory.

SCENE 61. A workman rushing from the factory. The camera follows him out. He is yelling and waving the BOLSHEVIK. He goes through one of the doors. A captain of the army stands facing him. The captain makes a gesture with his hand, half like a magician's gesture, half like a military command. The paper is wafted out of the workman's hand, and disappears out of the picture to the upper right. The workman stands frozen in his final position. The captain makes another gesture and command. The workman comes to attention. The captain makes another gesture. The workman salutes and is dressed in olive drab. The captain makes a fourth gesture. The workman executes an about face. He has a gun with fixed bayonet. He stands on guard facing the door.

SCENE 62. An indefinite row of captains, each with a similar soldier in front of him, stretching to the left rear.

SCENE 63. Same as Scene 61. The next workman comes flying out the door. The soldier mechanically bayonets him, and deposits his body face downward on the floor. Another workman comes flying out. The soldier bayonets him, and deposits him on top of the first. The workmen come flying out faster and faster, the wall of bodies reaches to the soldier's head. He starts a new similarly neat wall in front of him. The wall rises on two sides of him, and shuts him out of sight. The workmen keep coming. The wall of already bayoneted bodies commences to roll stiffly in, and the soldier is overwhelmed.

SCENE 64. A space in front of the factory. Nothing can be seen but a limitless mob of tearing men, indefinitely rushing to the right out of the picture.

SCENE 65. A street scene, at the crossing of several streets. A solid churning crowd of men and women, filling the street in all directions, from the edge of one building to the next. Placards tossing about over the heads of the crowd, each a small square placard held up on a small pole, with the single word STRIKE.

SCENE 66. Another view of the same crowd. The crowd is turbulent, but with a kind of mechanical good humor. Almost every face wears the same kind of grin. Newsboys come pushing their way through the crowd. People buy newspapers.

SCENE 67. Close-up of three men standing reading a paper. The picture shows the back of the paper, with a large full-page ad: LOONY GAS IS KIND GAS.

SCENE 68. The front of the same paper. THE DAILY BULL. Headline: THE FACTORIES ARE WORKING FULL TIME.

SCENE 69. Close-up of a machine in the factory. A very large black spider very deliberately commences to spin a web connecting the arm of the machine with the floor.

SCENE 70. Another view of the street. A moving van backs up to the curb, and is unloaded of pile after pile of newspapers. They are flung out over the heads of the crowd.

SCENE 71. View of the crowd grabbing the papers.

SCENE 72. Close-up of one of the papers in a man's hand. THE BOLSHEVIK. TENTH EDITION. Headline: STRIKE!

SCENE 73. Another. THE BOLSHEVIK. TWELFTH EDITION. Headline: NO COMPROMISE!

SCENE 74. Another. THE BOLSHEVIK. FIFTEENTH EDITION. Headline: CHEERS!

SCENE 75. Bolshevik headquarters. Same as Scene 26, but indescribably busy.

SCENE 76. The street again. The crowd scatters in all directions. A small tank is charging down the street, guns bristling out on all sides of it, charging the crowd, but not firing. The tank comes head-on through the picture.

SCENE 77. Another street scene with another tank.

SCENE 78. A third street scene with another.

SCENE 79. Bolshevik headquarters. Men frenziedly pounding the typewriters.

SCENE 80. Head-on view of the first tank. It is an ordinary rapidly moving caterpillar tank, but on each side, at the top-front, it has a huge round glass eye, like the compound eyes of an insect, or one of H. G. Wells's creations. The crowd is still in act of dividing in front of it, rushing to the right and left, each with one arm upraised, but individual workmen, each with the other arm upraised, and a copy of the BOLSHEVIK in it, are detaching themselves from the crowd and rushing in front of the tank.

SCENE 81. Close-up of one of the glass eyes. It looks something like an automobile lamp.

SCENE 82. Close-up of the BOLSHEVIK seen through the glass eye. It is a round view, through thick glass. Headline: STRIKE!

SCENE 83. Continued from Scene 80. The tank, and a workman thrusting the copy of the BOLSHEVIK in front of it. Instantly, and mechanically, like a broken jack-in-the-box, six soldiers, with their arms at their sides, pop up through as many doors in the top of the tank, three on each side, slanting outwards, and remain sticking three-quarters of the way up out of the tank. The tank stops. The soldiers are motionless. They fold their arms.

SCENES 84 to 89. Flashes of six street scenes one after another, each with tanks similarly on strike.

SCENE 90. Same as Scene 83. The soldiers still popped up rigid out of the first tank. The people on the street are joining hands, men and women, in an immense ring-around-the-rosy around the tank. They dance clockwise around the tank. Each man holds in his right hand the right hand of the woman in front of him, the men are all facing forward and out, the women forward and in. In the midst of the dance one of the soldiers unfolds his arms and taps the hip of the soldier in front of him. He gets no response. He taps again. No response. Gradually he extracts a large plug of chewing tobacco out of this soldier's back pants' pocket.

SCENE 91. Close-up of an enormous cheek, being distended, well satisfied, with an enormous plug. FADE-OUT.

Part III

Sub-Title: A STITCH IN TIME

SCENE 92. Same as Scene 9. The directors' room. The directors all registering deep dejection, some of them slumped in their chairs, the others pacing up and down with their hands behind their backs. Above the picture of President Coolidge is a small draped American flag.

SCENE 93. The camera drops down through the floor. The floor below, except for its scattered pieces of office furniture, is absolutely empty. The camera drops down to the floor below. This is also empty. The camera goes down through empty floor after floor with not a single sign of life, except that after six or eight floors there is one old scrub-woman very slowly mopping up. The camera goes slowly through eight or ten more floors and comes to the factory floor. An ample spider-web covers the whole of the nearest machine.

SCENE 94. Close-up of the web. Same as Scene 69. The same large black spider can be seen industriously spinning. The camera shifts a little. A female spider appears, slightly less large, surrounded by a whole host of baby spiders. The camera starts up again. It goes through empty floor after floor and comes to the old scrub-woman. Her mop is idle in her pail, her back is turned, her arms are folded, and on her back is pinned a large crudely printed sheet of paper:

ON STriKE

The camera starts up another floor and fades out.

SCENE 95. The directors' room, same as Scene 92.

SCENE 96. Close-up of the inside of the door of the directors' room. It is a large plain mahogany door, with a polished brass knob.

SCENE 97. Close-up of the upper part of the door, a fly settled on it. The door vibrates slightly, the fly being thrown off. It settles back. The door vibrates again. The fly settles back. The door vibrates a third time.

SCENE 98. The directors' room, same as Scene 95. The directors from where they stand or sit each turn toward the door, and their lips can be read saying "Come in." Enter a young man, the lecturer of Scene 47.

SCENE 99. Close-up of the young man. He walks to the table, shakes hands with the directors, raps for order with his gavel, and gesticulating suavely, commences to make a speech. FADE OUT AND INTO

SCENE 100. His speech. A rolling cloud of mist, in a frame like a Doré illustration. In the lower right-hand corner are the Bolsheviks, being driven down and out by a devil with a trident, horns, cloven hoof, and forked tail. The young man soars in on large white wings, his gavel in one hand and a glass of water in the other, ascends a rostrum and dispenses even-handed justice.

IRA NOYES HALL

SCENE 101. Close-up. The young man, still in his wings, dispensing even-handed justice. Below at his left (the right of the picture) fades in one of the Bolsheviks—at his right fades in one of the directors—each with open imploring arms. The young man holds an enormous Kewpie doll. Judicially he considers, extending it toward each in turn. He places the doll on his stand, cuts it vertically in halves with a bread knife, weighs the halves on a small balance, and hands down one to each. FADE OUT AND BACK TO

SCENE 102. The directors' room. Same as before. In an apparently continuous motion with the action at end of previous scene, also of Scene 99, the young man pours himself a glass of water and goes on with his speech. The directors applaud. The young man acknowledges with a graceful wave of the hand. FADE OUT AND BACK TO SCENE 103. Same as Scene 101. Continuation of the speech. Upside down on his reading-stand the young man lays his hat. He displays it—there is no fraud. Out of the hat he extracts an enormous hour-glass. He presses down on the top of the hour-glass. It collapses as though made of rubber—it becomes short and squat. He hands it down to the Bolshevik on his left.

SCENE 104. Close-up of the hour-glass. It is labeled SHORTER HOURS.

SCENE 105. Flash of the directors. Gravely they nod.

SCENE 106. Same as Scene 103. Continuation of the speech. Out of his hat the young man takes a silver dollar. He places the dollar on his stand. He covers it with his hand, raises his hand, and a column of dollars rises, mounting upward under his palm. The young man takes the column of dollars by the middle (it sticks together as though glued) and hands it down to the Bolshevik on his left.

SCENE 107. Close-up of the column of dollars. It is labeled HIGHER WAGES.

SCENE 108. Flash of the directors. They consult and nod again.

SCENE 109. Same as Scene 106. Continuation of the speech. Out of his hat the young man takes a money-bag—a typical round canvas money-bag, with a dollar-sign on the front. He places it on the stand. On each side of the bag he lays a hand. The bag commences to burgeon—it trebles its former size. The young man hands it down to the director on his right.

SCENE 110. Close-up of the money-bag. It is labeled BIGGER PROFITS.

SCENE 111. Flash of the directors. They are in wild applause.

SCENE 112. Out of his hat the young man takes a wreath.

SCENE 113. Close-up of the wreath. It has a valve like a bicycle tire. It is labeled BROTHERLY LOVE.

SCENE 114. The young man puts his mouth to the valve of the wreath, and blows. The wreath becomes enormous—in extent, but not in thickness. The young man beckons. The director and the Bolshevik float closer. The young man casts the wreath around their necks.

SCENE 115. Same as Scene 111. The table, with the directors in prolonged and vigorous applause. FADE OUT AND BACK TO SCENE 116. Same as Scene 114. Conclusion of the speech. The young man claps the hat on his head. It becomes a blinding halo. The stand, the Bolshevik, and the halo fade out, the directors fade in, and the scene becomes a continuation of Scene 102, with the young man talking to the directors. He concludes his speech (the directors applaud), he hands out printed slips.

SCENE 117. Close-up of one of the slips, with a director's hand signing his name. The slip reads:

I WILL BE GOOD

the name signed—

J. P. MORGANFELLER

SCENE 118. Same as Scene 116. The directors' table, with each of the directors signing. The young man collects the pledges, shakes hands all around, and exits out the door. As soon as he has gone, one director leans over, puts his finger on his lips, and whispers to the others. Each director turns, reaches over to his right, and picks up a telephone.

SCENE 119. A fan of fifteen telephone wires stretching out from a large glass insulator on top of the skyscraper. The camera slides along the wires, which are twisted cord, and as it does so printed words jump in and out, but nothing intelligible: YOU and SEE THAT and ALL RIGHT and WITHOUT FAIL.

SCENE 120. A long narrow police station. Fifteen desk sergeants, at fifteen desks, nod and hang up their phones.

SCENE 121. Outside the police station, a building of gray stone. Through the open arched door head-on into the picture bursts a police-patrol auto, full of armed policemen, with policemen clinging solidly to the outside. The instant it has emerged, comes another precisely similar, and another, and another.

SCENE 122. The directors' room, same as Scene 118. Close-up to the window, with a director with opera-glasses looking out.

SCENE 123. View through the opera-glasses. Two round circles, through which appears:—the young man addressing the mob of strikers from the tail-end of a truck. A white cloth banner runs along the top of the truck:

COMMITTEE FOR PEACE AND GOOD-WILL

SCENE 124. Close-up of the young man. He is seen to be handing out all-day suckers to the mob.

SCENE 125. Close-up of his feet. He stands on a soap-box. It is labeled:

SOFT SOAP

SCENE 126. Close-up of one of his hands. It holds forth a director's pledge-slip.

SCENE 127. Close-up of the pledge-slip:

I WILL BE GOOD

J. P. MORGANFELLER

SCENE 128. View of several members of the mob. They turn toward each other and consult.

SCENE 129. Close-up of two members of the mob consulting. One of them is deaf and dumb. The second shouts at him—the first man can not hear. The second shouts again—the first man can not hear. In desperation the second tries the deaf and dumb sign-alphabet. The first man rapidly nods. They both point and gesticulate toward the front.

SCENE 130. Same as Scene 127. Close-up of the pledge-slip:

I WILL BE GOOD

J. P. MORGANFELLER

SCENE 131. Same as Scene 129. Close-up of the two men. They are still nodding and gesticulating.

SCENE 132. Same as Scene 128. Several members of the mob. They are all nodding and approving.

SCENE 133. General view of the mob. They line up—count off—squads right, and march off after the truck.

SCENE 134. Bird's-eye view of the mob. It is in column of eights. It marches after the truck.

SCENE 135. Close-up of an all-day sucker. IRIS DOWN AND OUT.

Sub-Title: THE COLD GRAY DAWN OF THE MORNING AFTER

SCENE 136. The street, same as Scene 134, only empty. Empty pop bottles and STRIKE banners are littered around.

SCENE 137. Same as Scene 121. Outside of the police station. Patrol autos still coming out.

SCENE 138. Roofs in the factory district just before sunrise. A forest of flag-poles with flags. Each flag is of solid color (red). Suddenly up each pole goes a policeman shinning. They all go up together. They reach the tops. They take down the red flags.

Insert: CAME DAWNING

Sunlight appears behind the roofs—the sun rises very rapidly about fifteen degrees, and stops.

SCENE 139. A street corner. Up from the left at an immense rate of speed comes a patrol-wagon, turns, and sweeps off to the right. The instant it has passed comes another, and another, and another.

SCENE 140. Bolshevik headquarters, same as Scene 79.

SCENE 141. Same as Scene 16. Street in front of Bolshevik headquarters. The patrol-wagons drive head-on through the picture, and stop. The policemen leap out.

SCENE 142. Same as Scene 140. Bolshevik headquarters. Through a door at the right front come the patrolmen. They pour into the room. They fill it full. Policemen with drawn revolvers stand solidly against all the walls. Four grab each Bolshevik. One cop holds each hand, one each leg, and they carry the men face downward through the door and down the stairs.

SCENE 143. The stairs. A concrete office-building stairs, going indefinitely up and down; a yellow oak railing and uprights of square green bronze. The stairs is in somewhat dim light, lit on the stairs (not at the landing) by one small square window for each floor. Winding down the stairs come the prisoners, each stretched like a frog between four policemen. The scene holds until the last office boy has been carried down.

SCENE 144. Outside on the pavement. An endless rank of patrol-wagons backed against the curb. The Bolsheviks are brought out, stood on their feet, and placed back to back in rectangular formation, two wide and eight deep. Two cops commence baling them up like a bale of cotton—winding a stout hemp rope around all of them as a unit: neck, chest, arms, thighs, and feet. They are loaded as a solid block into one of the patrol-wagons, which immediately drives off. The office boys are similarly brought down, baled, and loaded. One office boy gets one arm out, which he holds straight up and waves around.

SCENE 145. The patrol-wagons going back through the streets. Eight or ten wagons of armed patrolmen—the patrolmen leaning out and pointing revolvers out like a hedge in all directions. Then two patrol-wagons with the two bales of prisoners, policemen with drawn revolvers glaring desperately around hanging on the outside. Then more wagons of policemen glaring desperately around.

SCENE 146. The directors' room. Same as Scene 98. Into the room from the right comes a uniformed office boy, in tight-buttoned blue A. D. T. blouse with large brass buttons. He carries a stack of newspapers on his arms.

SCENE 147. Close-up of the office boy walking forward with his papers. The camera mounts up over the papers and looks down on them from above. Headline:

STRIKE CLOUDS WANE

SCENE 148. Same as Scene 134. Bird's-eye view of the marching column. The Loony Consolidated Gas Company has been reached. The truck containing the young man drives through the door. In endless files the workers follow it in.

SCENE 149. Same as Scene 146. The directors' room, the directors reading their papers. The door opens. Enter the young man.

SCENE 150. Close-up of the young man walking forward toward the table. A hand appears in the picture. It takes the young man by the ear, and turns him around the other way. A foot appears in the picture. It hits the young man in the seat of the pants and hoists him into the air.

SCENE 151. An open window. Top floor of the Loony Consolidated Gas building, seen from the outside. The young man, feet and arms out, comes flying through the window, and through the picture. Instantly window, stonework, the whole side of the building whizz up. A panorama of the side of the building unrolls up. Heads are stuck out of windows and disappear—birds shoot upward, looking curiously down.

SCENE 152. The same. Background as above, but farther out. The young man is seen, falling through the air, wriggling like a spider. He cups his mouth with his hands, and shouts at a head in a window.

SCENE 153. Close-up of the head in the window, cupping ears, listening.

Caption: "ALL RIGHT SO FAR!"

SCENE 154. Same as Scene 151. Panorama of the building.

SCENE 155. The directors' room, same as Scene 149. The directors still reading their papers.

SCENE 156. Close-up of the back of a paper. Full-page ad:

LOONY GAS IS SUCCESSFUL GAS

SCENE 157. Panorama of the passing building.

SCENE 158. The column of marching men. Bird's-eye view from quite high. It is still marching into the building. Its end has not appeared.

SCENE 159. Panorama of the passing building.

SCENE 160. Same as Scene 148. The street. Entrance to the Loony Consolidated Gas Company building. The column still marching in. Its tail appears, and the last ranks march steadily into the building. The last worker disappears.

SCENE 161. Closer up to the entrance. An aged white-wing, with brush and round barrel cart, is picking up the cigarette butts. Down through the center of the picture in an indistinguishable rush shoots the young man. He hits the pavement and flattens out into a large blot. The pavement tips up for a moment to display the blot. It is a super-size, conventionalized ink blot. The aged white-wing, going about his business, finally gets to the blot, dusts it up, and puts it in his cart.

SCENE 162. Close-up of the barrel cart. IRIS DOWN AND OUT.

Part IV

Sub-Title: THE HAPPY ENDING

SCENE 163. Same as Scene 1. The factory in full blast, only if possible more noisy and frenzied. To the right, through one of the open doorways, comes a line of ten or fifteen men in wide trousers and short blacksmiths' aprons. A barrel shoots over them and rolls them all out flat.

Through the door comes flying a folded paper.

France's Dangerous Adventure

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, August 8

THERE has been a change for the worse in the Moroccan policy of the French Government since the rising of Parliament. In the first place they have yielded to Nationalist clamor and begun legal proceedings against some Communists, including a Deputy, M. Doriot, for inciting soldiers to disobedience in An Appeal to Sailors and Soldiers issued by them. There is little doubt that the persons prosecuted have committed a legal offense, for the appeal called on soldiers to revolt, throw down their arms, and fraternize with the followers of Abd-el-Krim, but it does not follow that the Government is wise in taking such action, especially since the appeal has had no effect and is most unlikely to have any.

Drawing by Frans Masereel in Clarté

To Morocco—

The appeal was chosen as the ground of the prosecution because no other is available. Since France is not technically and legally at war with Abd-el-Krim, there can be no "intelligence with the enemy" or offense of that kind. The prosecution is a silly business, and its effect is likely to be the opposite of that presumably desired by the Government. Opposition to the war is still allowed free expression. Meetings of protest continue to be held, and l'Humanité continues with impunity daily to demand peace with Abd-el-Krim and the evacuation of Morocco.

This is a much less serious matter than the only too evident capitulation of the Government to the generals, who are having it all their own way. The generals declare that French "prestige" requires that Abd-el-Krim should be crushed before peace is made, and there is too much reason to believe that the Government has now accepted that view. The terms of peace offered by France and Spain to Abd-el-Krim are very different from what they were semi-officially represented as being. Indeed the press and the public have been deceived in this matter. We were told that autonomy was to be granted to the Riff, but it now appears that the "autonomy" is accompanied by the conditions that the civil officials are to be Spaniards and the local police force is to be staffed by French officers! There are other humiliating conditions, such as the entry of French and Spanish troops into the Riffian capital as a sign of Abd-el-Krim's submission. It is not surprising that the French and Spanish governments have refused to make their terms public. Had they been known before Parliament rose, the attitude of the Socialists and a great part of the Radicals would have been very different. It was on the strength of M. Painlevé's declaration that the Riff was to be granted autonomy that the Socialists abstained from voting against the Moroccan credits. Now the Socialists—a little late—have, in conjunction with the Spanish Socialists and the British Labor Party, come out for complete independence for the Riff.

It is impossible that the French and Spanish governments could have supposed for a moment that Abd-el-Krim would accept the terms offered him, and it is, therefore, difficult to avoid the conclusion that they do not sincerely want peace. I am inclined to think that the policy of the Government has changed. M. Painlevé undoubtedly at first desired to end this business as soon as possible, but I fear that he has been got hold of by the generals, who have much more to do with the disastrous policy now being adopted than bankers or capitalists. Military ascendancy is always the danger in France. It is most unfortunate that the Prime Minister is also Minister of War. Moreover, the Quai d'Orsay, with its usual insistence on juridical technicalities, has declared that it is impossible to negotiate with a "rebel," with whom France is not legally at war. Terms must be imposed on him. Unfortunately neither Spain, which has been beaten by Abd-el-Krim, nor France, which has not yet beaten him, is in a position to impose terms, so this simply means that the war must go on. French lives are to be sacrificed to a technicality. For the sake of "prestige" France is embarked on what may prove a disastrous adventure. M. Painlevé has declared, no doubt on military advice, that it will take two months at most to crush Abd-el-Krim. I cannot forget that on August 1, 1914, the French military authorities said that it would take three months to defeat Germany, even if England remained neutral.

In my opinion the French Government has now put itself entirely in the wrong. If Spain refused to grant independence to the Riff, it was madness to agree not to make peace without Spanish consent. France will now be obliged to go on fighting to maintain the Spanish protectorate. For France will do all the fighting. This is a heavy price to pay for the permission to pursue Abd-el-Krim into the Riff, for which M. Painlevé, by the way, declared in the Chamber of Deputies that the French Government had no intention of asking. There is, however, some reason to believe that Spain is now more ready to negotiate with Abd-el-Krim than is France, for Abd-el-Krim is willing to agree to the annexation by Spain of the Ceuta and Melilla zones, somewhat enlarged, in return for the complete independence of the rest of the Riff territory. Such an arrangement would require the consent of the other signatory powers of the Treaty of Algeciras, but the only one likely to object is England, and English objections might be overcome. The British Government would put itself in a very invidious position if it prevented peace being arrived at.

By an amusing mistake the correspondent of the Matin at Tetuan in a dispatch published in that paper on August 5, have what purported to be the Franco-Spanish peace terms, included in them this proposal about the Ceuta and Melilla zones. Naturally, France and Spain have never thought of such a proposal and the terms published in the Matin were in fact a mixture of some of those proposed by Abd-el-Krim and some of those offered by France and Spain. It is a very clever move on Abd-el-Krim's part to offer this compensation to Spain for the loss of the Spanish protectorate over the Riff and the offer has greatly disconcerted the Quai d'Orsay. Abd-el-Krim has also shown his cleverness and his desire for peace by refusing to receive the Franco-Spanish peace terms officially. He has learned what they are unofficially through two emissaries whom he sent to Tetuan, where they saw General Primo de Rivera, and, since he would be obliged to refuse them, he has avoided an official communication to avert a rupture and leave the door open for negotiations. It is now clear that, if Abd-el-Krim ever had the intention attributed to him by the Communists of trying to drive the French out of Morocco, he has it no longer. He has said categorically that the only condition on which he insists is the independence of the Riff and, if the war continues, it will not be his fault.

For the moment public opinion seems, strangely enough, to be calmer than it was a few weeks ago, when the situation was much less critical. The Radicals seem to have accepted war in Morocco. At any rate the Quotidien, which a few weeks ago was daily demanding peace with Abd-el-Krim, is now silent. The Socialist leaders have contented themselves with a resolution demanding the independence of the Riff and are making no attempt actively to oppose the war. Meanwhile, it is noteworthy that M. Briand seems anxious to evade as far as possible responsibility for the Moroccan policy of the Government. He never speaks about the subject and has left M. Painlevé almost the sole control even of the negotiations with Spain. M. Briand always knows which way the wind is blowing.

The present calm is deceptive. If the great offensive against Abd-el-Krim does not succeed or involves heavy losses, the calm may be suddenly broken. It is a characteristic of the French that they will put up with a lot until a given moment, when they suddenly burst out and smash everything. Even the Echo de Paris, ardently as it advocates war to the bitter end, is constrained to admit that the peasants are quite indifferent to the fate of Morocco and that the country generally is not in a mood to make sacrifices for such a cause. The appeal of the Government for volunteers has met with almost no response, except from a group of American aviators. It is a pity that, when America does intervene in European affairs, it is usually to help us to make war, but, of course, the present intervention is quite unofficial. M. Painlevé is, in effect, gambling on the chance that everything will be over by the beginning of October; but what if he is disappointed? Unless the offensive is decisive, I do not see how the Government can avoid mobilizing some of the reserves—the military authorities, it is understood, already consider it to be necessary—and then there is likely to be an upheaval.

Meanwhile, another little war has broken out in Syria. As usual, all the news that we get in France, except vague official communiqués, comes from the English press, and it suggests that the situation in Syria is much graver than is officially admitted. The matter is complicated by the political controversy about General Sarrail. The Echo de Paris asserts that he and a certain Captain Carbillet, whom General Sarrail appointed governor of the Djebel Druse, have caused the revolt by their harsh treatment of the Druses. But the Echo de Paris has consistently attacked General Sarrail merely because he is a Republican and a Freemason, so it is not an impartial witness. Nevertheless, the facts or alleged facts that it gives require an answer. Instead of refuting them, the press of the Left merely says that General Sarrail must be in the right because he is a Republican and a Freemason. General Sarrail saved Verdun during the battle of the Marne and was very badly treated by Marshal Joffre, but that does not prove that he is a good governor of a colony.

The Government declares that the forces in Syria are amply sufficient to deal with the situation, but it made the same declaration about Morocco until it became impossible to make it any longer. Should reinforcements become necessary in Syria, as is at least possible, it is hard to see where the Government will find them without calling up reserves, unless the Rhineland be evacuated. The inhabitants of Syria objected from the first to being put under French control, and nothing is more likely than that they might seize the opportunity of revolting against it when France is occupied in Morocco, especially as the majority of them are Mohammedans.

The French people, lulled by a complaisant press, have no idea of the dangerous possibilities that may lurk in the adventure into which they are being dragged. It is to be feared that they may have a rude awakening.

Paris, August 12

Since I wrote four days ago, Abd-el-Krim has taken the important step of sending to Tetuan an envoy, who has officially informed General Primo de Rivera that Abd-el-Krim is ready to negotiate on the sole condition that the independence of the Riff is guaranteed in advance.

The situation is therefore now quite clear. Peace can be made if independence be granted to the Riff and, if France and Spain now continue the war, it will be only for the purpose of preventing the Riff from becoming independent. I doubt whether the French people, to whom the independence of the Riff is a matter of complete indifference, will consent to continue the war for such an object. Plainly, it is now the duty of the French and Spanish governments to negotiate with Abd-el-Krim on the basis mentioned, and, if they refuse, they will be solely responsible for the consequences of their refusal, including the sacrifice of French lives and treasure in a bad cause.

Alcaeus to the Tenth Muse

By MARGARET TOD RITTER

Pour mixed juices of lime and pomegranate,
Frost the goblet until white wraiths of vapor
Cloud the edges like veils, elusive, fragrant,
Blown from a woman . . .

Harken, Sappho, who leaped to the Aegean,
Mad with passion for one not called Alcaeus:
Fiery nectar in token of your kisses . . .
Bitter libation!

Crude Sugar; Refined Politics

By FRITZ KUNZ

[This article was sent in manuscript form to Governor Farrington on June 8 with a letter asking for his comment; no answer has been received.—Editor The Nation.]

IN Hawaii our politics are white and refined, though our sugar is crude and brown. Some of the smooth, white, refined politics have lately been on view.

In September, 1922, Governor Wallace R. Farrington appointed a new Attorney General, an appointment confirmed at the next session of the local Senate in 1923, the Governor having thus acted "with the advice and consent of the Senate," as the organic act constituting the Territory provides. The Governor (perhaps from laboring in the Royal Palace and imbibing imperialism from its walls) believed that he was establishing in office his personal assistant in the chief law officer, John A. Mathewman; Mr. Mathewman, singularly enough, regarded himself as one of several executives constituting the government, with definite powers laid down by the law, a tribune of all the people. In his innocence he proceeded with his work of rendering opinions upon cases which came before him, looking forward to the four years of office which the statute provides, if he interpreted the law truly and well for all people, little brown laborers of the sugar plantations and the big crude sugar magnates alike. (Crude is an adjective modifying sugar, if you please; big applies to the magnates.)

Mr. Farrington, alas for him, did not know what human dynamite he was seating at the Attorney General's desk; that in that short, solid, sun-burned figure, with its big, legal head, quizzical and humorous eyes, and precise, deliberate speech from an exactly set jaw, resided no complaisant boon companion of the Daugherty-Fall sort, ready at a moment's notice to render convenient opinions, but a rather out-of-fashion and exceedingly rare public servant whom nothing would deter from duty.

Mr. Farrington delights in talk about law observance, especially as regards the Eighteenth Amendment. When Mr. Mathewman hinted at certain possible lapses in observance on the part of the Governor relations became strained. Mr. Farrington was a considerable shareholder in the Star-Bulletin, besides being influential with the Advertiser, another newspaper of Honolulu. He sold his interest in the Star-Bulletin when he became Governor, but the stock is said to be held for him to buy back when he is ready to take it. Mr. Mathewman pointed out that the Star-Bulletin publishers got a non-competitive contract for printing amounting to $11,000, although the law provides that all contracts for more than $1,000 should be given on competition. Again, in anticipation of the consent of the legislature and contrary to local statutes, according to Mr. Mathewman, Governor Farrington appointed the Audit Company of Hawaii to the lucrative job of investigating accounts in the Tax Office.

Nor was it only the Governor himself who found the law officer difficult. Mr. Mathewman established the fact that large areas of public domain were held at absurdly low rentals, and illegally, by big financial interests. The latter did not like his saying so. Our sugar may be crude in Hawaii, but let us be pleasant fellow-members of the same clubs and avoid unpleasant topics. And then again the political powers are in the habit of raising millions of dollars from Wall Street interests at 5 per cent and better, for public improvements, well ahead of the time of beginning the bridges and roads and all that. The Hawaiian banks receive this money and hold it at 2 per cent interest for the Territory, lending it at 7 and 8 per cent. The difference is what the banks make. How simple is finance!

Other interesting episodes arose out of the question of constitutional guaranties and civil rights for Filipinos. On the one side the big interests, crude as to sugar, smooth and white as to politics and race. With them one Cayetano Ligot, commissioner of Philippine labor, representing in Hawaii the benign and portly figure of General Leonard Wood. On the other side of the stage observe Pablo Manlapit, magnetic leader of labor causes among the Filipinos of Hawaii, an agitator of red tint and spiritually a child of Lenin and Trotzky. Put in a few labor operatives and investigators following Señor Manlapit. We see Filipino laborers recruited from their homes by the beneficent sugar companies who have such a hard time making their percentages, even with the help of cheap public lands. The laborers are ideally housed, well paid, and in heaven. But the ignorant fellows are always wanting something more, thanks to the pestilential agitator Manlapit.

Late in 1923 Francis Wright, part Hawaiian, was murdered in a crap-shooting brawl. A number of Filipinos were tried. Various sentences, among them several long terms and two of capital punishment. The cases came before the Attorney General for opinion, as to whether the Governor could and should pardon. In the state of the law Mr. Mathewman recommended full pardon for two of the long-term convicts because he thought the evidence insufficient; in the state of the law he thought Juan Timbal and Maximo Felias should hang as the court had decreed, for this was a case of the most brutal form of murder. Now it happened that just then the Filipino strike was brewing; coincidently the Governor felt pity for the condemned men; and at the same time Señor Ligot, in loco parentis for Leonard Wood to local Filipinos, among others petitioned for clemency; sentences of death were commuted in the two cases and pardons were issued to others. Thus Señor Ligot was starred as the friend of the Filipino.

But the ungrateful laborers went on to demand an eight-hour day and all that sort of thing. The strike started on Oahu in April, 1924. It had incidents which called for the interposition of the Attorney General, who persisted in his usual fashion in observing the law, taking the lead from the Governor's own words. A Mr. de la Cruz was held for fifty-two days because of incendiarism in a cane-field fire at Waipahu, but no charge was preferred against him. Mr. Mathewman's interposition liberated him, and thus strengthened the constitutional guaranty that no man shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law.

The strike went on, and the strikers were denied the right of assembly. This irked the Attorney General. Mr. Mathewman considered how he might justly bring forward the rights of assembly which even Filipinos are supposed to have. So he wrote an opinion for the benefit of his subordinate, the County Attorney on Kauai, where the strike had now spread, setting forth the constitutional guaranties, showing the right of peaceable assembly, and also defining the lawful limits of such assembly. Presently, in the midst of the strike on Kauai, there was armed violence. As usual, the story is confused; it has some singular incidents, and reporters independent of both parties are reluctant to commit themselves to a straight account. But this much is sure: four of the police were killed and in their turn (or before) they killed sixteen strikers.

Crude sugar had endured enough. Mr. Mathewman must go. What is the use of an Attorney General who thinks Filipinos have the right of peaceable assembly? The Governor had also had enough. As heir to the traditions of Kamehameha the Great, how could he suffer the presence of a law officer whose views of publicity are so definite as to compel him to leave the Governor's Cabinet (August, 1924, while remaining Attorney General) in protest against a hush-hush policy. Mr. Mathewman declined to resign, but once more the example of Kamehameha driving his enemies over Nuuanu Pali stood the Governor in good stead. A complaisant legislature put Mr. Mathewman out of office unheard in his own defense. Curiously enough, when this gift of a head on a charger was made to the Governor, certain venerable Senators got appointments for their friends upon the Board of the Department of Public Instruction. An expensive coincidence for Hawaii.

And so all seemed quiet on Waikiki Beach. President Coolidge took the unusual step of reappointing Mr. Farrington six months before the Governor's term expired; and the Senate, taking what seems to have been the right of its successor, confirmed him in office. So he "sits pretty." But the question arises whether more has not been done for civil rights in Hawaii by Mr. Mathewman's removal than for the noble and uplifting cause of crude sugar. We will leave it there for the favored ones to consider. Just a month after they had had their way, the Senate was a scene of uproar and recrimination. And the end is not yet. When the favored ones fall out, the civil rights of crude brown men are likely to have an inning at the expense of even the more precious crude brown sugar.

A Night in Mexico

By WITTER BYNNER

From somewhere over the houses, through the late night,
Come windy ripples of music;
Somewhere there's a lover in the street,
Somewhere, behind a dark window, a girl
Smiling into her pillow. . . .
Is it yonder, over the cobblestones?
A shuttered corner comes nearer, nearer;
Till now, by the very curb,
The unseen night stands breathing
A blackness of bass-viol and cello
And a faint moonlight of violins . . .
And in the last ray
The shadow of a bird leaves its perch for a smaller twig,
And a candle is lighted and put out again.

In the Driftway

AT the regular convention in October the Bishops of the Episcopal Church will discuss a weighty question: Shall they or shall they not officially insist that the word "obey" be included in the marriage service? The Drifter cannot prophesy what the godly gentlemen will decide; it may be that no wife, henceforth, need publicly promise to obey her husband; it may be that the young women who desire to omit the fatal word from their marriage vows will have to be joined in matrimony by a mere Methodist. The Drifter does not think that the marriages of the future will suffer either way. The brides who object to the whole idea of obedience can, if they look in a standard concordance of the Bible, find sixty-nine instances of the use of the word "obey"; men and women are enjoined to obey the voice of their God, the dominions obey him, even the winds and the sea, the winds and the waters; children must obey their parents, servants their masters, unclean spirits even are obedient to the voice of Jehovah. The idea of obeying is an old one.

* * * * *

WITH such a series of precedents it may be that some reluctant young ladies will be won over to the idea that obedience, after all, is a very common social observance. But others will still object; precedents mean nothing to them. And for their benefit the Drifter has taken the trouble to investigate the etymology of the word. What, after all, is this obey? Does it mean to bow in the dust, to cringe at the frown, to fly at the word of command? It does not. It comes from a simple Latin prefix meaning before or near; and the verb audire which any first-year Latin student can tell you means nothing more dangerous than to hear. To hear near, to hear before, to listen to; this, the Drifter believes, is a definition that might be generally accepted in order to put an end to an old controversy. What young wife would dare assert that she did not wish to listen to her husband? Wives always listen; they hear, if they do not heed; words penetrate their ears if they do not touch their hearts. They listen in the morning before breakfast, while the unwilling brush lathers the obstinate chin; they listen in the evening, over the soup, before the fish, all around the dessert; they listen as the night grows darker, as the hours lengthen, as the clock is wound, and the cat put down cellar. And frequently they listen when they would rather sleep.

THIS being the case—and what wife will deny it?—there is obviously no reason why the word "obey" should be a stumbling-block to any union. The Drifter has little use for those gentlemen who cynically argue that it is the women who exact the obedience, who in their subtle, underhand way impose their will without seeming to do so, without, indeed, disturbing the complaisance of the gentleman they wish to coerce. The matter is softer than that: it is merely a question of listening. Let us redefine obey and allow the clergymen to do their worst. Feminine honor may be maintained without the sacrifice of a single cherished precedent. Or is the Drifter, in his meddling way, only making matters more painful? Listening can be powerful tedious. The Drifter can call to mind persons whose commands he would bow to a thousand times before he would listen to them for an hour.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

We Couldn't Fool Him

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You doubtless thought you could bewilder or fool your Gentile readers by that stanza reprinted in the original Yiddish from the Jewish humorous weekly the Big Stick. But I, for one, could translate it and translate it into verse (and, too, without the assistance of my tailor from Odessa or my green grocer from Warsaw). Here it is in your idiom and mine:

> Sixty years has now Miss Nation,
> But fresh she is and young yet;
> And Dame Reaction trembles
> Before her caustic tongue yet.

I hope you'll print it, if only for the benefit of my many Jewish friends, the Jacksons and Bennetts and Sydneys, who have so pitiably forgotten the quaint homely speech of their cradle songs.

Madison, Wis., August 24 William Ellery Leonard

Gettysburg

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The review in The Nation, June 17, of General Maurice's "Robert E. Lee, the Soldier" contains by implication a military justification of the Confederate assault participated in by Pickett's division and other troops of Lee's army on the third day of the Battle of Gettysburg. Furthermore, the review cites Colonel Haskell's narrative as evidence of fault in the preparations to receive the attack and of thinness of "the blue line that held the heights upon which depended the fate of the Union."

I have been familiar with Colonel Haskell's classic of civil-war literature for many years and know of no statement of his warranting the conclusion that only a thin blue line was prepared to receive the Confederate assault. His reference to the matter is expressly limited to the troops of the Second Corps, to which he belonged. On the staff of a general who during the battle commanded a division or temporarily a corps, Colonel Haskell would not be familiar with troop movements made by the army commander except as he saw them or their results, or learned of them from others. Several times he wrote of the limitation of his vision, admirable as his narrative is in many respects.

Lee's preparations for this assault were plainly seen on the Union line as early as ten o'clock in the morning. The cannonade did not begin until one o'clock, and the assault not until three o'clock. In preparation for it Meade's chief of artillery placed on Cemetery Ridge as many batteries as the ground would hold. From Round Top General Meade for a while watched the massing of Lee's troops. On the evening before he had said to Colonel Haskell's chief, General Gibbon, that the next assault would be upon the center, the Second Corps. General Meade ordered Slocum on the extreme right to send all the troops he could spare for reinforcement of the threatened point. In addition, one division of the First Corps, two brigades of the Sixth Corps, five brigades of the Third Corps, besides other troops, were hurried to the reinforcement of the point where it was obvious that the attack would strike.

The Union cavalryman Brigadier General Taylor told me that General Meade personally ordered him to post a cavalry regiment in rear of all the troops at the center and to shoot any skulkers refusing to return to the front. General Meade knew that the configuration of his line enabled him to bring reserve troops from all parts of his army, as he actually did, before the Confederate advance, across a wide valley and in the face of a devastating fire, could reach his front. To have massed his reserves behind the threatened center at an earlier hour would have subjected them to Lee's artillery fire, which it is well known was so high as to go over the front line in considerable measure. Haskell suggests that Lee thought the Union troops were so massed and thus accounts for the elevation of the Confederate fire.

The assault of Pickett, Pettigrew, Perry, and Wilcox on that July afternoon never had the slightest chance of success, because of the preparations made to meet it. The farther these troops went the worse off they would be. Had they more than dented Meade's line at the place of Haskell's activity and observation, behind the Second Corps line were the blue reserve masses to take them in front, on both flanks and in the rear, a disaster even greater than that which occurred.

General Meade thought that Lee's best operation would be a movement around the Union left. That, it was subsequently learned, was Longstreet's advice to Lee. Meade declared that it was sound military sense. Had Lee accepted the suggestion there would have been no third-day battle at Gettysburg; Meade would have fallen into his chosen Pipe Creek line, where his engineers had chosen positions for all of the army corps, and Lee would then have had the choice of fighting with no advantage in his favor or of returning to Virginia. By the end of the second day at Gettysburg he had learned that he was not opposed by a Hooker, a Burnside, or a Pope. His excitement, which Longstreet observed, would probably have subsided, and he could have repeated his retirement made from Antietam in the previous year with no great loss of prestige and with less loss to his army than was caused by the militarily foolish third assault at Gettysburg.

It is probable that it was to the anticipation by Meade of a movement around his left that Colonel Haskell referred in attributing to the army commander the thought that Lee's attack would be on the left, for Meade's remark to Gibbon that if Lee assaulted again it would be on Gibbon's front in the center is established by the statement of General Gibbon himself.

General Maurice's chapter heading The Second Invasion of Maryland, meaning the Gettysburg campaign, is indicative of a state of mind characteristic of most English military critics who have written about the Civil War, Atkinson and Hadway being notable exceptions.

Ardmore, Pennsylvania, July 4 Isaac R. Pennypacker

Are Profits the Cause of War?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial Seven Years After, dealing with Bernard M. Baruch's fund for investigating war profiteering, skims too lightly, it seems to me, over the magnificent hope held out that thus we may end all war. It is so announced; and you do say that the certainty of conscripting capital along with human life "would have a profoundly depressive effect on the whole phenomenon of jingoism and militarism." Perhaps. But would it remove the cause or even a main cause of war?

The economic sources of war lie in rivalry for profits before the drums begin to beat. Out of tariffs, special privileges, the exploitation of weak "backward" countries arise those frictions which generate the spark in the powder magazine. It is the competition, not for war profits, but for peace-time markets, raw materials, trade routes, backed by the armies and navies of those countries whose nationals are competitors, which oftenest provokes modern wars, even though they be ostensibly to make the world safe for democracy.

It is true that our packers and coal operators and textile manufacturers and steel men profited hugely from the World War. But who of them knew that seventeen of our forty-five woolen and worsted mills would earn more than 100 per cent on their capital stock? If they knew, what was the form their jingoism took? Did they set Germany and France at each other's throats? Did they cause the war? Or, once Europe was embroiled, did they shove us into the cockpit?

The attractive and sentimental notion that prospective war profiteers cause wars has been exploded. It is difficult to believe that Mr. Baruch subscribes to it. Possibly the announcement was so worded without his approval, as a bit of ill-advised ballyhoo for publicity. To mobilize our industry on a profitless basis in case war comes would be admirable. But it would not prevent war from coming.

Sound Beach, Connecticut, July 24 SILAS BENT

Why They Stop Their Subscriptions

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish you would stop sending The Nation to me. I have enjoyed reading it for quite a number of years, but I am afraid that I am getting too liberal in my thinking.

Sauk Center, Minnesota, April 25 B. F. DUBOIS

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The reason I have discontinued my subscription to The Nation originates from the biased, slanderous campaign conducted by The Nation against the actual government at Italy, the best government Italy ever had since its unification in 1870.

New York, May 15 P. TOMASELLI

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is a matter of regret that I am unable to continue my subscription to your valuable paper. Hope to renew next year. You have done some fine work and your exposition of the modern problems which confront us is most admirable. But I must remind you of the affront to decency which your sex articles occasioned. We welcome free discussion, but such special pleas as you featured in your paper are surely subversive of the best standards of married life. Some of the articles were excellent, but others were merely pleas for indecency.

Kelso, Washington, April 25 W. W. SWITZER

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Our limited funds do not permit of our subscribing to all the magazines we would like to have. Though we appreciate the value of The Nation, we are obliged to subscribe only to those magazines pertaining to public health. We were especially interested in the series of articles New Morals for Old, and entered our subscription to cover that series.

New York, May 3 MARY CASAMAJOR,
Librarian, National Health Library

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I find The Nation consistently unfair in its treatment of matters pertaining to Soviet Russia.

Rolling Bay, Washington, May 8 R. L. JOHNSON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Kindly erase our name from your list. Russians should be your only subscribers.

Chicago, May 25 (MRS.) H. C. SWEETEN

Poe and His Contemporaries

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In spite of the research of three-quarters of a century the life of Poe is still a mystery, and we know with certainty neither the date of his birth nor the cause of his death. Since The Nation has for years been a medium for such Poe scholars as Whitty and Campbell, may I not be permitted to say a few words on the editorial Wayward Genius, appearing in the issue of July 8?

Although I have long been a worshiper at the shrine of Edgar Allan Poe, I am willing to concede the general justice of the editorial opinion; it may, however, not be hair-splitting pedantry to take exception to the ambiguous phrase, "hated and neglected by his contemporaries," which implies that Poe's contemporaries were unanimous in this hate and neglect.

It is true that Rufus W. Griswold and Thomas Dunn English were Poe's bitter enemies, and Poe undoubtedly made many other enemies among the literary nonentities of his day; but, hate him never so greatly, his contemporaries could neither neglect nor ignore him, and he had many friends.

The Saturday after Poe's death, and within a week of Griswold's ill-timed attack, N. P. Willis came to the defense with an article in the Home Journal, during the course of which he referred to "a friendship of five or six years" with Poe. George Graham, another fellow-editor of Poe's, pronounced "unfair and untrue" the Griswold portrait of "the character of our lost friend." It is obvious that Poe was not completely without friends, and that the "whitewashing" of his character began immediately after the Griswold attack.

Mrs. Whitman, to whom Poe was engaged shortly before his death, devoted her life to the defense of his memory, and rendered great service to early biographers of the "whitewash school." Her important essay, Edgar Poe and His Critics, was reprinted by Haldeman-Julius under the misleading title Was Poe Immoral? (Little Blue Book No. 144.)

It is not generally realized that Poe was one of the earliest vers-librists, but careful study of such poems in cadenced prose as Shadow: A Parable reveals him as a precursor of Whitman. Much more generally recognized is the fact that Baudelaire's translations of Poe's verse into French prose had an important formative influence on the nascent vers-libre of the Imagists.

It is not Poe's contemporaries and immediate successors in America who have ignored him, but rather the intelligentsia of the early twentieth century. Let us by all means reconsider our estimates of Poe, not only as a man but as a forerunner of more important things than the work of Conan Doyle and A. K. Greene.

Mount Vernon, Iowa, July 20 DAVID FULLER ASH

Barnet Braverman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issues of July 31 and August 6, 1924, you published a notice stating that I was representing myself as a correspondent of The Nation in Austria. When in Paris recently mention was made to me of this notice, and now that I am back in the United States I want to prevent further annoyance by a statement of the facts:

1. At the time your informant wrote (June, 1924) he misunderstood the situation.

2. Neither you nor your informant can name any individual connected in an official or business way with Austrian affairs to whom I ever represented myself as a correspondent of The Nation.

3. Austrians (especially in Vienna and in Salzburg), as well as Americans whom I met there, among them a few of your readers, as well as a number of English and American newspapermen, deny your informant's report.

4. Correspondents receive theater privileges in Vienna. Yet the directors and managers of Vienna's theaters, in a statement signed by each of them, also deny the truth of your announcement.

New York, June 4 BARNET BRAVERMAN

[After discussing the matter with Mr. Braverman since his return to the United States we are convinced that he was not guilty of any intentional misrepresentation.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Books

Decoration for a Girl's Room

By HORACE GREGORY

A still bird in a wild tree, a small, black bird with a golden throat makes noises to a far, gray sea and never sings a note.

And clouds move in a dark sky, broken, red clouds that curdle and fall through the wild tree and the bird's cry that never sings at all.

Mr. Massingham

"H. W. M.": A Selection from His Writings. With essays by H. N. Brailsford, J. L. Hammond, Vaughan Nash, H. W. Nevinson, H. M. Tomlinson, and George Bernard Shaw. Edited by Harold J. Massingham. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

NO selection from his writings, no introductory essays even from such intimates as J. L. Hammond, H. N. Brailsford, H. W. Nevinson, and Bernard Shaw, can explain the unique position held by H. W. Massingham among the English journalists of our time. For though he put more of his individuality into his written word than any other servant of the press, the subtle qualities of his intelligence and feeling could only be communicated in close personal intercourse. Moreover, the greater part of his active life was spent in the effervescence and evanescence of daily journalism, writing vivid parliamentary sketches and political leaders on the Daily Chronicle and Daily News. Only since 1907, when he became editor and maker of the London Nation, did the educated public begin to reap the maturer fruits of his mind. Only those who worked with him could realize his greatness as an editor, his almost miraculous eye for the significant, not only in what is called "public life" but in the world of art, literature, science, and religion. Bred in a nest of East Anglican Methodism, and escaping early in the eighties into the freer journalistic atmosphere of London, he bore through life the strangely durable traces of an inner austerity of spirit which contrasted amusingly with the surface levity, almost license, of his speech, manners, and opinions upon many matters of serious import. This apparent inconsistency was enhanced by the dramatic vividness imparted to all his expressions in speech or pen, and by the quick changes in perspective which distinguished his peculiarly responsive nature. But such statements do injustice to the powerful principles and steady deep enthusiasms that made him a courageous and effective leader in so many causes of freedom and justice. His resignation of the editorial chair of the Chronicle, when the proprietors sought to silence his criticisms of the infamous Boer War, was but one of several sacrifices to the cause of truth which marked his high sense of the responsibility of the press.

Some of the most brilliant articles retrieved for this volume deal with public men whom he had known, or whose careers he had closely followed, and it is not too much to say that American readers will get a better understanding of what is distinctive in the tortuous British policy of the last two generations from these portraits and passing aperçus than from the more formal histories of our time. For Massingham had the literary genius to put into some single phrase the special significance of a critical event or a political character, thus giving a true signal post along the road of history. Not a profound scholar, he had large and various reading; not a philosopher, he had clear guiding thoughts and strong sensitive intuitions. His attitude to life's passing show was that of the keenly interested artist rather than that of the scientific thinker. But his art of life was not what is called merely, or mainly, temperamental. It was guided and inspired by steady lights and immovable standards. The events of the past decades went largely to feed a disillusionment into politics, which appeared to him more and more as an art of promise, not of fulfilment. The charge of variability, sometimes brought against him, is attributable to the fact that he "found out" so many of the men and lands of promise. He did much to aggrandize such liberal leaders as Rosebery and Lloyd George in their as yet undimmed roles of social reformers. They left him; he did not leave them. So it was, not alone with individual but with party. Liberal to his very quick and marrow in training, traditions, natural sympathy, and intellectual convictions, he required from liberalism the tests of personal liberty and equality applied to a society riddled with economic despotism. The war proved that liberalism was false even to its own accepted creed, throwing overboard one after another as war emergencies its cherished liberties, while amid the wreckage of the post-war era it wrung impotent and unconstructive hands. Massingham thus came to quit a liberalism no longer liberal, and became an attached though hardly an optimistic supporter of Labor.

Though politics naturally plays a large part in this collection, much incisive and illuminating writing is directed to other themes—literary, dramatic, religious. In all of this, while the writer often seems absorbed with qualities of style, technique, and method, it is the flashes of moral sensibility that are most impressive, pointing as they do to the serious and solid substratum of his nature. It was with visionaries and mystics, Tolstoi, "Mark Rutherford," Olive Schreiner, that his spirit was in deepest sympathy, and in his profounder moments, either as writer or as talker, he was continuously reverting to their thoughts.

His son, in editing, has done well to include fragments of verse and prose from private letters and other informal sources, but not so well in appending to some of the most brilliantly intelligible passages notes either of interpretation or of appreciation.

J. A. HOBSON

Lincolniana

Life of Abraham Lincoln. By William E. Barton. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. Two volumes. $10.

Lincoln the Litigant. By William H. Townsend. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

Abraham Lincoln. By Dr. Graf Albrecht Montgelas. Vienna: Verlag Karl Konig.

IN his two volumes Mr. Barton assembles the conclusions of nearly fifty years of personal investigation. In "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," published four years ago, he contributed a fresh consideration of Lincoln's early environment in Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois as the basis of a well-documented study of Lincoln's attitude toward religion. Shortly afterward he published "The Paternity of Abraham Lincoln," in which, after disposing of a number of lingering traditions purporting to identify Lincoln's father with another than Thomas Lincoln —Patrick Henry and John C. Calhoun figured as rivals of five other gentlemen—he showed that Herndon, in later life, had abandoned his earlier assumption of irregular paternity. In a recent edition he made known his final conclusions establishing the long-rumored illegitimacy of Nancy Hanks Lincoln. Both books bulk largely in the "Life," but the new work is amply warranted. Mr. Barton is able to correct a number of details in the work of his predecessors, to confirm others that were in doubt, and to give some facts and documents which had escaped the notice of previous biographers.

Mr. Barton makes public for the first time the information that in 1859 Lincoln purchased the insolvent Illinois Staats-Anzeiger, a German-American newspaper of Springfield, and used it for eighteen months in behalf of his nomination for the Presidency, afterward reselling it to its former editor. Of even greater interest are some excerpts from the "Diary" of O. H. Browning, United States Senator from Illinois during the Civil War days, a man who was as intimate with Lincoln at the time as any one. From this diary, soon to be published by the Illinois Historical Survey at Urbana, Mr. Barton is able to amplify our knowledge of Lincoln's slough of despond in 1862, when his defeated armies and the unfavorable fall elections deeply depressed him and furnished an occasion to the ambitious Chase to stir up a revolt of the radical Senators against the President. Headed by Wade and Trumbull, the Senate committee, convinced by Chase's intimations of dissension in the Cabinet, insisted that the President reconstruct his official family. Lincoln was momentarily disconcerted. He instructed the committee to return and state their case before the Cabinet. The Senators went away in disgust upon hearing the Cabinet members, including Chase, solemnly aver that they were all harmonious. Feeling that the President could now make what he thought were desirable changes in the Cabinet, Browning went to the White House to urge this course, but received the emphatic response from Lincoln that he was master.

Biographers have made much of Lincoln's domestic infelicities. Mr. Barton gives a very human and sane treatment to this subject, concluding from his reconsideration of the little evidence to be had that, although Mrs. Lincoln's high spirit frequently taxed her husband's patient forbearance, Lincoln loved his wife and owed much in his career to her ambition and counsel. Similarly he reconsiders the slender evidence bearing upon the composition of the Gettysburg Address, agreeing that it took shape partly in Washington and partly after the President's arrival in Gettysburg. He regards the Cooper Union Address as the peak of Lincoln's utterances, contrary to the prevailing view. It was, indeed, the maturation of the arguments growing out of the debates with Douglas, and it answers once for all any misgivings as to Lincoln's capacity for effective research and constructive interpretation in constitutional law. But for artistic condensation of both outward and inward experience the speech falls distinctly below the Gettysburg Address and the Second Inaugural.

"Lincoln the Litigant," to which Mr. Barton supplies an appreciative foreword, is Mr. Townsend's second contribution to Lincolniana. His "Lincoln the Defendant" of two years ago presented facsimiles of previously unpublished letters and legal documents in a suit brought against Lincoln in 1853 by a cotton manufacturer of Lexington, Kentucky, to recover $472.54 which the company alleged that Lincoln, as its attorney, had collected from Illinois customers and left unaccounted for. Lincoln's father-in-law, Robert S. Todd, had been a member of this company, and after his death his son, Levi, alienated from his sisters during the distribution of the paternal estate, inspired the suit against Lincoln. Lincoln furnished his Lexington attorney in the case with such an array of counter-proof that the suit was withdrawn. Mr. Townsend's second book summarizes the facts of this suit and gives interesting accounts of several other suits in which Lincoln appeared, not as counsel but either as plaintiff or as defendant. The reader will be surprised at the number of such suits in which Lincoln figured. The author has added considerably to our knowledge of this new phase of Lincoln's legal history.

Lincoln students will be much interested in the new brief life of Lincoln by Count Montgelas. The author is active as a Democrat in German politics, and copies of his book were circulated among the German electorate to influence votes in the presidential campaign against Von Hindenburg. The volume furnishes an enthusiastic statement of the orthodox facts concerning Lincoln's rise from the common folk to the leadership, not of "stupid sheep" but of an intelligent and self-governing people.

LUTHER E. ROBINSON

Donald Ogden Stewart

Mr. and Mrs. Haddock Abroad. By Donald Ogden Stewart. George H. Doran Company. $2.

The Crazy Fool. By Donald Ogden Stewart. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.

SOME do and some can't. There are men sufficiently acute to recognize the aesthetic principles which demand that you laugh at Mr. Stewart's latest ventures in humor because "the Haddocks' souls are filled with the tag-ends of modern life and stuffed with the mythology of the daily papers," or even because "Stewart's story . . . is really an excursion into the subconscious of the average 'solid citizen' and his wife"; there are those, come to think of it, who can find aesthetic values when The Spirit of Street Cleaning and The Spirit of Garbage Collecting march in spotted veils down The Avenue of Progress.

As for me, I am a simple soul who has painfully learned to guffaw when the movie comedian chucks a custard pie at the face of the tyrannical pie custodian—because good thereby overcomes evil. But there I stop. I will not, nay, I cannot rise to the realm of aesthetics. I may be pricked but never tickled by a philosophic feather of this nature: "Eccentric to the recurrent rotation of the wheels of that enormous machine whose ravages William Vaughn Moody vividly described in his poem, The Beast, the speculation of [these writers] has wandered into the realm of phantasmagoria presided over by the subconscious."

I am not proud of my limitations. Why should Mr. Stewart's blows strike me as blow-outs? Impressionism, explains the neoteric. When Mr. Perkins of the New York White-wings discourses on the tour to Europe, the Ritz cuisine, and the Princesse de Lorme, that is impressionism; when Mr. Haddock seeks the place where he kicked a fair cross-word puzzler's leg and she counters by saying: "And last Thursday those headaches came back," that is impressionism; when the captain interrupts his Sunday services to quell a revolt of the second-class passengers, that is impressionism. But why does not all of this impressionism impress me? And who in the world besides the enthusiastic aesthetes was impressed by it?

These reflections are perhaps more pertinent to "Mr. and Mrs. Haddock Abroad" than to "The Crazy Fool." Neither contains the heady stuff of Mr. Stewart's earlier books; each lacks the sparkle of "Perfect Behavior" and the sizzle of "Aunt Polly's Story of Mankind"; but at least "The Crazy Fool" is impressionism sufficiently modified to be recognizable both in its achievement and its intent. Whereas in the Haddock volume there is but one genuinely humorous passage, the first chapter, in "The Crazy Fool" the comic episodes and moods follow close upon one another, all the way from the introduction of our hero: "When he inherited the asylum, Charlie was 23 years old and in love, which made his total age 14 including depreciation and money for carfare and marbles"; through the philosophical reflection of Edison that "sex is a funny thing but yet, like the cat in the adage, you've got to have it"; to the meeting with drunken Romeo and the catastrophe that ends the book.

As for the intention, we soon recognize that the author aims at a vast burlesque of contemporary American civilization. With the most Rabelaisian carnality possible in a God-fearing, Bryan-cheering country Mr. Stewart ridicules the incidents that constitute our life; and though little of the criticism is original with him, the manner of its presentation is wholly his own. His travesty Mr. Stewart achieves through the constant conglomeration of platitudes, bromides, and catch-words which, in their absurd juxtaposition, must impress us with the vapidity of conventional thought and speech, piling his jocosities one upon the other to a glorious climax in the scenario which the girl from the Publicity Department writes to advertise Socko. This is called "The Passion Flower of Broadway," for, as the young lady explains, it sounds much "better than just 'The Life of Calvin Coolidge' or something like that."

"The Crazy Fool," then, ranks between Mr. Stewart's earliest work and "Mr. and Mrs. Haddock Abroad." It may lack something of the magnetic attraction of "Perfect Behavior" and of the compelling irritation of "Aunt Polly's Story of Mankind," but it has an abundance of both wit and satire. Though nothing Mr. Stewart may ever publish will make me forget the superb autobiography he wrote a year or so ago, the Haddock book has done much to temper my enthusiasm for his future. If, as has been reported, he is truly concerned with immortality, he will do well to return to the style of that biography. Time is armed with a crude weapon, and Mr. Stewart's best method in the duel is a downright, vigorous attack with the broadsword of humor, not a fancy feinting with the rapier of ingenuity.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

The New Ownership

Industrial Ownership. By Robert S. Brookings. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

WHEN a successful business man speaks on economic questions, he is likely to be heard with more respect than is accorded the mere economist, though the latter may know ten times as much. Mr. Brookings, however, speaks modestly. His little book, embodying the results of long and careful reflection on an important body of facts, deserves the attention that it is likely to receive.

Forty years ago the business unit was small, industry was actively managed by its owners, and nobody questioned their right to run it as they pleased within the law. Today, partly as an almost unnoticed result of the trust movement, the ownership of our important industrial corporations has become widely diffused, and that diffusion is proceeding faster than ever before. In consequence, ownership has become almost wholly separated from management. Industrial management is actually in the hands of a small, self-selected group (just as in every other social activity), and "the owner's reliance is primarily on the good faith and ability of the management as witnessed by past performance." Two important results follow. "In the first place, it has made it possible to distinguish the return to ownership from the return to management, and therefore to set up standards of a fair return to each. . . . In the second place, the separation of management from investment is bringing about a change in the ideas of managers about their own responsibility. As management ceases to represent merely itself, it comes to feel a responsibility not merely to the stockholders but also to labor and the public."

According to Mr. Brookings, in the old days when management and capital collectively constituted ownership, industry was administered in the interests of such ownership, profits were high, and profiteering was not specially disreputable. Public dissatisfaction with this state of affairs manifested itself in the rise of militant trade unionism, the growth of anti-trust legislation, and the appearance of new standards of business ethics. While the politicians and the unions have been exercising increasing pressure on management, the influence of stockholders has been decreasing, thus giving management a new sense of responsibility both to labor and to the public.

As a result of all this, Mr. Brookings believes that he has put at least a little salt on the tail of that shy bird, the industrial problem. A comparison of the earnings of national banks, employing little labor and operating under strict government regulation, with the somewhat smaller returns of industrial corporations suggests that ownership is not exploiting labor but is getting simply the "market wage" necessary to secure the services of its capital (the economist's "pure" or "natural" rate of interest). Management, moreover, receives only reasonable returns, profiteering being the exception. Therefore the benefits of increased production tend, on the whole, to go where they are most needed, to "the public" in lower prices and to labor in higher wages (an idea interestingly reminiscent of General Walker's residual theory of wages). Hence our hope of betterment lies in increased production, which we may aid by a relaxation of anti-trust laws so far as they prevent cooperation in the public interest and by inducing unions and individual workers to eliminate restrictive practices. To attain these results we must have uniformity and publicity of corporation accounts, and it may be a considerable degree of public regulation, together with unemployment insurance, a reasonable control of industrial fluctuation, and other measures that will give labor a real and direct interest in increased production. All this accomplished, "we may hope that cooperation between the industries and labor will take the place of the present wasteful system of bargaining." It is a cheerful faith, and one based on wide experience and sober thought. Moreover, it certainly reflects the operation of important forces at work in present-day American industrial life.

But a question and an observation are suggested. First, in proving his case, why has not Mr. Brookings proved at least half the case for his socialist critics? If ownership as an active force has fallen into the background, and if management, to put the case extremely, now works for labor and the public rather than for owners, why should not the state take over industry, thus getting rid of the troublesome questions arising out of private ownership?

But vastly more important, to state the basic matter flatly, all ideas of economic salvation based on the increase of production are vain, and if we persist in following that path we proud exponents of Western civilization shall all go to hell together. As Vernon Lee says, "To reform our notions of what is valuable and distinguished would bring about an economic reformation." I believe that Mr. Brookings is everlastingly wrong in his basic assumption; but that assumption is shared by nine hundred ninety-nine out of every thousand persons in the Western world, whether they call themselves radical or conservative. All such, whether they agree or disagree, will find in Mr. Brookings's book much food for thought.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

The Ethics of Politics

The Ethical Basis of the State. By Norman Wilde. Princeton University Press. $2.

THERE is some question as to whether there is an ethical basis for politics, even in the Aristotelian sense of the word. The attack upon the state as the highest unit of moral community is not limited to the pluralists and syndicalists who are boring from within. It is supported by the combined forces of the cosmopolitans and internationalists, just as unwilling on their part to stop short with the state as the pluralists are to arrive at any such inclusive limit. "Citizens of the world, unite" is the device of this internationalism, just as the class or group critique of the state is apt to issue in an exhortation to the workers of the world.

Mr. Wilde has undertaken the task of weighing out even-handed justice both to these critics and to the ideal state which they are defaming. At the outset one must accept his self-imposed limitations. He is not hopeful of pointing out a way to social or political salvation. He does, however, hope to clear up the ground which is being fought over, and the air as well, by "an untechnical exposition of the principles more or less clearly recognized since the time of Plato and Aristotle." The problem, he sees, is to find what it is about the relation of the state to other groups that is peculiar; and then to examine the claims this status gives the state to an especial moral sanction for its use of force.

It is a joy to find an American scholar combining the perspective of humanism with a lucid style and a wide acquaintance with the essential facts. Mr. Wilde sees that ethics cannot escape considering economics, history, and psychology, or the combination of these that is politics, by any merely general formulae. Historically, the basis of a new pluralism of loyalties is to be found in the modern growth of economic associations which reintroduce the struggle maintained by the church in the Middle Ages. But can these economic organizations supply a new basis of social organization which will reduce the state gradually to a relatively unimportant role, as the church hoped to reduce it earlier? There seems to be a substantial agreement that the state is not that all-inclusive organic context of social relations and institutions which Bosanquet has hypostatized into a General Will. Rather, pluralism has it, the state is only the government—not the entire sum of social activities. And government is one of the least of these.

Mr. Wilde is interested in rescuing the state from these contenders. The state is society, but only in the aspect of "an all-inclusive, non-voluntary, territorial association" exercising unconditional control over its members. It is not the whole context of society. But neither is it merely the rulers—the government, as the realism of Duguit, Laski, and Cole would hold. The state represents a definite community in society, a community of purpose in things political, legally organized on a territorial basis.

What is to prevent this political community from extending its sphere in all directions—from becoming omnicompetent? Essentially it is the fact that political purpose is limited to safeguarding the conditions of the good life. That means a qualified individualism, not simply social atomism or negative protection. So that the state, while it must never attempt to impose Kultur, or to stifle the freest development of personality, still can play an active role in providing a justice which will "hinder the hindrances" to the good life—to use T. H. Green's phrase. Upon this claim rests the essential right of the state to be judge in its own case, i.e., to be sovereign. The ethos of internationalism seems, for some reason, to concern Mr. Wilde hardly at all.

Is there an ethical basis for obedience to the state? Yes, according to Mr. Wilde—one which springs from a shared community of purpose and is dependent on the general recognition of certain political rights and duties in a given society. Obligation is not absolute but relative to the values involved—with the presumption in favor of the state where obedience alone is called into question. His main point, however, is that the very existence of a state implies a sufficient community of moral purpose to permit the settlement of disputes by political and legal means—not by direct action or by what Mr. Laski calls negotiation. But is this basic community one of moral values and are they absolute? Is there not a pragmatic as well as a formal problem? The pragmatic problem demands that we examine a city not laid up in Heaven but actually made with hands. Our real ethical concern must be with fitting the materials at hand into our ideal specifications or in altering the latter to a workable program.

"Out of wealth-seeking individuals we cannot build a free community," says Mr. Wilde. But your political contractor must make bricks with this straw: bankers' and manufacturers' associations, chambers of commerce, farm bureaus, labor unions. An ethical basis for the state demands a real moral community, a theory of representative government that permits such differing members of the body politic as these to work for a solution in the light of a common purpose, not by lobbies and blocs. Perhaps the subordinate and advisory economic body known as the German Parliament of Industry may offer the concrete beginning of a solution dependent upon neither a formally categorical imperative nor a pious wish—though Mr. Wilde passes it by to deal with a highly hypothetical guild socialism.

It would be an injustice to Mr. Wilde to suggest, however, that he does not recognize the need of superstructure for his foundation. Community of moral purpose, he says, is a matter of degree and of fact. To give real grounds for political obligation we must create a sufficient degree of moral community in our state to make loyalty to it a fact. That is, on the whole, as wise and honest a statement of the matter as one could wish.

W. Y. Elliott

Ambition in Love's Clothing

La Vie amoureuse de Madame de Pompadour. Par Marcelle Tinayre. Collection "Leurs amours." Paris: Ernest Flammarion.

IT is hard to forgive a publisher who sets Charles Maurras to write of Dante's Beatrice and Marcelle Tinayre to prattle of Louis XV's ugly amours in the same series. We have heard often enough, it would seem, of Jeanne-Antoinette Poisson's long intrigue with the Sun-King's unworthy successor. It does still remain for some one to study in detail the influential if generally unfortunate part the Marquise de Pompadour played in the political affairs of Europe, and her much more wholesome activities in the encouragement of art and industry within the borders of France; but there was no new gossip to retail about her ostensibly sentimental relations with the Well-Beloved (we cannot refrain from parenthesizing that though Louis seems for a time to have merited this title, it was not because of any real affection which this sly mistress of his ever cherished for his insignificant person); and Marcelle Tinayre has no scandal to purvey which has not already reached the reader of Michelet, the Goncourts, Pierre de Nolhac, Noel Williams, and the smaller fry who had already told her story.

The book is well done, of course. Everything of Marcelle Tinayre's has been well done. She has a gentle, unpretentious, serious, and incredibly nimble way about her which again justifies somebody's remark to the effect that no one ever writes better than a Frenchman except a French woman. Here is certainly the pleasantest book about Mme de Pompadour. We are inclined to believe, even, that the author's intuition, in default of new information, has given us at some points a truer and subtler picture of this strangely strong and secret soul than we have found anywhere else. But we are not always sure that, skilled novelist as she is and given to building a narrative into symmetry and harmony, she is always entirely candid in her use of her material. Story for story, the alleged testimony of an eye-witness that the King glanced out of the window toward the funeral cortège of his late mistress and remarked nonchalantly: "The marquise has a wet day for her journey" is less edifying than the other one that he stood heroically on his balcony in the pouring rain, wept two great tears, and sobbed: "It was the only way I had of showing her the last honors." But it is quite as well authenticated, and Mme Tinayre never even mentions the former story or hints at any doubt as to the latter. The book is distinctly an apology, frankly as it speaks of faults; but it is never quite so shockingly tolerant as the opinion of an English biographer that "Apart from her responsibility for the Seven Years' War, it is very doubtful whether Mme de Pompadour really did much harm. . . ." We are sure she did, but even had this been all, one might pay a similar tribute to Attila or General von Bernhardi. Mme Tinayre wisely refrains from specific appraisals, and she is always judicious. But we feel it our duty to warn sentimental readers that the book is no love story. What the gifted and charming Marchioness of Pompadour loved was never man that is born of woman but power that is born of intrigue. And that, we must admit, she did love so passionately that she gave her life for it.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

Books in Brief

The Growth of Civilization. By W. J. Perry. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Professor Perry, like Dr. Elliot Smith, holds firmly to the thesis that in Egypt is to be found the origin of all higher forms of civilization. The close relationship between Egypt and the later and wider Mediterranean culture is now well understood. The relation of Egypt to Far-Eastern, Polynesian, and even American culture is assumed by Elliot Smith and Perry to be no less obvious. To hold as they do that Egyptian culture spread by actual migration to the Pacific Ocean and to America is to overwork the theory of cultural borrowing and to ignore completely the possibility of independent invention of culture. In truth, we have in their work a pretty example of men—specialists in their own right, one in anatomy, the other in archaeology—pretending to speak in somewhat related fields but withal denying the mass of facts which run counter to their preconceived position. They ignore completely the historical method made prominent in anthropology by the work of Boas and his students. This method studies each culture in its historical setting first, drawing inferences as to universality, borrowing, or invention in regard to related cultures only as the empirical features warrant. The present author, on the contrary, commences with a thesis and then by a whole series of perhapses and we-may-assumes places his interpretation before us as a final word on the origin of civilization everywhere from Timbuctoo to the Iroquois Confederacy. The lay reader would do better to remain in ignorance of primitive cultures than to get such colossal misconceptions as appear on every page of this book.

What Ails Our Youth. By George A. Coe. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

Youth in Conflict. By Miriam Van Waters. Republic Publishing Company. $1.

With the flood of recent literature about our young people and their—and incidentally our—difficulties, it might be thought that little was left unsaid. Yet both Mr. Coe and Miss Van Waters have made definite contributions toward a mutual understanding of two generations with conflicting ideals and habits. That the conflict is not new both authors admit; but they succeed in convincing their readers that the present educational, domestic, economic, and religious situations are creating even more than the usual amount of stress and strain. The two books are a distinct contrast in method and material, although the conclusions arrived at are similar. Mr. Coe speaks from the standpoint of the experienced university teacher and is particularly interested in the religious and educational aspects of the conflict. His approach is the more conventional, and for that reason sometimes lacks the compelling force of Miss Van Water's case-studies. Miss Van Water's book is based on face-to-face contact with youthful tragedies. She is the Referee in the Juvenile Court of Los Angeles, and her material is taken from her experiences there. Her book is a definite answer to those sociological critics who claim that social work is nothing but mere puttering with individuals with

AMERICAN AND BRITISH LITERATURE SINCE 1890

BY CARL VAN DOREN AND MARK VAN DOREN

A CRITICAL and authoritative evaluation of contemporary American and British literature.

The authors—both men of outstanding importance in present-day letters—have selected the writers since 1890 who give promise of achieving permanent rank in literary history.

The book contains studies of, among others, Bernard Shaw, Thomas Hardy, Joseph Hergesheimer, Willa Cather, J. M. Synge, William Butler Yeats, Eugene O'Neill, John Masefield, Max Beerbohm, Sinclair Lewis, H. L. Mencken, Amy Lowell, and Lytton Strachey, in each case giving the reasons for the opinion that a writer has made a lasting contribution to literature, and "placing" him in relation to his contemporaries.

American, British and Irish literature are discussed separately under the headings of Poetry, Fiction, Essays and Criticism, and Drama.

A timely book for those who would be "up" in contemporary literature.

Price, $2.50

THE CENTURY CO.

353 Fourth Avenue New York City

Exchange
Sell
Buy

Something odd, rare; useful, ornamental. Try the classified section of The Nation. Your advertisement will be read by men and women of divers tastes, means and appreciation. For rates address Dept. E. S. B., The Nation.

The Nation's Student Worker Contest for university and college students who have spent the summer of 1925 at work in some industrial or agricultural occupation. For the best account of such an experience The Nation has offered a prize of $125. Second and third prizes of $75 and $25 will also be awarded. The Contest closes on October 15. Full particulars will be given in next week's issue of The Nation.

no adequate return to society. The conflicts here described embrace everything from childish quarrels to murder. The essential elements which produce the conflicts, however, exist in practically every American community and in thousands of American homes, schools, factories, and neighborhood groups. Every college dean, high-school principal, and educational administrator should read "Youth in Conflict," so that he may render a more understanding service to the youth in his charge.

Society and Its Surplus. By Newell L. Sims. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

For a full quarter century the view has been widely cultivated that the central problems of modern economics center about a more equal distribution of wealth rather than about an increase in wealth production. In the phrase of the late Simon N. Patten, our society had, so it was said, "passed from the age of an economic deficit to the age of an economic surplus." This gave rise to many hopeful visions of a new human dispensation in which there would no longer be any general concern as to the adequacy of the material basis for civilization, an era in which the great social policies would deal with the equalization of the standards of life and the spread of the best elements of the social heritage among all ranks of the people. Mr. Sims's book is admittedly inspired by that vision. Yet it is also a serious effort to construct a theory of social evolution and organization on the Spencerian principle of the equilibrations of energy. On the whole it is a worth-while book, being full of interesting data and abounding in sound and thoroughly objective sociological observations. It is regrettable that the author could not avoid the monotony of his references to the "social surplus."

Men and Policies. By Elihu Root. Harvard University Press. $5.

The eighth volume in the collected addresses of Mr. Root, edited by the late Robert Bacon and James Brown Scott, brings together some of his more recent speeches and writings under three main headings: Some Americans, Law and Its Administration, The War and Readjustment. With few exceptions they are the utterances of the private citizen; a number under the last heading represent his latest contributions to the conduct of our foreign relations—as one of the Committee of Jurists who framed the plan for the World Court, and as a member of the American Delegation to the Washington Conference. This volume recalls again the extraordinary breadth of Mr. Root's interests and the range of his influence. But Mr. Root's contributions, eminent to the conservative cause, are compact of compromise and sometimes even of confusion. Pan American unity, which his trip as Secretary of State was to cement, fell afoul the Cuban imbroglio. His work on the gas and submarine treaty at the Washington Conference is more likely to be honored in the breach than in the observance. He was one of the Thirty-one Republicans of 1920—and has not recanted, as some of his colleagues have done. There is little of the far-visioned statesmanship of Hay or Wilson in foreign policy, or of Holmes or Pound or Cardozo in domestic problems involving "the rule of law," to lift his utterances above the level of the skilful advocate of the status quo—another illustration of the failure of the elder statesmen of the last generation to grasp the essentials of continuing stability.

Mrs. Meynell and Her Literary Generation. By Anne Kimball Tuell. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

At last a full recognition has been given to the important literary distinction of Alice Meynell's prose. It is a much needed contribution to American criticism, and fortunately, as rendered by Miss Tuell, it is not academic. The elucidation of Mrs. Meynell's doctrine of the mot juste, the crystal phrase, the deliberate word, is, in itself, criticism of compelling firmness and finesse. But this chapter strikes a key which is not sustained. Only in scattered paragraphs—notably those which deal with views on woman, and with the religious poem—does the author manage to interrupt with a critical passage her avid survey of all the departments of Mrs. Meynell's enormous journalistic output. Those familiar with the work of Patmore, Francis Thompson, or Mrs. Meynell herself will find the comments on the religious poetry conducive to the respectable pleasure of affirmation. But much of what the author understands in such phrases as "Mrs. Meynell's socialism," "inward solitude," "spiritual sense," "the hidden infinitude of contradiction," "the ultimate paradox of sanctity," she leaves for the general reader obscure.

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT L. WOLF is a contributor to current periodicals and the author of "After Disillusion."

LOUIS LOZOWICK is an American artist who has exhibited in Europe and will show his paintings in New York in January. He is the author of "Modern Russian Art."

ROBERT DELL is The Nation's correspondent in Paris.

FRITZ KUNZ has lived in the Orient and now edits a fraternal magazine in California.

LUTHER E. ROBINSON is head of the department of English at Monmouth College.

W. Y. ELLIOTT, formerly professor of political science at the University of California, is now at Harvard.

JOHN A. HOBSON, British economist, was the author of a series of articles on current economic problems in The Nation during March, April, and May. He is a contributing editor of The Nation.

HARRY F. WARD, who has been spending several months in China and Japan, wrote the article The Meaning of Shanghai in The Nation for July 22.

THEATRE

SIEGFRIED

UFA'S Great Music Photo Drama Based on the Norse Saga and Wagner's Ring Operas

Limited Engagement

A Symphonic Orchestra of 60 Musicians from the Metropolitan Opera Co. Will Play a Special Score Compiled From

Wagner's Immortal Music

JOSIAH ZURO, Conducting

CENTURY, 62nd Street and Central Park West.

ALL SEATS RESERVED

TWICE DAILY, 2:30-8:30 1000 SEATS 50c BEST SEATS $2.20

406 GRAND ST. THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp

Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

International Relations Section

Law and Order in Japan

By HARRY F. WARD

LAW and order did not have to be imported into Japan along with Western industrialism. Some improvements have come in recent years, but the habit was ingrained in old Japan, so that the attitudes have become almost instinctive. The system works with a finish that makes the strivings of our super-patriots appear to be, as indeed they are, the efforts of crude and bungling novices.

Law and order in any period of history rest upon espionage. At first glance, the present Japanese system of registration and surveillance of foreigners, with the continuous oversight of suspected radicals, seems to have been "made in Germany." Undoubtedly some features of it, like the military system of Japan, come from that country, but historians tell us that in the days of the Shogunate an orderly and ambitious ruler divided the population up into blocks of five families, each five to spy continuously on another.

